The next amendment was, in section 3, line 19, after the word "purposes," to insert "as to all civil causes and proceedings," and in line 22, after the word "purposes," to insert "as to all civil causes and proceedings;" so as to read:

That the counties of Cedar, Polk, Green, Dade, Lawrence, Newton, McDonald, Barry, and Stone, of the southern division of the western district aforesaid, be, and they are hereby, attached to the western division of the western district for circuit-court purposes as to all civil causes and proceedings; and that all other counties in said southern division of the western district be, and they are hereby, attached to the central division of the western district for circuit-court purposes as to all civil causes and proceedings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 3:

And whenever the circuit and district courts in either of said districts or divisions shall be held at the same time and place, jurors shall not be summoned for each of said courts, but for both said courts, and they shall act accordingly as grand and petit jurors for both said courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 4, section 4, after the word "reside," to strike out the words "or may be found;" so as to read:

That hereafter all suits to be brought in the courts of the United States in Missouri, not of a local nature, shall be brought in the division having jurisdiction over the county where the defendants or either of them reside; but if there be more than one defendant, and a part of them reside in different divisions or districts of said State, the plaintiff may sue in either division of either district where one of such defendants resides, and send duplicate writs to the other division or district, directed to the marshal of said district, on which said writs shall be indorsed, by the plaintiff or his attorney, that the same is a duplicate of the original writ sued out of the court of the proper division and district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 1, after the word "all," to insert "civil;" and in line 6, after the word "established," to strike out "shall" and insert "may, in the discretion of the court;" so as to read:

That all civil causes and proceedings in law, equity, or bankruptcy now pending in any district or circuit court of the United States in the State of Missouri, where all the defendants (or plaintiffs, where the jurisdiction is derived from the residence of the plaintiffs) shall reside in either of the divisions in which courts are hereby established, may, in the discretion of the court, be transferred to the court of the division in which the defendants (or plaintiffs, where the jurisdiction is derived from their residence) reside, and the transfer may be made in vacation or in term-time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 19, after the word "districts," to strike out all down to and including the word "committed," in line 25; as follows:

All prosecutions for crimes and offenses, now pending in any of the courts in said eastern and western district, or any division thereof, shall be terminated by final adjudication therein, and all such prosecution hereafter commenced shall be commenced and prosecuted in the division where the offenses were committed.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

All crimes and offenses heretofore committed within either of said districts shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

The amendment was agreed to

The next amendment was, in section 7, line 1, after the word "shall," to strike out "fix" and insert "hold;" in line 11, after the word "shall," to strike out "fix" and insert "hold;" and in line 20, after the word "shall," to strike out "fix" and insert "hold;" so as to make the section read:

That before the judge shall hold the terms of courts at Saint Joseph he shall have satisfactory evidence that the county court of Buchanan County has provided and set apart for the use of said courts a court-room, clerk's office, marshal's office, and attorney's office, free of expense to the United States for rent therefor, to be used and occupied until the completion of the public building belonging to the United States Government now in process of construction at said city of Saint Joseph, at which time the courts shall be held and said offices established in said public building; and before the judge shall hold the terms of court at Hannibal he shall have satisfactory evidence that the county court of Marion County has provided and set apart for the use of said courts a court-room, clerk's office, marshal's office, and attorney's office, free of expense to the United States for rent therefor, to be used and occupied until the completion of the public building belonging to the United States Government now in process of construction at said city of Hannibal, at which time the courts shall be held and said offices established in said public building; and before the court or judge shall hold the terms of said court at Springfield he shall have satisfactory evidence that the county court of Greene County has provided and set apart for the use of said court a court-room, clerk's office, marshal's office, and attorney's office, free of expense to the United States for rent therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. VEST, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. EVARTS were appointed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent to consider and pass a bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of the same nature as the one just passed, only a great deal shorter. It is Order of Business 2154, being the bill (H. R. 6764) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Vicksburg, Miss.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator report the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. GEORGE. I reported it on the 8th of February.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being on the Calendar, a motion to take it up is not now in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know that I shall object, but——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to morning business?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I rose to make a proposition.

Mr. HARRISON. There is morning business yet to be transacted, and I suggest that we finish the morning business before we take up bills on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business has precedence under the rule. If there are no further reports of standing and select committees the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is the next business in order.

COMPLIANCE WITH PACIFIC RAILROAD FUNDING ACT.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas it is provided in section 11 of the act known as the "Pacific railroad funding act," approved May 7, A. D. 1878, and more commonly called "the Thurman funding act," as follows: "That if either of said railroad companies shall fail to perform all and singular the requirements of this act and of the acts hereinbefore mentioned, and of any other act relating to said company, to be by it performed, for the period of six months next after such performance may be due, such failure shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises derived or obtained by it from the United States; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause such forfeiture to be judicially enforced:" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he hereby is, directed to advise the Senate at his earliest practicable convenience whether the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, or either of them, have for the period of six months or longer next after such performance was due, in any manner, and if so in what manner, and when, and to what extent, failed to perform any of the requirements of said act, or of the acts of which it is amendatory, or to which it is supplemental, or of any act relating to such companies or either of them, and if so what requirements; and if there has been any such failure upon the part of said companies or either of them for the period of six months or longer, whether any proceedings, and if so their nature and when commenced, have been instituted by the Attorney-General for the purpose of judicially enforcing a forfeiture as required by the eleventh section of such act, of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises derived or obtained from the United States by such company or companies so in default.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I move that the resolution be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRA HOURS OF CLERICAL EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], which comes over under objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate as to what unusual necessity, if any, now exists for requiring a certain part of the clerks in the offices of the Adjutant-General and Surgeon-General to work extra hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WILLIAM WEBSTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution reported by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the petition of William Webster, relative to a claim for indemnity from Great Britain, which comes over by unanimous consent to be laid before the Senate this morning.

Mr. MORGAN. By consent of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and myself, members of the committee who are investigating a new point raised in the matter, we both consent to ask that the resolution may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the resolution goes over until to-morrow without prejudice.

ALPHEUS R. FRENCH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1582) for the relief of Alpheus R. French, which was to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty" before the word "dollars."

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3286) to increase the naval establishment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business having closed, the Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall move to substitute——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not——

Mr. BUTLER. It is not debatable; I am aware of that; but I have a right to make a motion that House bill 6966 be substituted for the bill moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am in favor of his bill, but it was understood yesterday between the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and myself that House bill 6966 should be taken up and considered this morning. I am satisfied it will require a very short time, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not now in order. Pending a motion to take up a particular bill, it is not in order to move to amend it by taking up some other bill. After the bill moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania is taken up for consideration it will then be in order to move to proceed to the consideration of any other bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Chair rules on that proposition, I should like to have his interpretation of the second clause of Rule IX, which appears on page 142 of the Manual. I should favor the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but it appears to me that before the arrival of 2 o'clock it is in order, a motion to proceed to the consideration of one bill being pending, to move to proceed to the consideration of another bill, without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that under the second clause of Rule IX, such a motion is very clearly not in order. The clause of Rule IX referred to reads as follows:

> Second. A motion to proceed to the consideration of any other bill on the Calendar, which motion shall not be open to amendment.

The proposition of the Senator from South Carolina is in the nature of an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. I entirely concur with the ruling of the Chair. I think, however, in case the Senate decides to take up the bill moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania, it will then be competent for me to move to substitute House bill 6966 for the bill which the Senator from Pennsylvania has in charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly, after the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is agreed to it will be in order to move to take up any other bill.

Mr. HARRIS. This is a motion to take up a bill. What is the regular order if that motion should fail?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order would be the call of House bills under the Harris rule, as it is commonly known.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion to take up any bill to the exclusion of the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3286) to increase the naval establishment, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I abstain from voting.

Mr. COLQUITT. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). I wish to inquire if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is recorded as voting on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded as voting.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask his colleague [Mr. MORRILL] if he knows how the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] would vote on this question.

Mr. MORRILL. I presume he would vote "yea." I certainly have voted "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. In view of that statement, I withdraw my vote, being paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Allison,	Eustis,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Blair,	Evarts,	McMillan,	Sawyer,

Chace,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,
Colquitt,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I voted for the consideration of the bill just taken up, but I move now that the further consideration of the bill just taken up by the Senate be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6966.

Mr. BECK. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. It is the bill (H. R. 6966) to change the time of the meeting of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory. As I said yesterday, it is a matter of the very last consequence to the people of that Territory that this bill be acted upon as early as possible. It involves——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator that debate is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent simply to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust there may be order in the Hall that we may hear what the Senator from South Carolina is saying.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please come to order. Senators will resume their seats.

Mr. BUTLER. It involves a matter of some $300,000 to the people of that Territory this year. Under an act of the Territorial Legislature of Washington, known as the gross-earnings act——

Mr. CAMERON. Is that bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not before the Senate; but the Senator from South Carolina, by unanimous consent, is discussing his motion.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from South Carolina moved to postpone the naval bill, and that motion would be debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is debatable, but the motion put by him is not, in that form. The Senator has unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. BUTLER. I was proceeding to say that under the provisions of an act of the Territorial Legislature of Washington Territory known as the gross-earnings act, the railroads of that Territory are exempt from taxation upon all their property. Within the last year or so there have been 12,000,000 acres of land withdrawn by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company that are not taxed at all. If under the act of July 10 of the last session of Congress the Territorial Legislature of Washington could meet within a reasonable time and repeal that law, it would pay into the Territorial treasury some $337,000. Under what is known as the gross-earnings act passed, as I stated, in 1883, they have never paid certainly more than $75,000.

Now, I submit that as an act of common justice to those people, the tax-payers of that Territory, this Senate ought to act upon this bill. The House of Representatives passed the bill on the 1st of last May. It was referred to the Committee on Territories on the 3d of that month, and there it has slept since. That committee has now reported adversely, with the views of the minority. I simply appeal to the Senate, as an act of common justice to the tax-payers of the Territory, that this railroad company and other railroad companies should be required to pay their proportionate share of the taxes for the support of the government of the Territory.

That is all that is involved in the bill. The bill simply provides that the Legislature shall meet, as I propose to amend it, on the first Monday in March next so as to enable the Legislature to repeal that gross-earnings act and subject to taxation the property of the railroads that run through the Territory.

I will state for the information of the Senate that, with the exception of Washington Territory, the railroad property is taxed in every Territory and State through which the Northern Pacific Railroad runs.

Mr. PLATT. The lands are not.

Mr. BUTLER. The lands are taxed; at least that is my information.

Mr. PLUMB. Has not the governor of the Territory authority to convene the Legislature?

Mr. BUTLER. He has authority to convene the Legislature in special sessions, but this does not involve the necessity of a special session. It simply changes the time of the biennial session.

Mr. PLUMB. There is a remedy in the hands of the governor.

Mr. BUTLER. There is a remedy if the people of the Territory are subjected to the additional expense of an extra session; but why do that when Congress has the power under this bill to enable that Legislature to meet not quite ten months in advance of the time now provided by law.

I will state further, while I am on my feet, that the delegates elected to the present Legislature were elected on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November last. That Legislature does not assemble until the first Monday in December of this year, thirteen months after the election, and I am informed that the Legislature was elected with the distinct understanding that this very oppressive and unjust, and I was about to say iniquitous, law should be repealed. They are committed to its repeal. As I stated awhile ago, I think I shall be able to demonstrate when the time comes that it will make a difference of $337,000 to the people of that Territory if we can get that act repealed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask the Senator, has the bill passed the House?

Mr. BUTLER. I stated awhile ago that it passed the House on the first of last May.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The bill only requires to go through the Senate, then?

Mr. BUTLER. It only requires the concurrence of the Senate. Now, I ask that the bill be taken up and considered, and that the further consideration of the bill in charge of the Senator from Pennsylvania be postponed, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BECK. Before the yeas and nays were called on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] I rose to make a remark, but being out of order then, I gave way. I only rise now to say that I have been voting with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] continuously to preserve the morning hour in order that we might pass the House bills which are now before the Senate and do something, and not because I was seeking to oppose any bill any gentleman desires to call up. The bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania will come up at 2 o'clock anyhow. The bill of the Senator from South Carolina will be reached in its place if we go on with the Calendar. I want to reserve the morning hour for House bills on the Calendar, and my vote "nay" does not indicate opposition to any particular measure, but only a desire on my part to clear the Calendar of House bills.

Mr. BUTLER. I have been as earnest as the Senator from Kentucky to adhere to that.

Mr. PLUMB. Is this debate in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion to postpone the pending bill debate is in order. The Senator from South Carolina now makes that motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I have been as anxious as any Senator to adhere to the Harris rule, as it is called, but it has not been certainly more than half an hour since the Senate, in the face of that rule, has passed a long bill here in regard to courts in Missouri, and I heard not one single objection to the consideration of that bill. Now, here is a bill, as I have stated again and again, of the very first consequence to the people of Washington Territory, and yet I have not been able to get the Senate to consider it even. I submit that it is an act of injustice to the people of that Territory. They are entitled to be heard and have this bill considered in their interest. I therefore insist on my motion.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I dislike to detain the Senate from the discussion of the bill which has just been taken up with reference to the increase of our Navy, and therefore I will simply at this time say this: There is no disposition on the part of the majority of the Committee on Territories to postpone the consideration of the bill mentioned by the Senator from South Carolina. The majority of the committee have reported adversely to it in the belief that the tax-payers of Washington Territory do not want at the present time its legislature to convene in the month of March. I will not reply at length to what has been said by the Senator from South Carolina; I simply leave the matter upon the statement I have just made. The majority of the committee has no desire to delay the bill, and if it were not for the importance of the bill which has been taken up, I should be very glad to have it considered this morning, but I must vote against taking it up now.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood that the Senator from Connecticut agreed yesterday, and it is so announced in the RECORD, to assist me in getting up this bill to-day. While the majority of the Committee on Territories perhaps have not a disposition to postpone it, they have certainly shown no inclination whatever to expedite its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. I will meet that when it comes. When the vote came up on the question of whether this measure of great public importance should be taken up or not, I was bound to vote in favor of that.

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone the pending bill and take up the bill referred to by the Senator from South Carolina.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], and not knowing how he would vote on this question if present, I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Beck,	Coke,	Hampton,	Van Wyck,
Berry,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest,
Butler,	Fair,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Call,	George,	Saulsbury,	Whitthorne,

So the motion was not agreed to.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 3286) to increase the naval establishment is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I believe all the amendments that were offered yesterday were disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment is pending.

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill, but I offer an amendment to strike out all of section 3 down to and including the word "beyond" in line 7, and to insert:

The contract for the construction of said vessels shall contain provisions to the effect that the contractor guarantees that when completed and tested for speed under conditions to be prescribed by the Navy Department, the vessels shall exhibit a maximum speed of at least twenty knots per hour, and for every quarter knot of speed so exhibited above said guarantee the contractor shall receive a premium over and above his contract price of $50,000, and for every quarter knot that said vessel fails of reaching said guaranteed speed there shall be deducted from the contract price the sum of $50,000.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I understand the amendment of the Senator from Maine practically ignores the main feature of the bill as offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. As I read his remarks, the great point of this bill is to fix to a certainty that these cruisers shall make 20 knots an hour; and now another member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Senator from Maine, now opens the door to escape from that which was to be the main feature of the bill, by providing that the speed may be less than 20 knots an hour and saying what shall be the forfeiture or upon what terms they may make less than 20 knots an hour.

I should like to ask my friend from Maine or the Senator from Pennsylvania how many war vessels to-day in the world are making 20 knots an hour.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe there is but one.

Mr. HALE. When the Senator from Nebraska is through I will answer what he says.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will pause, then, in my remarks, and let the Senator from Maine take the floor. I prefer to have that question answered before I proceed.

Mr. HALE. The object of this amendment is very plain to anybody who has heard it read. To obtain a speed of 20 knots, sea miles, per hour, would be a great feat in naval construction. It is believed that it can be done. The committee believes that it can be done. The committee believes that American ingenuity and skill, when encouraged as they will be by the passage of this bill and the chance to build these vessels, will produce that almost wonder in naval architecture, a vessel that will make 20 knots an hour. But it has not been done in many cases up to the present time. The Thompsons, ship contractors and builders, have built for the Spanish navy a ship that makes under the severest tests 20 knots per hour. That is more than 22 land miles. The war ship that can do that can overtake nine-tenths and perhaps, ninety-one one-hundredths of all the commercial ships that sail upon the seas. But to obtain that requires the best appliances of skill, that no accident shall happen on the trial, and that there shall be favoring conditions.

Without this amendment the contractor who honestly enters into the contract and strives to attain this maximum speed with the bonus that is offered for the speed above, might find himself a quarter of a knot below 20 knots, with the whole ship thrown upon his hands. The danger is that under these conditions and risks no contractor will dare to enter upon the enterprise. His peril is so great for losing a quarter of a knot an hour that he may not dare to build the ship, and so the whole enterprise is "turned awry," and nothing can be done.

On further consultation with ship-builders and the Department officers, it was deemed advisable to introduce the feature embodied in my amendment; and that is this: Twenty knots per hour is the desideratum. We hope and believe it can be obtained. If the contractor can go a knot beyond he shall have $50,000 for every quarter of a knot, and we can well afford to pay that. Twenty-one knots an hour will give us ships that the world can not equal, and hardly approach. If, on the other hand, he fails in a little and only produces a ship that will make 19¾ knots, which is an amazingly fast ship, he shall forfeit $50,000 of his contract. If he fails in a half knot he shall forfeit $50,000 more. If he produces a 19-knot ship he forfeits $200,000. The ship will cost, we will say, $1,300,000. If he furnishes a 19-knot ship, faster than four-fifths or nine-tenths of the war ships of the globe, he only gets $1,100,000; if he furnishes an 18-knot ship he only gets $900,000 for a ship that, if built as an 18-knot ship, he would get $1,000,000 for; and we could afford to take it. If he furnishes a 17-knot ship, then he only gets $700,000.

The penalty is so tremendous, is so dissuasive of anything like carelessness or lack of earnest endeavor that I believe—and that is my motive in offering the amendment—that it is a safe, practical measure to embody upon this bill. It does not involve the abandonment of the 20-knot speed; but it does encourage contractors and stimulate them to enter upon this great work in a contract with the Government that shall not be their ruin if they fail in a quarter of a knot.

That is why I offer the amendment. I offer it as a practical measure, because I believe it will help the movement; and I do not think it will result, I am sure it will not, in our getting anything but fast ships.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There was so much noise in the Chamber that at this distance I did not catch the Senator's remarks at first in reply to the question as to how many war ships in the world sailed at twenty knots an hour. I did not understand what he said as to that point.

Mr. HALE. I think at present there is but one ship that upon tests and trial and use afterwards has demonstrated clearly a speed of 20 knots an hour. That, as I have said, is a ship that was made by the Thompsons, the great builders, for the Spanish Government. But the Senator understands that year by year the rate of speed attainable by built and used ships has been growing. Fourteen knots was a high rate of speed a few years ago. Then 16 knots; then they crept up to 18; and now the naval architects of the world are striving to reach this maximum of 20 knots per hour. I think it will be done.

Mr. VAN WYCK. We were admonished yesterday that this committee had been a long time wrestling with this question, and that the Congress and the people of the United States had been some twenty years in a wrestle with this question, and the maturity of their judgment and the wisdom of the committee was expressed in this bill—this bill which provided for a speed of 20 knots an hour. That was the able speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] who proposed the bill. He said:

A cruiser which makes 15 knots an hour, when the fast passenger steamers that would be pressed into service in war make 18 to 19 knots on every voyage, is of somewhat doubtful utility.

Again:

One of the first authorities in the world on the subject thus gives as his opinion that a still greater speed than 20 knots is demanded. In view of this it would be unwise for us to begin to build ships of a lesser speed.

And the next day comes an amendment from a distinguished Senator, a member of that committee, substantially authorizing the building of vessels at a lesser speed. There is the attitude. The Senator from Pennsylvania tells us that we must not commence to build vessels to have a lesser speed than 20 knots an hour, and the Senator from Maine ingeniously proposes his amendment because some ship-builder suggested it, and therefore it is that he proposes to hedge in this matter, or so that the committee may hedge, or the Navy Department or the contractors may hedge against the Government and against the people, and by his amendment he admits that we shall have to probably commence building vessels which will have a speed of less than 20 knots an hour.

We have the record presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania in his speech of yesterday from the navies of the world, and his arraignment of the people of the United States and this Government that we have no Navy. We have heard that not only in this year but in previous years in the way of denunciation. The record submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania in this usual arraignment of the people of the United States because we have no Navy, presents the navies of the world, with the speed of their war vessels and their number, and we find that in this record there is recorded but one vessel in the navies of the world that makes 18½ knots an hour. The vessel floating to-day anywhere in the waters of the world that makes 20 knots an hour has not found a place in the catalogue of the navies in it. The highest record is 18½ knots an hour, and there seems to be but one, and that belongs to France. France is the only nation, and she has only one war vessel that seems, according to the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to make 18½ knots an hour.

Mr. President, it would seem perfectly idle to introduce a bill providing that ten vessels shall be built with a speed of 20 knots an hour, when, with all the skill, all the ability, all the expenditure of money by millions, as appears by the Senator's speech, by all the nations of the earth, among all their navies, grand and expensive as they are, they have only one vessel that makes 18½ knots an hour. Now, we propose to do an impossibility, to build ten steamers that will make 20 knots an hour; and that beautiful picture was shown us yesterday, and it went upon the wires throughout the length and breadth of this land, and I suppose was cabled to the nations of the earth, who thought they had navies—that ten vessels are to be built here which will make 20 knots an hour.

The committee evidently ascertained their mistake in this bill and in that declaration, and now this morning the committee come and say they really think after all it may be impossible to construct a vessel making 20 knots an hour. After they had promised the people of this country and proclaimed it to the nations of the earth that we can build vessels making 20 knots an hour, now they come in with a confession that after all that thing is of very doubtful result, and therefore this amendment is made, and you provide that they may make 18 or 17 or whatever number of knots it may be after we have been amused, as the Senator from Kansas said yesterday, with the declaration of our ability to build war ships making 20 knots an hour, and the same committee actually come into the Senate and admit that after all that is probably an impossibility.

I desire, as I said yesterday, to call attention to this bill and kindred bills. We had, as I said yesterday, twin bills passed a few days ago, and I think the Senator from Maine characterized his bill for some protection of the great lakes as a companion to this bill—a companion because I suppose it appropriates about the same amount of money, $15,000,000.

So, Mr. President, it does seem there should be a little hedging and that we should go slow ourselves. It is not necessary that we should make 20 knots an hour in the hasty consideration and passage of this bill. We had better go a little slow ourselves when the committee doubt the correctness of their own bill and of their own conditions. I did intend to ask this committee where was to be the remedy if these ships were found not to make 20 knots an hour; but the matter was evidently anticipated by the committee, because they provide this as the penalty. The rate of speed, I think, was fixed for the Dolphin. How many knots an hour was the Dolphin to make? Will my friends on the committee tell me?

Mr. HALE. Fourteen.

Mr. VAN WYCK. She was to make 14 knots; and how many knots did she make when she was tested? Can my friend from South Carolina tell me?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not remember.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Dolphin was made at one of the best yards in the United States by one of the best ship-builders in the United States. We have no better to-day, my friend from Maine will admit. She was to make 14 knots an hour, and when she came to the actual test in service she failed to make it, and the Navy Department was embroiled and the ship-builder was annoyed and the nation was agitated over the Dolphin, and we heard nothing but the Dolphin for a long time.

Now we start with this bill. The committee have practically admitted that no vessels here can be built to make 20 knots an hour. What next? We are told we must have them. What are these vessels for? To catch fast-going passenger vessels that make 18 knots an hour. And yet we are told that if the result is less than 20 knots there shall be an easy escape for the contractor, and no certainty or guarantee that the nation will be provided with vessels of the speed of which we boast. Therefore we come to the conclusion to which I called attention yesterday, practically this bill will give no vessel at 20 knots an hour or near it. John Roach's ship-yard, it seems, could not get 14. The ingenuity of the world furnishes about that quota, not rising beyond 18½ knots.

There is some other purpose. I trust we shall stop here long enough and that the American people will stop long enough to see where there is amusement in this matter. It is not practical. It is conceded already before the passage of the bill that there will be no 20 knots an hour. Therefore it is to deplete the Treasury, as I said before, and it is well to repeat it—to deplete the Treasury. It is a sudden thought, or we certainly should not have spent nearly two years in this Congress; and now when we are only within about two weeks of the end of it, we propose twin bills and companion bills for the purpose of depleting the Treasury, and have actually succeeded in proposing to get out over $70,000,000.

The surplus in the Treasury, as I have stated, is so exasperating, is so annoying to the people, that these gentlemen must commence—and I want to call the attention of this committee and the Senate and the people of this country to the fact that the principal object in these twin bills, in my judgment, without, of course, any reflection upon this committee or any member of the Senate—that the object of these twin bills and of the companion bills is to deplete or seem to empty the Treasury so that there may be no excuse for withdrawing taxes which are weighing heavily upon the people; that then there will be an argument that the revenues will not be sufficient; there will be an argument that oppressive tariff duties must be retained, because they will say the Treasury is in the way of depletion.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have no sense of humiliation over having learned something over night. I acknowledge that the feature to which I have adverted of the danger if the rigid test of the bill was passed of preventing contractors from entering into these contracts is much stronger to-day than it was yesterday. Thinking it over, talking it over with an honest purpose of getting good, fast, swift ships built, I have offered this amendment as a practical means. I think it will commend itself to the good sense of the Senate. The Senate will not desire to enter upon this great enterprise under impracticable conditions.

As I have said, this amendment does not prevent the 20-knot ship being produced. I hope and believe it will be produced, and the penalty is so great for every lapse from that, for ever quarter of a knot below 20 that is not reached by the contractor, that he, earnestly striving day and night to save that penalty, will try to build his ship to run 20 knots.

I wish the Senator from Nebraska could realize that it is possible for a bill to be reported here from a committee without a sinister object, that there is some earnestness in the desire of the committee that fathers this bill to increase the national security and to contribute to the national defense, and that in considering that question, one of the questions which are now uppermost with the American public and which interest the citizen as well in the West as in the East, that this is not brought here as a trick to prevent the reduction of taxation, but that it has its root in a sincere purpose to do for the American people, for their protection and security, what should be done and what they desire to have done. There is no purpose to divert any wise or sound measure in any other direction in the way of reducing taxation; and I do not propose to take up any more time of the Senate, because the hour is so rapidly passing away. We do not want to get in the position we were at 2 o'clock yesterday of antagonizing another bill that the Senate wants to pass. So I will take no more time.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. President, I am induced by the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I state the reasons which govern me in supporting this and its companion measure.

Premising that a false impression is made when it is assumed that $30,000,000 is immediately taken out of the Treasury for the purpose of building these cruisers, and other vessels of war, I wish to say that it will take possibly five or six years. That number of years will be consumed in exhausting this appropriation. In other words it will practically amount to an appropriation of about five or six million dollars per annum, supposing both bills to pass—a trifling sum in my judgment, in view of what I believe is demanded alike by the honor and the interest of the Government of the United States.

The same impression, false in character, prevails as to the measure passed the other day contemplating fortifications and the building of ordnance plant. I am, for one, free to say that I do not share much of the fancy for fortifications. I believe that our coast, our commerce, all that we may hold dear, can better be protected by an efficient navy than by any system of land fortifications, and I believe that the people of this country realize the necessity and the duty of the hour to be to commence the work of providing an efficient navy.

What was the idea in the committee as to the pending bill for cruisers? What office will they perform? These are to be swift vessels to overtake an adversary's commerce; and when you look to the condition of the marine vessels of the nations of the earth it is well to see what is their rate of speed. If you are building a cruiser to overtake them you are not to measure it by what is to be accomplished in the rate of speed by war vessels alone.

If the heavy-armored vessels of any foreign country are to be brought in attack against our shores, I venture the judgment that with a fleet of fast cruisers on our part, that shall act as the cavalry of the sea, these heavy-armored vessels never will reach the coast of the United States, or, reaching it, will not be in a condition to harm any of its citizens. They will be compelled to pause in mid-ocean by the attack of your cavalry and to defend and fight for their own life and strength. These great engines of war are armor-clad steam vessels, and when they come to assail your coasts, if you have an active cavalry with modern guns to attack them they will be delayed in their passage, and every hour's delay is the exhaustion of their means of attack, and when they reach your coast they will be almost powerless, and if that cavalry is there to surround them it will make them inefficient in their attacks.

I have some such idea as that, and it is with that view I have supported this original bill.

For one, I am frank to say that I wish my friend from Maine would in his amendment put the measure down and make it impossible for the Government to accept any vessel of a less rate of speed than 19 knots an hour. Our object, or at least mine, in supporting this bill was to secure that which is to give the dominion of the seas to the nation that has the speed. I voted for this original bill simply and solely with the idea of giving a bounty to the inventors, the contractors, the ship-builders of this country who will enable, in that great struggle for the dominion of the seas, the Government of the United States by an accomplished rate of speed to secure it. It is with that view that I was in favor of the original bill, and I should be glad if my friend from Maine in his amendment would make it impossible for the Secretary of the Navy or the Government of the United States to accept any vessel of less than 19 knots, leaving all claims of contractors to be settled in the future on their equity. Here is due notice to contractors: "Here is the speed we want: if you reach it we will pay for it." Fix no graded standard for them afterward to appeal to our sympathies.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I think if the rule that the Senator from Tennessee proposes were to be laid down by Congress we should have no ships. We are dealing confessedly with a subject of the first importance and ought, therefore, to act with deliberation.

We labor under the misfortune of not being able to read in the text of the bill the amendments that have already been made, and have only heard from the desk the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

The difficulty which troubles me in this matter is that yesterday we were told that this bill represented the deliberate and final thought of the Committee on Naval Affairs with regard to the course that the Government ought to pursue in connection with this great subject, and to-day we are told by a member of that committee that the bill, as it came before us yesterday, is wholly impracticable.

Now, as the Senator from Maine suggests, it is no discredit to a Senator to admit that he has learned something over night, but the inference is irresistible that, if a Senator who has had this matter in charge has learned something over night and to-day says that that is impracticable which yesterday he urged upon the attention of the Senate, the summit of human wisdom on this subject may not yet have been reached, and that perhaps it might be advisable to take another night over it.

Now the Senator from Tennessee suggests that he desires to have a standard of speed set up by Congress that shall exclude any vessel which performs less than 19 knots an hour, so that the contractor may have due notice in advance and be definitely advised that if upon trial, after the expenditure of a million or a million and a half of dollars, the vessel does not reach that maximum speed, she is to be rejected. The somewhat celebrated contention in the case of the Dolphin is fresh in our mind; and, if I remember, it was one of the allegations by the Navy Department against that vessel that she did not reach the rate of speed which the contract called for and which the law required. What was the reply to that? The contractor said this vessel has been constructed upon plans and specifications that were prepared by the Navy Department and approved by the naval board of constructors; therefore, the only question is not whether the maximum rate of speed has been attained, but whether the Dolphin was constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications prepared by the Navy Department. Am I not right? Yes.

Here in this bill the committee propose to declare that no vessel shall be accepted unless it reaches a maximum speed of 20 knots an hour, and that these vessels are to be constructed, if we provide the money for them, in accordance with the provisions of the act of 1886. Under that act, if I have read it aright, the contractor has nothing whatever to do with the plans. He merely takes up the plans that are furnished to him by the Navy Department, and proceeds to construct the ship, and when she is launched and sent out upon her trial trip if she does not make the required maximum of 19 or 20 knots an hour you propose to say that she shall not be accepted.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me right there——

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. With his usual acumen the Senator has discovered what must necessarily follow if this amendment of mine should be adopted. I have already, in the bill which I have, upon lines 9 and 10, of section 1, marked as the next amendment which accompanies this the striking out of these words:

Before either of said cruisers shall be accepted by the Government.

The Senator is right. If the amendment be adopted, that clause of course should be struck out as not being harmonious, and if it will not in any way interrupt the Senator I would like here to refer to what he was saying about these plans and specifications.

There he has struck what is one of the practical difficulties in this movement toward building up or habilitating our Navy and constructing new ships. The contractor is all the time under disability in building from plans that are sent to him, which are rigid in every detail and nature, made in the Navy Department. That can only be cured by good, broad, wise, generous administration. I can only illustrate it by saying what I would do if I were at the head of the Navy Department. Before making plans and specifications, which are given to the contractor, I would call before me the great ship-builders and naval architects, if we have them in the country, outside of the Navy Department, and before establishing my plans and laying down my lines that should be followed, I would get the benefit of their ingenuity, of every device that they have in their minds as to proportions, as to lines, as to location of machinery, and before I put out the proposals that American ship-builders have got to act upon I would know whether these American ship-builders believe that under certain plans, which they have helped to suggest, and which my judgment would approve, these ships could be built; because so long as the plans are made without reference to the practical suggestions of the builders who are to execute the contracts, just so long the trouble will arise that arose in the case of the Dolphin and other naval structures. That, as I have said—and I ask pardon of the Senator from Kansas for using so much of his time—is the remedy. It is in wise administration.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the interesting statement of the Senator from Maine has been no intrusion on my time, because I am sure all desire the same end, and that is the construction and maintenance of an adequate navy at the least possible expense to the Government; but what he has said is an apt illustration of my proposition, that we had better make haste slowly in this matter. Festina lente should be the rule of our conduct, because he admits, after what I have said, and it was undoubtedly in his mind before, that there is still another amendment that must inevitably be made to this bill before it can be enacted, that is, that we shall strike from it that fundamental provision on which the Senator from Tennessee insisted, and that is that unless these vessels when constructed reach the standard of speed prescribed by the bill they shall not be accepted by the Government. That represents as radical a distinction in the opinions of this committee upon a question of vital moment as could possibly be conceived.

Now, Mr. President, the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine as to what he would do in this matter appears to be also open to criticism, from the fact that he suggests as an alternative a method which never has been adopted before, and which can not possibly be applied with force and effectiveness in this matter.

I had the good fortune not long since to converse with an officer high in the naval service, and to talk with him about this very subject, and he said that it was impossible to solve upon paper the problem of speed and of perform ance in naval construction. Given the elements of the problem to con truct a vessel of so many thousand tons burden that shall make so many knots an hour under so many revolutions of the propeller, with an engine of so many horse-power, and he said to me that no engineer and no builder could make plans that would reach the result which was required to be attained with any certainty within a margin of from 10 to 20 per cent.; and he stated, what was more singular still to me, that two vessels might be constructed from the same plan, by the same constructor, and under essentially the same conditions, and that they never would be equal to each other either in speed or in performance.

Mr. HALE. Very likely.

Mr. INGALLS. That there was an undefinable margin of friction, the unknown quantity as we might say in an algebraic problem, which can not be computed, and which therefore must be rejected in the solution of this problem where specific results are required to be attained.

If this is the case, if we are attempting to solve that problem and declare that we will not accept a ship constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications of the Navy Department unless it reaches the specific speed that has been agreed upon, then of course we are going to have no ships at all, because no contractor will undertake to spend millions in armor and in labor and in material if a problem confessedly so abstruse and uncertain as this is is to be laid before him, and he is the person who is required scientifically to solve it, and therefore the Senator from Maine does well in proposing to amend the bill by striking out this provision in section 1.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. INGALLS. Not now; but in a moment I shall yield. There were some other matters to which I desired to call the attention of the Senate in connection with this bill, but as I have said now all I desired to submit upon this particular point, I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall not detain the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2288) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Railway Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that that be laid aside.

Mr. INGALLS. Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. CAMERON. I am afraid I can not get it.

Mr. VEST. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that it be laid aside until to-morrow.

Mr. VEST. We have only some fourteen or fifteen working days of the session left, and we must dispose of the regular order at some time. I ask the Senate to continue its consideration to-day until it is concluded. I hope the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania will not prevail.

Mr. CAMERON. I make my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the consideration of the unfinished business be postponed until 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I think if the Senator will modify that and move to postpone it for an hour that without any doubt the naval bill will be out of the way. I think there will be no further discussion of consequence.

Mr. VEST. It is simply impossible to dispose of the naval bill in an hour. I know myself a number of Senators who propose to speak upon it, and it is out of the question to talk about expending $15,000,000 presently and twenty-odd million dollars probably in a bill like that at this stage of the session, as you can dispose of an ordinary bill for a bridge across a river.

Mr. HALE. What is the belief of the Senator from Missouri about the Senate disposing of his bill this afternoon?

Mr. VEST. I know no reason in the world why it can not be disposed of. If we consider that bill for an hour each day and then put it off, it will take a long time. I do not want to speak on it. I simply want a vote. I shall be compelled to leave the city in a day or two on absolutely imperative business.

Mr. HALE. I am very anxious, as is the Senator from Pennsylvania, to dispose of the naval bill, but I see the difficulty the Senator from Missouri is laboring under. He has been very indulgent in other matters. I think under the circumstances I would allow the naval bill to go over until to-morrow morning after the routine business, and then let us take it up and insist on its holding its way until it is finished.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will adopt that suggestion.

Mr. CAMERON. As the Committee on Naval Affairs do not seem disposed to have their bill acted on, I shall adopt the suggestion.

Mr. BUTLER. As the Senator well knows, I am very earnestly in favor of the bill and of its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. It is a pretty good discussion. It will do good.

Mr. BUTLER. I think, in common fairness to the Senator from Missouri, who has had the Eads bill on his hands for the last ten days or two weeks, we ought to allow him to finish it to-day if possible, so that I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CAMERON. I will adopt the suggestion of the members of the Naval Committee, and let the bill go over until to-morrow. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he will adopt the suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina, or the Senator from Maine. I simply desire to say that that must not be construed to imply unanimous consent to the taking up of the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania after the routine of business to-morrow morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No unanimous consent for anything hereafter.

Mr. HALE. It depends on the will of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. If a majority of the Senate propose to take it up, they can do so to-morrow morning, but it can only be done in that way.

Mr. BECK. I gave notice that I would call up a bill of considerable importance, though a private bill, at 2 o'clock to-day, the bill (S. 31) for the relief of Warren Mitchell; but the condition of things is such that there is no chance for that to-day. I give notice again, however, that I will endeavor to get it up on Thursday at 2 o'clock. I hope these important measures will be out of the way by that time.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me to make a suggestion to him, I would suggest that we agree if possible to take a vote on this Eads railway bill at 5 o'clock to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No agreement about it or anything else during the rest of the session.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask that an order be now considered from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which I hold in my hand.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to anything that requires unanimous consent.

Mr. EVARTS. It is merely for printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS (to Mr. EVARTS). You can offer it as a resolution and have it come up to-morrow.

Mr. EVARTS. I want it passed to-day. It has relation only to printing the testimony that we are taking from day to day.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand; but the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has served notice on the Senate that nothing goes through by unanimous consent, and I am simply acting on what he has said. I object to the consideration of this matter.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. BLAIR. To introduce a bill. This is morning business.

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to request the President of the United States to return to the House the bill (H. R. 5652) for the relief of James W. Goodrich.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 367) to amend section 536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the division of the State of Illinois into judicial districts, and to provide for holding terms of court of the northern district at the city of Peoria.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10394) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PEEL, Mr. SKINNER, and Mr. PERKINS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10394) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. DAWES, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. CALL the managers on the part of the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 10799) for the relief of St. Dominick's church, in the District of Columbia, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). This bill will lie on the table by request.

MAIL MESSENGERS.

Mr. CONGER. A conference committee was appointed on the bill (H. R. 8346) authorizing the employment of mail messengers in the postal service, of which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] was a member, but his sickness prevents his attendance. The House conferees are anxious to meet, and I move that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] be placed on that conference committee in the place of the Senator from Rhode Island, who is unwell.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] take the place of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] on the committee of conference named by him in view of the inability of the Senator from Rhode Island to attend. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10666) for the allowance of certain claims reported allowed by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVARTS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY HOSPITAL STEWARDS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1119) providing for the appointment of hospital stewards in the Army, as amended by the House of Representatives, to report it with the recommendation that the Senate concur in the House amendments. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator to let that stand over.

Mr. MANDERSON. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. And let the amendments be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC SHIP-RAILWAY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2288) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Railway Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill now under consideration, and I hope the friends of the bill will not object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The amendment is not in order now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the pending amendment be reported.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I presume it is in order to offer an amendment and have it printed, to come up in its order.

Mr. INGALLS. By unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It may be done without objection. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], which will be read on the request of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to modify the language of that amendment. I will say that I accept as a substitute for my amendment one prepared by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], which I will offer as mine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama modifies his amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to section 1 the following proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be considered as a waiver of any rights which the United States may now have under any treaty heretofore made with Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If in order now, I offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe I had the floor yesterday, but I do not object to the amendment being received.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. VAN WYCK as follows:

That no certificate for stock shall be issued until the same shall be fully paid for in money at the par value of said stock and the money deposited in the treasury of said company, and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid. No bond shall be issued until the full amount of stock authorized has been subscribed and 50 per cent. of that full amount paid in money into the treasury of said company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of my friend from Nebraska for a moment, I ask him to look at the amendment pending from the Senator from Missouri to take the place of the whole bill, being all that the promoters of this scheme think it fit to ask for now, and he will see that this corporation being created by this amendment, which is the only thing that is asked for, does not have any stock. It is not a corporation having any capital stock at all, and therefore an amendment which provides that the capital stock must be paid in, or any part of it, would be inofficious, as the lawyers say about wills; that is to say, it would have no application at all.

This is the most singular corporation, I suppose——

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is there no provision for stock or bonds either?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a provision for bonds in a certain way that I shall come to presently. I wish the Senator from Nebraska would get a copy of this proposed bill, proposed by the Senator from Missouri, and just look at it and see whether it is not perfectly unique in the whole history of Congressional or State legislation, unless it may be a corporation to establish a burial ground or something of that sort in some State:

That for the purpose of constructing and operating said ship-railway and its accessories hereinbefore recited—

Referred to in the preamble under the Mexican concession—

and for the full enjoyment of all the rights, privileges, and concessions contained in the hereinbefore recited grant, and such others as may be hereafter secured from the Government of Mexico—

Whatever they may be, Eads and his associates—and their successors, are hereby created a body corporate and politic in deed and in law under and by the name, style, and title of "The Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Railway Company," and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and shall be able to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, defend and be defended, in all courts of law and equity within the United States of America—

No matter where the jurisdiction may lie—

and shall generally have and possess all the rights, privileges, and powers usually possessed by similar companies, and may do all lawful things necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act, and secure the full enjoyment of the powers, privileges, rights, and concessions contained in the grant herein before recited, and any supplementary grant; and said company is hereby authorized and empowered to make and have a common seal, to acquire, hold, transfer, or otherwise dispose of property, real and personal—

Without any limit as to the amount—to issue capital stock and bonds in such amount, which shall not, however, exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000, and to elect such officers, employ such agents and attorneys, establish such offices in such place or places, and impose and collect such tolls, rates, and charges as to it, said company, may seem necessary and proper; and said company is hereby authorized and empowered to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as it may deem necessary and proper—

Not as shall be necessary, but as the corporation may deem in their judgment necessary—relating to the management of the affairs of the company; the issue and sale of its stock and bonds; the acquisition and disposal of its property, estate, and effects; the imposition and collection of its tolls, rates, and charges; the declaration of dividends on its capital stock; the number and character of its officers, their duties and terms of office; the safety and control of vessels in transit or in the docks, harbors, or works of the company; and relating to all other matters not inconsistent with this act, and connected with the business of said company or involved in carrying out the purposes for which said company is created.

There is the corporation. I stated to my friend from Nebraska that it had not any capital stock, although the phrase "capital stock" is used in it; but the amount of capital stock that is to exist, how it is to be issued, the quantum of its shares, and every other thing connected with it are left entirely to the discretion of Eads and his associates.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Left in a most dangerous form, I would say to the Senator from Vermont—left entirely to the by-laws to be framed by the directors of this corporation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, that is precisely what it is.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The more necessity for some restraint about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know; but the restraint my friend has provided is a restraint which will be utterly ineffectual; and the point I wish to call the attention of the Senate to is in respect of this corporation created by this act that I do not believe in the statute-books of any civilized country on this globe can be found to exist a business corporation with that kind of performance in respect of its creation and of its powers. As they would say in Ireland, it would be a kiting corporation, where the kite raises the wind instead of the wind raising the kite, as an Irish lawyer once said to an English judge who went over there.

I repeat, Mr. President, and I ask Senators to think of it in respect of voting for this measure, however much they may be desirous of making an incorporation which shall be authorized to do that thing, there is no precedent for it that I know of, safe or unsafe, in the legislation of any State, and certainly none in the legislation of Congress, because we never passed an act of incorporation except for local purposes, with definite provisions, in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, excepting the Bank of the United States and the Union Pacific and its associated railroads. Here you have a corporation which is created and left to itself to do whatever it may or will do for the objects that it deems to be suitable to attain the ends that it may have in view. That is the nature of this corporation; and if it were proposed to be incorporated in the District of Columbia for any business whatever, I do not believe in its present form, or anything like its present form, it could get on the yeas and nays the vote of a single Senator in this body.

There is not even left in the bill the power of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal it. It is a perpetual grant, without the power of repeal on the part of Congress or any other dominion that all legislative bodies now that represent the people assert over every corporation which it creates. That is what it is.

But where do we get the power to create a corporation of this kind even with a definite and stated capital stock, definite and stated powers, and a definite and stated reservation of the right to repeal? Under what clause of the Constitution of the United States does the Senator from Missouri undertake to defend or maintain the power of Congress to enact this bill in the form that he has it, amended in the way that I have suggested that it might be amended to come somewhere within the range of State acts of incorporation?

The question of the power of Congress to establish corporations was elaborately and exhaustively discussed and decided in the case of the Bank of the United States, which was chartered by Congress to carry on or to assist in carrying on the fiscal operations of the Government. The only ground that the Supreme Court of the United States could find, and the only ground that they state or that anybody hinted at in the course of the discussions, was that it was to aid the Government of the United States as an incidental power to execute some one or more of the powers that the Constitution had reposed in the Congress of the United States in carrying on the operations of the Government.

Does this bill provide for assisting the Government of the United States, or does it have any reference to any act or thing that the Government of the United States may gain or do in carrying on its operations? Far from it. The concession, as it is called, and which I will assume for the purposes of what I have to say, is a constitutional concession by the Government of Mexico, although I do not know it. The concession provides in explicit terms that any and every incorporation that Eads and his associates may get there or elsewhere, as the phrase is in the concession, shall be purely and exclusively a Mexican corporation; that it shall be under the dominion of the Mexican Government; that it shall be a part of the municipal exertion of Mexican power, and nothing else. Now, let us see if I am right about that:

ART. 32. The company shall be Mexican, even though some or all of its shareholders be foreigners, and shall be subject exclusively to the jurisdictions of the tribunals of the republic in all matters of which the cause and action may take place within its territory. The company itself, as well as all foreigners and the successors taking part in the enterprise, whether as shareholders, employés, or in any character whatsoever, shall be considered as Mexicans in all things relating to the company, nor can they even allege, with regard to title to property and other matters connected with the company, rights as foreigners, under any pretext whatsoever. They shall have those rights and the means of making them valid which the laws of the republic confer on Mexicans, and consequently not subject to interference on the part of foreign diplomatic agents.

ART. 33. The executive will be represented in the board of directors of the company by two-thirds of the whole number of the directors of the company, those whom it shall appoint in compliance with this provision having the same emoluments and prerogatives as those of the company which the enterprise will pay.

Then follows another article on the subject of what the company may do.

I have now shown you that this company, wherever organized, wherever incorporated, is to be purely a Mexican company, for Mexican purposes just as much as if it were incorporated in the Republic of Mexico or in some one of its States, and just as much as if every one of its shareholders and bondholders was a citizen of that republic or of the Mexican State in which it might be incorporated. That is the nature of the corporation which the Congress of the United States is asked to create. Where do we get the power to do it?

As I said a little while ago, the utmost that could be maintained in respect of the power of Congress to create corporations out of the District of Columbia and the Territories was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in McCulloch vs. Maryland, where they held that the incorporation of a bank of the United States could be upheld upon the ground that it was created, by the terms of its charter, to be the fiscal agent of the Government of the United States, and therefore in the exercise of the incidental power of raising and supporting armies, of borrowing money, the transmission of exchanges to foreign agents, and all that sort of thing, it was within the incidental power of Congress to create a corporation to assist it, to be a means through which and by which the Congress and the law should carry on the operations of the Government of the United States.

This incorporation does not propose that the United States of America shall have anything to do with it except to give it a send-off, except to do exactly the same thing as if Congress to-day were asked by an additional section in this bill to create a bank in the city of Chihuahua, or in the city of Tehuantepec, in the Republic of Mexico, to create a manufacturing corporation there, to create any corporation of any kind which under the laws of Mexico was to exist there, and to be there, and to be a Mexican corporation wherever created. Where does the Congress of the United States get that power? I should be glad to hear my friend from Missouri, whose knowledge of constitutional law and of all other law I know is complete, answer me that question. But, of course, it can not be done.

Now, what sort of a corporation is this which is to be created? What are its powers? What is it to do? One of the things that the United States are asked to do in creating this being is to provide that the being of its creation shall, as I have said, be a Mexican citizen and subject to all intents and purposes whatever, and, secondly, that it shall never have any relations with the Government of the United States.

Article 15 of the concession refers to carriage for the Mexican Government, which I shall not take the time of the Senate to read because I want to get on. Then:

ART. 16. Passage over the railway shall be open for all the vessels of all the nations not at war with Mexico, and the government of the republic binds itself not to close to ocean commerce, during the time of the concession, either of the two terminal ports of the interoceanic ship-railway, one in the Gulf, the other in the Pacific, except in case of war.

Then it makes a subdivision of heads:

The passage of ships shall be subject to precisely the following conditions:

1. The passage shall be open at all times to the merchant marine of the world, and for the ships of war and the property and appurtenances of the Mexican Government.

2. The company will not be allowed to transport war vessels, war materials, or troops of any foreign nation without the previous constitutional permission of the Mexican Government.

* * * * * * *

ART. 18. The company which, for the objects mentioned in this contract, may be organized by Eads—

Which is this company mentioned in the scheme of my friend from Missouri—

ART. 18. The company which, for the objects mentioned in this contract, may be organized by Eads, shall exercise all the rights, powers, and privileges in relation to the issue of bonds or other guarantees, and in every way, that may be granted by any concession which it may obtain in Mexico or elsewhere, provided that it be not in conflict with the provisions of this contract or with the laws of the Mexican United States.

ART. 19. The concessions contained in the present contract, and the railway, telegraphs, stations, ports, lands, and, in short, all works constructed by virtue of the present contract, can in no wise be sold, mortgaged, or alienated to any foreign government or governments, under penalty of the immediate nullification of the present concession.

* * * * * * *

ART. 21. Eads or the company is authorized to build, on the land conceded as a right of way, a railway, broad or narrow gauge, to be operated for the service of the ship-railway, and for the carriage of passengers and freight. Its tariff for these purposes shall be that of other railways of its class in the republic, and for it the government shall pay no subvention whatever. In case that only this auxiliary railway be constructed, and the ship-railway not built, said auxiliary railway shall be in every way subject to those regulations established for the railway actually being built in Tehuantepec, except as regards the enjoyment of a subvention.

* * * * * * *

ART. 25. The concessions made by this contract shall be void for any of the following causes:

1. For not commencing or terminating the construction of the railway and its works according to the times fixed by article 20.

2. For alienating, transferring, or mortgaging this concession, or the rights derived from it, or the works executed, to some foreign state or government, or for admitting it as a partner, any stipulation to this effect being also null.

And so on. So, Mr. President, taking this concession to be genuine and constitutional according to the laws of the Republic of Mexico and its respective States, you have got in every aspect a purely Mexican corporation for Mexican purposes, with no international right of any sort of control or interest, or incidental solicitude even, of the Government that is now asked to create this corporation.

You have got it, first, in the express and literal and careful terms of the article that I read in regard to what the corporation should be, and what all its stockholders should be, if it should have any stock, which is not provided in this bill, except just as much as the directors choose to have; they may have a dollar or a million dollars, or any other number that they may like, and so on. You have got, second, the careful provisions of the Mexican Government, if it did it, that in no respect whatever should any foreign government have or exercise any control or interest in respect of the title, the property, the lien, the loan, or the operations of this company.

Therefore it stands on all-fours, as I said before, with a case where we should be coolly asked by somebody to charter a bank to carry on operations in the city of Mexico, or in the city of Tehuantepec, or in the city of Chihuahua, or anywhere else in that republic, or to charter a manufacturing corporation to saw out lumber in the city of Ottawa, in the Province of Ontario, in the Dominion of Canada. That is what it is on its face. It is what it is impossible, as I think, to deny in the clear, definite, and explicit statement in the amendment of my friend from Missouri, which is the bill we are to consider, taken in connection with the concession to which it refers and for which this corporation is created, as is stated in the preamble. Now, can we do that? If we can I should be glad to know how.

I am not indifferent, Mr. President, far from it, to the desirability to the people of the United States and to the good neighborhood of the world of having some means of transit across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; but the interest I have in that is not so great, as nobody's ought to be, as to compel me to fly in the face of the Constitution of my country and to undertake to do a thing which on the face of it is so entirely outside of the power of Congress, and still more to undertake to do a thing in creating a corporation of this kind in the way, even if we had the power, that this is proposed to be done, which I repeat I believe has no precedent in the history of the legislation of any State in this country or any civilized State in any other in respect of its want of securities, in its want of regulation, in its want of limitation, in its want of the power to alter, amend, or repeal.

What, then, are we to do about the Isthmus of Tehuantepec? It is not within our territory. Mexico has made no treaty with us or any other country, so far as I know, upon this subject save one, that of 1853, which related to a passenger railway, possibly a canal—I have forgotten which—but the canal part of it has been demonstrated really to be impracticable by the report of Commander Shufeldt on that subject made about fifteen years ago. He shows, although he was eager to find a way for a canal there and enthusiastic upon the subject, that the thing is really impracticable. You can not get the water at the summit level of 754 feet above the sea without, if it were possible to get it at all, an expense so enormously disproportionate to the end to be reached, and so inadequate to the supply of a canal that would carry the ships of the world across it, as to make it really entirely out of the question.

At the distance of 27 miles, if I remember the distance rightly, from the summit level at Tarifa, the only way of getting water would be from the head waters from one of the branches of the Coatzacoalcos River, and according to his statement (and I have it here) at the point where at this distance of twenty-five or thirty miles the dam was to be made and the feeder started there would be only 4 feet of elevation above the summit of the canal, which, of course, must feed the summit level. If you can once feed the summit level of a canal you can feed the lower parts, because the canal itself feeds the lower locks, as we all understand. That river is in a country that for half the year has no rain and for the other half has a torrent, it is true enough; and that country which for half the year has no rain is expected in the six months of the dry season to furnish in a feeding canal 27 miles long, with only 4 feet of head, from the little tributaries of this river, enough water to supply a canal that is to carry the really serious and important commerce of the world. So that practically the canal matter is entirely out of the question.

Now, it is proposed to build a ship-railway there. I wish the Mexicans could do it. I wish the Americans could do it under some treaty with Mexico which should authorize us to do the same thing in respect of it that the State of Nicaragua is willing and anxious that the United States shall do in respect of a canal to be built there. But Mexico has made no such proposition. So far as we know, she is not willing to make any such proposition. She proposes to be the supreme, controlling, and exclusive power within her own territory of what goes on within it in every work of internal improvement. So you are to have a ship-railway under this kind of a charter.

What kind of a ship-railway are you to have? The summit level, as I said, is 754 feet above the seas. For the first 30 or 40 miles on the Gulf of Mexico side it is a low, flat country, just as feverish and just as malarious as my eloquent friend from Massachusetts depicted the shores of Nicaragua and Panama to be the other day. If I had his gift of speech and dialect I should be not happy, but it would be my duty, to describe the horrors of the fever season on the northern shore of Tehuantepec, at the mouth of the Coatzacoalcos and of the 30 or 40 miles of low flats that lie between the sea and the elevated table-lands on the north side. But I have not. I pass it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he has any information which supports the suggestion that that is an unhealthy region?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the same information precisely, I think, that the Senator from Massachusetts has——

Mr. HOAR. My information is very strong——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Please let me answer the question. I have the same information, I suppose, precisely that the Senator from Massachusetts has in regard to the general condition of the whole coast of the Gulf of Mexico beginning where the Isthmus of Tehuantepec begins, which is said to be the first northern or western part of the isthmus, going the whole distance east along the Gulf side of the coast, and that is its physical and geographical condition of a low, flat, tropical or subtropical country that is filled up with swamps, with the most fertile of lands where you can get out of the swamps, and all of the attendants that belong to the deposits of rivers that come down into a lowland in a tropical country. That is the extent of my information. Now, I will listen to my friend.

Mr. HOAR. My information is directly to the contrary, that the character of the country at Tehuantepec partakes of the character of the country northerly along the Gulf, and that it is as healthy as Galveston or as the settled parts of Texas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My information is that there is no difference whatever between the healthfulness of the coast which lies between the sandy and not the swampy lands of the alluvial regions of the Gulf of Mexico for the whole distance eastward from where those alluvial regions begin and a little to the west of the Isthmus of Tehauntepec all the way around until you strike the mountain shores to the eastward of where the Panama Railway and French canal, that is not to be, now exist.

But then, to come to the other part of it, for that is merely incidental here, you are to have a ship-railway which is to carry a ship, according to this concession, of 3,000 tons, including its cargo. That is the highest that is provided for in the concession. That is to say, you are to be able to carry over a railroad 3,000 tons of freight in the form of a ship and the things that it contains. That being done, Eads has accomplished the object that entitles him to the concession of lands, &c., that the Government of Mexico say shall be given to him in that case.

How much of a vessel is that, Mr. President? (Mr. FRYE in the chair). You live near the coast of the Atlantic and know something about ships. How much of a ship and how much of a cargo would you have if you hoisted out, as I have no doubt Eads could do and as everybody can do, into a dry-dock at Boston, the modern Athens—if you hoisted out a ship in Boston into a dry-dock that could be adjusted on scales, as it could beyond all question. There are some people I think in Vermont who could make the scales, and would be glad to do it if paid for it. You weigh it and you have got weighed up exactly the ship and all that is in it, 3,000 tons. How much cargo have you got there? Not more than 1,500 tons, probably less. If it were a sailing vessel it would be probably a little more. If it were a steamer with its engines and its boilers filled and with its coal and all the other things that belong to a steamship, it would be much less than 1,500 tons of cargo. But suppose you have got that.

The divide at Tarifa of 754 feet—if I am correct in my recollection of the figures—above the sea is not midway in the 140 or 150 miles across that isthmus, but it is more than two-thirds of the way over to the Pacific shore. You have therefore got a comparatively easy grade, a comparatively slight incline going from the Gulf of Mexico to the southward or southwestward, or whatever the direction may be, until you get to the crest of the Cordilleras. Then you pitch down suddenly to the sea on the other side and to the narrow strip of alluvial and bottom lands that lie along that ocean.

Think, Mr. President, of one single mass of even 3,000 tons in weight, 300 feet long, I will assume, or 350 feet—whatever may be the length of a ship that would, with all its cargo, if hoisted out weigh just 3,000 tons—two or three hundred feet in length—rigid, sitting in a bowl of water, if you please, but that bowl of water must be on something that is rigid under it, on a railway track and descending a grade of even 20 feet to the mile. How are you going to manage that? Would it not be a little dangerous? What insurance company could you get to take a risk, unless it were a risk of 75 or 100 per cent. on the entire value of the whole thing, either to carry that thing down or to carry it up a grade of that kind?

What are you to do with the change of direction on a rigid and unbendable ship 250 or 300 or 400 feet long? Captain Eads very wisely proposes as the only possible way for that, not to change your direction by a curve, as railway trains do, with only 60 feet or so of a car, and with adjustable trucks under it that have a certain movement of difference of direction when they are pressed from the body of the car above them; and within certain very narrow limits that must be, or otherwise you would go to destruction immediately. He agrees, if I correctly understand it, that the only way to change that direction is to go in straight lines to a point where you must change your direction and then roll your concern on a turn-table, as it might be called, a side-table, a switch-table, and then make a right-angled movement far enough to accomplish your change of direction, and then begin again. There is reason in that; I do not dispute it. It is the only possible way, obviously and of course.

Now, think of the amount of machinery, the amount of danger, the amount of critical adjustment every moment to take such a vast weight as that in one immovable body, even in straight lines, up and down grades, or even along a level on a track, and then to move it to the right or left as occasion may require (and it would require it very often, I suspect, to get through the pass of the Cordilleras there), and see how you would come out.

Suppose another thing. Suppose it should happen, as it sometimes has happened in the history of human experience, that your train should get off the track, or that your track should break down, or some part of it should break down. In the case of a railway train on land, with the cars and locomotives that are now in use, you have small sections. You are able to build a side-track around it if you have a bad smash, to put up a temporary bridge on one side or the other with a curve and go around the disaster, if you can not rectify it immediately. You can not do that with a railway that carries a ship of 3,000 tons or of 1,000 tons in a lump across a continent or across a State or across a level plain of 10 miles. You can not build your curve around it to have your next ship that is behind go around and pass the obstruction until your 3,000-ton ship is jacked up and got on to the track again and starts forward on its career. It is totally impossible, as everybody knows.

I do not pretend to be an engineer, but I claim, as all Americans do, to have some share of common-sense and to know something of the ordinary events of the physics of this world that we see in our daily life everywhere. In my opinion it is totally out of the question, as a practical, continuous, and mercantile contrivance, to carry solid bodies of any kind of the weight and construction that ships are over any kind of a railway for any considerable distance. You would fail much more often than you would succeed, and failing you necessarily blockade the whole line until you can repair that disaster on the spot; and you can not build a side-track around it to get by with the rest of your ships. But that is apart from what I had any disposition to say.

What I wished to say was that while I am desirous to help in every way that I can constitutionally our sister Republic of Mexico—that has not asked us except in the matter of 1853, which is quite apart from what I wish to say, and so I leave it out—to help our sister Republic of Mexico to get every possible good means of transportation across that isthmus, and to help her in every other way that we can, although she has not asked it, I should not be willing to volunteer it, as I was not in respect of the Topolovampo railroad, from Austin or somewhere in Texas, across Mexico to a port far to the westward of the western part of her Pacific coast possessions.

But what I wished to say was that the bill as it stands is in my opinion as clear a case of usurpation of power on the part of Congress to create a corporation such as is described in the bill of my friend from Missouri as he has amended it, and as is described in this concession by the Government of Mexico, as it is possible to imagine; and, secondly, that the creation of the corporation itself, if we had the constitutional power, is one that is perfectly unique in the audacity of its conferring powers upon a corporation without any limitation except the will of that corporation itself, without any security, without any power of control; although my friend from Missouri may answer me, and very effectually, by saying we have no business to have any power of control; it is a Mexican corporation, and therefore we have no right to have any provision that we may even repeal this charter; we are merely creating an artificial citizen of the Republic of Mexico, which is rather an extraordinary business for the Congress of the United States to be engaged in, I submit.

The discussion which has taken place on this bill in regard to the canal at Nicaragua I do not now propose to go into. I prefer, for myself, to deal with the subject of this proposed act of incorporation for this ship-railway company as if for the time being there were no Isthmus of Nicaragua, as if for the time being there were no Lake of Panama at the summit level of 120 feet only above the two oceans, and as if there were no Isthmus of Panama whatever. If we had the constitutional power, and under constitutional regulations and under Congressional control, for the public purposes of the United States, that Congress could regulate, it was proposed to create a corporation to do this thing in this foreign country of our sister republic with her consent, granting us to have the power to have some interest and some voice in what of our citizens and what of our ships should pass, I should be for it; but this concession contains no such thing. It denies every such thing. The concession, as I said before, as it stands is, in my opinion, entirely beyond the constitutional power of Congress to enact.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont, before he sits down, with reference to his constitutional argument—I thought I would not interrupt him at the time he was making it—whether he denies or seriously doubts the right of Congress to charter a railroad, say from the Atlantic Ocean to Chicago, which shall pass through the States and not through the Territories, entirely through the territory of States, a part of the Union? Does he conceive that such an institution is a proper instrument to promote commerce among the States or with foreign nations?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Instead of denying it I assert it, and I have asserted it on all proper occasions for twenty years in this body and elsewhere. The Constitution of the United States declares that Congress may regulate commerce among the several States; that it may establish post-roads; that it may raise and support armies, and I suppose transport them by any means that it pleases; that it may regulate commerce with foreign nations; but I never heard of a clause in the Constitution which says that we can regulate the internal commerce of Mexico, or regulate commerce, or do any other thing in a foreign nation. If it was to provide for carrying a railway from the southernmost point in Texas to the borders of Her Majesty's Dominions for the purpose of regulating commerce with foreign nations, to say nothing about the intervening States, I should say we had the constitutional right to do it; but to establish a local and territorial corporation within the body of a foreign and independent state that is to have no power and do nothing that that state shall not give it the power and the right to do, I deny.

Mr. HOAR. I should like the indulgence of the Senate for only two or three minutes to refer to the constitutional proposition of the honorable Senator from Vermont, though I am taking more share in this debate than is quite becoming, I am afraid.

The Senator stated in his argument, as I understood him, that the power of the United States, at any rate that all previous exertion of the power of the United States in creating corporations, was limited either to the Territories or the District of Columbia, where our jurisdiction is complete, or to corporations like the Bank of the United States, or the more recently established national banks, which were fiscal agencies or performed some other of the direct functions of the Government, and he proceeded to argue what of course can not be successfully disputed, that the proposed corporation was neither of these.

But now I understand the Senator further to concede that in the States, where the United States has no complete and unbounded jurisdiction, as it has over the Territories or the District of Columbia, it may charter corporations beginning and ending in the State territory, if the effect of creating those corporations be to promote commerce among the States or with foreign nations. If that be true, suppose a foreign nation to be so situated with reference to this country that the direct effect of constructing a public way in the territory of that foreign nation be the promotion of commerce among the States, Congress gets the power to do that thing from its general power to promote the general welfare and to regulate commerce, which every Senator who shares the constitutional opinion of the Senator from Vermont I suppose interprets as meaning to promote the interests of commerce.

In a hundred ways during the last twenty years that Senator and those who agree with him have asserted in debate, whether it be to raise taxes, to create corporations, to confer authority upon individuals, or to exert the direct and immediate functions of Government by the officers of Government, that Congress has power to do what it thinks will promote that end without limit, except the limits provided in regard to the invasion of individual right and the other constitutional restraints which do not present themselves here.

If Congress may lawfully make a railroad beginning in Vermont and ending in Vermont in order that there may be unrestricted commerce between New Hampshire and New York, or in order that the foreign commerce coming in at the port of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, may pass in the freest manner across Vermont and New Hampshire to New York, why, if the territory of Mexico be so situated that the natural and convenient route of commerce from our great Atlantic to our great Pacific coast leads through that territory, may not Congress in its discretion incorporate a company who shall have, with the leave of that foreign country, the right to aid in the transportation of freight and the conduct of commerce across that territory from Maine or from New York to San Francisco or to Portland, in Oregon?

How does it happen that the mere fact that the situation of this railroad is to be in another territory makes it any the less within the constitutional power of Congress than it is to give a subsidy to an ocean steamship which is to plow the high seas from a port in the United States to a port in South America or in Europe? It is not the situation of the work; it is not the location of the carrier; it is not the position of the railroad, or the steamboat, or the sailing vessel, whether within our territory or on the high seas or within foreign territory; it is the accomplishment of the constitutional duty of Congress to provide, under the Constitution, for the interests of American citizens in dealing with foreign nations, or in commercial dealings among the citizens of the several States.

Then the Senator says that this corporation under the concession of the Mexican Government is to be made for all purposes of its conduct in Mexico a Mexican corporation. That does not in the least affect the constitutional power of Congress. If authorizing an American citizen or an American corporation to go to Mexico and to acquire certain rights as against Mexico, and take upon itself certain obligations of submission to Mexican jurisdiction and Mexican courts, be a convenient, proper, and fitting instrument for the promotion of commerce among American States or between American States and foreign countries, it is within the constitutional power and the constitutional duty of this country to do it.

Of course Mexico does not mean that by granting this concession to an American corporation she is to put herself into the power of the United States by creating international obligations. She says, and she says very properly—she says what would be the first thing sought by the honorable Senator from Vermont himself if England were seeking to build a railroad across the State of Maine, or to open a canal there, and we thought it to our interest to permit her to do it—that the person in dealing with Mexican soil, in dealing with Mexican citizens, in dealing with the Mexican Government, shall be entirely subject to the control of the Mexican law. It does not hurt the United States any. We are not putting ourself into the Mexican power.

This gentleman simply asks to be clothed by Congress with the powers of corporate succession as distinguished from individual relations, which, of course, must terminate with the death of any one of the copartners—to be clothed with the perpetuity and the impersonality of the corporate character in order that he may go to Mexico, and getting there no power over Mexico except such as her own citizens have as against her, build a railroad at his own risk, which, if it succeed, shall be an important factor in connecting the American States and in bringing the seaports of the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico in possession of a vast advantage in dealing with Japan, with Asia, with China, with Australia, and with South America, as compared with any foreign government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Massachusetts, with the astuteness that characterizes him always, and intending to be fair, has stated a series of connected propositions that he says I have been in favor of, about three of which I have been in favor of as constitutional propositions, and the other two I have not. I have never maintained the power of Congress to establish a corporation other than for the purposes of the District of Columbia (which is a full State power and complete sovereign power), the Territories, and the objects that the Constitution of the United States has committed to the Government of the United States. I have voted for subsidies, though not very often (and I begin to think I was mistaken that I did not do it more often), to steamship companies to promote American lines for the benefit of American trade, for carrying American mails to foreign countries. I did not do it on the ground the Senator speaks of as applied to corporations and other acts of specific legislation, because of the general welfare clause in the Constitution except in respect of appropriations of money. The appropriation of money in the Constitution is given to Congress, and in specific terms to pay the debts and liabilities of the United States and to promote the general welfare. I may not quote it with absolute verbal accuracy, but that is the substance of it.

There is a specific power conferred upon Congress to be the master of the purse of the people of the United States, and therefore whenever I think it will promote the general welfare I am ready to vote the money of the people of the United States, of which so long as I am a Senator I am one of the trustees bound to follow the law of my creation under the Constitution in exercising my judgment about spending money. But when it comes to creating the charter of a corporation, that is not a subsidy, that is not granting money.

I admit that you may grant to Mr. Eads to-day, in the constitutional sense, $100,000,000, if you want to, by name and in person. Whether you speak of it as gratitude for what he has done or has failed to do for the United States, or what he expects to do, or because you wish him to go to the other side of the globe and stay there, or any other reason, that is appropriating money which the Constitution gives Congress the power to do whenever it thinks the public welfare will be promoted by it. But appropriating money is one thing and creating an artificial being with powers under the Constitution of the United States is another thing; and the Supreme Court, as I said, speaking through Mr. Chief-Justice Marshall, more than half a century ago, only found themselves able, and with great stress and difficulty even at that, to support the constitutionality of the charter of a bank that was to be the fiscal agent of the United States, the creature of the United States, under the control of the United States, and in substance and effect managed by the United States for its fiscal and war purposes, upon the ground that it was incidental to the power to do the things that the Constitution had conferred upon Congress the authority to do.

Now, when you come to the regulation of commerce clause, upon which alone I suppose my distinguished friend stands, he says that I have admitted you may pass a law of Congress providing for a railway corporation entirely within the State of Vermont. I have not admitted or said any such thing. I do not know but that I would admit it. What I said was that I admitted to Congress the power to provide for chartering a corporation to build a railroad from the southern border of Texas to the Canada line in order to promote commerce with—not in, but with—a foreign nation.

My learned and distinguished friend has omitted to remember at this moment the change of phraseology on that very regulation of commerce clause of the Constitution. Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the several States, which means in and between them as related to each other, but "with foreign nations," which means, as our fathers who knew something about the course of political powers and events, and something about the use of language, changing the phraseology intentionally, changed it on purpose to exclude the idea that we were to have anything to do with the internal commerce or the internal operations in any foreign State unless we got it by treaty, which related to our public powers. It was with them; it was among us. They were external. We only stand on the outside and treat them as a single unit of power who are to regulate their own affairs in their own way within their borders, and we deal with them as separate and independent communities, having no right to enter into them for any purpose whatever except by relations that may be created by treaty or something of that kind.

Therefore, Mr. President, this case is exactly as if the Congress of the United States were asked to-day to establish a manufacturing corporation on the theory that it would promote the general welfare (and I rather think it might) in the city of London, in England, that you and I and my friend from Massachusetts—and we three, I suppose, would have capital enough to do it; if not we could call in some of the other Senators about us—a corporation for making Bessemer steel to be established in the city of London or its suburbs. I will say nothing about a concession for the moment. Does anybody suppose we would have a right to do it? Of course, everybody would say "no" at once.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose it was a corporation to repair American ships that happened to be over there? What would the Senator say to that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should say "yes," for the fun of it, just now, but not as a corporation to repair foreign ships.

Mr. HOAR. No, American ships.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Here is a corporation that is to be created in Mexico, to be a Mexican being, for Mexican purposes and nothing else, with a majority of its directors and managers the appointees of the Government of Mexico. If the bill provided that we might establish a corporation which, with the leave of the Government of Mexico, might locate itself at Vera Cruz for the purpose of repairing American ships of war and the vessels of American commerce belonging to American citizens, I do not say whether we could do it or not; I should rather incline to think that we might. But to establish a corporation in the city of London, or in the city of Mexico, to carry on a local business operation, although it has other——

Mr. HOAR. Now, will my friend allow me——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask my friend to wait just one minute.

Mr. HOAR. I will wait two, if the Senator wishes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will ask you to wait just three, if you will possess your soul in patience.

I will ask my friend from Massachusetts again, what would he say to providing for a corporation in the city of London to carry on the manufacture of Bessemer steel because we think it would be for the public interest and general welfare of the people of the United States that we should be higher up in the art of the manufacture of Bessemer steel? We could build railroads here that should be interstate commerce, a national line, from New York to San Francisco. He would of course say "no," I take it. So there is no getting away from the proposition by suggesting things that do not exist.

This proposition is simply to create an internal Mexican railway corporation that might just as well, for all the purposes of our constitutional power, run from the City of Chihuahua to the City of Mexico entirely inland, as from one coast to the other, because its powers under this Mexican concession, its powers under this proposed grant of my friend from Missouri would be precisely the same in either case.

The mere fact that this railway would be capable of promoting commerce between the several States would equally apply to every corporation that might be created in a State. We might be asked to-morrow to create a corporation within the State of Massachusetts to do this thing, that thing, or the other, which we thought would promote the general welfare. It would increase commerce. We might take possession of the magnificent Atlantic mills at Lawrence, and say we will promote the general welfare, and we will regulate and promote commerce between the States by turning that into a corporation of the United States, in order that its fabrics may go to every foreign country and be carried over every State in this Union, to the great benefit and advantage of them all, as I have no doubt it would be as far as the fabrics are concerned, for they are very good.

No, Mr. President, it is idle to attempt to escape from the thing that we must face in passing the bill as it stands, and that is that we are passing a bill which is absolutely unique, the first one of its kind, and which does not give to the United States, or profess to give, any authority, or control, or benefit, or advantage whatsoever. On the face of its preamble it declares that it is to be that kind of a corporation and for that purpose, that the Mexican Republic if it had the power, which I very much doubt, under their constitution for the State of Oaxaca has the control of those things, but I leave all that aside—a corporation that the Mexican Republic is to take possession of and is to have as its citizen, as its agent, and nothing else. If we have the constitutional power to do that, we have the constitutional power to do anything.

Mr. HOAR. I think when my honorable friend (on whose unfailing sweetness and courtesy I thought I could rely to permit me to ask him a question while he was speaking, but I found I was mistaken) shall have thought over the concessions he has made in the course of his two speeches, by to-morrow morning he will come to the conclusion that whether this bill be accepted or not it is entirely within the constitutional power of the Government.

In the first place, he concedes that we might give Captain Eads $100,000,000 out of the Treasury to go and build this railroad—that is the first proposition—on the ground that thereby the general welfare, which we have a right to spend money to promote, would be promoted. I think he will on reflection see that if we can do that, we can create a corporation whose object shall be carrying American ships across Mexico under our power to promote the interests of commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

The Senator also admits that Congress has the power, if it be a suitable method of promoting the interest of commerce among the States or with foreign nations, to authorize the building of a ship-canal across the State of Florida, although Florida itself may have no interest therein, or although it may take jurisdiction over that corporation.

If we can do that, can we not create a corporation whose function it shall be to remove a rock in the high seas which is an obstruction and a danger to American commerce? If we can take the rock at Hell Gate out of Long Island Sound because that rock is an obstruction to commerce among the States or with foreign nations—if we can create a corporation to do that thing, can we not create a corporation whose function it shall be to remove a rock in the high seas which is a danger to our commerce coastwise or with the Pacific or with foreign nations? If we can create a corporation who can do that, can we not create a corporation who can dig out the Isthmus of Nicaragua or Panama or Tehuantepec, which is an obstruction to our commerce among the States and with foreign nations, although that obstruction be entirely situated within the limits of the Republic of Nicaragua, or Guatemala, or Mexico?

My learned friend admitted further that we might lawfully create a corporation whose function it should be to go to England, and on English soil, and under English laws, and subject to the sovereign of England, create a corporation whose function it should be to repair American ships, whether belonging to the Government or to private persons, if in that way our foreign commerce would most conveniently and advantageously be served.

If you can plant on either side on the coast of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec a corporation, as the Senator agreed, subject wholly to Mexico, under Mexican authority, who shall repair your ships that put into those ports out of repair, by what earthly process of logic does the Senator say that you can not make a corporation which will take up those ships and carry them across the continent from sea to sea and deposit them in water at the other side?

It is the general function of promoting commerce with foreign nations or among the several States with which Congress is clothed. If as incident to its power to establish a sound currency it may establish a national banking system and create corporations, if it be the most convenient and appropriate method, of which Congress is the sole judge, of performing that function, if the creating a corporation to aid American ships in their transit from sea to sea on foreign soil be in the judgment of Congress an appropropriate method of accomplishing our function of promoting the interests of commerce with foreign nations or among the States, the constitutional power of Congress is precisely the same.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the controversy which is raging on the other side of the Chamber about the constitutionality of this bill is in a family that I am not a member of. Both those Senators in their interpretations of the Constitution rank with that class of politicians who used to be called Federalists, while I belong in the Democratic family and believe in what is called the Jeffersonian construction of that instrument.

I stated when I first opened the debate on my part that I felt this was a constitutional measure because it related entirely to the operations of a corporation beyond our borders. The limitations of the Constitution of the United States affect the people and the States of this country and all the provisions put in that instrument in restraint of the powers of Congress relate to the dealings of Congress with our own people and our own States. When we come to look at the Government of the United States in respect of its relations to foreign countries, it is a unit representing both States and people, and there is no abridgment of its powers beyond our own borders.

I think any one will look in vain to the Constitution of the United States for any word or sentence or idea that restricts the powers of the Government of the United States in its dealings with foreign countries below themselves or any other countries in the world. So I conclude that when we organize a corporation, it may be for the benefit of the whole people of the United States, we have the authority to do so, finding no controversy with any State or with any citizen of the United States in the powers we seek to confer upon it. What we have to do in a foreign country, or in respect of a foreign country, is to get the consent of that country that our corporation shall have some powers within its domain.

I believe the consent of the Government of Mexico has been obtained to the operation of a corporation created under the laws of the United States to build a canal or a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. That guarantee is given to us in the eighth article of the Gadsden treaty, to which I have frequently adverted in this debate. The Government of Mexico has gone on from time to time continuously and persistently to keep that grant in operation in the hands of different persons, different corporations, one failing, another succeeded, and, after all, the Government of Mexico became the final successor and assumed the rights of property and the duty which it had devolved on other grantees in concession to build a railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. So that whenever we pass this act of incorporation, instead of making ourselves parties to the concession on which it is based, we find ourselves related to it by the terms of that treaty, and they regulate what our rights are upon this railroad.

I believe the Government of Mexico, in view of the history of her own operations and transactions in perpetuating this isthmian railway-transit through Tehuantepec, would never presume to deny that the rights of the Government of the United States arising under the eighth article of the Gadsden treaty apply to this corporation, and of course as far as they do apply they would break down any provision in the concession that might operate in derogation of our rights.

In support of that I wish to submit and put in the RECORD a memorandum showing completely, I believe—but perhaps there may be some omission in it—the conduct of the Mexican Government in relation to the right of transit and the building of lines of transit across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec.

The Mexican Government has made the following grants for the Tehuantepec interoceanic communication:

First. The first concession made by the Mexican Government for the construction of an interoceanic railway through the Isthmus of Tehuantepec seems to have been made March 1, 1842, to Mr. José Garay.

Second. As the road was not built in compliance with the above grant, the Mexican Government signed a contract for the same purpose February 5, 1853, with Messrs. A. G. Sloo and associates, forming what was called the Mixed Company. That is the company that is referred to in the eighth article of the Gadsden treaty. That eighth article refers to the grant made February 5, 1853. It does not mention Messrs. Sloo & Co., but merely mentions the grant and the date of it, thereby showing that it was not the grantees to whom the concession was made that were the persons in respect of whom these rights of the United States were to attach or not to attach, according to their ability to build the road or not to build it, but that it was the grant embodied in the concession of that date, describing it by its character rather than by the individuals who were concerned in executing it.

Third. The road not having been constructed by the latter company, the Mexican Government made a new contract December 7, 1857, with the Louisiana Tehuantepec Company. Article 17 thereof bound the company to pay $600,000 with interest to Mr. Francisco J. Falconet, who had loaned that amount to the Sloo Company to allow it to comply with the provisions of article 14 of the contract of February 5, 1853, the government remaining free from all liability on this point. Observe the connection reserved by the Government of Mexico between the Sloo Company and this Louisiana Tehuantepec Company. The time fixed in this contract was extended by decrees of March 28, 1859, and October 25, 1860. As the road was not constructed, the contract was declared forfeited October 15, 1866—forfeited by the government, of course.

Fourth. This same decree authorized the Tehuantepec Transit Company to build a railroad through the Isthmus. Article XXXII of the same bound the company to assume all the responsibility arising out of the amount due Mr. Francisco J. Falconet for his loans to the Sloo Company. Thus connecting the transaction back with Sloo.

Fifth. The Mexican Government made another concession (October 6, 1867) to the La Sere Company for the opening of an interoceanic communication through the Tehuantepec Isthmus, which was amended by a decree of January 2, 1869.

By decree of December 20, 1870, the same company was authorized to establish a navigable canal between the Pacific Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico.

On the 22d of May, 1872, the grants of January 2, 1869, and of December 20, 1870, to construct and work a railroad and a navigable canal through the Tehuantepec Isthmus were revalidated and a provision made that the time fixed in the former would begin to be reckoned from the 2d of January, 1872.

On the 17th of January, 1874, an extension of a year was granted to the latter company.

On the 14th of December, 1874, a subsidy of $7,500 was granted for each kilometer of road built and approved in conformity with the decree of January 2, 1869, and other modifications and extensions of time of preceding concessions were granted.

Sixth. On the 2d of June, 1879, Mr. Edward Learned, or the company to be organized by him, was authorized to build a railroad through the Tehuantepec Isthmus. This grant was declared forfeited by the Mexican Government, who assumed the construction of the work, making an arrangement with the Learned Company for the payments of the amounts spent by the latter.

Seventh. Mr. James B. Eads made a contract with the Mexican Government in 1880 for the construction of a ship-railway through the isthmus, which contract was amended May 2, 1885.

That is the history of the railway and canal grant, as far as I have been able to obtain it, made across this Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and it shows that the Government of Mexico has persistently prosecuted the work from the date of the treaty of 1853 down to this very day, never abandoning it, sometimes assuming it as a government enterprise, always making a relation between the debts contracted by the previous companies and assumed by the successor companies, and thereby maintaining in continuous operation the grant itself and the means itself by which the grant was to be executed in the building of a railway or a canal.

Mexico can never deny that she has maintained continuously the grant that was described in the eighth article of the Gadsden treaty as a subsisting and operative grant, and that she has committed herself to it by concession after concession and by the government itself assuming to do the work. So I hold that when Mr. Eads builds his ship-railway there, it will be a ship-railway within the meaning of the Gadsden treaty of 1853, and that all the treaty rights and stipulations which are reserved by the amendment of the Senate adopted this morning to this bill will be found to be in full force and effect in respect of Mr. Eads's railway.

Having said this much I will yield the floor to the Senator from Missouri with one single remark; that is, that I propose before we get through with this bill to strike out the preamble in order that it shall not be said by the Mexican Government that we have amended or modified our treaty relations with Mexico by any legislative act adopting the Eads concession as a part of our legislation.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, as a matter of course in the discussion of this question I was not unaware that the constitutional question presented by the Senator from Vermont would be raised, and I had prepared myself at one time, anticipating such a discussion several months ago, with the authorities in regard to the power of Congress to incorporate a company to operate outside of the territory of the United States; but I assume that that question has been settled by the decisions of the courts of the United States, and it is not necessary to enter into any elaborate argument of it.

Corporations are simply means and instrumentalities. If the power exists in the General Government to do any act, if a general power is invested in the Government to perform any function for the benefit of the people at large, then the Government can use any instrumentality it pleases for the purpose of carrying out and effectuating that purpose. True, the Supreme Court of the United States decided in regard to the old United States Bank and the national banking system as it now exists, that they were fiscal agents of the Government; but that acknowledges the whole argument, because the power to regulate finance being vested in the Government of the United States, the minor, the implied power must go with the general grant that Congress may use such agencies as it sees proper or finds necessary to carry out the general grants of power. In the case of the States freight-tax case, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 15 Wallace, 275, Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> Beyond all question the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce for the purposes of exchange or sale, is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. A power to prevent embarrassing restrictions by any State was the thing desired. The power was given by the same words and in the same clause by which was conferred power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It would be absurd to suppose that the transmission of the subjects of trade from the State to the buyer, or from the place of production to the market, was not contemplated, for without that there would be no consummated trade, either with foreign nations or among the States.

If it is once conceded, as it must be ex necessitate, that the power to regulate commerce among the States gives the power to use such instrumentalities including the agencies of corporations as may be necessary for that regulation, then the clause that gives Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations inevitably implies the same minor, subsidary power, the use of corporations created by Congress for the purpose of carrying out the general power in regard to commerce with foreign nations. Mr. Story sums up the whole thing in his Commentaries, volume 2, page 7, in the following language:

> Many like powers—

He says, in speaking of the clause in regard to commerce among the States—> have been applied in the regulation of foreign commerce. The commercial system of the United States has also been employed sometimes for the purpose of revenue; sometimes for the purpose of prohibition; sometimes for the purpose of retaliation and commercial reciprocity; sometimes to lay embargoes; sometimes to encourage domestic navigation and the shipping and mercantile interest by bounties, by discriminating duties, and by special preferences and privileges; and sometimes to regulate intercourse with a view to mere political objects, such as to repel aggressions, increase the pressure of war, or vindicate the rights of neutral sovereignty. In all these cases the right and duty have been conceded to the National Government by the unequivocal voice of the people.

Mr. Jefferson used the embargo in the last term of his occupancy of the Presidential chair in order to prevent a war with Great Britain. Unfortunately it failed and the war of 1812 was precipitated upon the country. But Mr. Jefferson claimed the right to use the embargo under the commercial clause of the Constitution in order to prevent hostilities with a foreign power. It is not necessary to go as far as that in order to find this power now in the clause which gives to the Congress of the United States the authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations. But for the purposes of this argument I had supposed that question settled by very high authority, authority equal to possibly that of the Supreme Court of the United States. While I was entirely prepared for the attack made by the distinguished Senator from Vermont on this bill to-day, because he is an open and undisguised enemy of the Tehuantepec ship-railway, and it is an open secret that the Senator from Vermont is the especial advocate of the Nicaragua scheme—he believes the Nicaragua scheme is feasible and that the Tehuantepec ship-railway is not feasible——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will permit me——

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not an open secret, it is an open fact that I believe in the Nicaragua scheme.

Mr. VEST. I accept the amendment with the greatest pleasure. It is an open fact that the Senator from Vermont is the enemy of the Tehuantepec ship-railway and does not believe it feasible, and he has stated so over and over again. Every obstacle put in the way of the enterprise is augmented and magnified by his imagination. Every fact stated and every doubt suggested in order to throw obstacles in the way of Captain Eads is used by that Senator, while every obstacle in the way of the Nicaragua scheme with him dwindles into insignificance.

The Senator says he is not here to discuss engineering difficulties, and yet, whilst he knows that Captain Eads relies upon the feasibility of his enterprise to get capital in order to build this ship-railway, the Senator from Vermont manages to throw in every damaging circumstance he can possibly find in all the partisan reports, in all the partisan literature that has been sent broadcast over this country against Captain Eads and the Tehuantepec ship-railway, but at the same time the Senator disavows any intention on his part to prevent the construction of this railway between the seas.

I was prepared for the Senator's opposition, for I knew it existed. I was not exactly prepared for his constitutional argument, for I hold in my hand his report on the Nicaraguan incorporation act, in which he uses this language, a report made unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and signed "Geo. F. Edmunds, for the committee:"

> The committee is of opinion that the instance must be rare and exceptional when it should recommend Congress to pass any act of incorporation other than for local purposes within the District of Columbia or in some Territory, but it thinks that for great national objects and for specific purposes, affecting the welfare of the people of all the States, that Congress may rightfully and properly create a corporation to effectuate the same public objects that Congress might by law provide for being done by the Government itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it exactly

Mr. VEST. That is all that I ever asked.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not what your bill is.

Mr. VEST. That is all that the bill before the Senate now asks. It is simply an act of incorporation, and, as the Senator from Alabama in front of me [Mr. MORGAN] very correctly observed, after that corporation is created, what it does with Mexico, what concession it receives from Mexico, is a question between that corporation and the Mexican Government.

Why, sir, the States create the corporations every day, and those corporations come to Congress and ask for the power to build bridges over rivers of the United States where Congress has the exclusive national jurisdiction. The existence of the corporation emanates from a State, but its right to operate in the national domains comes from Congress. So the life is breathed into this corporation by the Congress of the United States, and its power and authority upon foreign soil must necessarily come from the foreign power and nowhere else.

This Congress, as a matter of course, has no extra-territorial jurisdiction. All we can do is to put the stamp of our sovereignty upon our own citizens, and it is for us to say what powers and rights those citizens may have in a corporate capacity, and we crystallize those powers in an act that comes from Congress itself; but when that corporation after being created goes into a foreign jurisdiction, then the United States is powerless to control it; and the government that would permit a foreign corporation to come on its soil and be anything else than its subject ought to be blotted from the map of the earth. Why, sir, what would be the indignation of the distinguished Senator from Vermont if a Mexican corporation should come here, or a lot of Mexican citizens should ask for a concession from the Government of the United States upon our territory and say at the same time that they did not propose for jurisdictional purposes to be citizens of the United States? I can imagine the indignation of my friend from Vermont, and how he would "thunder in the index" of the Senate at such a monstrous proposition. What, foreigners come here and put their persons on our soil and breathe our air and use our rivers, and yet not be subject to our laws as our own citizens are. Oh, Mr. President, then we should hear a very different argument from that we have heard to-day. But Mexico, according to the Senator, must permit a lot of American gentlemen to go upon its soil, take a concession from it, and when Mexico says to them "For all the purposes of jurisdiction you are citizens of Mexico as to this end and this purpose," then the Senator says that is a monstrous proposition, and a unique one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will pardon me—I do not wish to interrupt him—I desire to say a word.

Mr. VEST. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He entirely misunderstands and misstates my position. I am not complaining of the action of the Government of Mexico; but that being its action, defended by the Senator from Missouri, I say it is not within the competence of the United States on such terms and with such a concession to create a corporation to do this Mexican work. That is my proposition.

Mr. VEST. What have we to do with the concession of Mexico? It does not bind this Government. There is not a single clause of that concession that affects the rights of the Government of the United States. It is a contract between this corporation which we create and the Government of Mexico. There is nothing in this whole concession binding on our Government. There is a simple preamble here reciting that such a concession exists as an inducement for the creation of the corporation, pointing out the subject-matter on which the corporation is to operate; but there is nothing whatever in the concession that binds this Government. The whole question here in the beginning is, Have we the right to create this corporation? and the Senator from Vermont says that we have, but he proceeds further to say that because we are creating a corporation to take this concession from the Government of Mexico therefore it is unconstitutional here.

We can give, he says, $100,000,000 to Captain Eads; we can take it out of the money in the Treasury. I deny it. I belong to a school in politics that admits no such power under the Constitution of the United States. Congress has no right to take the money of the people out of the Treasury and give it to any object of charity it pleases, whether personal or general, either under the general-welfare clause or under any other clause. But here is no such proposition as that. It is proposed here simply to create a corporation for a great international object, the very same object except in a different locality for which the Senator from Vermont has reported a corporation in the Nicaragua bill now on our table.

Mr. MAXEY. I would like the Senator to state the clause of the Constitution under which Congress has the power to incorporate this company as proposed by this bill.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt we have that power under the commercial clause of the Constitution authorizing us to regulate commerce with foreign nations. I have no doubt that power exists. Then you have it under the general clause of the Constitution which says all the powers that are necessary to carry out the preceding grants shall be given, or words to that effect.

Mr. GEORGE. Under the commercial clause of the Constitution giving power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, has Congress the right to charter a railroad company or a canal company? Is that the position of the Senator? Then, under the same clause of the Constitution, under the power to regulate commerce among the States, Congress, doing what the Senator from Vermont said and what the Senator from Massachusetts said Congress could do, might charter a railroad company in the States to build and operate a railroad in a State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Missouri will pardon me a moment, I will say that my friend from Mississippi has apparently overstated my proposition. I have not admitted or said, so far as I know, that Congress has power to charter a railroad within a State and in a State alone. What I said was that Congress, I thought, had power to charter a railroad company to build a railroad from the border of Mexico to Canada—to illustrate, a national road, to govern commerce between and across many States.

Mr. GEORGE. I accept that amendment, but I do not see any substantial difference in the view that the Senator from Missouri and I take between the power of Congress to incorporate a railroad company running between several States, as the Senator from Vermont says, and one to operate solely within a State. Does the Senator from Missouri think Congress can create a corporation to build a railroad from Washington city to New Orleans, passing through several States?

Mr. VEST. All I have to say in regard to that is that Congress has done it. Congress did it in the construction of the railroads to run across the continent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. From the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. VEST. They did do it, and I hold in my hand the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, 91 United States Reports, affirming the legality of that act.

Mr. GEORGE. But the grant, the charter to the Pacific railroads was confined to the Territories.

Mr. VEST. The grant was from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, without reference to whether it ran through Territories or States, and the Supreme Court in this case that I have before me gave their reasons for the legality of it:

> Although this road was a military necessity, there were other reasons active at the time in producing an opinion for its completion besides the protection of an exposed frontier. There was a vast unpeopled territory lying between the Missouri and Sacramento Rivers, which was practically worthless without the facilities afforded by a railroad for the transportation of persons and property. With its construction, the agricultural and mineral resources of this territory could be developed, settlements made where settlements would be possible, and thereby the wealth and power of the United States largely increased.

I say, as a matter of course, that Congress has no right to incorporate a railroad or canal company within the domain or limits of a single State; but when there are several States, if Congress comes to the conclusion that it is necessary to build a railroad or a canal across this continent and through States under the exercise of its power under the commercial clause it has the authority. We have just passed a bill here to regulate freights upon railroads, the interstate-commerce bill, that received the ardent support of my friend from Mississippi. What is the difference, let me ask him, between regulating the freights and saying how the business of the railroad shall be done and giving an act of incorporation to individuals to build such a road? There is no difference in the power. It comes from the same grant in the Constitution.

I want to call attention again to this report made by the Senator from Vermont. The Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Alabama have both been vastly exercised about the concession to Captain Eads and his associates from the Government of Mexico. It would seem to me a perfectly legitimate and conclusive argument upon this branch of the subject to say simply that the Government of the United States is not bound to the extent of one single dollar in any event in regard to this concession or in regard to this interoceanic ship-railway. I accepted an amendment, in fact drew it myself, which provides that in no contingency shall this Government, directly or indirectly, become liable for one single cent; and I drew another amendment, which the Senator from Alabama offered and in which I concurred, that no treaty rights of the United States shall be affected by the construction of this railway or by this incorporation. How, then, is it possible that the Government of the United States can lose anything in any event under this concession, or if this act shall be passed by Congress?

But is it not remarkable that whilst the Senator from Vermont criticises every line and syllable in this concession from Mexico, he reports in favor of a bill, and the Committee on Foreign Relations report unanimously in favor of it, giving an act of incorporation to the Maritime Canal of Nicaragua without any concession at all?

Mr. MORGAN. A treaty covers it.

Mr. VEST. There is no treaty. That treaty failed of confirmation by the Senate of the United States. If it was so, why should this report say "under any concessions or authority that the Republic of Nicaragua may concede to them?"

It seems to the committee—

Says this report, after deciding in favor of the constitutionality of the incorporation—

It seems to the committee, therefore, that the least the United States can do is to authorize a corporation, composed, as it is believed the names mentioned in the bill do, of highly respectable and responsible citizens of the United States, to be a corporation for the purpose of building this canal under any concessions or authority that the Republic of Nicaragua may concede to them. It will be noticed that the bill, as proposed to be amended, provides rigorous security for the due administration of the affairs of the corporation and for the prevention of the diversion of its funds to other purposes than those intended by the act, and that it also provides for the complete authority of Congress to amend or repeal it as the public good may require. It will also be observed that the bill as amended does not draw into question the existence or extent of any supposed treaty obligation of the United States with any power.

Looking, therefore, to the large benefits, not only the United States and the Republic of Nicaragua and her sister republics, but also to the commerce and intercommunication of the whole sisterhood of civilized governments on the globe, the committee recommends the passage of the bill, with the amendments proposed, in the hope that the resources and enterprise of private citizens of our country may be enabled to accomplish this great work even if our Government itself is not yet ready to undertake it.

Mr. GEORGE. Where is the office of this company to be?

Mr. VEST. There is a provision in this concession that they may have an office in New York.

Mr. GEORGE. Where is it to exercise its powers?

Mr. VEST. It proposes to exercise its powers in the United States and in Mexico, as a matter of course, to construct the ship-railway. The Maritime Nicaragua Company will exercise their powers in the United States and have an office in New York, and they also propose to construct a canal in Nicaragua.

Mr. GEORGE. What powers are to be exercised in this country?

Mr. VEST. The power to open books, take stock, pass by-laws, and the general powers of a corporation.

Mr. GEORGE. It has no other?

Mr. VEST. I take it for granted that the main object for all practical purposes of this association is to secure the carrying out of its legitmate results, to raise money, and that is to be raised in the United States. It has already raised and spent $400,000, and is prepared to raise in this country $30,000,000 more by and among the incorporators, some of the wealthiest men in the United States and the largest shipbuilder engaged in that kind of business possibly in the world; and yet the Senator asks me what it proposes to do in this country. It proposes to raise this money here; it proposes to get the means with which to build this ship-railway in the interest of the commerce of the world, and particularly in the interest of the commerce of the people of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question if he will yield.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask whether there is any objection to putting into this bill, as the Senator has drawn it, a minimum capital stock? I see that the bill as it is drawn, says the capital stock shall not "exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000," but it does not have any limit at the other end. It seems to me there should be some sum, $1,000,000, $2,000,000, or any other sum which is to be paid in; or if the capital stock were $20,000,000, as in the Nicaragua bill, that 10 per cent. should be required to be paid in.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection in the world to such a provision. I did not, to be frank about it, draw this bill. It was sent to me by Captain Eads, and I introduced it at the time, supposing there would be no sort of opposition to it. Captain Eads has been before the Commerce Committee for a number of years asking for a guarantee of $7,500,000. Mexico gave a guarantee of a portion of that amount on her own account. But there was so much opposition to that proposition that finally he withdrew it altogether, and comes here simply asking for a naked act of incorporation, with the express provision that this Government shall not be bound to the extent of one single cent, directly or indirectly; and yet obstacles spring up on every hand in front of this plain proposition; and it is urged here now most eloquently and vehemently that this American citizen, who is, to say the least, an engineer of eminence and a citizen of high repute, shall not be permitted to take the carrying out of this grand enterprise without any risk to this Government at all.

The Senator from Vermont was most facetious in criticising the bill before the Senate as a unique bill; and yet what is the difference between that and the bill which he reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, which provides that—

Frederick Billings—

And some five or six gentlemen—

and all those persons who are or may be associated with them, and their successors, are hereby created a body corporate under the name and style of the "Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," by which name said company may sue or be sued, may defend and be defended, in all courts of law and equity within the United States, may have a common seal, and generally may have and possess the rights and privileges usually possessed by similar companies—

And yet when the Senator came to that provision in the Tehuantepec ship-railway bill he tore passion into tatters, and his judicial and legal acumen was utterly shocked and horrified at giving any such power to any corporation! Here it is found in the bill he reported himself—usually possessed by similar companies, and may receive, purchase, hold, and convey such real estate and personal estate as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act, and may do all lawful things to secure the full enjoyment of the powers, privileges, rights, benefits, and grants contained in any canal concession made or to be made to them, or those to whom they may succeed, by the Republics of Nicaragua or Costa Rica, or both; and the principal office of said corporation shall be in the city of New York, and all legal process may be served upon said company by service upon the person who may at the time be in charge of said office, or upon the attorney of said company, whose name and address shall be certified by the president of the company; and such certificate shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States.

The Senator talks about a unique act of incorporation. Look at this. Here is this act of incorporation without a scintilla or sight of a concession from Nicaragua at all, not even a right of way or anything, and it provides that under any concession that may be granted hereafter this corporation shall exist. Suppose Nicaragua should hereafter demand absolute control over the canal when constructed, we bind ourselves to that in advance.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him and call his attention to articles 14 to 18 inclusive of the treaty of 1867 between the United States and Nicaragua, which is available for the building of a ship-canal across Nicaragua, and asserts the rights of citizens of the United States in connection with it, gives the guarantee of this Government of neutrality and protection to that line. The difference in the two cases, if the Senator will allow me to observe it, is this: That this has no concession. Of course there is no concession, but there is a treaty right, whereas I contend that our rights under the scheme of Mr. Eads are also regulated by treaty; but I do not think the Senator from Missouri believes that. In his estimate of it, without any treaty relation, it depends entirely on a concession, which is very objectionable, I think, especially if we undertake to protect it, but the Nicaragua canal depends upon a treaty agreement between the two countries and without any concession to modify that in any form.

Mr. VEST. Irrespective of any opinion I entertain about the Gadsden treaty, the Senator from Alabama has most vigorously and eloquently argued for five or six hours that the Gadsden treaty gave to the citizens of the United States all the rights the citizens of Mexico had in transit over that isthmus.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. VEST. Very good. If that is so they are fully protected in the case of the construction of the Tehuantepec Canal. If the Gadsden treaty has any effect, that is an absolute protection as to the transit of American citizens.

Mr. MORGAN. Not if we give it away by adopting the concession.

Mr. VEST. It is said that there are treaty stipulations with Nicaragua. I have heard, it has been whispered—I do not say where—but it has been in the press of the country that the State Department is being urged now to conclude a treaty with Nicaragua with reference to this canal. I have heard, it has been published in the papers of the country, that Nicaragua demanded a loan of $4,000,000 from the people of the United States before they would give the right of transit by way of that canal.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether he has ever read the treaty of 1867 with Nicaragua?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course that treaty was gone over and was in print before us here in a debate in which the Senator and myself participated.

Mr. MORGAN. It is still in full force and gives every right that I spoke of.

Mr. VEST. And yet we know that there is no concession to-day in existence from Nicaragua to any corporation; and it is worth while to inquire here what is the purpose of passing this Nicaragua act of incorporation at this time. What is to become of a concession if hereafter made? What is to be the result of it? Is this company to be incorporated now in order to receive a concession that we must afterward buy? Is this act of incorporation now proposed in this Congress in order that the corporators may negotiate for themselves a right of concession from Nicaragua, in order that we hereafter may negotiate with them for that thing?

What is that concession that is mentioned in this act? What is it to be? I want to ask the Senator from Alabama if he has the treaty to which he refers, why does he refer at all to a concession to be afterward obtained from Nicaragua? What is the use of giving a concession if he has everything by treaty stipulation? Does he not know from a public document laid but a few days ago on our tables here that Nicaragua and Costa Rica are engaged in a controversy in regard to the occupation of the San Juan River, and that a few weeks ago they agreed to leave it to the President of the United States to act as umpire between them? Costa Rica comes in now and demands one-ninth of the proceeds of the tolls on this canal that is to be constructed, this canal in nubibus resting upon this magnificent lake of Nicaragua.

When the company is created and the canal constructed, Costa Rica steps in and says: "I want one-ninth of the proceeds of this canal, or you shall not have the privilege of putting a dam upon the San Juan River," as long as from here to the Treasury Department, 51 feet high; and yet gentlemen talk about engineering difficulties at Tehuantepec! There is no concession, there is a disputed boundary line between Costa Rica and Nicaragua to-day, and yet the sensibility of the Senator from Vermont, so anxious to protect the people of the United States, so hypercritical as to the concession made to Captain Eads is lacerated at the idea of such a unique bill as that before us now, and he himself reports a bill to give an act of incorporation to five or six gentlemen who propose to construct a canal at Nicaragua without having any concession or knowing what its terms will be, with a disputed boundary line and the President of the United States to-day solicited to act as umpire between these rival South American states. What is the nature of that proposition?

Then let us weigh the sincerity of the Senator from Vermont when he attacks this concession made by Mexico, a neighboring sister republic to the United States. Does not every man know that a canal at Nicaragua means an enormous navy competent to meet on the ocean the navy of our rival, Great Britain? Do we not know that to-day, according to Admiral Porter, we have but one single vessel that can go to sea in the event of war, the Dolphin? On the very day after that martial debate here, when we pelted Great Britain with epithets and undertook to clean out the British Channel, the Admiral of the United States, Porter, came out in a public letter and said that if we went to war we had but one vessel that could steam out of any port and last a minute on the bosom of the ocean.

What would be the result if we went into the Nicaragua scheme to-day? As the Senator from Massachusetts has so well said, with the islands outside on the Caribbean Sea in the possession and ownership of Great Britain, it would mean that we must immediately build and put afloat a navy, a permanent navy equal to the great emergency that would then come upon us. We should be compelled to construct absolutely, to build and make a harbor at Greytown upon the Caribbean Sea, and a harbor at Brito upon the Pacific Ocean, dig them out, scoop them out of rock and sand, and build them from the beginning, from the foundation stone up. After we have done that and constructed this canal we enter the waters of Lake Nicaragua with its enormous embankment of 51 feet high, extending a distance equal to from here to the Treasury Department of the United States, with a lock, one single lock, a lift-lock of 53 feet with a gate 88 feet high.

After we have accomplished all this we must then put afloat and wait for a conflict with the navies of the world such a navy as we never had and as exists alone to-day in imagination. The construction of that canal, Mr. McFarland, an engineer officer of the United States, says, would cost at least $140,000,000. The construction of the canal is simply the beginning of the expense. We could not reach it with land forces. We should have to march down the isthmus, obtain the consent of Mexico to pass by Tehuantepec, and on down to Nicaragua, 750 miles below, and there our troops would be in a tropical climate filled with tropical fevers, far from home, without any base of supplies.

We are told by the Senator from Vermont that this proposition of Eads is a unique proposition, unheard of and unknown before in the annals of America. The Senator from Alabama asked what the United States got, and the Senator from Vermont repeated the question. I believe this ship-railway can be built, but I am not here to discuss that question, because that is between the capitalists and Captain Eads, and we are not asked to put a dollar into it. If it is built, it is a continuation of the coast line of the United States. Tehuantepec is at the upper extremity, or 1,500 miles of isthmus.

It is exclusively upon the soil of Mexico, a sister republic, which, without using the phrase of "manifest destiny," is bound to come under the dominant sentiments and institutions of the people of the United States. I have no doubt—I may not live to see it, and no man here present may live to see it—the time will come as certainly as this Government continues to exist that Mexico will become a component part of the territory of the United States. When the strain comes upon our institutions that will come when we must have more territory in order to escape from great and manifest evils, then the people of the United States will look for more territory, and they must inevitably look in the direction of Mexico and no where else.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that part of this plan?

Mr. VEST. The Senator asks me if that is part of this plan. I am speaking for myself. No man is responsible for my utterances. I only give my own opinion. But I say now emphatically and distinctly that there is a vast difference between Nicaragua and Mexico geographically, as to the people, as to the institutions, as to the interests involved. If we construct the Nicaragua Canal, it means that we seek Nicaragua for better or worse; we are to protect her territory; we are to become the sponsors for her and for her institutions and for her interests. Mexico is allied to us by vicinity and with the finest climate and soil upon the face of the globe. It is only necessary to infuse into her people the business enterprise and activity of her neighbor on the north to make it the ideal republic of the world.

Mr. President, I could weary the Senate and myself by reading the opinions of distinguished engineers as to the feasibility and practicability of the Tehuantepec ship-railway. I do not think it pertinent to this discussion. I have all the statements here at hand and could read them ad nauseam to the Senate. The best engineering talent in the world says that this project is entirely feasible. But it is not logical to bring that into this discussion, for the simple reason that we are not asked to believe that this ship-railway is practicable and feasible. All we are asked to do is to give this incorporation and risk the capital of this country and the world as to whether it will be invested in it or not.

But I can not forbear noticing what has been said in regard to a portion of this route across the Tehuantepec Isthmus. It was said here by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Alabama that the river was simply a part of the canalization that was necessary, and the Senator from Vermont declared that it was a swampy river, shallow in depth, that it would have to be dredged out and kept in that condition in order to be safe for navigation. I have in my hands, amongst a number of other works, Williams' Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and this is the standard authority of the survey of that isthmus, and I may state parenthetically that I have here also at the command of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Vermont the profile and instrumental survey made lately of that isthmus, within the last two years. That survey and those profiles have been in the committee-rooms of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives and the Senate for more than a year, entirely accessible and open to the inspection of any one. The survey of Williams, which is the standard authority on that subject—it has nothing to do with the ship-railway, which was not then thought of—says in regard to the Coatzacoalcos River, what I shall read. The Coatzacoalcos River, permit me to say, has a bar at the mouth, which can be removed, as Captain Eads says, by the jetty system, and there is now 15 feet of water at low tide on that bar; but crossing the bar the ship would enter then into the Coatzacoalcos River proper, and would go up to Minatitlan, which is from 20 to 25 miles above the mouth of the river, where the works for the elevation and taking of ships out of the water are to be constructed. Williams says:

> As soon as the bar is crossed, and the ascent of the river commenced, it widens and deepens, and at 7 miles from the Gulf the lead shows a depth of 40 feet, which is preserved for some distance. The least depth in the channel below Minatitlan is 12 feet, and this may be carried nearly to the island of Tacamichapa. The superior advantages offered by this stream as a safe and convenient harbor for ships early attracted the attention of the Spanish conquerors. Cortes, in his official dispatches to the Emperor Charles V, speaks of the importance of this river as furnishing the best harbor to be found on the Gulf coast of Mexico. In giving the results of a survey of the river, made by his order, he says: "They found two fathoms and a half of water at its entrance, in the shallowest part, and ascending 12 leagues, the least they found was 5 or 6 fathoms."
> These soundings were made in the year 1520, and give about the same depth over the bar at the mouth of the river which we now find. This is an important fact, as proving that the material of which the bar is formed does not change its position, and giving promise that any work for deepening the channel at this point will afford permanent results.

But the Senator from Vermont draws a graphic picture of a 3,000-ton ship passing over the Tarifa Heights and then plunging down a precipitous descent to the laguna upon the banks of the Pacific Ocean. From this same authority I read a description of that portion of this route, after crossing over what is called the three divisions and going down toward the Pacific Ocean:

By a narrow opening or gap in these mountains, we descend suddenly from the elevated table-lands to the Pacific plains, which form the third or southern division. These plains average about 20 miles in breadth, from the base of the mountains to the Pacific coast, and descend on the meridians to the lagoons, at an inclination varying from 10 to 15 feet in the mile; thus forming, as it were, an immense inclined plane, with its side next the mountains, about 250 feet above the Pacific. Under these circumstances they present a remarkably smooth, even surface, with a uniform gentle slope toward the sea. In some instances there are occasional isolated hills, which, rising abruptly, form a prominent feature in the topography of this part of the country. The plains are traversed by eight rivers, which discharge the drainage of the southern slope into the sea. Seven of these rivers empty into the lagoons, which are connected with the sea by a narrow outlet, called the Boca Barra; the eighth, or Tehuantepec River, comes from a northwesterly direction, and passing through the city of the same name, discharges itself directly into the sea at the Bay of Ventosa.

This is the precipitous descent so graphically described by the Senator from Vermont, while this engineer whose survey is considered the highest authority in regard to the typography of that country asserts that it is a remarkably favorable survey running down to the laguna. I may be permitted to say here that it is within engineering possibilities that the laguna may not be used at all, that the survey may not go out to the ocean itself, but to an arm of the ocean extending a number of miles further, to secure deep water in the vicinity of the entrance.

I am not disposed, however, to go into these details. So much has been said about them that I can not resist the temptation of saying a few words in regard to the surveying difficulties that are met by the Nicaragua Canal. According to a published statement it appears that the Nicaragua Canal has a width at the surface of the water for 7 miles of its length of 80 feet, and its depth for 46 miles is 28 feet, and the locks have a depth of only 29 feet. Its water width is 80 feet; its depth for 46 miles—I think the statement of the Senator's own engineer, Menoçal, is 28 feet—with a depth to the locks, of which they are seven, according to the Senator from Alabama, of 29 feet.

The Senator from Alabama ridiculed the idea that the war vessels of the United States in any contingency could pass over the Tehuantepec ship-railway. He said that the largest tonnage of any ship to be passed over it is 6,000 tons and that we have not got a war vessel that does not weight more. The largest war vessel of the United States, I believe, is the Chicago, 6,800 tons, 800 more than the 6,000 tons which are to be given to the ships transported by Captain Eads. Since the Senator made this statement I have taken the pains to find out what the tonnage of our war vessels is. With a width of 80 feet, a depth of 28 feet in the main for 46 miles on the Nicaragua route and only 29 feet depth of the locks, let us see how the war vessels of the world would pass through that.

I have the nationality, name of vessel, width of beam, and draft. The Italia, width of beam 72 feet 9 inches. That would give it 3 inches to spare in going through the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What country is that?

Mr. VEST. Italian; taken from the records of our Navy Department. That vessel has a draft of 31 feet 2 inches. Italy also has the Lepanto; and this is instructive reading in two or three aspects to the Congress of the United States. We are in the habit of hearing of Italy as the land of maccaroni and lazzaroni, but it seems she has a better navy than the United States has. The Lepanto has 72 feet 9 inches width of beam and a draft of 31 feet 2 inches; the Duilio has 64 feet 9 inches width of beam and 26 feet 7 inches draft; the Andrea Doria, 65 feet 4 inches width of beam with a draft of 27 feet 2 inches; the Sardinia, 75 feet 6 inches width of beam and 28 feet 6 inches draft; the Sicilia has 76 feet 6 inches width of beam and a draft of 28 feet 6 inches; the Sardegna, 76 feet 2 inches width of beam, with a draft of 29 feet.

Now we come to our great commercial rival, England, because I say, Mr. President, if we build a navy on that account (and if we build the Nicaragua canal we shall need one from the beginning) we must build one equal to that of England. That canal without a navy would be an elephant on our hands, more disastrous than any elephant ever heard of in this or any other country. We at least must have a navy composed of vessels as large as these foreign war vessels, in order to compete with them and protect our own property. The Sultan, belonging to Great Britain, has a width of beam of 59 feet ½ inch, with 27 feet 11 inches draught. The Inflexible has a width of beam of 75 feet, and a draught of 26 feet 4 inches. The Dreadnaught has a width of beam of 63 feet 10 inches, with a draught of 26 feet 9 inches. The Camperdon, 68 feet 6 inches width of beam, with a draught of 27 feet 3 inches.

Now we come to Austria with the Tegethoff, width of beam 62 feet 9 inches and her draught 26 feet 6 inches.

These are some of the war vessels of the world with which we are to come in conflict in the event of a difficulty between the United States and the governments to which they belong.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They could not get through that canal very well.

Mr. VEST. No, but what sort of ships could we pass through the canal? I believe it has been suggested here in debate that the only thing to do is to take them into Lake Nicaragua, and there have a grand naval spectacular performance for the edification of the people of the whole world; but to get at them for the purposes of protecting the canal or the commerce of the United States would be as impossible as for me to carry off this Capitol on my shoulders. With 7 miles cut through rock, according to the engineer's report, with a deeper cutting than any known in order to make this canal, how long would any war vessel of the dimensions which I have read here to-day live in such a canal as that? How could it get through it? It is simply impossible.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I never undertake to interrupt unless I get leave. May I ask my friend what would be the weight of these war vessels that he has named with their armament, &c., if they were laid up on one of Fairbank's scales that are made at Saint Johnsbury, Vt.?

Mr. VEST. I do not know what their weight would be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it not be 10,000 tons?

Mr. VEST. I know that the weight of the Chicago, the largest vessel we have, with all her armament upon her, is 6,800 tons.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These great one would be 10,000 tons.

Mr. VEST. Captain Eads proposes to take a vessel of 6,000 tons from the Gulf to the ocean. The Mexican concession says 3,000 tons, but Captain Eads is willing to guarantee 6,000 to anybody who will put confidence in the enterprise. It is not a question between the Government of the United States and the Senator from Vermont and Captain Eads, but between the capitalists, who are willing or not willing to put money into the project. Captain Eads is willing to say that he can take a vessel over with 3,000 tons, and if Mexico is willing to accept that it is a question between Mexico and Captain Eads and nobody else.

The Senator from Alabama's description of the Nicaragua route is so different from the published reports of Menoçal and other engineers, that I am constrained to notice it. He says that the San Juan River can easily be made navigable for vessels drawing 20 feet of water. This conflicts with the fact that the Nicaraguan Government has for several years attempted, but in vain, to obtain plans and make contracts for improving this river so that boats drawing 4 feet of water might navigate it without danger of being wrecked on the rapids.

The Senator says that there are no obstructions at Nicaragua in the shape of heavy cuttings, whereas the engineer, in his statements, gives one rock cutting nearly 3 miles in length whose average depth is 149½ feet and maximum depth 218 feet, and another whose maximum depth is 318 feet—considerably deeper than the depth of the greatest cut at Panama, if the Senator's statement that it is 218 feet is correct.

It seems to have been assumed all along by the advocates of the Nicaragua canal that all the engineering difficulties lie in the way of the ship-railway, and that canal building for ocean vessels on the Nicaraguan Isthmus is a very easy and inexpensive work. After carefully comparing the statements of the engineers, I am rather inclined to believe that the greater difficulties lie in the path of the canal, for in addition to these which I have just mentioned are several others of still greater importance.

The canal will require 7 miles of rock-cutting at an expense so great that the engineer, in order to get his estimates down to a low limit, was obliged to make this rough, rocky, and dangerous trough only 80 feet wide at the surface of the water; that is about the width of the Erie Canal, which varies from 72 to 100 feet. Through this narrow trough, and through the scant amount of water it contains, he proposes to push a vessel 52 feet wide at 5 miles an hour. Why, sir, such a vessel at that rate of speed, could it by any expenditure of power be obtained, would not go 100 yards without taking a sheer and running into the rocky side of the canal and to certain destruction. The size of this ditch cut in the rock is only about two-thirds that of the Suez Canal, which is so congested with ships getting aground against the the sandy banks and obstructing the channel that it can, with the greatest difficulty, accommodate a traffic of less than 6,000,000 tons.

I find that the size of the canal designed at Nicaragua is not one-half as large as the proposed enlargement of the Suez Canal, and yet the advocates of the Nicaragua Canal assert that it will accommodate easily 12,000,000 tons; while at Suez it is necessary to make one twice as large to accommodate 6,000,000 tons.

Then, I am not so sure that the harbors at Nicaragua can be deepened and improved as easily as has been stated. The naval engineer who made the plans seems to have done all he could to whittle down estimates, and in this has admirably succeeded. But when his estimates for improving the Greytown harbor on the Caribbean Sea is $1,766,625 and that of the Army Engineer, Colonel McFarland, who has much larger experience in such works, is $7,733,375, it may not be audacious for us to question the estimate of this young naval engineer. Bearing on this question I find the following very forcible remarks in one of the discussions on the canal:

The question of successfully improving the harbor at Greytown is one of vital importance to the canal. The problem to be solved is how to restore and maintain a harbor that has been completely ruined and practically obliterated by forces it is well-nigh beyond the power of man to control. Natural causes have diverted from their former channel the waters of the lower San Juan and turned them into the Colorado River, which debouches into the sea through Costa Rica. When it is borne in mind that our engineers have failed to deepen the channel into a single harbor along the whole sweep of our Atlantic and Gulf coasts, except the mouth of the Mississippi, the folly is apparent of intrusting to an amateur the design and estimates for a work as difficult as that at Greytown.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to weary the Senate with these estimates. I have only been induced to go into this matter at all by the attacks made on the Tehuantepec ship-railway, when I repeat that the only question is between the capitalists who are willing to put their capital into it and the projector of the enterprise.

I am not here as a militiaman in the service and at the use of Captain Eads, as the Senator from Alabama intimated. I know Captain Eads; I know what he has done as an engineer; I know to what respect his opinions are entitled. I confess that I am unable now to pass or give an opinion as to the engineering difficulties of this route which would be worth anything to the Senate or to any other body. I am not a practical engineer; but I say when we are offered a chance for an isthmian transit which is simply the continuation of the coast line of the United States, without one single dollar, without the possibility of one cent's loss to the people of the United States, it would be a fatuity beyond my imagination if we rejected that chance.

Why, Mr. President, what has been the result of the construction of the Suez Canal? It has brought Liverpool 2,500 miles nearer to the Indian possessions of England. I was struck the other day with a statement which I saw in the English journals officially that England to-day has constructed 15,000 miles of railway in her Indian possessions and then the construction of the Suez Canal has given her 2,500 miles nearer transit between Liverpool and India, where she pays her laborers 8 cents a day to raise wheat. Why should we not provide for shortening our route between our Atlantic and Pacific possessions? To-day we are passing wheat either around the cape 16,000 miles or across the continent 500 miles farther than by the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Tehuantepec is 750 miles nearer to New York than Nicaragua, 1,250 miles nearer than Panama. I am taking but one side; but when you double it, it makes a difference between Tehuantepec and Nicaragua of over 1,500 miles, and nearly 2,500 miles difference between Panama and Tehuantepec.

In addition to this, when it comes to the question of strategy and military defense, look at the difference. The Nicaragua canal would necessitate a standing army and a standing navy in order to protect it—simply to protect it in the event of a war with a foreign nation, and the canal under our protection. What would be the result? Our men would have to be carried in the face of the navies of the world to Nicaragua, or pass by land through Mexico, across and along the isthmus; but in the event of the Tehuantepec ship-railway being constructed, it could be defended by troops marched directly through Mexican territory. What on the other hand would be our position? Mexico to-day is building five railroads, one of them running south to Tehuantepec, and now in process of construction. Mexico holds out her hand to-day, begging us to go into this project and exercise a joint protectorate over it. The land forces of the United States could be sent in a few days to protect this ship-railway if it should be built.

Here is this great Mediterranean Sea of ours, which Commodore Maury told us was the Mediterranean of the whole world, with two straits only through which war vessels could come to attack this railway; one the Strait of Florida, the other the Strait of Yucatan; and with a comparatively small navy we could protect ourselves on the Gulf portion of this ship-railway against the naval forces of the entire earth.

Without expending a dollar we have a chance to construct this ship-railway. I know, Mr. President, when this project was first presented to me, with all my admiration of Captain Eads and my belief of his engineering skill and power, I received it with some degree of incredulity; but when I reflected upon the fact that I received with some incredulity his judgment and his propositions to throw a bridge of 525 feet span across the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, when I reflected that I had received with more incredulity his proposition to deepen the mouth of the Mississippi River, and when he told me that he could construct this ship-railway beyond a doubt and was willing to put his life and fortune upon it, I was willing to accept his assurance. I believe to-day if he lives he will construct it by voluntary contributions upon the part of the people of the United States and the world.

Have we any doubt that Mexico would make with us the proper treaty stipulation to pass our munitions of war and our armies across her domain? We have now upon our statute book a treaty with Mexico that permits our troops to cross her frontier to pursue hostile Indians. Mexico knows full well her relations to the United States. Mexico to-day is anxious to induce American capital to engage in enterprises in that country. Under a beneficent and statesmanlike rule the old prejudices growing out of the war of 1846 has passed away. An American sentiment is growing there rapidly and vigorously among all the educated classes. Who doubts that Mexico would give us any treaty stipulation necessary?

As a matter of course it was imperative that Mexico, in granting this concession, should protect her own territory and her own self-respect. She was bound to see that this corporation should be Mexican—Mexican in what? As to its right to the soil of Mexico alone. She gave to this company 2,700,000 acres of public land, she exempts it from taxation, except revenue stamps, which the constitution of Mexico does not permit to be taken off in favor of any one. The constitution of Mexico provides that no munitions of war or armies belonging to any foreign nation shall cross her soil without what is called a constitutional concession to that effect. Who doubts, after the Gadsden treaty and with the change in public sentiment among the educated classes in Mexico which we know exists to-day, that a treaty could be at any time brought about between the two countries that would give us all that we ask?

I have no more to say in regard to this discussion than this: I have no doubt Eads is entitled to a place by the side of the great discoverers and inventors of the world. If Columbus had gone to Ferdinand and Isabella after all the long years of his hard exertions and of weary and incessant delay, and said to them, "Your majesties, I ask not one dollar from your treasury, I ask not one favor or gift; I ask from you simply the poor privilege of sailing to discover an unknown world and a passage to the East Indies under your flag and that alone," what would have been thought of those sovereigns if they had turned him away and said "no"?

To-day this man, ridiculed, slandered, outraged as he has been by those who are unworthy to touch his shoes in point of talent and genius, besmeared with all sorts of filth and slander—this man now, after engineering achievements which have commanded the admiration of the whole civilized world, comes and asks from this Congress simply the poor privilege of attempting to secure for us a transit which was the dream of Cortez, which has been within the mind of every American statesman worthy of the name, and to give it to us without money and without price.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to reach a proper conclusion on this bill. I have reflected about it and given it as much attention as I could. I shall vote for the bill, but I desire to say that I do not place the constitutional power of Congress to pass it on the simple ground taken by the Senator from Massachusetts and by the Senator from Missouri. I regard the bill as simply giving to a foreign corporation, essentially foreign in all respects—the work it is to do is foreign, and the right to do that work comes from a foreign government—I therefore regard this bill as nothing more than giving the rights of hospitality to a foreign corporation within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. VEST. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The provisions of this amendment, as I recollect them, are very extraordinary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Nebraska indicate where he wishes his amendment to be inserted?

Mr. VAN WYCK. At the end of the second section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 it is proposed to add:

That no certificate for stock shall be issued until the same shall be fully paid for in money at the par value of said stock, and the money deposited in the treasury of said company; and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask to modify the second part by substituting what will now be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

No bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received shall be authorized or issued until such paid capital shall amount to the sum of $10,000,000, and no bonds shall be issued or disposed of at less than par value.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have been waiting for as many days as this bill has been under discussion supposing the projectors of it would make some suggestion in the way of protection or security for persons, at least as to the amount of stock to be issued and the mode of its issuance, and also as to the amount of bonds to be issued and the security to the bondholders; but from the committee and the projectors of the bill has come not even a suggestion, and as the bill stands as reported from the committee, unless something shall be added by the Senate there is no restraint or protection. There is a simple clause that they may issue stock and bonds not to exceed $100,000,000, without any suggestion as to the amount of stock which shall form a part of that $100,000,000, or the number of shares of stock that shall be subscribed, or how much shall be paid thereon.

Now, is it possible, no matter whether it be a foreign corporation or for foreign purposes, that at this age of the world, with all the experiences in our own history and the experiences of other nations, we shall incorporate, set on foot and give life to a creation and impose no sort of conditions upon it? It is a startling proposition. What objection the Senator from Missouri may have to my amendment as now proposed I fail to see.

There was, at one time, a suggestion made, but not in the shape of a proposition from the committee, that they might subscribe for $10,000,000, I think, and pay 10 per cent. upon it, and that upon the payment of a million dollars they could proceed ad libitum, according to their own will, to issue stock and bonds for $99,000,000. But there is not even such a provision as that in the bill, it seems. There is no requirement anywhere, either in letter or in spirit, although it has been conceded here in this Senate Chamber, that the great injury to our prosperity to-day has been the allowance of watered stocks and bonds until the whole nation is incumbered with a mortgage, without any consideration, of nearly $4,000,000,000. Yet it is proposed to do even worse than that in this bill, and to pass it without a requirement that any portion of this money shall be paid in cash into the treasury of the company.

It is all idle to talk as gentlemen have talked, which is undoubtedly true, of the great excellence and high moral character of the incorporators and the great wealth of some of them. The same could be said of all the projectors of railroads in this country. The same could be said of the organizers of the Union Pacific Railroad Company when they came here and Congress bestowed liberally in bonds and money, and yet those men conducted the enterprise in such a way as to bring about scandal and credit mobiliers, and finally by their own unrestrained issue of stocks and bonds they brought disaster to the company.

We are told to-day in the Senate Chamber that with a hundred million dollars indebtedness of these railroad companies we must be tender and careful through our laws, because otherwise the whole hundred millions will be lost to the nation. Yet those were men of character, they were men of moral excellence, they were men of genius, they were men of property. So with all the corporation system of this country which has entailed this enormous debt, upon which interest is extracted from the people by extortionate and oppressive railroad charges. We not only have all that before us in the history of our own country, but we have the history of France in her Mississippi scheme and others, and the history of England in her South Sea scheme and bubble, when her nobility, when her ministers, her chancellors of the exchequer and the treasury were all engaged in such projects.

There is no question of the genius of these gentlemen and the esteem in which they are held; but shall we not protect commerce, and shall we not protect innocent persons who may be disposed to enter into this enterprise by inserting a provision in the bill to restrict the amount of stock which may be issued or the cash which may be paid upon it, or to restrict the amount of bonds to be issued and state the condition upon which they shall be issued?

Mr. CALL obtained the floor.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to have an amendment read which may or may not meet the views of the Senator from Nebraska, but which I think is a sufficient protection?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri submits an amendment, which will be read for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the incorporators herein named, or as many as they may choose from their number by a majority vote, shall have power to open books of subscription to the capital stock of said company at such places, within the United States or elsewhere, as they may elect, and receive all subscriptions to said stock. When not less than $5,000,000 of said stock has been subscribed and 10 per cent. thereof paid in in cash, the said incorporators, or a majority of them, so authorized, shall call a meeting of the stockholders, to be held either in the city of New York, or in Washington, D. C. At least thirty days' notice of said meeting shall be given by mailing to each stockholder a written or printed circular calling his attention to the same, and by publication in at least two of the daily newspapers having general circulation in the city where the meeting is to be held. The stockholders present at said meeting, either personally or by proxy, shall elect a board of directors, who shall serve for such time as may be determined by a majority of the votes cast at said meeting, and who shall have such powers as are conferred by the by-laws. The stockholders shall also at said meeting adopt by-laws covering any or all of the matters mentioned in connection with by-laws in section 1 of this act; and any of said by-laws may be altered, amended, added to, or repealed, at any time thereafter as, in the opinion of the stockholders, the interests of the company may require.

At said first meeting of the stockholders it shall be the duty of the incorporators to deliver to the stockholders all moneys, stock-books, stock-certificates, property and effects held by them and belonging to said company; and thereafter all power vested in said incorporators, as such, shall cease and the stockholders and their successors shall thereafter constitute the corporation hereby created.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri where does that appear in the bill?

Mr. VEST. It is an amendment that I offer.

Mr. VAN WYCK. At best that calls for the payment of $500,000. It is open to precisely the same objections that I have stated. That starts the corporation on its high road, having paid in only $500,000. That is the only modification, as I understand by the amendment, of the original proposition which we have been considering for a week or more.

Mr. VEST. There are very few corporations with a capital of 50 per cent. paid in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator from Florida to yield to me that I may make an announcement to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to state that to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock I shall ask the Senate to consider resolutions of respect to the memory of the late Senator Pike.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, we have had a great deal of discussion here in regard to the power of Congress to make this incorporation, but it seems to me very clear that the only question in this matter is what we can do within our own territory. Manifestly there is no power in this Government to enact any law which is to operate beyond the territory of the United States. The authority and jurisdiction which it has over its own citizens exercised in a foreign country must be by the consent of that country alone.

What does this act of incorporation propose? It proposes simply to give the right of succession in the United States, the right to own property, and to contract and be contracted with. Beyond all doubt that is competent to be done here.

This question can not be tried by the objects it has in view or by the effect it may have upon property in a foreign country. We here simply give the power of succession, the power to contract and be contracted with, the power to own real and personal estate, and that is confined to our own country; but those rights of property which are acquired abroad are represented by persons who are and always will be within the power and jurisdiction of this Government. To my mind that settles the question, the domicile of the corporation being within our control. What other rights it may acquire abroad are matters that do not concern and can not be affected by the act of incorporation now asked to be passed.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that we are doing great discredit to the intelligence and power and wealth of this people in neglecting to take advantage of any of the transits across the isthmus that may be practicable. Certainly there is no question that the necessities of the world demand not only that we should encourage, but that we should by actual appropriation of money, by acts of public policy create this transit. I should greatly prefer that the Government of the United States undertake this work, and by its own sovereign power carry it into effect and establish a transit there either of its own authority or in concert with Mexico or with the other nations of the world; but now when the private enterprise of our citizens and the sagacity of great commercial men are applying to us for an ordinary exercise of the powers of legislation, that they may be associated together here in our own country, that the money they may contribute may be under their control in a convenient manner, that the right of succession may be given to them, it seems to me that there can be no possible reasonable objection to granting this act of incorporation.

There is another view to be taken of the matter. I sympathize very much with the idea of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] that the commerce of the world should not be taxed for the fictitious and pretended use of money which is not used, that there should not be a false capitalization of any enterprise; and it derives great force from the fact that there are but one or two practicable transits across the isthmus. If the ideas of this great engineer shall be realized and this enterprise shall be effected it will be an actual power of taxation upon commerce as great as is possessed by any nation over its own property and its own people.

In that point of view under ordinary circumstances I should support any amendment looking to the condition that there should be no greater capitalization than the actual and reasonable and proper cost of the great enterprise that is attempted. Whether it should be done by requiring the stock to be paid in advance would be another question. At present, under the circumstances in which this enterprise comes to us, I am opposed to embarrassing it with any other considerations than are absolutely necessary for the protection of the country and for the success of the enterprise itself.

Looking to the eventualities of this great enterprise, a corporation like the East India corporation to be created here and which may grow to be a vast power, it being a transit which it may be necessary for the interests of commerce in this country to be controlled by the Congress of the United States, I submit to the Senator from Missouri whether it would not be wise to add these amendments to the act of incorporation:

SEC. —. The power to alter, amend, or repeal this act of incorporation is hereby reserved to the United States.

SEC. —. The Government of the United States shall have the right at any time to acquire the ownership and control of the property of this corporation at such price as shall be ascertained by a fair appraisement of its value by appraisers, one of whom shall be appointed by the United States and the other by the said corporation, and a third who shall be selected by the two appointed persons.

To my mind these are proper conditions which should be attached to a corporation which has such great possible and even probable eventualities, and I shall submit them to the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is not the suggestion of amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri as a substitute first in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I should like to say in this connection, since the committee have shown the necessity of a little attention to the matter, that the proposition of the committee provides for a subscription of $5,000,000, and 10 per cent. paid, which would be $500,000; that is, the incorporators named are to meet together, not in Mexico, but they are to meet in New York or Washington.

I will say to my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL] that this is an American corporation, and whatever neglect there may be will be chargeable to the American Congress. Whatever scandal may grow out of this transaction will be chargeable to the American nation. The amendment provides that the corporators named shall meet in New York or Washington, not on the soil of Mexico; that there shall be $5,000,000 subscribed, and there shall be 10 per cent., or $500,000, paid in; and when that is done they are to give notice that there will be a meeting of the stockholders when they will turn over everything to the stockholders. The act of incorporation is to secure the stock, and the cash paid goes to the stockholders, and then they are to have the power to make by-laws.

I apprehend we have a right to look upon this as we look upon other incorporations. We have a right to adjudge to them the same high qualities, the same excellence, the same genius as other men, and also it becomes our duty to charge up against them the same passions and avarice and propensity to enrich themselves as other high-toned gentlemen who have gone into corporations have shown themselves to possess. I take them in both aspects. We can not discharge our duty unless we give them credit for excellence and charge them with the infirmities of mankind.

The amendment proposes that it shall all be turned over to the stockholders. That is to be the end of it. They may go in and make their by-laws then, as all other honorable corporations, just as your Pacific railroad companies have done, just as your Wabash system did, just as your great railroad systems in this country have done, in whose hands honorable, high-toned, money-making men—call them ingenious men, thrifty men—have gone in and made their by-laws, controlled by what? Not entirely by patriotism.

The gentlemen who propose to put their money in this scheme do it not so much on account of high patriotism to benefit the great American nation. We were amused with those stories, you remember. We were amused with that when we organized the Pacific railroad companies, and you remember how in both Chambers of Congress and throughout the whole country those patriotic men were lauded who were going to pay out their own private fortunes for the purpose of developing the country; and what then? We have learned about that.

We have a right to say the same precisely of these men. Captain Eads and his associates are not doing this for the benefit of mankind and the American Republic—not at all. They are doing this to accomplish good in that direction, but the greater good is to make a successful venture for themselves. That is all there is about it in that sense. We take the experience of the past and we know that to be the case. It has been so on our own soil, and I have said it was so on French soil and on English soil. Mankind is the same all over the world.

I supposed we had learned one lesson in this country, that organized capital, that genius banded together, needed some restraining power, and it would seem impossible with all the experience of the past before us that we should suffer such a bill to pass.

The only requirement is that when $500,000 shall be paid into the hands of the stockholders then they shall make by-laws. What then? What is to prevent the issue of stocks and bonds as other high-toned corporations have done, and what is to prevent the issuing of stocks and bonds principally to the projectors of this enterprise? There is nothing in the bill to prevent it.

I supposed we had reached at last a point where we could regulate that. We sought to apply such a restriction in the Senate to railroad corporations, as we all remember, railroad corporations that had been created by States; and when they undertook to invade and enter and lay their tracks through Indian Territory we have sought to apply such provisions to them.

We create here a new charter. We set it afloat, parade it as an American charter; and yet with all the experience of the world and our own experience are we to open the door for these men, if they are so inclined at any time and ambition or greed or avarice shall happen to control them, as it has controlled good men all over the world, and give them the same opportunity to do what was done in France, what was done in England, what has been done in the Republic of America?

If the proposition I submit is not correct, then adopt some proposition that will be some protection, so that in the future we shall not be compelled to bear the scandals which have attached to some of our legislation in the past and to some of the highest toned business men I suppose that the Republic of America ever produced.

Mr. HOAR. I give notice of a proposed amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri when that shall be offered. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is not yet pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not yet in order.

Mr. HOAR. I give notice of an amendment now which I hope he will accept. In the seventh line of his amendment, after the provision that subscriptions to the stock shall be opened, is this provision:

When not less than $5,000,000 of said stock has been subscribed and 10 per cent. thereof paid in in cash.

I propose to strike out the words "when not less than $5,000,000 of said stock has been subscribed and," and to insert:

When the Secretary of the Interior shall have certified that not less than $5,000,000 has been subscribed to said stock by responsible persons, and when,

So as to read:

When the Secretary of the Interior shall have certified that not less than $5,000,000 has been subscribed to said stock by responsible persons, and when 10 per cent. of the same shall have been paid in in cash.

The effect of that amendment will be to require bona fide and responsible subscriptions for the $5,000,000—persons certified to be responsible by a high public officer.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator inform the Senate why he puts in the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my statement, and then I will answer the question with great pleasure.

That stands, as I understand, in law as a fund. If it is not paid in, any creditor would have the right to compel its payment by a process in equity. The obligation is a fund for the debts of the company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, if you can find the stockholders.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; if you can find the stockholders.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts explain why he wants the Secretary of the Interior put in and the Government of the United States committed to it?

Mr. HOAR. The Secretary of the Interior is the officer of the Government to whom such duties are commonly committed. He is the officer of the Government to whom the superintendence of railroads, so far as the Government has any interest in them, is confided. He has the railroad auditor of accounts, the Government directors of railroads, under his control and in his Department, and he seems to be the natural person to deal with a railroad question.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not observed any feature of this bill heretofore that connected the Government of the United States with it. I thought it was a private enterprise, and I can not understand why the Senator should desire to connect the Government of the United States with this private corporation.

Mr. HOAR. There is not a State in the Union which, in exercising the superintending power over corporations, whether they are merely joint-stock companies for purely private business, for owning and renting real estate, or for manufacturing, that does not have its commissioner of corporations, or its State treasurer, or some other public officer certify to the lawful organization of the corporation, whether it is a private or a public corporation. If we wish to make provision that there shall be such a subscription it is proper to have some public officer charged with the duty of seeing that it is a bona fide subscription, and that the subscribers are responsible persons. I trust the honorable Senator from Missouri will accept the amendment.

Mr. VEST. I personally have not the slightest objection to the amendment.

I wish to make a remark in reply to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]. I do not ask for Captain Eads any immunity from the ordinary suspicion and from the ordinary restriction which attends every man who engages in an enterprise of this sort. All I ask for him is that he be treated fairly and liberally, because he is, as all the world knows, surrounded with great difficulties in this enterprise, and he is asking very little from the Government except this incorporation. That is all that he asks.

The Senator from Nebraska proposes to put the most extraordinary restrictions upon this stock and the amount of payment. He asks for a payment of 50 per cent., which is unheard of as to an enterprise of this sort. In the Nicaragua incorporation bill (and we will all concede to the Senator from Vermont that he is not in the habit of drawing any loose provisions in the bills that he controls) we have this provision:

That if stock to the amount of $10,000,000 shall not be subscribed—

This is an amendment of the committee—

That if stock to the amount of $10,000,000 shall not be subscribed, and 10 per cent. thereof actually paid in, before the expiration of two years next after the passage of this act, or if the work of constructing said canal shall not be actually commenced before and be in progress at the expiration of four years next after the passage of this act, the said corporation shall be deemed to have expired by limitation, and all its franchises and privileges shall be deemed to have absolutely ceased and become determined.

In the amendment which I have offered it is provided, in the first place, that this $5,000,000 of stock shall be subscribed and 10 per cent. paid in, which it is true is only $500,000. That is the initiative. Now, I propose, and I read it for information, to offer an amendment which is identical almost with that which we find in the Nicaragua bill, with the exception of the term of years:

SEC. —. That if stock to the amount of $10,000,000 shall not be subscribed, and 10 per cent. thereof actually paid in, before the expiration of two years next after the passage of this act, or if the work of constructing said railway shall not be actually commenced before, and be in progress at the expiration of four years next after the passage of this act, the said corporation shall be deemed to have expired by limitation, and all its franchises and privileges shall be deemed to have absolutely ceased and become determined.

With the exception of four years instead of two, this is identical with the provision in the maritime Nicaragua Canal bill, and I submit that that is enough.

Captain Eads ought not to be dealt with as an adventurer, as a mere speculator. He is putting the reputation of his whole life in this enterprise. He is sixty-two years old. His character is certainly worth something to him. A man who stands as he does before the world today is putting his whole private fortune in this thing, and he is doing what to a man of a high sense of honor and of a sensitive disposition is more than fortune, he is inducing his friends, the people who have stood by him through all his wonderful career, to put their money in on the faith of his participation in this enterprise. All I ask for him is that he shall be treated liberally, and in that broad, catholic spirit which is worthy of a great government in dealing with a distinguished citizen.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My distinguished friend from Missouri is handy and happy in calling attention to the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations as containing some clauses that he thinks, being forced to it, he would put into this bill, and one is the clause in respect of the paying in the subscriptions and paying in of money to the stock, actual money, which he has stated very fairly, being the ninth section of the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. What does he say to the sixth section?

That no part of the capital stock paid in—

As required by the ninth section—shall be at any time withdrawn or returned to the stockholders or in any manner diverted from the proper uses of the corporation.

A penalty follows, which I need not read, for anybody who takes part in that sort of thing.

What does he say to the tenth section, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations?

SEC. 10. That nothing in this act contained shall be held or construed to in any manner involve the United States in any pecuniary obligations whatever, other than in respect of the payment of tolls as provided in section 8 of this act.

What does he say to the eleventh section as it is reported?

SEC. 11. That Congress shall at all times have the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act when in its judgment the public good may require.

What does he say to the distinction between the Nicaragua bill and this where the Nicaragua bill provides for treaty arrangements between the two governments, and the co-operation of the two governments in the construction of the work and their joint, effectual, influential management of it through the corporation? There is the difference between this scheme, supposing it were possible of accomplishment, as a matter of mere business, and the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VEST. There are a great many things in the Nicaragua bill which could not by any possibility be put in the Tehuantepec bill, for the reason that we have a concession, and the gentlemen in the Nicaragua scheme have none. They are to take whatever concession is hereafter given them by Nicaragua. Here is a concession by which Mexico has given to Captain Eads certain privileges and demanded of him in return certain specific obligations. He had to take that concession or nothing. He got the best he could, and he is bound by that concession.

Mexico, in addition to 2,700,000 acres of land and exemption from taxation, is also loaning $1,250,000 a year to this enterprise out of her treasury, and the United States is not paying a dollar. There is a provision here that Mexican goods and vessels, &c., shall pass over the route at 25 per cent. less than those of other nations, and the same terms can be made with any other nation that extends aid to this enterprise, but the United States gives no aid. Not a dollar is asked from this Government. As a matter of course no such provision as that could be put in this bill.

But in regard to the specific clauses spoken of by the Senator from Vermont I have drawn an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time, but all these objections are made in advance. I shall propose to add to the bill:

SEC. —. That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to involve the United States in any pecuniary obligations whatever other than the payment of tolls as hereinbefore provided for.

I propose at the proper time to offer that, so that there will be no obligation at all on this Government to pay a dollar.

The Senator from Vermont asks me in regard to other provisions which I shall attempt to notice. He refers to section 11 of the Nicaragua bill, which reads:

That Congress shall at all times have the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act when in its judgment the public good may require.

I have simply to say that I have an amendment drawn with those identical words in, with the provision that any equitable right of this company shall be considered. I put that clause in for the reason that these bonds are to be sold in the markets of the world, and foreigners do not understand such a provision in a charter given by the United States Congress as we would probably understand it. Capital is timid. There are great difficulties as an engineering project in the way of this enterprise. If we put in an additional provision that this act may be repealed at any time by the Congress of the United States, foreign capitalists might not feel inclined to put a million dollars upon a hazard of that sort, while they might be willing to risk Captain Eads, his integrity, his genius as an engineer. I submit that this Government and the stockholders would be just as well protected with the amendment as I have drawn it as with that which is found in the Nicaragua bill now spoken of by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me right on that point he is speaking about?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Nicaragua Canal gentlemen, who I suppose are quite as respectable as Mr. Eads, and more numerous than he is, because there are more of them than one man, had their bill introduced with the equitable clause that the Senator refers to in it. The Committee on Foreign Relations, unanimously I think, all of them believing that the Nicaragua Canal was the thing for the safety, and welfare, and promotion of the interests of the United States and of the Central American republics in the commerce of the world, &c., in spite of our good wishes to those people, thought it necessary to the public interest to strike out their provision, which the Senator now wants to have in his repeal clause, "but not in violation of the rights of the company considered in equity," and to leave every corporation that is created by the United States wherever it may have the power, or not have the power, whatever it does, subject to the absolute and unqualified legislative jurisdiction of Congress.

Now, the Senator is not content to take what the friends of the Nicaragua Canal scheme and the friends of the people who wish to engage in that enterprise thought it necessary to impose upon them, but asks that there shall be applied to the legislative power of Congress a limitation, to be determined by a court as between private persons, which I think my friend would not submit to in Missouri for a moment if it were proposed to his Legislature for any corporation whatever.

Mr. VEST. I have stated what I thought would be the effect, and that is the only reason why I should wish to put in that clause. As a matter of course it is within the sound judgment of the Senate to determine upon it.

Mr. FRYE. Had we not better adjourn?

Mr. VEST. I am anxious to close this debate. I will stop speaking if it will facilitate matters. I just want to say that in section 6 of the Nicaragua bill there is nothing to which I object at all as to withdrawing any portion of the capital stock, &c. I have no disposition to divert any assets of this company to anything but the legitimate purposes for which the work is commenced.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. VEST. I hope not.

Mr. INGALLS. I supposed there was no possibility of finishing the bill to-night.

Mr. VEST. I think we can get a vote.

Mr. INGALLS. If it is the desire to proceed I have no wish contrary to the desire of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas insist on his motion?

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. VEST. I wish to make a single remark. I am not in the habit of asking any personal favors of the Senate, but I am so situated that I am compelled to ask the Senate if possible to conclude this bill to-day and let it go through the Senate in some shape. It has been here now two weeks obstructing other business, and we can dispose of it in a very few minutes, I think. If an adjournment is taken it will have to be discussed over again, and new amendments will be suggested and the debate may be interminable.

Mr. VAN WYCK. With all due deference to my friend from Missouri, I suggest that after, as my friend seems to forget, a week or two was passed in a general discussion of the bill as to the great extent and power of England and other nations of the earth, when we reach the point of maturing the proper details we are met with objection. Amendments are proposed here which are not understood, because my friend from Missouri did not understand fully the last amended portion which was read. I had changed the position, asking for 50 per cent. to be paid upon the stock before the bonds should be issued, but I did require in one proposition that certificates of stock should not be issued until the stock was fully paid up. If we were organizing a railroad corporation here we would insist on putting such a clause in.

That has been the source, as I stated before, of much of our financial trouble to-day. There is no reason why we should organize a corporation and allow certificates of stock to be issued until the stock is fully paid. The sentiment of my friend from Missouri, which might be assented to by all here, as to the liberality which should be extended to Captain Eads, is quite another matter. Captain Eads is not this whole corporation. Other men will take hold of this enterprise after awhile, as they have taken hold of all other corporations that have been organized. They do it for their own interest, and it is our duty to protect ourselves and protect innocent purchasers of the stock.

I apprehend that it could not be justified that stock should anywhere, by any concern, be issued until the full amount is paid before the certificates are issued. My proposition is, that up to the extent of $10,000,000 contributed, an equal amount of stock and bonds may be issued pari passu. It is not until $10,000,000 of bonds are paid up that the corporation may issue bonds in excess of the stock. That is the proposition. Who is to object to it? Captain Eads himself ought not to object to it? It is not Captain Eads's private fortune, for he has no $100,000,000 to construct this work.

Before this is through it will be a stock operation, and gambling stock operators will be interested in this matter. You leave it in the power of the stockholders without any restraint or check whatever when you require $5,000,000 to be subscribed and 10 per cent. paid. Your very bill authorizes the stockholders to decide that no more money need be paid on the stock than 10 per cent. When that is done and they have the power to do it, it is their interest to do it, and there is no restraint on them, according to the proposition of the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Massachusetts—you leave the power with them after they have paid the 10 per cent. on $5,000,000—they may pass a by-law saying that no further payment need be required on that stock, and as soon as they issue stock beyond $5,000,000 they leave it with the stockholders to say that only 5 per cent. or even less may be paid. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he considers at this day, with all the experience we have had in such matters, that it is safe to intrust this power to any man, no matter how great he may be?

Mr. HOAR. I will answer the question. I do not wish to detain the Senate more than a moment. If I can have its attention one moment I shall be pleased.

I have given as much study to this matter of restraining corporations as I have to any legislative matter, and I am quite of the opinion in regard to domestic corporations, like banks, like home railroads, which are in danger of being hawked about in the stock market, and where widows and trustees with small credit may take their bonds in small amounts as an investment, that a very stringent provision that the debt shall not exceed the capital stock ought to be put in; but I think this is an exception.

I think that a $50,000,000 enterprise, which must of necessity get all its credit from large bankers and brokers and investors who invest by the million and who will, with the aid of legal counsel, look clear to the bottom of the whole thing before they pay out their money, may be made an exception to this general policy that I have spoken of. I do not think any innocent or ignorant bona fide person will ever be in the slightest danger of being wronged one cent, and I think it may be desirable, and desired by the capitalists who furnish the money, to do it in the form of a bonded indebtedness rather than in the form of becoming stockholders where all their interests are subject to a vote of a majority of their associates, and they can not tell whom they will be in the future.

So, then, if we secure the genuineness of this operation by an actual payment of $500,000 and by a subscription of $5,000,000 from responsible persons, whose responsibility is certified to by the Secretary of the Interior, which subscription becomes a trust fund, according to the decisions of the courts, just as much as though they had paid out money left to those persons to be called in by trustees, it becomes a trust fund for all the creditors of this road. I think that that is a reasonable and sufficient security for the public and for every person.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Allow me to ask the Senator if he thinks this enterprise is entitled to more liberality than the construction of the Pacific Railroad?

Mr. HOAR. It is a very different enterprise.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But does he think this should receive any more consideration than a project like the Pacific Railroad? Does he not know now the danger of loss that there has been and is to-day and will be in the future from the fact that Congress either neglected or were careless in the protection of the public when they organized the Pacific railroad companies? The people of Massachusetts know how that is.

Mr. SHERMAN (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). Mr. President, I have expressed my purpose to vote for the incorporation of a company to try the experiment of building this Eads enterprise across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. I do it with as much cheerfulness as I shall vote for the Nicaragua project; but, in my judgment, for the benefit of the project itself there ought to be a good many provisions inserted that are inserted in regard to every corporation created by Congress, and those provisions ought not to be inserted at this late hour of the day without some study and consideration. I therefore respectfully submit to the Senator from Missouri whether it would not be better to have this bill recommitted.

I do not desire to delay it a day or an hour, but in my judgment there ought to be provisions for organizing these incorporators, providing for their meeting, for the opening of books and fixing the amount of the capital stock to be subscribed, the manner of subscription, the amount to be paid, how it shall be paid. These are matters which ought to be fixed by the law itself, and not by the power of the corporation to create by-laws. Then there ought to be a provision in regard to the issue of bonds, whether they should be mortgage-bonds, their rights and liens, &c.

It seems to me that this may be better done by recommitting the bill to the same committee that reported it and is in favor of it, with a view to proposing these amendments. Then if the bill is reported back to-morrow morning, it would be better to have the amendments pass under the eye and scrutiny of a committee. I undertook, while in the chair, to write one or two provisions that I supposed everybody would be in favor of, but I did not like to do it in the hurry of this late hour. I submit to the Senator from Missouri himself whether it would not be better to let the bill stand over, without formal recommittal, with a view to having these amendments prepared.

Mr. VEST. I have a number of amendments, but the bill was attacked so vigorously——

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go over until Thursday morning.

Mr. VEST. The amendments can be read. I intended to offer them to meet these objections.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That Congress shall at all times have the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act when in its judgment the public good may require, but not in violation of the rights of the company considered in equity.

SEC. —. That the United States shall be entitled to such a representation on the board of directors of said company, not, however, in any event exceeding two-ninths of its members, as may be provided for in any treaty hereafter made between the United States and Mexico.

SEC. —. That the principal office of the company shall be located and maintained either in New York city or Washington, D. C., as said company may elect. Said election shall be made by the company within six months next after the passage of this act, and notice thereof shall be published in a daily newspaper in each of said cities at least once a week for four consecutive weeks immediately following the date at which said election is made.

SEC. —. That the United States shall, upon payment of three-fourths of the customary rates, and having first obtained the consent of the Government of Mexico, as provided in said concession, enjoy the use of said railway for the transportation of troops, munitions of war, mails, and property.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the amendments be printed and the bill go over until Thursday morning. I think it would be very unwise for this corporation not to have these provisions carefully framed, because wise and prudent men would want to know exactly the nature of their rights, the right to their stock, its value fixed by law, not fixed by mere by-laws which can be changed from day to day.

It seems to me, if I was about to invest money in this enterprise I should want all these provisions, whatever they are, laid out in the law with the certain probability that Congress would not do any unwise thing to jeopardize or lessen the rights I had acquired by subscription either to bonds or stock. It seems to me that the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Massachusetts, who are familiar with corporation legislation, could prepare amendments that would be acceded to by every one, and there would be then no further difficulty in passing the bill. To attempt to frame these amendments to-night at 6 o'clock I think is an impracticable task.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that to-morrow is set apart for another duty. If the bill goes over until Thursday with all the rights then that it has now, I think it can be finished in half an hour on that day.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to know what rights it has. I have not heard of its having any rights. There are other bills before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. It is a special order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. There are Senators who do not intend to concede that it has any rights, and we do not concede anything and do not acquiesce in anything except to finish business as speedily as we can. I do not believe, for one, the bill ought to pass the Senate in the form that it is, because I look upon it not as a bill but as a treaty, a treaty that I never intend, for one, to acquiesce in or concur in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VEST. If we can not get through with this bill to-night, with the understanding that it remains the special order and comes up on Thursday as the unfinished business, I have no objection to an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is the unfinished business.

Mr. CAMERON. I give notice that I shall call up the bill to increase the naval establishment immediately after the morning business is concluded to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. Before an adjournment is had, I should like to ask my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] if we can not have an agreement about a vote on this bill. I suggest to my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that we agree to take the vote some time to-morrow.

Mr. VEST. To-morrow is to be devoted to eulogies.

Several SENATORS. After 3 o'clock.

Mr. VEST. If the bill can be taken up to-morrow——

Mr. BUTLER. Let us agree to vote at half past 2.

Mr. VEST. If we take the bill up to-morrow at 1 o'clock——

Mr. CAMERON. I shall object to that.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to the bill going over until Thursday if it can be understood that it shall be taken up then at 2 o'clock and finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri ask unanimous consent that the bill go over until Thursday and be the unfinished business at 2 o'clock on that day?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; and that we then sit the bill out then.

Mr. GIBSON. The understanding being that the bill is to be voted upon on that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Unanimous consent is asked. Does that imply that we agree to take the bill up on Thursday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent of the Senate to take it up at that time would, of course, involve taking it up.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not consent to this under any circumstances.

Mr. BUTLER. It does not require any unanimous consent.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I shall not object to the bill being taken up, with the understanding that it does not imply that I agree to this bill under any circumstances.

Mr. VEST. Nobody asks the Senator to agree to it.
Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.
Mr. VEST. Let us have the understanding first.
Mr. INGALLS. It is understood.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition of the Senator from Missouri that this bill be the unfinished business at 2 o'clock on Thursday.
Mr. GIBSON. And be then finished.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] moves that the Senate do now adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 16, at 12 o'clock m.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.
The motion was agreed to.

LAND GRANT TO NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2172) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, said bill having been returned from the Senate with a message that the Senate further insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the House and ask for further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.
Mr. COBB. I move the House insist on its amendment and agree to the further conference asked for by the Senate.
The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that order will be made.
There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 367) to amend section 536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the division of the State of Illinois into judicial districts, and to provide for holding terms of court of the northern district at the city of Peoria, said bill having been returned with an amendment.
Mr. WORTHINGTON. The amendment of the Senate is merely formal, providing that all offenses heretofore committed shall be determined and tried under the laws as they were at the time of the commission of the offense. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be concurred in.
There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.
Mr. WORTHINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, with the amendments of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 10793) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888; which, with the amendments, was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

SWORD OF CAPT. SAMUEL CHESTER REID.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 109) authorizing the President of the United States to accept in behalf of the United States the sword of Capt. Samuel Chester Reid, tendered as a gift by his son, Samuel C. Reid; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BILLINGS, CLARK'S FORK AND COOKE CITY RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2778) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company the right of way through the Crow Indian Reservation.
Mr. PEEL. The Committee on Indian Affairs of this House has reported favorably a bill substantially the same as this. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be considered at the present time.
Mr. WAKEFIELD. I must object.
The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ALFRED H. EMERY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 929) for the relief of Alfred H. Emery, said bill having been returned from the Senate with a message that the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.
Mr. MCKENNA. I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference.
The motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint during the day the managers on the part of the House.

JAMES W. GOODRICH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution, adopted by the Senate on the 12th instant:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 5652) for the relief of James W. Goodrich.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this resolution will be adopted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INDEXES OF CONGRESSIONAL REPORTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution, adopted by the Senate on the 14th instant; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed the indexes to the compilation of House and Senate reports of committees provided for in Public Resolution No. 24, first session Forty-ninth Congress.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SCRANTON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for three days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. MCRAE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:
A bill (H. R. 3160) to amend section 553 of the Revised Statutes; and

A bill (H. R. 6393) to authorize the Fort Worth and Denver City Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 10305) to increase the appropriation for the public building at Brooklyn, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 6976) to erect a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio; and

A bill (H. R. 7775) to increase the appropriation for the erection of a public building at Troy, N. Y.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced as managers at the conference to be held on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill 10394, the Indian appropriation bill, Mr. PEEL, Mr. SKINNER, and Mr. PERKINS.

PENSION TO MRS. MARY A. LOGAN.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, according to the understanding on yesterday morning I now ask to call up for further consideration the resolution to make Senate bill No. 3050, granting a pension to Mrs. Mary A. Logan, a special order for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the resolution to which he has referred, and against which the point of order has been made.

Mr. HAMMOND. Which is still pending?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I understand that there are several gentlemen who desire to discuss the question of order, and I will withhold any remarks I may have until gentlemen have been heard.

The SPEAKER. If no gentleman desires to discuss the point of order the Chair will rule upon the question.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, just as I rose to discuss this question on yesterday I received a notice to retire for a conference committee, and was in some confusion as to the history connected with this matter. That is my excuse this morning for obtruding for a few moments further remarks upon the subject.

I have gotten now the history of the rule, so far as to fix the dates, and of certain rulings on the subject. I would be glad to have the Clerk read the paper which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

No rule or order shall be changed, &c., without one day's notice. (Adopted November 13, 1794.)

Amended March 13, 1822, by adding that no rule should be suspended except by a two-thirds vote.

Amended April 26, 1828, by adding that order of business shall not be changed except by two-thirds vote.

Mr. Blaine's decision that amendments to rules could be referred on call of States and Territories. (Second session Forty-third Congress.)

Mr. RANDALL'S decision that resolution to amend rules was in order as an independent motion. (First session Forty-sixth Congress, May 28, 1879.)

Mr. Keifer's decision that proposition to amend rules was in order as privileged question for introduction, subject to motion to refer to Committee on Rules. (First session Forty-seventh Congress.)

Mr. CARLISLE'S decision that same was in order as privileged question as notice. (First session Forty-eighth Congress, January 23 and 24.)

Mr. HAMMOND. It will be seen that this Rule XXVIII originated as far back as 1794, when there was no Committee on Rules of the House. At that time another part of the old Rule CXLV, of which this rule was a portion, required notice to be given even of the introduction of bills. No bill could be acted upon in the House without this notice. There were various arrangements for giving notice as to the time when a matter was to be called up, because there were no committees to which such matters were referred prior to taking them up for action in the House. I allude to that only to emphasize what I said on yesterday, that this part of the rule had no force except as a limitation upon the time when matters could be considered.

The first thing which gentlemen seem to regard as an innovation upon the rule was when Mr. Speaker Blaine decided that a proposed amendment to the rules could come in on Monday on the call of States. But they went to the Committee on Rules. So Mr. RANDALL'S decision in the Forty-sixth Congress simply was that a motion to amend the rules was admissible as an independent proposition. That did not touch the question whether it was privileged when it came back or when anybody undertook to call it up for action. So also Mr. Keifer's decision was on a proposition to amend the rules, holding that it was in order as a privileged question to give notice for introduction of proposed amendments subject to a motion for reference to the Committee on Rules. In other words, he held that a member might introduce the motion; that it was his right under the first clause of Rule XXVIII, which provided that no rule should be changed without a day's notice to introduce his motion by way of notice.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman not state whether he did not also decide in that connection further that if the House refused upon that motion to refer the proposition to the Committee on Rules it was then before the House for action?

Mr. HAMMOND. Perhaps he did. I do not remember, however. Mr. CARLISLE'S decision that the motion was in order as a privileged question as a notice simply applies to what I have already said in connection with Mr. Keifer's decision.

The point that was made with force by Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, on yesterday, that this was not a change of the rule, was considered in the Forty-seventh Congress, in the course of the debate upon which Mr. CARLISLE, Mr. BLACKBURN, and others participated. On the vote on that proposition the parties were evenly divided. There were three or four votes, and the Republicans all voted one way and the Democrats the other. But that was not this question. That was upon a motion to change the rules which had been regularly reported by the Committee on Rules. Mr. Kasson introduced the motion, which went to the Committee on Rules, and they reported it back. The question presented there was whether the Committee on Rules could rightfully report a rule which selected a particular bill and declared what certain votes might be had and what certain others might not be had on that bill.

In that gentlemen differed. But now we come down to this question, which is, when a gentleman has introduced as a matter of privilege a proposed change of the rules and given his one day's notice whether he can call it up as a privileged question. On that point we have another piece of very interesting history to which we desire to call the attention of the House. On the 18th of July, 1882, Mr. Pound, a Republican, called up what was known as the Pound rule, and he insisted that, having introduced it and given notice on a previous day, he had a right to call it up as a privileged question for discussion on that day. That was opposed by different members; and as I am very hoarse I will ask the Clerk to read the parts marked in the RECORD of that day's proceedings.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMENDMENT OF RULES—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POUND. As a question of privilege, under Rule XXVIII, and in pursuance of a notice given on yesterday, I desire to call up and move the adoption of the resolution which I ask the Clerk to read. Before the Clerk proceeds to read I ask the House to be in order and listen to the resolution, as the reports of the press were very misleading.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will yield to me I will cite a rule under which I think the point of order should be made. Rule XI provides that "all proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule;" and clause 41 of that rule provides that "all proposed action touching the rules and joint rules shall be referred to the Committee on Rules." Now, this is proposed action in regard to the rules of the House, and the rule I have quoted is imperative that it shall be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention to the first paragraph or clause of Rule XXVIII, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session."

Mr. REED. I desire to suggest that the point of order shall be open to discussion, for if we are going to establish as a precedent, among other things, that any member may offer an amendment to the rules and it will come up as a privileged question the next day, without consideration by any committee of the House, it seems to me that we will establish a precedent that will be very troublesome indeed.

* * * * * * *

Mr. REED. I apprehend that the two rules are perfectly consistent, and they do not seem to me to need any such interpretation as will allow any member to present a proposition for a change of the rules to come up as a privileged question after one day's notice. The two rules are perfectly consistent with each other and not at all consistent with the idea that any member can present a new rule to be acted on the next day. If that should be held to be the correct construction of the rules it would certainly lead to very singular results.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I take it that Rule XXVIII, which was read by the Clerk, is simply a general proposition or rule that "no standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice." As the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has said, I do not believe it confers upon any member of this House the right to give notice that on the following day he will move to change the rules, and then the question must come up as a privileged question. The paragraph of Rule XI which I have cited is imperative that "all proposed action touching the rules and joint rules shall be referred to the Committee on Rules." This is proposed action in regard to the rules and orders of the House, and Rule XI sends it to the Committee on Rules. Any other interpretation would do away with the necessity for any Committee on Rules at all. We might abolish that committee at once, and then any one who desires to amend the rules could give notice to-day of a proposition to that effect, or any half a dozen members could give notice to-day of such propositions, and they would come up to-morrow morning as questions of privilege, and their consideration might occupy the entire session of the day and even more.

Mr. KASSON. It is evidently in order to move to refer this proposition to the Committee on Rules. That committee having the right to report at any time, I make the motion to refer it to the Committee on Rules.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Rule XI implies that all such propositions as these should be referred to the Committee on Rules. The only doubt that could be raised in that connection is the fact that Rule XXVIII says that "no standing rule of order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor."

Now, let us take Rule XI by itself. The gentleman may propose and have referred an amendment of the rules. The Committee on Rules may meet and report it back favorably within an hour, and it may be passed upon to the exclusion of all other business to-day. Rule XXVIII simply amends Rule XI in that particular by providing that while all matters in relation to a change of the rules must be referred to the Committee on Rules, and while the Committee on Rules may report at any time and have the privilege of the floor at any time, there shall be no consideration of their report until one day's notice has been given to the House.

Mr. POUND. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this is a new departure in the practice of the House, and there seems to be a disposition to discuss the point of order at great length, and inasmuch as the time of the House is precious, I will assent to the motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules, hoping, but I fear hoping in vain, that it may be reported back at an early day. I will make that motion myself.

Mr. HAMMOND. It will be seen that though this rule has been of force since 1794 the direct question now before this House, whether after a resolution has been merely introduced it may be called up as a privileged question at the pleasure of the introducer, had never been before then before the House; and then the argument from both sides of the House was so strong against its being privileged that the gentleman who introduced it voluntarily abandoned his effort to call it up as a privileged question, calling it a "new departure." Again, for nearly one hundred years that rule has stood. Through all those years members were anxious in every possible way to urge their measures before the House, and yet nobody can show where such an effort ever succeeded. There are very few instances in which it was even tried. Perhaps the one I have referred to is the only one, and there the House peremptorily refused by acceding to the request to let it go to the Committee on Rules because it could not be then considered.

We should have no regard in this discussion to the immediate bill that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] seeks to bring up, namely, that pensioning Mrs. Logan. No particular measure should influence any gentleman's view upon a question of construction of the rules. The whole question, when the rules are under construction, should be, what is the law of the case without regard to the interests of anybody? These rules give us logical, regular procedure. In many particulars they are disagreeable. They prevent each of us from getting up measures which we would like to get up. But, on the other hand, if we enforce not our rules we would have nothing but chaos in the business of this House.

I do not care to take up further time in argument. I felt that the blunder which I made yesterday in speaking of that debate as occurring in the Forty-seventh Congress ought to be corrected. I felt that in the interest of business and good order the real facts ought to be presented. I take it for granted the Speaker himself has thoroughly examined this matter; and after the debate, with such light thrown upon his mind as may be produced by debate, we shall have a decision which will meet the approbation of the House. It is a great mistake to suppose that because at particular times the harness seems to fit too tightly we had better kick out of the harness entirely. We may break the machinery and destroy its usefulness.

Mr. DIBBLE. One of the questions which has been discussed in relation to the point of order now pending is whether a resolution of the kind that is offered involves a change of the rules. Rule XXVIII makes a distinction between a change of the rules and a suspension of the rules. It uses three words, the word "rescind," the word "change," and the word "suspend." Under the rules of the House a suspension requires no previous notice, but it requires a two-thirds vote; whereas a change of the rule requires one day's notice under Rule XXVIII, the rules themselves marking the distinction between a suspension and a change.

Now, what is a change of the rules? Is it requisite in order that it should be a change of the rules that it should apply to a whole class of subjects, that it should embrace the whole time of legislation? Not at all. Why, in the rules themselves specific days are set apart for specific purposes—the first Monday of the month, for example—and if it is competent to set apart a single Monday out of a month, and that is a rule, it is competent to set apart a Thursday or any other day of the week as well as a Monday; so that the fact of setting apart a specific day is not repugnant to the idea that it involves a change of the rule.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, is it a change of the rules because it sets apart a time for one proposition rather than for a class of propositions. The change of the rules does not depend upon what is going to be considered, but it depends on the displacement, the superseding of what is the regular order under the rules of the House. If a day is taken up by a single proposition that under the regular rules of the House would not be so occupied, it is as much a change as if that day had been taken up by a whole class of propositions, because if that single order had not been specially set for that day the rules of the House in their ordinary currency would prevail; and the disturbance of that regular routine is a change, and makes no difference whether it is one proposition or a class of propositions which causes the change.

It was ruled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] upon an occasion when he was in the chair, at the first session of this Congress, that a proposition to set apart a single day for the consideration of a certain class of business was a proposition to change the rules, because the adoption of the resolution would be, pro tanto, a change of the rules. What is the meaning of that ruling? If the setting apart of a particular day for a certain class of business would be a change of the rule, what difference is there between that and the case of a proposition to change the order for that day? One may embrace a larger scope of business, but if one is, pro tanto, a change of the rule, upon the same reasoning the other must be a change of the rule also.

Another point. It is contended here that the reference of a proposition for a change in the rules to the Committee on Rules is peremptory—that the rule directing such reference is mandatory—because the word used is "shall," because it says that "all proposed action touching the rules and orders of the House shall be referred to the Committee on Rules." Why, Mr. Speaker, the same expression exactly is used as to all references of business to the several committees of the House. In the beginning of Rule XI it is distinctly provided that "all proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named." The word used is the same in both cases—the word "shall;" and yet it is the common practice when a bill is introduced on the call of States and its regular reference, according to the opinion of the Chair, would be to a certain committee, for the House, on motion made for the purpose, to refer the bill to another committee by a majority vote.

This, I say, is the common practice of the House, although the word "shall" is used in relation to all references to committees, just as it is used in relation to references to the Committee on Rules; and when a proposition to change the rules is submitted, the ordinary reference of which would be to the Committee on Rules, it would be perfectly competent, following out the analogy, for any member of the House to move, and for the House to resolve, that such proposition touching the rules should be referred to some committee other than the Committee on Rules.

Suppose, for instance, the proposition were to strike out from the rules of the House the provision which assigns one Monday in every month to the business of the District of Columbia. That would certainly involve a change in the rules. Now, suppose that proposition were brought up here, would not the Chair hold that it would be perfectly competent for the House, on motion, to refer the proposition to the Committee on the District of Columbia rather than to the Committee on Rules? Therefore it will be seen that there is no peculiar virtue in the Committee on Rules more than in any other committee of this House, although, in fact, business of a certain character is directed by the rules to be referred to that committee.

Mr. Speaker, there is another matter to which I desire to call your attention and the attention of the House in connection with this general question. It has been held, time and again, that a report of the Committee on Rules establishing a special order for a given day is a privileged report. Where does it get its privilege? I fail to find in the rules of the House any express grant of such privilege to the Committee on Rules. There is to be found in the rules a provision that the Committee on Ways and Means shall have the privilege of reporting revenue bills at any time, and there is a like provision with reference to the Committee on Appropriations as to reporting general appropriation bills, and with reference to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in relation to the river and harbor bill, and so on. But not only is there no such privilege expressly granted to the Committee on Rules but up to a recent Congress there was no regular standing Committee on Rules.

What, then, gives its privilege to the report of the committee? It is not given expressly by the rules; it is not due to any peculiar personal prerogative of the members of that committee, who are only the equals of the other members of the House. Therefore the privilege must be given because, in the nature of things, it inheres in the subject-matter of the resolution. Only upon that ground can the uniform course of decision and practice be justified. Now, if in the very subject-matter of a resolution of that character there inheres this privilege, then the privilege as to that matter must be in all its phases regulated only by the provision that it shall not be sprung upon the House unawares, but that at least one day's notice of it must be given.

I think, Mr. Speaker, and I submit, that the case of the consideration of a Presidential veto is analogous. It was decided in the first session of this Congress (on the 29th of July last), and it has been the uniform decision of this House, that a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a measure under the Presidential veto and to consider it in the House is in order as privileged matter.

Why, Mr. Speaker? Because the constitutional privilege applies to it. Now, what does the Constitution provide? It says that after the veto has been received the House in which the measure originated shall proceed to consider and determine the question. Does that mean proceed immediately? Does that give the question its privilege? Not at all; because it has frequently happened—it was done here two or three days ago—that a veto, instead of being considered immediately, has been referred to a committee. That is the course which has been taken with veto after veto. Consequently the privilege does not arise from any requirement of the Constitution for immediate consideration. Vetoes are referred to committees just as a proposition to change the rules is referred. It goes to the committee with its privilege. It has been held that you can move to discharge the committee; and it is a privileged motion which the House is to decide by its vote—that you can call up the vetoed measure and discharge the committee without waiting for their report.

I submit that the case here is exactly analogous. This is a matter of the rules. The rules are under that constitutional protection which says that a majority of the House shall constitute a quorum to do business. In doing business is involved the order in which the House shall transact its business. I would call the attention of the Chair and the House to the further fact that in the section of the Constitution in which it is provided that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, that case is stated in distinction from action of the House, which requires a two-third vote. We find stated succinctly in one section that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a member," showing the consistency with the Constitution of that rule of theHouse which provides that a majority of the members shall decide all questions as to the priority of business, but without debate. This is really, Mr. Speaker, a question as to the priority of business; because such a question may not mean simply the business of to-day; the rule certainly does not say so; but it may include the priority of the business of to-morrow as well. It is, as I said, a constitutional power of the highest order.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this power to determine the rules of its proceedings is a power which the House can not exercise in such a way as to preclude the House from exercising it de novo at its will by the voice of its majority. Suppose that on the first day of the session of this House a majority should determine a set of rules for the House, and should lay down as one of them that "no rule herein adopted shall ever be set aside except by the unanimous consent of the House." Would that rule bind the House forever? Would there be no way for the House to get out of that iron-bound position? Has not this House, assembled here to-day with its full powers, the same functions which it had at the beginning of the session when it adopted these rules? Has it not the same constitutional vigor? And is not the constitutional privilege in any question of doubt to be supported rather than abridged by intendment? If there is any doubt whatever on this question as to the power of the House it should be construed liberally, not strictly, because a liberal construction tends toward giving to the House complete exercise of those powers which the Constitution has granted to it.

Again, Mr. Speaker, there was an instance the other day where the House had adopted an order involving a sweeping change of its rules. It was an order that the trade-dollar bill should be the special order for a certain day; that that day should be set apart for its consideration after the reading of the Journal; that no other business should be transacted until that question of the trade-dollar had been considered and disposed of. There was the order. Yet it was held by the Chair that, notwithstanding the order, it was competent for the House, then and there, upon the question of consideration, to determine at the time and for itself, and notwithstanding its past action, whether it would then consider the trade-dollar bill or not. The Chair ruled without hesitation that although the order stated this particular bill should be considered to the exclusion of all other business, the House had not parted with its power to decide at the time what should be its order of business. The same ruling, carried out to its legitimate consequences, would give the House at any time, as a privileged question, control over the changes of its rules in other instances as well as in that. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the point of order against the proposition now before the House is not well taken.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, there is no question that this House, under the Constitution, is a law unto itself with reference to its own government. There is no doubt that the rule of law, that "acts of Parliament derogatory from the powers of subsequent Parliaments bind not," is also applicable to this House. That being the case, the House is certainly always master of the situation. The proposition now before the House, therefore, is not as to whether a majority of this House can change the rules or not, but it is rather a question as to whether the proposition before the House is a proposition to change a rule or a proposition to violate a rule; in other words, whether it is a proposition to change a rule or a motion to suspend the operation of a rule.

The motion is that a day be set apart for a certain specific purpose; and that motion being carried, it would not change a rule, but would violate a rule. Therefore, in my judgment, this should be considered as a motion in the nature of a suspension of a rule; and if that is its nature it will require a two-thirds vote to adopt it.

So far as I am concerned it is immaterial as to the precedents which have been established. It is practically a matter of constitutional right. If it is a proposition to change a rule the majority of the House can do it. If it is a proposition to suspend the operation of the rules—and I say a proposition to do a specific act outside the regular order is a proposition to suspend the rules—it will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, if this were an original question the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] would be tenable; but we have not one but a hundred decisions on that branch of the proposition in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses. Where the point of order was directly made we have decisions from the Chair sustaining the Committee on Rules in bringing in a motion fixing a special day for the consideration of this bill. And the very fact the Committee on Rules brings in a proposition involves the idea it is a change of the rules, because unless it were a change of the rules they have no right to the floor. They come upon the floor of this House under the constitutional right given in section 1, clause 5, of the Constitution to amend the rules, and unless they come amending the rules they do not come at all.

Now, as has been mentioned by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE], only two days ago this question upon that branch of the proposition was directly before the Speaker and before this House. There the Committee on Rules had adopted a resolution discharging the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of a Senate bill in regard to the trade-dollar and devoted the entire day of Saturday to the consideration of that bill. When that resolution was up the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] made the point of order; and what was it? It was that prior to this day the House, by a two-thirds vote suspending the rules, had given the Committee on Labor the right to call up its bill at any time. The Speaker decided, although by a two-thirds vote the House had by prior order given the Committee on Labor the right to call up its bills at any time, yet acting on this change of rules made at a later day the majority of the House had set apart Saturday and gave it to the committee wanting to consider the Senate bill concerning the redemption of the trade-dollar.

Not only then but in innumerable instances has this question been before the House. On the 19th of July, 1876, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] presented a resolution "that Tuesday next, after 5 o'clock p. m., the day should be exclusively set apart for the consideration of bills for the construction of bridges," and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], following the line of argument made by his colleague to-day [Mr. BRUMM], protested against it as not a change of the rules. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] took issue, and the question was there decided it was a change of the rules, and that the Committee on Rules had the right to report the resolution setting apart that day for the consideration of these measures.

So I dismiss that part of it and accept the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], that pro tanto this is a change of the rules, and being a change of the rules, it comes within the twenty-eighth rule on notice of one day to call the matter up.

Gentlemen say it will be extremely inconvenient if we do this thing. One moment on that. If the argument of inconvenience is to rule this House, I stand in my place to declare any member on this floor can nullify the whole system of rules by simply uttering "I object" from day to day. We have a rule which, in Committee of the Whole House, authorizes the amendment of any appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any other gentleman on this floor, under that rule, can offer ten thousand amendments and keep this House from now until next Christmas.

But will it be said because that inconvenience will result in the overthrow of the order of business of this House it is not a binding rule? Certainly not. There in black and white is the rule, and, however absurd the result which follows from it, it stands there a binding rule of the House.

Mr. BRUMM. Could not that objection be overcome by not allowing one objection, but requiring a majority vote at all times?

Mr. WILLIS. So long as it is a rule it is binding upon the House.

Now I come directly to what seems the only point in this case, and that is whether there is only one way by which this House can amend its rules. I claim under the rules, and under the decisions, there are two ways, and one of these ways is through the Committee on Rules, and the other way is by giving notice at the desk as a privileged matter and calling that up for the operation and action of the House on the following day.

Now, what sense, what meaning, has the presentation of a notice of a change of the rule except it be to give the House the right to vote directly upon that proposition which they may not desire to send to the Committee on Rules? The Speaker of the House is its mouth-piece, and when a resolution is presented providing for a change in the rules he directs its reference to the Committee on Rules, not by virtue of any power inherent in himself but simply as the mouth-piece of the House. But the House could direct otherwise. Now, when a resolution fixing a day for the consideration of a special bill is presented, and a motion is made in this body that it be referred to the Committee on Rules, and the House by an overwhelming vote, say by the entire body of three hundred and twenty-five members, declares that it shall not be so referred, where is that resolution? Where, I ask? The vote is taken and three hundred and twenty-five members, when the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules is considered, vote "no;" where does that leave the resolution?

Mr. SPRINGER. It remains on the table and will never be acted upon until so referred.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman says it remains on the table. Now, in answer to that I say the Speaker already, by permitting this notice, has declared this to be a privileged question, privileged not to be laid upon the table but for consideration. What sense would there be in the character of privilege which the gentleman from Illinois suggests that it may be presented to be laid upon the table?

It is privileged either for reference or consideration, privileged by reason of this constitutional declaration, and privileged by the notice given; and as soon as the time fixed by the rule expires I claim that privilege continues and attaches to its consideration; and we can, when a vote declares that it shall not be sent to the Committee on Rules, it being before the House, take such action with reference to it as we see proper. Any other rule would be an abdication by Congress of its high constitutional functions. If that is not the case, what results?

As I said on yesterday, three men, constituting the majority of the Committee on Rules, may hold Congress by the throat and you can not overthrow the will of such an oligarchy by all the power that you possess. That is the necessary and logical result of the theory advanced by gentlemen. Is that admitted as a correct doctrine? Is that either Democratic or Republican doctrine? Are we forced to such a strained construction of the Constitution?

There may be three hundred and twenty-two members on this floor who desire a change of the rules, and yet, if through the Committee on Rules we can only make that change, then the whole of this overwhelming majority could be defeated.

I submit, therefore, that this is a constitutional privilege; that having given this notice, it is the right of this House now to act upon it; and, Mr. Speaker, if there is the slightest doubt in the mind of the Chair as to whether this is a constitutional right plainly defined, I would most earnestly request that the House be permitted to decide upon its own prerogative.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the question presented by the point of order is one of so much importance that in undertaking to decide upon it we should act without reference to any particular measure which we may desire to bring up or allow the consideration of any such preference to influence our vote. We are deciding a principle, or rule of action, affecting not simply the particular measure we may desire to bring up but also all other measures that may be in future brought up for consideration by the House.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the fundamental difficulty under which we labor in this matter, and which it is claimed will result in anarchy in this House, lies in undertaking to consider a resolution setting apart a special and different time from that provided by the rules of the House, and a different manner for the consideration of a particular measure, as a rule within the meaning of that term as used in parliamentary language.

A rule is understood to be by all writers upon parliamentary law an established and regular form of procedure for the transaction of parliamentary business, or of a particular class of parliamentary business. That is a rule. Tested by that, a particular proposition or resolution proposing to take out of the operation of the rules the consideration of one particular measure to be considered at a different time and in a different manner from other business of that class, is not a rule but a special order, which, under the rules of the House, requires the concurrence of two-thirds of the House on a motion to suspend the rules. Any other conclusion than that must lead us into irretrievable confusion.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] has undertaken to save us from this trouble by claiming that under the provision of our rules which allows an individual member to propose a notice of a change of rule and bring it up as a privileged question, while he may introduce such a resolution as a privileged matter it can not be brought up for consideration as a question of privilege. For myself I fail to see where the line of distinction between the privilege in this case is to come in. It seems to me if you allow that this is a rule, that then all the rest follows. But more than that: If the Committee on Rules of this House may report at any time a special resolution, which is a special order, simply setting apart a particular day for the consideration of a bill and providing that that bill shall be considered in a different way from what the rules of the House provide, then I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, why, the moment that report is made, some member upon the floor may not at once rise and move, if he can obtain the floor, and if the motion for the previous question be lost, to amend the report by providing that some other committee instead of the committee reported by the Committee on Rules may have the day, or some other time be set for consideration?

Mr. WILLIS. That very thing was done in the last session.

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely. And I do wish to say the moment you hold that a special order of this kind is a rule within the meaning of parliamentary law you rush at once, even if you deny the second proposition, into that disorder of which gentlemen have spoken, every member of this House, if recognized, being permitted to rise and move to amend that order, although reported by the Committee on Rules.

Now, it appears to me, for the orderly conduct of the business of this House, a special order of that kind, setting aside the rules of the House for the consideration of a particular matter, should not be held to be a rule but a special order requiring a two-thirds vote to secure its adoption, and that only rules applying either to all bills, or all bills of a class, should be allowed to come in in this way. Unless we commence right at that point upon the principle that it is only rules of this House that can be brought in and adopted by a majority we should at once secure all the anarchy and disorder which it seems to me would inevitably flow from any such proposition as that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know that I can add much to what I said yesterday on this point of order. I only wish to say one word. It is this: The argument that this is not a change of the rule does not apply in this case. The only proposition now pending is whether the Speaker, having decided that notice might be given on yesterday of the introduction of the proposition, the only question remaining to be decided is whether under clause 43 of Rule XI this proposition must now be referred to the Committee on Rules. That clause is as follows:

All proposed action touching the rules and joint rules shall be referred to the Committee on Rules.

There can be no question but this is a proposition touching the rules. It may not be a change of the rules. It may be a suspension or it may be an exception to the rules. But it certainly touches the rules of the House, and if it touches the rules of the House, which it certainly does, I insist that under this clause before it can be acted upon by the House it must be referred to the Committee on Rules. The other question having been determined, that alone remains for the Speaker to decide to-day.

After the committee shall have reported upon the proposition then a gentleman may make the point that was referred to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] yesterday, and that has just been discussed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], as to whether it changes the rules or suspends them. But now the only question before the House is as to whether it must be referred to the Committee on Rules before this House can act upon it; and upon that point I fully concur in what was said by the gentleman from Georgia and in what was read from the RECORD as having been said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already decided in accordance with the practice which has prevailed in the House for a great many years, and in accordance, also, with several previous decisions on the subject, that a gentleman upon the floor has the right, under clause 1 of Rule XXVIII, at any time when the House was not engaged in the consideration of other matters, to give notice of a motion to amend the rules, and that this might be in the technical form of a notice or in the form of a resolution, the latter having precisely the same effect as a notice, and that it would lie over under the rule. This is the whole right conferred upon such propositions by clause 1 of Rule XXVIII; and it will be observed that even this right is not given in express terms, but exists only by implication. The rule reads:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor.

Under that it has been held that inasmuch as this was the only method by which a proposition to amend the rules of the House could be introduced, it conferred upon a member the right to give the notice and have it lie over one day.

Since that time, however, at the beginning of the present session of Congress, clause 1 of Rule XXIV was so amended as to include simple resolutions of the House among the others which might be introduced on Monday on the call of States and Territories; and it was contended yesterday that this abrogated or rescinded clause 1 of Rule XXIV. But the Chair decided then, and the Chair still thinks decided correctly, that this amendment to the rule at the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress, instead of abrogating or rescinding clause 1 of Rule XXIV, was cumulative and provided an additional method for the introduction of such propositions. Instead of taking away the method already provided for it added another.

But the question now presented is quite a different one. All the right conferred by implication by clause 1 of Rule XXVIII has been exercised in the case now before the Chair; and if the proposition hereafter has any further privilege it must be found either in some other rule of the House or in the nature of the subject to which the proposition relates. No other rule of the House conferring such a privilege has been cited in debate, and the Chair is not aware of the existence of any. But it is said by gentlemen on the floor that inasmuch as the House has the power, under the Constitution, to make rules for the Government of its own proceedings, propositions to make or to amend these rules must be privileged for the same reason that propositions in relation to the right of a member to a seat on the floor and propositions relating to bills disapproved and returned by the President are privileged. The power of the House to make rules is conferred by the Constitution in the following terms:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

This power is plenary, and the Chair thinks that the power of the House to make rules prescribing the methods which shall be pursued in changing its rules is just as absolute as its power to make rules to govern its proceedings in ordinary matters of legislation. To hold that the House may make rules binding upon its presiding officer and binding upon itself for the government of its proceedings in ordinary matters of legislation, but can not make rules prescribing the methods by which it shall change its rules, would certainly result in a very great and material abridgment of the power conferred by the Constitution. The House has made rules not only for the government of its proceedings in matters of legislation but also for the government of its proceedings when it comes to change its own rules or to consider propositions to change its rules.

It is provided, first, in Rule XXVIII that such a proposition may be introduced by notice, and secondly, in the amendment to clause 1 of Rule XXIV that it may be introduced upon the call of the States and Territories on Mondays. It is provided in clause 43 of Rule XI that "all proposed action"—there is no exception made—"touching the rules and joint rules shall be referred to the Committee on Rules." It may be not improper to repeat here that clause 1 of Rule XXVIII, as has been already stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], has been in operation more than eighty years, and the Chair has not been able to find a single instance where it has been decided that a proposition brought before the House under that clause had any further privilege; but in every case, so far as the Chair has been able to find a decision upon the subject, it has been held that when the proposition came before the House it was here subject to all the other rules of the House. And it may also be remarked that for a long time after the organization of Congress bills could be introduced only upon notice, but it was never decided, or even contended, that when so introduced they became privileged. The giving of the notice was a matter of right, but it conferred no privilege upon the bill itself when introduced.

During the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress the present occupant of the chair had occasion to decide this very question, and the Clerk will read what then occurred. The Chair will first state, however, that on the 23d of January, 1885, Mr. Valentine, then a Representative from the State of Nebraska, introduced a resolution providing that on and after a certain day the House should meet at a certain hour, and that it should be the duty of the Speaker to recognize gentlemen upon the floor for the presentation of matters for consideration, which should be considered unless objected to by a certain number of members. On the next day the gentleman called up his resolution, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has now called up the resolution upon which the point of order is made; and the Clerk will read from the Journal what took place.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. VALENTINE, as a privileged question, called up the following resolution submitted by him on yesterday:

"Resolved, That on and after Monday next the regular meetings of the House during the present session shall be at 11 o'clock each day; that it shall be in order each day for one hour immediately after the reading of the Journal for the Speaker to recognize such member as he may choose, alternating sides of the House and members, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of such business as such member may select; but if, after the reading of the bill or resolution, ten members object to present consideration, the same shall not be considered: Provided, That if consideration be had, five minutes shall be given for debate for and five minutes against such measure, if asked by any member."

Mr. RANDALL made the point of order that under clause 43 of Rule XI the said resolution must be referred to the Committee on Rules; pending which Mr. Valentine made the further point of order that the said question of order submitted by Mr. RANDALL could not now be entertained, but should have been made on yesterday when the resolution was presented.

After debate on said point of order, the Speaker sustained the first and overruled the second point of order, on the ground that the resolution having been presented under authority of, and in conformity with, clause 1 of Rule XXVIII, was before the House, subject to all other rules touching its consideration, and that, as the resolution was not presented on yesterday for immediate consideration, the point of order as to such consideration by the Committee on Rules would be in order at any time before such consideration had been entered upon.

The said resolution must therefore be referred, under clause 43 of Rule XI, to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. On the 23d of January, when the resolution was first introduced, certain proceedings occurred which the Clerk will now read from the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that would change a rule of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded heretofore, but the gentleman from Nebraska stated that he rose to a privileged question.

Several MEMBERS. That is not a privileged question.

Mr. VALENTINE. I admit that it is not privileged for consideration at this time, but must, under the rule, lie over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that so far as regards the mere introduction of the resolution, either for the purpose of having it lie over one day, or for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Rules, it is privileged; but not beyond that.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is all that I ask for it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will also ask the Clerk to read the ruling made on the next day.

The SPEAKER. Rule XXVIII of the House provides that—

"No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor," &c.

The Chair supposes that this notice might be given in two ways. A member might rise in his place and state that on the next day, or upon some succeeding day, he would propose to amend the rules in a certain way; or he might accomplish the same purpose by presenting to the House a proposition to amend the rules in a particular way. And the Chair supposes that the question as to whether or not the point of order can now be made that this proposition must have its first consideration in the Committee on Rules depends upon the same consideration, no matter in which one of those methods the notice might have been originally given.

Suppose a gentleman had risen on the floor yesterday and simply given notice under this rule that on to-day he would propose a motion to amend the rules, stating the character of the amendment, of course no question could then have been made that it must have its first consideration in the Committee on Rules. So it was on yesterday when the gentleman from Nebraska presented his proposition. It was a mere notice to the House under Rule XXVIII of a proposition to amend its rules, and the Chair thinks that the point of order, if it can be made at all, can properly be made to-day when the subject actually comes before the House.

The next question is, whether these rules provide two different methods for their own amendment; that is to say, whether they provide two different methods for bringing before the House for actual consideration a proposition to amend the rules. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the two rules are not at all inconsistent with each other, but they very well stand together.

A proposition to amend the rules can not be considered by the House at all until there has been one day's notice given, either on the floor, as suggested by the Chair, or by the presentation of the proposition itself; but the giving of that notice in either form does not seem to dispense with the forty-third clause of Rule XI, which provides expressly that it shall be referred to the Committee on Rules. If the Committee on Rules should make a report to the House of a proposition to amend the standing rules or orders of this body which had not been referred to them more than one day before the report was made, the Chair would have no hesitation in saying that the report must lie one day on the table before it could be considered. But when a proposition to amend the rules has been made in the House and referred to the Committee on Rules one day before it is reported on, the Chair would have no hesitation in holding that it would then come up for consideration, because all the requirements of both these rules of the House in such a case have been complied with.

The Chair thinks that whatever may be the power of the House itself over its own rules, he is bound by all of them as they stand for the time being, and that this point of order can be made now and is well taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has reviewed not only that decision and the grounds upon which it was based but all the other decisions which were accessible, and still adheres to that interpretation of the rules. The Chair thinks that no matter how the proposition may in the first instance be introduced, it must go to the Committee on Rules under the forty-third clause of Rule XI. The point of order is therefore sustained.

Mr. WILLIS. With a view to economy of time in another matter, I trust I may be permitted to ask a parliamentery question; and that is whether it would be in order pending this matter to move to refer it to the Committee on Rules with instructions? I make this inquiry in the interest of economy of time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always held that it is not competent to move instructions upon the reference of a matter which has not been reported by a committee. Matters reported to the House by a committee can be recommitted with or without instructions under the rules of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There is a question I would like to ask: Does this refer the resolution with regard to the Logan bill to the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. It does.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports.

POLYGAMY.

Mr. HAMMOND. Allow me to interrupt the call of committees by a privileged report, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. A conference report?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 10) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, the recommendation of the conference committee is in the form of a long bill. I suggest it is not necessary now to read that bill or the explanatory statement which is submitted in accordance with the rule. I ask that the report and the explanatory statement be printed in the RECORD of to-morrow morning; and I give notice that I shall call the matter up on Thursday next.

Mr. EDEN. Let the bill be printed in the form in which it is to be presented to the House for action.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is the form in which it will be printed in the RECORD; so that every gentleman will see the exact shape in which it is presented for action.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks that the conference report and the accompanying statement made by the managers on the part of the House be printed in the RECORD; and he gives notice that he will call up the subject on Thursday next. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD as requested? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

The report and accompanying statement are as follows:

The committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 10, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes,' approved March 22, 1882," respectfully report:

That, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses that the bill be amended as follows:

In place of the part of the bill proposed by the House of Representatives to be stricken out, and in place of the words proposed by the House of Representatives to be inserted, the following words be substituted, and that so amended, the bill pass:

SEC. 1. That in any proceeding or examination before a grand jury, a judge, justice, or a United States commissioner, or a court, in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, the lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called, but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be; and such witness shall not be permitted to testify as to any statement or communication made by either husband or wife to each other, during the existence of the marriage relation, deemed confidential at common law.

SEC. 2. That in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, whether before a United States commissioner, justice, judge, a grand jury, or any court, an attachment for any witness may be issued by the court, judge, or commissioner, without a previous subpœna, compelling the immediate attendance of such witness, when it shall appear by oath or affirmation, to the commissioner, justice, judge, or court, as the case may be, that there is reasonable ground to believe that such witness will unlawfully fail to obey a subpœna issued and served in the usual course in such cases; and in such case the usual witness fee shall be paid to such witness so attached: Provided, That the person so attached may at any time secure his or her discharge from custody by executing a recognizance, with sufficient surety, conditioned for the appearance of such person at the proper time, as a witness in the cause or proceeding wherein the attachment may be issued.

SEC. 3. SEC. 4. That if any person related to another person within and not including the fourth degree of consanguinity computed according to the rules of the civil law, shall marry or cohabit with, or have sexual intercourse with such other so related person, knowing her or him to be within said degree of relationship, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of incest, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than three years and not more than fifteen years.

That commissioners appointed by the supreme court and district courts in the Territory of Utah shall possess and may exercise all the powers and jurisdiction that are or may be possessed or exercised by justices of the peace in said Territory under the laws thereof, and the same powers conferred by law on commissioners appointed by circuit courts of the United States.

SEC. 8. That the marshal of said Territory of Utah, and his deputies, shall possess and may exercise all the powers in executing the laws of the United States or of said Territory possessed and exercised by sheriffs, constables, and their deputies as peace officers; and each of them shall cause all offenders against the law, in his view, to enter into recognizance to keep the peace and to appear at the next term of the court having jurisdiction of the case, and to commit to jail in case of failure to give such recognizance. They shall quell and suppress assaults and batteries, riots, routs, affrays, and insurrections.

Such certificate, or the record thereof, or a duly certified copy of such record, shall be prima facie evidence of the facts required by this act to be stated therein, in any proceeding, civil or criminal, in which the matter shall be drawn in question. Any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not longer than two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 10. That nothing in this act shall be held to prevent the proof of marriages, whether lawful or unlawful, by any evidence now legally admissible for that purpose.

That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to institute and prosecute proceedings to forfeit and escheat to the United States the property of corporations obtained or held in violation of section 3 of the act of Congress approved the 1st day of July, 1862, entitled "An act to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the Territories of the United States and other places, and disapproving and annulling certain acts of the Legislative Asembly of the Territory of Utah," or in violation of section 1890 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and all such property so forfeited and escheated to the United States shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds thereof applied to the use and benefit of the common schools in the Territory in which such property may be: Provided, That no building, or the grounds appurtenant thereto, which is held and occupied exclusively for purposes of the worship of God, or parsonage connected therewith, or burial ground, shall be forfeited.

SEC. 16. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to cause such proceedings to be taken in the supreme court of the Territory of Utah as shall be proper to carry into effect the provisions of the preceding section, and pay the debts and to dispose of the property and assets of said corporation according to law. Said property and assets, in excess of the debts and the amount of any lawful claims established by the court against the same, shall escheat to the United States, and shall be taken, invested, and disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the benefit of common schools in said Territory.

SEC. 17. That the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, incorporating, continuing, or providing for the corporation known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and the ordinance of the so-called general assembly of the state of Deseret incorporating the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, so far as the same may now have legal force and validity, are hereby disapproved and annulled, and the said corporation, in so far as it may now have, or pretend to have, any legal existence, is hereby dissolved. DETAILED STATEMENT OF CONFEREES OF HOUSE.

The House conferees on the committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate bill No. 10, being an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882, beg leave to submit the following detailed statement, showing the effect of such amendments as have been agreed to, with conference report herewith submitted. The House struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and substituted its own bill, and on that vote the conference was had.

The bill as agreed upon by the conference committee differs somewhat in form from either the Senate or the House bills. It contains certain verbal changes which need not be explained. The material changes from the House bill are as follows:

In section 2, line 7, before the word "oath," the word "the," and in line 8 the words "of at least two credible persons in writing" have been stricken out, it being thought best to leave to the court the quantum of evidence necessary to show the unwillingness of a witness to appear. In that section we also left out in lines 15 and 16 the words "before any commissioner, judge, justice, or court of the United States," because as the witness was arrested for immediate attendance on the court, it was thought best that he should enter into recognizance before that court for his appearance.

To the ninth section of the House bill we added the provision of the Senate as to unlawful sexual intercourse between two married persons. This the House bill had not provided for.

Section 11 of the House bill was left out, because it was deemed unnecessary.

Section 13 of the House bill was left out, because, this being only an amendment to a former statute, section 13 was unnecessary.

Section 16 of the House bill has been amended by requiring the surplus of the property of the corporations therein mentioned, not provided for in the bill, or decreed to those entitled thereto by the courts, shall be used for school purposes in said Territory.

Section 17 of the House bill has been left out as unnecessary, the law now controlling writs of error from the supreme court in the cases of bigamy or polygamy or of any offense under the act March 22, 1882, is not affected by this act.

Section 18 of the House bill has been changed by leaving out to all religious societies, sects, or congregations so much real property for the erection or use of houses of worship, and for such parsonages as shall be necessary for their convenience and use, the title to be in trustees named by them.

Section 21 of House bill, annulling legislation as to water, timber, or herd rights has been left out because the conference committee did not know the full possible effect of that section, and because it is believed that existing law furnishes an adequate remedy for any illegal act done in the premises.

In section 22, House bill, the conference committee in section 1, which defines the terms "lawful wife," believe it best to leave that matter to the courts. Sections 26 and 27 of the House bill were so amended as to strike out all the authority therein granted as to the appointment of officers in said Territory except that the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, is required to appoint a probate judge in each county.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BELMONT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. COBB. Before that motion is entertained I desire to present a privileged report, the report of a committee of conference.

Mr. BELMONT. Is it in order to raise the question of consideration on the report made by the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). It is. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has the right to present the report of the conference committee and the House can then determine whether it will proceed to its consideration or not.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I trust the hour for the consideration of bills will not be set aside.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report presented by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

THOMAS R. COBB,
W. J. STONE,
H. B. STRAIT,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. N. DOLPH,
P. B. PLUMB,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COBB. I desire in submitting this report to say——

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] has raised the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was waiting to hear what motion the gentleman from Indiana was to submit.

Mr. COBB. I desire to make no motion, but I desire for a few moments to discuss the contents of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the question of consideration has been raised.

Mr. SPRINGER. I presume that will not be urged; there is not to be debate.

Mr. BELMONT. There will be debate if the consideration of the report is entered upon. It is inevitable.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I rise to a question of order. Is it competent on a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to set aside the rule providing that there shall be a consideration hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now before the House is whether the House shall proceed with the consideration of the conference report presented by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would suggest on the question of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa that it has been ruled on several occasions that the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is in order after the call of committees for reports has been completed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the conference report?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 32, noes 42.

Mr. COBB. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT].

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 36.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw the point as to a quorum, and I withdraw the report for the present.

Mr. BELMONT. I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair, and resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 10396) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

Mr. BELMONT. I desire to ask if the word "Turkey" has been inserted in line 26.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not. No motion was made for that purpose.

Mr. BELMONT. I move, then, to amend by inserting the words "Turkey, and the Argentine Republic" in line 26. That is in accordance with the amendments under the point of order made the last time the bill was under consideration.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

In line 25, after the word "the," insert "Argentine Republic," and in line 26, after the word "Colombia," insert "and Turkey;" so that it will read:

"Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the Argentine Republic, United States of Colombia, and Turkey, at $7,500 each, $22,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Ministers resident and consuls-general in Bolivia, Corea, Denmark, Hayti, Liberia, Persia, Portugal, Siam, and Switzerland, at $5,000 each, $45,000 (and the minister resident and consul-general in Hayti shall also be accredited as chargé d'affaires to San Domingo).

Mr. BURNES. The law fixes the salary of the minister to Liberia at $4,000. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Agent and consul-general at Cairo, $5,000.

Mr. BURNES. The law provides a salary of $4,000. I make the point of order.

Mr. BELMONT. I shall not oppose the point of order which has already been sustained by the Chair, but I desire to say this is simply a repetition of a salary appropriated for several years past.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Chargés d'affaires ad interim and diplomatic officers abroad, $20,000.

Mr. BELMONT. It will be necessary at this point to insert Liberia, which was stricken out in a former paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection that amendment will be made.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will please send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. BELMONT. The fact is this amendment will produce a new class of office, a minister at $4,000. There is no such thing at present. Therefore I am at a loss to know where this amendment should be inserted; there is no paragraph in the bill where it would properly come in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to offer his amendment at line 45.

Mr. BELMONT. I offer, then, this amendment:

After line 45 insert the words "minister to Liberia, $4,000."

I ask the Chair to submit that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already submitted it and it has been agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I submit the proposition, somewhat hesitatingly, with regard to the point of order upon the paragraph contained in lines 44 and 45. The amount provided for in the statute does not authorize an appropriation of $20,000; but the current law does authorize that amount, the appropriation being $20,000. Prior to the first session of this Congress the appropriation was $12,000. This is an increase over former appropriations, except that of the first session of this Congress, of $8,000.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, there is some limit to the propriety of points of order, it seems to me, and in this case I think the gentleman from Missouri is mistaken. If the Clerk will read the section of the law upon which the appropriation is founded I think the gentleman may be induced to withdraw his point of order. If he does not withdraw it I desire to say to some of my friends on this side of the House that they should remember there is a distinction between affirmative legislation and negative legislation, and while certain gentlemen have been most successful hitherto in negative legislation (and no one more than I appreciates the great service they have rendered the party by opposing unwise appropriations) it does seem to me that we are no longer a party of opposition, and that we must undertake some affirmative legislation.

I agree, of course, that a check should be placed upon unwise expenditure, and I know of no more proper and effective method than that which has been pursued by the President of the United States in his recent veto message upon the dependent pension bill, for which I did not vote. The provision under consideration is made in direct pursuance of a recommendation received from the State Department. It is an appropriation in which the money is to be expended only in case of necessity.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me a moment I think I can perhaps facilitate business.

Mr. BELMONT. I would rather not yield at this moment, but if the gentleman particularly desires it I will do so.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to believe that the point of order can not be sustained against this proposition, and therefore I withdraw the point and move to amend the paragraph by striking out the word "twenty," in line 45, and inserting "twelve."

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the House will not adopt that amendment. If it does we shall have simply a repetition of what has occurred in previous years—a deficiency. The committee last year induced the House to appropriate this amount, simply to avoid a deficiency, and, for the first time in many years, there is no deficiency. Shall we cut this item down now simply that we may be able to say that we appropriated $12,000, whereas in reality we needed $20,000, and must hereafter appropriate to make up that amount? If that is to be the policy of the House, I am very much mistaken in having opposed the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, before this vote is taken I beg the indulgence of the committee for a moment, so that all may understand the proposition, so far at least as my objection to it is concerned. What is the appropriation for? It is for the payment of chargés d'affaires ad interim. Who are they and what are they? We have a minister at a foreign court who receives a full and adequate salary. That minister has ordinarily a secretary, called the secretary of legation, whose salary is provided by law, and who receives his salary.

But, when the minister goes away from home he leaves the secretary as his chargé d'affaires, and then the secretary becomes entitled to higher pay, and this sum is appropriated to pay for the service thus rendered in the absence of the minister. Now, the minister, in his absence, draws the full salary of his office, and the chargé d'affaires draws an additional salary; so that we are paying two individuals for the same service at the same time. I wish to add further that in the Forty-eighth Congress we had practically come to the conclusion that this whole appropriation ought to be abolished and that the practice ought to be ignored; but, as there were occasions when probably some appropriation under this head might be needed, we finally concluded to compromise rather than to abolish the appropriation entirely, and determined to make the appropriation $12,000, although the judgment of probably a majority of the House was in favor of entirely abolishing it, inasmuch as it ignored a proposition of legislation and of government, which ought always to be recognized, namely, that no two persons should receive pay for doing the same work at the same time.

Mr. BELMONT. I think my friend is mistaken. The chargé d'affaires, in the absence of the minister, is not entitled to his pay as secretary of legation, but he is entitled to 50 per cent. of the minister's pay. The reason this appropriation is put at $20,000 is because it is utterly impossible to determine in advance what vacancies may occur in the missions by reason either of absence or death. For instance, the missions to Turkey, to Vienna, and to Berlin are temporarily vacant to-day, and other missions may become vacant, and when that occurs the secretary of legation is required to perform the duties of the minister.

But during that time he receives no salary as secretary of legation. If only a few vacancies should occur a smaller appropriation might be sufficient; but it may be that more vacancies will occur, and in that case there should be a sufficient fund at the disposal of the Department. So much of the fund as may not be used will be turned into the Treasury. I do not see that anything further need be said unless it be proper that the section of the Revised Statutes relating to this subject be read. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1685. For such time as any secretary of legation shall be lawfully authorized to act as chargé d'affaires ad interim at the post to which he shall have been appointed he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate allowed by law for a chargé d'affaires at such post; but he shall not be entitled to receive, for such time, the compensation allowed for his services as secretary of legation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I move to strike out the last word. I fully concur with my friend from New York that this is an appropriation of great importance, and should not be stricken out, for good and cogent reasons. Under the law as it now stands our ministers abroad are entitled to a leave of absence each year. In their absence some one must discharge their duties. Their responsibility devolves upon the secretary of legation. This appropriation is necessary to provide for the meager salary of the secretary, who only receives half the amount of his chief during the latter's absence. Not only so, but it is often the case that we have no ministers at foreign courts, and the duties must devolve on secretaries of legation. As my friend has remarked, such is the case at the present time in Turkey, and I will add has also been the case for two years at Austria.

This is no new appropriation, but has been provided for in similar bills for many years. Surely it can not be the purpose of a Democratic House, through a narrow and contracted policy of economy, to impair the efficiency of the foreign service when we have the control of this Government for the first time in the last twenty-five years. It is not economy to run the Government on such a narrow schedule. We have been so long in opposition, it seems to be difficult for many to realize the importance of our foreign service or to appreciate its importance and responsibilities. Some deference should be shown to the recommendations made by the Department when under the control of such an able, capable, and efficient Secretary as is now at its head. It is a cheap reputation which secures success at the expense of the public good.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move as an amendment to the amendment to strike out the last two words. The proposed amendment in the amount granted to pay secretaries of legation during the time when they are serving as acting ministers is a change in what is in fact a special contingent fund, controlled largely by the discretion of the Secretary of State; for a minister can not absent himself from his post, leaving a secretary to act in his stead, unless by authority of the head of the service. If you distrust the Secretary of State, if you think the Department of State will give to a minister permission to absent himself from his post for the mere purpose of putting money into the hands of a subordinate, then you should limit this appropriation with great strictness. But in the history of this country I have never known a Secretary of State who had so little of the confidence of the country and who was so feeble in purpose that the Congress would not believe him desirous of success, faithful to his trust and himself, and earnestly seeking to have an honorable and vigorous administration of his own Department.

As to the duplication of salaries to which reference has been made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], that may sometimes take place. Often it does not. I have known the mission to Russia to be vacant for a year—filled temporarily by a man at half the minister's salary, acting as chargé ad interim. The case is the same to-day, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] has stated, in regard to Turkey, where the minister's place is vacant and the salary stopped, while the pay of the secretary of legation as secretary is also stopped, and he is being paid, as you may say, half rate as minister while doing the work of minister. One fact might be stated which does not occur from an inspection of the legislation which has been read.

The duties of a secretary, when acting as chargé, if he is a man of self-respect, if he is a man who properly appreciates the responsibilities and duties with which he is charged, involve necessarily larger expenditure than he incurs when he is merely a subordinate. Unless he would do that for which his countrymen would despise him, because he would show an exceptional penuriousness that would make those about him sneer at our country belittled by its representative, he is constrained to expend more than he would ordinarily as a mere secretary of legation. It may be that the $12,000 indicated by the amendment is sufficient to pay the amount that would accrue as pay of chargés at all the lega-tions during the coming year, though it is expected that it will be more, and may be near $20,000. An administration, vigilantly and honestly guarded by an able head, may keep the expenditure within that limit of $12,000; but if so, and we should have appropriated $20,000, the $8,000 will simply be turned back into the Treasury. We ought to appropriate the $20,000 asked for, and if it is not rightly expended we know whom to hold responsible for the extravagance.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to dissent from some of the views entertained by my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] with reference to our diplomatic service. When speaking on this bill some days ago, he said it would be better to abolish our diplomatic service than to humiliate the officials engaged in it; and that my position was in the interest of the rich men, and among them my speech would be most loudly applauded, or words to that effect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have never been accused of any such selfishness as would make me desire to turn all the offices of this country over to the rich. I have great regard for the poor, for I was once poor myself. [Laughter.] But, sir, I do here and now wish to emphasize my protest against the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois and others in support of this bill that large salaries must be paid to our ministers abroad to enable them to fulfill the social requirements of these positions as they might be fulfilled by rich people or the representatives of other governments. In other words, they want Congress to appropriate money to enable them to put on rich men's airs.

The rich can spend their money as they please, but I deny that it is the duty of Congress or of the people of this country to pay salaries to their officials to enable them to live in extravagance simply because rich people of the representatives of other governments do so. I think, sir, that one of the great evils of the times in which we live is the idea entertained by a great many people, especially officials, that a person, because he holds a public position, must have such salary as will enable him, in sustaining the dignity of that position, to spend money like the rich.

I think, sir, that many of the diplomatic positions might be either abolished entirely or consolidated without serious detriment to the public service. The gentleman talks about the mission of our foreign ministers being a mission of peace. I do not think, sir, that the peace of this country is seriously threatened from any source, and less abroad than at home. The best peace measures we can adopt is to strengthen our Government in the hearts and affections of our own people; and the best way to do this is to show them by our acts that the Government is run with special reference to their interest, and not in the special interest of the office-holding class. Engraft this upon their understanding, and you will have done more toward keeping the peace than your diplomatic corps is likely to accomplish.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the question pending.

Mr. HITT. I withdraw the pro forma amendment which I submitted.

Mr. BELMONT. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel called upon to answer the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN]. I only ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked to show him this is no new question. He may or may not care what might be the recommendation of the present Secretary of State, but this Secretary of State whose report I ask to have read was Edward Livingston, Secretary of State to President Andrew Jackson in 1833.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ministers are considered as favorites, selected to enjoy the pleasures of foreign travel at the expense of the people, their places as sinecures, and their residence abroad is a continued scene of luxurious enjoyment. Their exertions, embarrassments, their laborious intercourse with the governments to which they are sent, their anxious care to avoid anything that might, on the one hand, give just cause of offense, or to neglect or to abandon the rights of their country or its citizens, on the other, are all unknown at home.

Even the merit of their correspondence, from which, at least, the reward of honor might be derived, is hid in the archives of the Department and rarely sees the light; and, except in the instances of a successful negotiation for claims, a minister returns to his country, after years of the most laborious exertion of the highest talent, with an injured, if not a broken fortune, his countrymen ignorant of his exertions, and undervaluing them, perhaps, if known. On the whole there is scarcely an office of which the duties properly performed are more arduous, more responsible, and less fairly appreciated than that of minister to a country with which we have important commercial relations. Yet there is some reason to believe that appointments to them are sometimes eagerly sought from the same false ideas of the nature of the employment. To these mistaken ideas, more or less prevalent, may be traced many of the evils which have operated and still operate injuriously upon the interests and reputation of the country.

At home the head of every subordinate bureau attached to any of the Departments has an office and a messenger, and clerks, and fire, and stationery, and lights, and every convenience for carrying on the business entrusted to him. This is as it should be. But to represent the dignity of the country, and on scant salary to transact its most important concerns abroad, we send a man whom we provide with none of these necessaries for the transaction of his business, we force him to do all the drudgery of the office with his own hands, and either to live in some obscure place, where his countrymen blush to find him fixed, when, after some difficulty, they have discovered his tavern residence; or, at the expense of his own fortune, to provide what is necessary for the interest and dignity of the Government. The usual answer to these representations is that, notwithstanding all these inconveniences, candidates are always found eagerly seeking these appointments.

But it must be remarked that these candidates are of two kinds. First, men of wealth, who are willing to purchase the honor of the station at the expense of their private fortunes. But although these are not always the fittest, in other respects, for the place they are sometimes selected, and their appointment is popular, because there seems to be no objection to a minister's keeping up a decent appearance, provided he does it at his own expense. Secondly, there are others who seek these appointments because they make false calculations on the consequences. They resolve to be very economical, to live within their income, and to be drawn into no extravagance. But, on arriving at their place of destination, they find that expenses which might, with prudence, have been avoided here, are inevitable abroad. Civilities are received which must be returned; strangers are introduced who must be entertained; their countrymen call on them and must be treated hospitably.

In short, they find themselves obliged to live as others do, or to forego all the advantages which social intercourse would give them in the business of their mission. The consequence is, that all our ministers return with impaired fortunes, however firm their resolutions have been to avoid unnecessary expense. It is possible there may be exceptions; but they are certainly very rare. If the mission is useful it ought to be supported at the public, not at private, expense; and the representatives of a great nation ought not be obliged to employ, in devising parsimonious expedients for their support, that time and those talents which ought to be occupied in the service of their country.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I see the committee is still meeting the opponents of the increase in this appropriation with the views of the Secretary of State. A great deal has been said in this debate about his opinions and recommendations. Now, the Secretary of State is no doubt a highly respectable gentleman. I have nothing to say against him, but so far as I know or am informed, in the discharge of the duties which devolve upon him in his exalted position, he has exhibited no such superior ability as, in my opinion, would require me to surrender my own conviction of public duty to follow his recommendation.

Mr. NELSON. This is the Secretary of State to Andrew Jackson—not the present Secretary of State.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I do not care what Secretary of State advises the support of official dignity at public expense, I do not believe in it. My opinion is that a man's dignity is not measured by the money he has or spends. The lavish expenditure of money by public officials may procure for them in some quarters a sort of prestige they could not otherwise acquire, but the true dignity pertaining to official station can not be purchased with money, but must have for its basis those traits of head and heart that result in duty well performed and make the world respect and honor good and great men wherever found.

Mr. BELMONT. Would you apply that to members of Congress?

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. To the great majority I would; others, I am sorry to say, must depend for their dignity and position on their money. Away, sir, with this idea that the dignity of a position is measured or determined by the amount of money its occupant expends! That is one of the false ideas that I wish to combat in the consideration of this and all other bills in this House.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen have had a good deal to say about the salaries paid by other nations to their diplomatic corps and of the vast sums of money lavished upon them by their governments to support their official dignity. And these same gentlemen insist that we must appropriate sufficient sums of money to enable our representatives abroad to live in something of the same style as the diplomats of other nations. Why should the American people want to imitate or pattern after any other people on God's green earth?

An American citizen, as the representative of this Government, need not ape or imitate anybody. The fact that he represents this Government, that is the admiration of the outside world and the pride and glory of every American, with proper conduct on his part and reasonable expenditures, is enough to support the dignity of any of our representatives abroad.

These governments to which the gentlemen refer us are founded upon theories altogether different from ours. Their rulers are born to official station and inherit their right to rule, and the official classes are supposed to be better than the people they rule and represent. But, sir, it is our pride that we do not do things in this country like other nations. Our office-holders are public servants, and because men reach high and honorable positions they are no better by reason of that than the people from whom they come and by whose grace they hold their positions.

Mr. Chairman, of all the disgusting things to me in our American system this tendency to ape and imitate the nobility and aristocracy and snobbery of other countries is the one with which I have the least patience. This disposition on the part of some of our people, which I am sorry to say seems to be growing in some quarters as individual wealth increases, is far more threatening and dangerous to our best interest and future welfare than any possible want of dignity that is likely to afflict our representatives abroad by reason of not having princely salaries from the Government. I wish, Mr. Chairman, I had more time to devote to this particular phase of this discussion. This effort to pattern after foreigners is, in my judgment, the worm in our chestnut.

Mr. BELMONT. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken; the committee divided, and there were—ayes 28, noes 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES SECRETARIES OF LEGATIONS.

Secretaries of the legations in Berlin, China, Japan, London, Paris, and St. Petersburg, at $2,625 each, $15,750.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the salary of the secretary of legation in China is provided for in the present bill at $2,625, while in a subsequent paragraph of the bill the salary of the interpreter is fixed at $3,000, thus dividing the salary fixed by law for the two offices, which may be held by one person, into two parts. The law provided that the office of secretary may be held by an interpreter and limited the salary for the service at $5,000. Now, by the division which this bill proposes the salary, in place of being $5,000 for the two, is fixed at $5,625. The aggregate appropriation is $625 more than the law authorizes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the point of order.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, the office to which the gentleman from Missouri refers is, I suppose, fixed under the law of 1856, and this provision here is simply a repetition of what has occurred in diplomatic and consular bills for several years passed.

As to the salary of the interpreter, I will ask the Clerk to read this letter, addressed to me by Mr. COX, of New York, during the last month.

The Clerk proceeded to read the communication.

The CHAIRMAN (interrupting the reading). The Chair does not think that this bears on the point of order.

Mr. BELMONT. It appears to me that it does.

Mr. BURNES. I do not think the gentleman from New York has understood the proposition.

Mr. BELMONT. I understood it perfectly.

Mr. BURNES. The letter the gentleman sent up to be read has reference to the interpreter at Constantinople, not to the interpreter and secretary of legation in China.

Mr. BELMONT. My object was to impress upon the House the necessity for these interpreters in the East, and I know of no better testimony than that of our late minister to Turkey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York must confine himself to the discussion of the question of order.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask for a decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Second secretaries of the legations in China and Japan, who shall be American students of the language of the court and country to which they are appointed respectively, and shall be allowed and required, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to devote their time to the acquisition of such language, at $1,800 each, $3,600.

Mr. HOLMAN. This, I believe, is a new provision.

Mr. BELMONT. It is not a new provision.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order on it.

Mr. BELMONT. It was contained in last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true, but it is not provided for by law. I find that in the former legislation, where the salaries were fixed and which went into the Revised Statutes of the United States, there are three second secretaries provided for—in France, Germany, and Great Britain; those are the only ones. And in the act of 1879 the same are provided for:

For the salaries of second secretaries of legation in Great Britain, France, and Germany.

In the act of 1879, as well as in the act of 1856, there are only three second secretaries provided for. I concede it may be that in the last appropriation bill provision was made for second secretaries of the legations in China and Japan, but that does not change the law.

The point I make is that there is no law authorizing this expenditure, no law creating these offices of second secretaries at Japan and China. It has been so repeatedly held that an appropriation bill does not change the law if it is simply the current appropriation from year to year that it is hardly necessary to discuss that subject. I content myself with sending to the Chair the two statutes showing that no such officers are provided for by either of the statutes which are recognized as the basis of the consular system.

Mr. BELMONT. I think the House should be made aware of the result of the strict application of this rule. If it is to be followed all the way through, I admit, that many offices which have been created since 1879, for which salaries are here simply repeated, will be either abolished or greatly reduced in compensation.

I have a list here of offices, some of them created since 1879, and appropriations made for them in certain cases by the committee of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is a member. In case the rule is applied all the way through and the bill is made to conform to the act of 1879, Ecuador would have to be changed from a consul-generalship at $3,000 to a consulate at $1,000, Panama from a consul-generalship at $4,000 to a consulate at $3,000, St. Petersburg from $3,000 to $2,000, Mexico from $2,500 to $2,000. And the following consulates must be reduced in rank and amount: Hong-Kong from $5,000 to $4,000, Belfast from $3,000 to $2,500, Leith from $2,500 to $2,000, Smyrna from $2,500 to $2,000, Jerusalem from $2,000 to $1,500, Palermo from $2,000 to $1,500, Apia from $2,000 to $1,000, Southampton from $1,500 to $1,000, and Ceylon from $1,500 to $1,000, while the following consulates to which consuls have been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate would have to be abolished altogether, not being provided for in the act of 1879: Nottingham, $2,500; Sydney, $2,000; Maracaibo, $2,000; Sagua la Grande, $2,000; Crefeld, $2,000; Tegucigalpa, $2,000; San José, $2,000; Managua, $2,000; San Juan del Norte, $2,000; San Salvador $2,000; Manila, $2,000; Amherstburg, $1,500; Antigua, $1,500; St. Stephens, $1,500; Malta, $1,500; Guadeloupe, $1,500; Aix la Chapelle, $1,500; Paso del Norte, $1,500; Puerto Cabello, $1,500; Para, $1,500; Sivas, $1,500; Mozambique, $1,000; Nuevo Laredo, $1,000, and Piedras Negras, $1,000.

In other portions of the bill the House, to maintain consistency and to conform to the act of 1879, ought to strike out the appropriation for the secretary of legation to Turkey. The envoys extraordinary to Central America and to Colombia should each be ministers resident; instead of ministers resident and consuls-general to Portugal, Denmark, and Switzerland there should only be a chargé d'affaires to each of those countries; instead of a minister resident and consul-general at Siam there should only be a consul, at $3,000 instead of $5,000; and the minister resident and consul-general to Lisbon, at $5,000, should be a consul simply at $2,000.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the application of this rule must prove to the House that much necessary legislation is utterly impossible while it is maintained, and there must be with a view to that legislation some change in the rules of the House. I offered on the 14th of June last an amendment to cover just the difficulty. I proposed to amend section 4 of Rule XXIII by inserting, after the word "harbors," in line 4, the sentence which I have italicized:

In Committees of the Whole House business on their Calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and bills for the reorganization of, or retrenchment of expenditure in, any branch of the legislative, executive, or judicial departments of the Government, which shall have precedence, &c.

I merely call attention to this proposed change in the belief that when Congress reassembles this matter of rules will force itself upon the attention of members. And I do not know any better illustration of the necessity for a change than the manner in which it is found possible for a few gentlemen to destroy the whole work of a committee, as we see here to-day. So far as I am concerned in representing that committee, I shall take occasion to offer the amendments to the bill, as the occasion arises, in conformity with the points of order raised and decided.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to submit to the Chair that this paragraph is not subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana. It is true no such clause is to be found in the act of 1856 nor in the act of 1879, but it is the creation of a new office on an appropriation bill since that time. It can not be said there has been no legislation on any other appropriation bill since 1879. The distinction is this: It is not the increase of a salary that was fixed by that act, but it is the creation of a new office with a salary attached to it on an appropriation bill since that time.

It does not undertake to change the salary that was fixed by that law. The legislative clause in the appropriation bill of 1879 designated the amount of the salaries for different officials and declared that those should be their fixed salaries from that time forward, but it did not say anything about second secretaries of legation at China and Japan, and it does not prohibit any such office from being established. Therefore this is equivalent to a legislative clause, and entitled to the same respect when it came into the bill last year or the year before as the legislative clause in the act of 1879. It is the establishment of these offices with salaries fixed, and is not in violation of any provision of the law of 1879.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend misapprehends the rule. It has to be shown affimatively that there is a law creating the office or authorizing the expenditure to make it in order on an appropriation bill. My friend takes the reverse on that proposition as true—that if there is nothing in the law prohibiting the creation of the office or the increase of the salary then it is in order.

Mr. CLEMENTS. But the office was established in the bill of last year.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was established before that. I think it was first provided for in the appropriation bill of 1884–'85, and it has been in the appropriation bills ever since. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not quite certain whether I ought to press this point of order, and I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] (who has studied this question much more closely than I have) to this suggestion. The purpose apparently in view is to educate young men from time to time at each of these missions and to enable them to familiarize themselves with the language and manners of the country.

It had occurred to me that there were no real duties to perform, and that the only benefit of a public character that could result from these appropriations would be the affording to a few young men connected with the diplomatic service an opportunity to become acquainted with the customs, the system of government, and the language of the countries to which they might severally be accredited.

Our relations with China and Japan being now so close, the intercourse between those nations and our own being so great and so constant, so many of our merchants going to locate and remain in the leading cities of those countries, it seemed to me scarcely possible that the facilities offered in this way to a few young men could be of any public importance; and it was upon that ground that I submitted the point of order, but I am not certain that it may be possible that in this instance the offices were properly provided for in the appropriation bill, and I feel inclined on that account not to press the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I renew it. I remember, Mr. Chairmain, that when the present rules of the House were under discussion the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] offered an amendment which I thought most appropriate in view of the fact that an administration has just come into power that had been chosen partly, at least, upon the idea that the number and the salaries of officers were too great. The rule being that new legislation upon appropriation bills was prohibited, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was a proposition to exempt the Committee on Appropriations from the operation of that rule in cases where offices were sought to be abolished or salaries reduced.

I remember distinctly, sir, that that amendment impressed me very forcibly, and that I voted for it and thought it ought to have been adopted by the House, especially in view of the circumstances under which the Democratic party had come into power and into control of the national administration. That amendment was voted down; and, sir, if we can not reduce the number of offices, or reduce the salaries of those who are in office, I, for one, propose to enforce the rule as it stands in cases where an attempt is made to increase the number of offices or the salaries of those who are in office.

On Saturday last, in discussing a point of order, my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. COX], for whom I have the very highest regard, stated that in some previous remarks which I had made upon this bill I had attacked his State, because I spoke of the chincapin and huckleberry pickers and tar-boilers of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to attack the State of the gentleman. Far be it from me to do so, for there are associated in my mind with the name of North Carolina and with the name of North Carolinians many pleasant and hallowed recollections. The gentleman can not raise a controversy with me by praising his State; it is a grand State. But, sir, I did not understand that in speaking of the poverty of some of the people living in that State I was making an attack upon the State or upon those people. Why, sir, it is no crime in my State to be poor, and I trust that it is no crime in North Carolina either.

But yesterday I saw in the public press a statement that there were people living in North Carolina, right under the nose of the grand jury, and living there for thirty years, in the most abject poverty, who had never been indicted for it. Sir, in the remarks of mine to which the gentleman referred there was no reflection upon his State. We have, sir, many poor people in Mississippi, and some of them the best people in the world at that. I simply spoke of the burdens of the people that we represent upon this floor, and gentlemen mistook my meaning if they understood me to argue that all the officials of this Government should be brought on a par with those people in the matter of compensation or income. The idea I intended to convey was that when we vote away money that is given in part by such people we should only take what is reasonably necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to state his decision. This question has been so frequently ruled upon heretofore, and uniformly one way, that the Chair conforms, without hesitation, to the previous rulings, and sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secretaries of the legations in Austria, Brazil, Italy, Mexico, Spain, and Turkey, at $1,800 each, $10,800.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, the secretary of legation at Constantinople, as fixed in this bill, is $1,800. Under section 1675 of the Revised Statutes the salary should be 15 per cent. of that of the minister, which would be less than $1,500.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not desire to contest the ruling of the Chair on the point of order; but I have only to say that this item is a repetition of the appropriations hitherto made for a number of years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secretaries of the legations in the Argentine Republic, Belgium, Chili, Corea, Netherlands, Roumania, Servia, and Greece, Peru, Sweden and Norway, Switzerland, and Venezuela, at $1,500 each, $15,000.

Mr. McCREARY. I raise a point of order on this section; and in support of the point I will read the third subsection of Rule XXI:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The paragraph just read by the Clerk is new legislation, never embraced heretofore in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. There is no law justifying this provision.

Mr. BELMONT. Under the present ruling of the Chair I do not dispute the correctness of the view suggested by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY]. These are new provisions with the exception of Chili and Peru. Their purpose, I think, might as well be stated to the House. At the outset of this discussion the gentleman from Missouri spoke of cases where there were vacancies in the office of minister and the duties were performed by the secretary of legation. The idea contemplated by the paragraph now under consideration is that each of these ministers should be provided with a secretary of legation, so that in case of a vacancy in the office of minister, caused either by death or leave of absence, there might be some established means of diplomatic communication. An incident lately occurred in which, very much to the detriment of our interests, there was no secretary of legation to perform the duties after the minister had returned home. In that case the diplomatic correspondence was carried on by courtesy through the English minister. I refer to the case of Persia. It is certainly very unfortunate for this country if we are compelled to seek the assistance of diplomatic agents of a foreign power in order to carry on our correspondence. The purpose of the legislation proposed in this paragraph, although it may be amenable to the point of order which the gentleman from Kentucky has raised, is to avoid such an unfortunate condition of affairs with reference to the interests of this country. I will not detain the House longer on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES INTERPRETERS TO LEGATIONS.

Interpreter to the legation in Turkey, $3,000; interpreter to the legation in China, $3,000; interpreter to the legation in Japan, $2,500; interpreter to the legation and consulate-general in Persia, $1,000; interpreter to the legation and consulate-general in Corea, $1,000; interpreter to the legation and consulate-general in Bangkok, Siam, $800; $11,300. But no person drawing the salary of interpreter as above provided shall be allowed any part of the salary appropriated for any secretary of legation or other officer.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order that in this paragraph there is, in violation of the law of 1879, an increase in the appropriation for the interpreter to the legation at Bangkok, Siam. The appropriation should be $500 instead of $800. In the same paragraph there is an increase for the interpreter to the legation in Turkey; but this increase being authorized by the law of 1879, no point of order can be made against it.

Mr. BELMONT. I think the gentleman who raises this point of order should at least consider the reason for the increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the point of order might apply to the entire provision. I believe this is an office created by an appropriation bill.

Mr. BELMONT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the point of order applies in the case of Turkey?

Mr. HOLMAN. The interpreter to the legation in Turkey is expressly provided for by law at $3,000, but the provision in reference to Siam is not in the former law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLERK-HIRE AT LEGATIONS.

Clerks at the legations in London and Spain, each at $1,200, $2,400.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order that the provision for a clerk for the legation in London is new legislation, and is not authorized by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is its first appearance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES FOREIGN MISSIONS.

For the purpose of enabling the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, postage, telegrams, furniture, messenger service, clerk-hire, compensation of cavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, includlng compensation of interpreter, guards, and Arabic clerk at the consulate of Tangier, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, and San Francisco, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of legations, and for printing in the Department of State, $105,000.

Mr. BURNES. I make a point of order against the paragraph just read. I wish to call particular attention to the law on this subject, to be found in section 1748 of the Revised Statutes. Whatever authority there may be for this appropriation rests upon that section, which defines the objects for which these appropriations may be made. Let me read the section:

The President is authorized to provide at the public expense all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs, as he shall think necessary for the several legations, consulates, and commercial agencies in the transaction of their business.

Of course, sir, so far as concerns an appropriation for any one of the items here enumerated, the point of order can not be sustained; but I wish to call attention to the items of expenditure which this bill proposes to authorize, when there is no law sanctioning such expenditure. But I must say some of them seem to me to be extraordinary. Let me read it:

For the purpose of enabling the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, postage, telegrams, furniture, messenger service, clerk hire, compensation of cavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreter, guards, and Arabic clerk at the consulate of Tangier, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, and San Francisco, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of legations, and for printing in the Department of State, $105,000.

I should say by subsequent legislation appropriation for rent and postage is authorized, but all the other items are unauthorized and are most extraordinary.

But when you take the provision as an entirety, I beg to submit to my learned friend he might as well have made this appropriation of $105,000 by saying $105,000, to be expended by the Secretary of State for the general welfare. [Laughter.]

So far as it relates to "telegrams, furniture, messenger service, clerk-hire, compensation of cavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreter, guards, and Arabic clerk at the consulate of Tangier, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, and San Francisco, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of legations, and for printing in the Department of State, $105,000," that all of this appropriation can be expended for the sole item of printing in the Department of State. Every dollar of this appropriation can be expended by the dispatch agents at London, New York, and San Francisco. Every dollar can be expended for the compensation of interpreter, guards, and Arabic clerk at the consulate of Tangier.

This is not an appropriation. This is simply a fund given to a high official to expend at his pleasure. I have as much respect for that distinguished gentleman as any member on the floor ought to have, but I will never consent, so far as I am concerned, to an indiscriminate appropriation of money to be used according to the sweet will of any official, be he high or low.

I would call attention in connection with this proposition to the printing in the Department of State. Will my friend from New York, when he comes to reply—and I see he is anxious to do so—will he tell me whether or not the Secretary of State already under current law has not found it necessary, in view of the fact the common, plain printing office was insufficient to do the work of his Department, although competent for the printing of the representatives of the people, although competent for the confidential printing of the Senate, although competent for the printing of the two bodies of Congress—I trust the gentleman from New York will answer me whether, notwithstanding all this, the Secretary of State has not found it necessary to establish a printing office in the Department of State, a special printing office of his own, with all necessary appointments, for the purpose of doing the printing which he does not trust to the common printing office, whether such an office has not been provided?

I have no doubt the Secretary of State will expend the money honestly, but the representatives of the people can never afford to stand up and say they will authorize any man to expend the people's money for a purpose for which no previous law has been enacted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman apply his point of order after the word "signs," in line 92?

Mr. BURNES. I apply it to all after the word "postage," in line 94.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman from Missouri has said this is an extraordinary provision, and he has read the items with great impressiveness, and yet it is nothing more than a simple repetition of last year's appropriation. There is absolutely nothing new in this paragraph. It provides for the contingent expenses of foreign missions, and that is all. An appropriation has been annually made for this purpose for many years, even before my distinguished friend from Missouri was a member of the House.

Out of the appropriation rent has been paid, and postage and telegrams, and it has been used for other purposes.

Why, last year, for the first time, a detailed statement was given in the bill of the purposes to which this contingent fund might be applied, to meet the views of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, who objected to an appropriation in bulk, and at his suggestion the list of objects to which the contingent fund had hitherto been applied was set out in the bill.

As far as the printing in the State Department is concerned, a great deal of the printing for that Department is done at the public printing office, but it seems to me there is no reason why the Government should not provide the necessary facilities to do this printing in the Department, for the purpose of keeping certain communications secret for a time. There have been communications sent to the present Committee on Foreign Affairs upon an important question now pending, and their printing, as well as the printing of certain important dispatches, was performed in the State Department, where it ought to have been done.

This is last year's provision, a very useful one; and so far from giving the Secretary of State any latitude in this respect, it is enough to say that he has always had greater latitude until last year, when these items were enumerated, and which we now simply repeat in this bill. There is nothing new, or extraordinary, or strange about it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to have the ear of the gentleman from New York for a moment, and I hope the Chair will observe the point to which I ask to call his attention. All of the provisions of this bill, under the rules of the House, relate to the foreign service of the Government. The contingencies of the State Department stand upon a separate footing altogether, just as those of the other Departments stand, as my friend well knows, and yet, strangely enough, under the rules of this House, in a bill having relation to the foreign service of the Government, a portion of the contingencies of the State Department are provided for. I trust my friend from New York will explain how that occurs.

The matter, of course, went with the estimates to the Committee on Appropriations, and of course the Committee on Appropriations considered the subject of the proposed contingency of establishing a printing office for the first time in our history in the State Department. It underwent a very careful examination, and the proper committee of the House determined, upon such investigation, that there was no necessity for the establishment of that new printing office; and the result was that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was reported to the House with that provision omitted. Could any member of the House, whether he belongs to the Appropriations Committee or not, be held responsible for letting a provision like this go through—such an extraordinary provision; for who would have thought of looking in such a place for it?

Would he not have looked in any other bill and expected to find such a provision rather than in this bill? The result is that $105,000 is proposed to be appropriated by the bill, and can be expended, all of it, right here in the State Department.

Mr. REED. It can not be expended but once.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will informally rise.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CLEMENTS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 215) to provide for printing the third annual report of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

The message further announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles, and requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed managers on the part of the Senate as follows, namely:

On the bill (S. 199) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar—Mr. JONES of Nevada, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. BECK; and

On the bill (S. 1582) for the relief of Alpheus R. French—Mr. SAWYER, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. SABIN.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 2929) to divide the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, &c., and requested a conference with the House thereon, and had appointed Mr. VEST, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. EVARTS as managers on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill H. R. 10394 (the Indian appropriation bill), and had appointed Mr. DAWES, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. CALL managers on the part of the Senate.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. One word further, Mr. Chairman. The Chair will observe that the Revised Statutes are lying before him and that chapter 3 of this bill and the section to which the gentleman from Missouri called attention has the following title: "Provisions common to diplomatic and consular officers."

I submit to the Chair that this appropriation stands upon a somewhat different footing from the ordinary appropriation for contingencies, inasmuch as the permanent law has expressed the purpose for which the President may expend money in the nature of contingencies. It may be used for many of the purposes named here; for instance, for stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs. That would terminate the provision of the general statute. There is no expenditure of money for the other purposes enumerated.

But the gentleman from Missouri, in view of the fact, I presume, that there have been appropriations made by way of contingencies for rent and postage heretofore, does not make the point of order upon these two items, but simply upon the residue of the paragraph, which is not enumerated in the law; and while the most of these might be contingencies for the foreign service under ordinary circumstances, they can not be contingencies under the present rules of the House, so established by legislation as to justify an appropriation of money. In other words, the affirmative law excludes the attempt to appropriate beyond the purposes enumerated under the general law. This is more apparent when you come to consider that not only are the contingencies here for the foreign service beyond that authorized by law but they are contingencies for the State Department at home, with which this bill has nothing to do.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman from Indiana states that under these contingencies we may provide for rent and postage; but he denies——

Mr. HOLMAN. What I said was that the point of order was not made on those two items.

Mr. BELMONT. But the gentleman denies that the necessities of foreign intercourse include telegrams.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman mistakes my statement. I deny that the law authorizes any such expenditure.

Mr. BELMONT. Where does the law authorize postage and exclude telegrams?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman not concede those are not embraced in the law?

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] was so kind as not to include rent and postage in his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Missouri did not make the point of order on those items, because they have been provided for from time to time.

Mr. BELMONT. Then it simply depends on the good will of the gentleman from Missouri what items shall be included. It seems to me if this—I was about to say absurd and narrow rule—is to be applied at all it should be applied in full. It should not depend on the kindness of the gentleman from Missouri that rent should be provided for our foreign service or postage while he stops at telegrams. And I submit to the Chair if the view of the gentleman from Indiana is correct we should strike out the provision for rent, the provision for postage, and all the rest. I think we ought to be consistent in this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. How about the printing?

Mr. BELMONT. As to the printing, I suggest that is only for our foreign intercourse. It is only the printing of dispatches which require secrecy.

Mr. HOLMAN. May I ask how the gentleman from New York came to take the contingencies of the State Department under his charge?

Mr. BELMONT. I will answer the gentleman in this way. I think it is notorious—and certainly the course of this bill has proved it—that the Committee on Appropriations as now constituted is hostile in every sense to our foreign service. I do not know but some gentlemen believe we might get along without foreign service.

Mr. HOLMAN. We might get along very well without our diplomatic establishment, but our consular system ought to be encouraged in the highest degree.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman from Indiana acknowledges that he is in favor of getting along, as he says, without the diplomatic service, although the greatest authority on international law, Mr. Wheaton, says that "international assent to the system for a long period of time has given to the custom the force of an obligation upon all civilized powers, and it can not be abandoned without the assent of nations."

Mr. WILSON. May I ask the gentleman from New York why he interprets the action of two gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Appropriations as the action of the committee?

Mr. BELMONT. I have only heard from those two gentlemen.

Mr. WILSON. They speak so far as regards this bill as members of the House, not as members of the committee.

Mr. BELMONT. I am glad to hear that statement. As to the necessity of diplomatic service——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELMONT. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires the debate to be confined to the question of order.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman from Indiana asked me why the Committee on Foreign Affairs undertook the management of this provision. I reply, it must be known to the House how hopeless it is to establish through the Committee on Appropriations anything useful to our diplomatic service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. Before the Chair makes his ruling I desire to make a correction. I find the law does not include rent and postage for the missions abroad, but it includes rent and postage for the consulates abroad. Therefore rent and postage for these missions are not allowed under existing law.

Mr. BELMONT. I would like to ask if under the rules of the House it is possible to practically abolish a mission for which an appropriation has been made by refusing to appropriate for rent? I mean to say that the purpose of the gentleman seems to be, while he can not abolish a mission or refuse to appropriate the salary, to withdraw the appropriations for purposes necessary to keep up the mission.

Mr. BURNES. That is the fault of the law, not of the member who makes the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not responsible for any consequence of the rule. He has simply to decide the questions of order submitted to him. It is conceded there is no authority of law for an appropriation covering these items. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. REED. How much is left of the section? Will the Chair cause the Clerk to read the section as it now is, that the committee may know what is left? As I understand, there is not even postage left.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled out the matter on which the point of order was made. If any correction is necessary it can be made by amendment.

Mr. BRAGG. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that unless there is a change made in the amount appropriated at the end of the paragraph the whole $105,000 are left for three or four things at the head of the paragraph after the bulk of it has been stricken out. Certainly if there is any sense in striking out any portion of this paragraph the sum appropriated should be reduced pro rata.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, in deciding on a point of order, has nothing to do with the consistency of what is left.

Mr. BELMONT. May I ask what is the effect of the ruling on this paragraph? I trust the whole section will be stricken out if we are to go on in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. Only the portion is stricken out which was covered by the point of order.

Mr. BELMONT. How much is that?

The CHAIRMAN. All after the word "business," in line 94, down to the word "State," in line 101. Unless there is further amendment to be offered the Clerk will read the next paragraph.

Mr. BURNES. In view of the fact that the bulk of the paragraph is out, $105,000 having been appropriated in all, I move that for the few remaining items the amount be decreased to the amount usual in such cases, $75,000.

The question was taken on the motion; and there were—ayes 19, noes 53.

Mr. NELSON. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will designate the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] to act as tellers.

Mr. NELSON. I make that point, Mr. Chairman, simply because when I make a point of order I do not want the Chair to snub me, and if I can not be recognized on that I propose to make up for it in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's reference to the Chair is mistaken. The Chair had no such intention. All in favor of the amendment will pass between the tellers.

Mr. NELSON (before the count was completed). I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is withdrawn. The Chair wishes to say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that if there was any seeming want of courtesy toward him it was due to inadvertence, and the Chair regrets it very much.

Mr. NELSON. I accept the statement of the Chair, and am very glad to hear that.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Erection of buildings for legation, court-house, and jail at Tokio, Japan, upon ground offered to the United States by the Government of Japan, $25,000.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to the correspondence of the State Department on this subject. In December, 1884, the United States minister, Mr. Hubbard, said that—

His Imperial Japanese Majesty's Government desired, in token of their friendship for the United States, to make a gift in perpetuity to the United States of America of 5 acres, or more, in land, for legation purposes, in the central part of this city (Tokio), and near to the new imperial palace now being erected. The estimated value of the land proposed to be given is $25,000, or more. The location will be all that could be desired.

In a second dispatch, he further says that—

Five of the foreign powers, to wit, Great Britain, Germany, Italy, Russia, and China, now own and occupy legation buildings and grounds in Tokio, and Austria-Hungary holds a grant of ground therein, and will, it is understood, erect legation buildings thereon in the ensuing year, and I have no doubt the other foreign powers will, at no distant day, own legation grounds and buildings in this city. I do not doubt that it will be a wise economy, and greatly promote our commercial interests as well, to accept the generous offer of this government.

In a communication of the 2d of October, 1885, Mr. Hubbard further says:

This offer of the Japanese Government is still a standing offer, and awaits the action of our Government. * * * It may be well to remark in this connection that all the other treaty powers have accepted, long ago, similar gifts of land from Japan, and have erected legation court-houses, jails, and residences for their ministers and staffs.

And Mr. Secretary Bayard requests us to take such action as may secure this donation to us. I will remind the gentleman that we have paid within the last ten years $34,000 for rent for suitable accommodations for our legation purposes. Whereas if we should now erect such a building as is provided for by this bill we would save in a like period at least $14,000.

Pretermitting, therefore, all respect we may have for the high authority of those who make these recommendations, I submit to the gentleman as a mere business proposition that he should not oppose the appropriation or raise a point of order against it.

Mr. McCREARY. I have already raised the point of order.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I did not so understand you, and trust that you will withdraw it. Indeed I do not consider it subject to the point.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no law authorizing the expenditure.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. No; nor is there any law required. It is simply a temporary appropriation for a permanent purpose. There is no law for or against it, but it is a matter addressed to the wise discretion of this House, which should be accepted when it is remembered that it is the only means for securing a suitable plat for the purposes indicated.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, in response to what has been said by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX], I wish to inquire of him if it is the policy of this Government to accept donations from foreign powers by which, as a matter of course, we are to be brought under obligations to them.

So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to any such policy, and I am opposed to a bill which tolerates any such proposition as that. If this Government wants a site for a legation in Japan, or in any other country, whether it costs $25,000 or $100,000, this Government is able to pay for it, and I am very glad that my colleague on the committtee raised this point of order.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I shall not resist the point of order, but I think that the question of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] should be answered. There is a precedent in the case of Tangier, where the United States accepted a gift of consular premises from the Emperor of Morocco in 1822, and has since made appropriation for their repair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the merits of the proposition is not in order. The question is to be disposed of on a point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairing and improvement of the legation premises at Bangkok, Siam, the same, with the ground on which it stands, being the gift of the King of Siam, $3,000.

Mr. McCREARY. I raise the point of order on that paragraph that it is in contravention of clause 3 of Rule XXI.

The point of order was sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses which may be incurred in the acknowledgment of the services of masters and crews of foreign vessels in rescuing American seamen or citizens from shipwreck, $4,500.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, the amount authorized by the statute for this purpose is $4,000. The object is simply to enable the Secretary to give a little more expensive gifts by way of recognition of heroic deeds. I make the point of order upon the paragraph.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, this restores the appropriation that was made from 1882 to 1886, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will please send to the Clerk's desk the statute to which he refers.

Mr. BURNES (after a pause). I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended under the direction of the President, pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BURNES. The committee, I trust, will recognize the distinction which I make when I call attention to the fact that the paragraph just read embraces a cumulative or duplicating appropriation, and further, is subject to a point of order, there being no law authorizing it. It will be observed that in the paragraph appropriating $15,000 this appropriation is stated to be "pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes." That section has been considered in this House upon several occasions, and it has been appropriately denominated a section authorizing a fund for a secret service. Now, the subsequent section appropriates $50,000 for the same purpose, under section 291. In order that the House may have the whole facts, I desire to make an explanation, and I am not here to defeat legislation of any character, but simply to give the facts.

At the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress the House determined not to appropriate for this secret service, the appropriation for that purpose being refused by a vote of the House or the committee. At the second session of that Congress it was believed that, as great changes were made in the foreign service, large expenditures would follow for those changes, and that consequently the President ought to have some fund from which he could defray those expenses. Therefore, in the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, when the committee was not restricted as under the present rules, but was authorized to legislate, this section was adopted, "to enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the diplomatic and consular service," but everything relating to the appropriation of $15,000 was left out of the bill.

Now, the present bill appropriates not only the $15,000 for the secret service but the $50,000 which in the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress was intended to stand in lieu of the other provision for meeting the expenses that might attend these unforeseen emergencies in the service. I submit, therefore, that, on a point of order, this paragraph should go out; and I put it simply on the ground of its being cumulative.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, these two provisions were contained in last year's appropriation bill. I remember well that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], when he had this bill in charge, found great objection to what he called the "secret-service fund;" and at that time a provision of this sort was excluded in the House. The Senate, however, being, as usual, compelled to correct such unfortunate mistakes as are sometimes made on this bill in the House, restored the provision; but in order that this prejudice against what is called a "secret-service fund" should be overcome the second provision was adopted in the House under the direction of my friend from Missouri.

Both sections are founded upon section 291 of the Revised Statutes. They are not cumulative in the least degree. The first section provides for what is known as the "neutrality fund." It is a necessary fund, and has been appropriated year after year, excepting the year when this bill was in charge of the gentleman from Missouri. It is necessary that our neutrality should be observed; and there has never been any question as to the usefulness of the fund. As showing that this provision is in order, I will simply refer the Chair to section 291 of the Revised Statutes. The succeeding paragraph of the bill is also founded upon that statute in this sense, that the expenditure is made upon the voucher of the President; but the purpose of the fund, as can be at once understood by reading the paragraph, is a different one. The provisions are not cumulative, and they are authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES CONSULAR SERVICE—CLASS 1.

Consuls-general at Havana, London, Paris, and Rio de Janeiro, at $6,000 each, $24,000.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to amend by striking out in line 170 the words "Class one." Their insertion is a clerical error, there being no longer any consuls at $4,000 coming within that class.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consuls-general at Calcutta, Kanagawa, Panama, and Shanghai, at $5,000 each, $20,000.

Mr. BURNES. The law provides that the salary at Kanagawa shall be $4,000 and at Panama $3,000. I make a point of order on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the discussion upon the point of order in the general debate, the Chair was troubled somewhat as to the rule relating to the schedules containing the salaries of consuls and changing their classification. Observing what had been the practice on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, where classifications somewhat similar to these are frequently rearranged, the Chair thought the analogy indicated that the same practice which had been so often applied in that bill to the classes embraced therein might be applied here. It was a very important question; and the Chair felt bound to recur to the original rule with its various amendments in order that he might ascertain, if possible, whether there was not some more certain way of reaching the truth than by analogy. The Chair therefore begs the attention of the committee in the first place to the rule in the Twenty-fifth Congress, which had obtained from 1820. The Chair will cause that rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. In the Congressional Globe, second session Twenty-fifth Congress, volume 6, page 235, will be found the record of an amendment to this rule with the debate thereon. The Clerk will read from the proceedings of March 13, 1838, as embraced in that volume.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Cambreling asked the House to take up the proposed amendment of Mr. Briggs to the sixty-third rule of the House, which was to add thereto the following:

"Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works or objects as are already in progress, and for the usual contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

The motion of Mr. Cambreling being agreed to,

Mr. Phillips moved to strike out the word "usual," which was accepted by Mr. Briggs as a modification, and the amendment of the rule was agreed to by two-thirds.

The CHAIRMAN. This rule was changed in the Forty-fourth Congress, and the Chair will cause the Clerk to read it as it was proposed by Mr. COX.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMENDMENT OF RULES—APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. COX. The Committee on the Rules have directed me to report, in response to a resolution of the House, the following amendment to the rules:

"That Rule No. 120 be so amended that all after the word 'progress' be stricken out and there be added the following:

"'Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto, changing existing law, be in order except as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.'"

If there be no objection to this rule, I will call the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Is this reported for immediate action?

Mr. COX. It is presented as the report of the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. KASSON. I object to its being acted on without debate and consideration of the clauses to which the proposition refers.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I raise the question whether this is in obedience to any resolution of the House.

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman that a resolution embracing a proposition of this kind was sent by the House to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. HOAR. I think we are entitled to have that point determined by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. According to the understanding of the Chair, the Journal shows that an amendment of this kind was offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and referred to the Committee on the Rules with a direction to report at an early day. This report is a response to that reference.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would like to have Rule CXX read as it now stands.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

Mr. COX. Now I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which in the Digest immediately follows this rule, and gives an interpretation to a portion of the rule which the committee have thought proper to strike out.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Digest the construction which has been placed on this by previous Speakers of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It has been decided that under this rule it is not in order to propose an amendment to a general appropriation bill which changes an existing law. But it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. It appears the provisions for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government up to that time had been one under which salaries had been increased. That provision was expressly repealed. There was left, therefore, only "works or objects in progress," which perhaps related to public buildings, with the qualification added by the amendment of Mr. COX, of New York, just cited, permitting legislation when germane which should retrench expenditures.

In the Forty-sixth Congress that rule was amended, and it appears as modified in the following language:

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. At the beginning of this Congress that rule was changed, and now reads in this form.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. This rule, therefore, leaves the question clear that there can not be any legislation proposed to an appropriation bill except as it relates to such public works and objects as are already in progress. And the consideration of the clause for carrying on the contingencies of the several departments of the Government, and the fact that it relates to salaries, discloses the purpose of the House to exclude from the appropriation bills any proposition increasing or reducing salaries at all. Whatever "works in progress" may mean, it certainly does not mean anything relating to salaries of Government officials.

Therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order, and will exclude all propositions increasing salaries of persons in the consular and diplomatic service when the question is raised.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that under the rulings of the Chair a vast number of changes must be made from page 8 down to the middle of page 17; and therefore I would suggest to the Chairman and to gentlemen on the other side who have called attention to the necessity for these changes whether it would not be better to read over the changes already made in order that the bill may be made to conform to them.

Mr. BELMONT. I think we can easily arrive at the result the gentleman seeks by reading the bill by sections and making the amendments which are necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consuls-general at Berlin, Ecuador, Halifax, Honolulu, Mexico, Montreal, and St. Petersburg, at $4,000 each, $28,000.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to strike out, in line 179, the word "Ecuador" and insert it in line 182, changing the footing accordingly.

Mr. BURNES. I trust the gentleman will yield to me for an observation. I would suggest that in striking out a word he also name the line in which it will be placed subsequently.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the regular way would be to strike out, when you reach the point where it is, and insert it afterward by amendment where it ought to be.

The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the word "Ecuador" in line 179.

Mr. BELMONT. And also the word "Halifax."

Mr. McCREARY. And "Mexico," in line 180.

Mr. BURNES. And "St. Petersburg," in the same line.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not know that my friends need be so anxious about the proposition to amend the bill. I can take care of it myself. If the Chair will recognize me in this matter I can perfect the bill as we go along without any confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has charge of the bill, and the Chair will certainly recognize him for the necessary amendments which the ruling will necessitate.

Mr. BELMONT. Then I move to strike out, as I have said, "Ecuador" and "Halifax," in line 179.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELMONT. I now move to strike out "Mexico" and "St. Petersburg," in line 180.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consuls-general at Constantinople, Frankfort, Matamoras, Rome, and Vienna, at $3,000 each, $15,000.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to insert——

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order is made now for the purpose of avoiding waiving it if this paragraph shall be passed over. I wish to make this suggestion, therefore, to the gentleman from New York to enable him to proceed with the bill without interruption: That it be understood the point of order is pending upon the increases in all these consulates, and the gentleman can then go on and perfect the bill and the point of order be reserved to be determined hereafter.

Mr. BELMONT. I am perfectly aware of the increases here, and have no desire to avoid the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands, then, the point of order is withheld.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order with the understanding that it may be made upon all the increases in these consulates.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to insert in line 182 the word "Ecuador."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELMONT. Also, in line 183, to insert the words "St. Petersburg."

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order that St. Petersburg is limited by law to $2,000.

Mr. BELMONT. It should go in line 183.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. On page 398 of the Supplement to the Revised Statutes it is provided that the salaries of the consuls-general at St. Petersburg and Mexico shall be fixed at $2,000. This is the law of 1879.

Mr. REED. Would it not be a good idea to refer this bill back to the committee to perfect it?

Mr. BELMONT. There is no difficulty about perfecting the bill here.

I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri as suggested by his point of order, and ask that the words "St. Petersburg" be inserted in their proper place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, then, withdraws his amendment?

Mr. BELMONT. I do.

I move that the word "Matamoras" be stricken out of lines 182 and 183.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the paragraph just read providing for the salaries of the consuls-general at Constantinople, Frankfort, Matamoras, Rome, and Vienna, at $3,000 each, $15,000. Now, Matamoras is stricken out, and $15,000 is left in.

Mr. BELMONT. The clerk makes the necessary corrections in the footing.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I suppose it was left in to be divided among the others. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Consul at Liverpool, $6,000.
Consul at Hong-Kong, $5,000.

Mr. BURNES. I see we must assist our friend occasionally. The law provides that the salary at Hong-Kong shall be $4,000. I make the point of order, therefore, upon the provision in the bill which fixes that salary at $5,000, and refer to the Supplement of the Revised Statutes, to which I have already called the attention of the Chair.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman is correct as to Hong-Kong.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk as read as follows:

Class 2, at $3,500 per annum:
Argentine Republic; Consul at Buenos Ayres.

Mr. BELMONT. I move that the words "Buenos Ayres," in line 190, be stricken out.

Mr. Chairman, when we come to the classification of these consulates it will greatly facilitate the committee to make the transfer from one class to another. For instance, the "words Buenos Ayres" should be stricken out here and put in their proper place in alphabetical order. It belongs properly to class 4.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from New York that it is likely to result in confusion if the clerks are not allowed to proceed in the usual way to make these amendments.

Mr. REED. Would it be in order to move that this bill be referred to a committee on revision?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not.

Mr. REED. We could have the assistance of the gentleman from Missouri in perfecting it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is not in order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] has the floor.

Mr. BELMONT. What I suggested just now seems to be perfectly satisfactory to the gentleman from Indiana. It appears to me the Clerk will have no difficulty in making those transfers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say in reference to various suggestions that have been made that it will be impossible for the clerks to keep the record correctly unless the paragraphs are read in consecutive order.

Mr. BELMONT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 189 and 190, strike out "Argentine Republic; Consul at Buenos Ayres," and insert those words in class 4, after line 228.

The CHAIRMAN. The class to which the amendment proposes to transfer those words has not yet been reached.

Mr. BELMONT. This method would very easily carry out the purpose of the committee.

Mr. REED. Such is the very complicated nature of these amendments that I think it would be well for the committee from time to time to rise and report progress, that the House may be advised what is being done. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman from Maine need not worry himself about it.

Mr. REED. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say again it is not in order to amend a paragraph until it has been reached. The Chair also makes this statement because he is informed by the clerks that the usual method of proceeding must be observed in order to keep the record correct.

Mr. BELMONT. Then I move to strike out the words "Argentine Republic: Consul at Buenos Ayres."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED. The amendment is a proposition to strike out. I hope the Chairman will explain where that leaves the bill. This is getting somewhat complicated.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not think it is necessary to give any explanation.

The question being taken, the Chairman stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. I call for a division.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 41.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this proposition has been negatived?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it was understood by the Chair the point of order was regarded as pending to all these propositions; but as a matter of convenience the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] was to make the motions as to these consulates in the order in which they occurred. The point of order was reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand. The bill is being considered by paragraphs as they are reached. There is nothing pending, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the point of order should be considered as pending.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not want to take any advantage. The point of order should be considered as pending, and I think my friend from Indiana is perfectly correct. There is only the difficulty raised by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. Precisely. The gentleman from New York declines to explain, and leaves the House in absolute darkness.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman from Maine is only repeating what I have seen here so often, and asks for an explanation for what must be clear to him.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from New York never saw this until the consideration of this bill has been reached.

Mr. BELMONT. I quite understand the gentleman's purpose to confuse an already rather confused matter. But I do not think he needs any explanation from me about it.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman is prevented by something more than his will from giving explanations.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not think it necessary to explain what must be clear to him and to this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Belgium: Consul at Antwerp.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order. The bill provides a salary for this consul of $3,500 when the law provides a salary of $2,500.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is raised. Is there any question on the part of the gentleman from New York as to the law?

Mr. BELMONT. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the point of order shall be considered as applying to all these increases.

Mr. REED. I want to understand how this matter is. Do I understand the Committee on Foreign Affairs are to move to strike out, and if that fails, the gentlemen representing the Committee on Appropriations are to throw out the item on a point of order? Is that the request of the gentleman from Indiana? This seems to be a double-action method of economy.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a very safe action.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Indiana. He asks unanimous consent that the point of order shall be considered as pending on all increases of salary in the bill.

Mr. DIBBLE. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BELMONT. I desire to submit the motions in every case in conformity with the rulings of the Chair. The Chair has in every instance ruled against every increase of salary; and unless gentlemen should, as the gentleman from Maine has sought to do, endeavor to confuse this matter further——

Mr. REED. That is not necessary after the gentleman from New York has explained it.

Mr. BELMONT. I propose to submit the motion in every case as it is reached in accordance with the rulings of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman an amendment to offer now?

Mr. BELMONT. I move that "Antwerp" be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. That has already gone out on a point of order.

Mr. REED. Where does that leave Antwerp?

Mr. BELMONT. It is to be inserted further on.

Mr. REED. Oh, it is to be put in by and by.

Mr. BELMONT. Exactly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Consuls at Amoy, Canton, Chin-Kiang, Foo-Chow Hankow, Ningpo, and Tien-Tsin.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to strike out Ningpo, in line 195.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

France: Consul at Havre.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to strike it out.

Mr. LONG. I understand that the point of order has been reserved upon all these items.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection was made to the request for that understanding.

Mr. BURNES. This goes out on the point of order. If the gentleman wishes to insert it at some other place that is another matter.

Mr. BELMONT. That should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Great Britain: Consuls at Bradford and Manchester.

Mr. BURNES and Mr. HOLMAN made the point of order; which was sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Brazil: Consul at Pernambuco.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order.

Mr. McCREARY. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order is reserved, however.

Mr. McCREARY. I reserve the point of order as to the salary allowed the consul at Pernambuco. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was being discussed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] on the 10th instant he filed at the close of his remarks certain tables and comments without reading them, by which he undertook to show that the tables which I had previously submitted were erroneous. I desire to say that after the most careful investigation I am satisfied that the tables submitted by me are correct. Table No. 1 presented by me is an exact copy of the table contained in the report accompanying the bill, and can not be disputed. The criticism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] of table 2 is wholly untenable.

In estimating fees collected at certain consulates he counted the whole amount collected in certain consular districts instead of confining himself to the amounts collected by each consul. For instance, the fees collected by the consul at Cardiff in 1886, as shown on page 17 of the Fifth Auditor's Report, and as stated by me, amounted to $288. The fees collected in the consular district of Cardiff, as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT], shown on page 31 of the Fifth Auditor's Report of 1886, amounted to $1,720.50; but they were derived as follows: Cardiff, $288; Llanelly, $105; Newport, $275; Swansea, $1,052.50.

These items make a total of $1,720. Thus the gentleman counts not only the fees collected by the consul but also those collected by the three consular agents.

The bill increases the salary of the consul at Cardiff from $2,000 to $2,500, and provides for the first time a consul at Swansea, with a salary of $1,500. There is nothing in the bill or report to indicate that the consular agencies at Llanelly and Newport are abolished.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, my colleague on the committee is perfectly correct in saying that I took my statement from pages 31 to 35 of the Fifth Auditor's report, and that was the proper thing to do in making the estimate. My colleague simply took, in the case of Cardiff, the amount of fees collected by that office, but the consular officer over a consular district is entitled to a portion of the fees of the feed consuls under him; and therefore in making the estimate for consulates the committee and the State Department adopted this course.

Mr. McCREARY. I can not yield any further, Mr. Chairman. I would not say anything at this time; but the tables and the comments which the gentleman put into the RECORD without reading seemed to demand that I should make an explanation. I hold in my hand the annual report of the Fifth Auditor to the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and I have examined every one of the consulates referred to by the gentleman from New York, and I find the same mistake made by him all the way through. He counts in his tables the amounts collected by the consul and by the consular agents of the district, when I simply referred to the fees collected by the consul.

Mr. BELMONT. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. McCREARY. I can not yield now.

As to table 3 he makes the same mistake. The amount of fees given in the table as collected in 1886 was taken from the Fifth Auditor's report of the fees collected in each of the consulates named. In refutation of this, the gentleman from New York stated the fees collected in the consular districts controlled by particular consuls named. In the Dusseldorf district, for instance, there was collected $2,575, but only $1,827.50 of this sum was collected at the Dusseldorf consulate; and the consul being a feed consul, that sum represented his annual compensation under the fee system. This bill gives him a specific salary of $2,500.

The balance of the fees were collected by an agent at Essen, who was compensated out of his collections. The interests of commerce demand the continuance of this agent at Essen, and there is nothing in the bill to indicate that he will be discontinued. In the Barranquilla district the gentleman from New York makes the same mistake, and counts the fees of the whole consular district instead of the fees of the consul at Barranquilla. The same mistake is made by him as regards every place named in his table.

On page 20 of the report Reichenberg is shown to be a consular agency with compensation in 1886 of $1,000 against fees collected amounting to $4,123. That it has been made a fee consulate since the fiscal year 1886 does not appear from the last report of the Auditor, nor was the contrary stated in the table which is criticised.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think this House will do well to examine, if it has opportunity, into this table.

I desire to explain to the House that in estimating the salaries, in order to reach a proper equalization, when you place a feed consul in the salaried class you must take the amount of fees collected in the district. My colleague on the committee [Mr. McCREARY] does not seem to appreciate the point that the consul receives not only the fees coming directly to him, but also a part of the fees from the subagents or officers under him. They send a part of their fees to the Treasury; but a portion goes to the consul himself. Take the case of Prague and Reichenberg. Under the proposed bill the consul at Prague receives a salary of $2,500. But the moment you put the present feed consul at Reichenberg upon a salary you withdraw so much from the salaried consul. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] understands this case perfectly well; and I have no doubt there are other gentlemen on the floor who have had communications from these consuls. It seems to me my friend from Kentucky should go a step further in his examination of this report of the Fifth Auditor. He would not then say I had made a mistake any more than he would say that the Department, in making these estimates based upon that very principle, had made a mistake.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I go by the Fifth Auditor's report.

Mr. BELMONT. What page? There are so many tables and so many pages that an examination is very confusing. The gentleman I think has got the wrong tables.

Mr. McCREARY. If the gentleman from New York will look at page 31 of the Fifth Auditor's report he will find a statement showing the character and amount of fees collected in consular districts during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886. He takes his statement from that portion of the report in order to show the whole amount collected in that consular district.

Mr. BELMONT. That is right.

Mr. McCREARY. In doing so he commits an error. When I had the honor to address the House I referred simply to the fees collected by each consul, not the fees collected in each consular district.

Mr. BELMONT. But you do not estimate the full amount of fees collected.

Mr. McCREARY. If the gentleman will take, for instance, Cape Town, on page 17 of the Fifth Auditor's report, it will serve as an illustration of what I am saying. The gentleman in his table fixes the amount collected at Cape Town at $1,019.50.

Mr. BELMONT. That is right.

Mr. McCREARY. That is the amount collected in the entire consular district. I said in my remarks that the amount collected at Cape Town was $325. I now read from a statement of the consular fees collected in 1886, as shown by the Fifth Auditor's report:

Cape Town	$325 00
East London	65 00
Port Elizabeth	582 00
Port Natal	47 50
Total	1,019 50

The error which the gentleman commits is in adding together the amounts collected in the entire consular district, when I referred only to the fees collected by the consul at Cape Town.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] made the same mistake in fixing the fees collected at Pernambuco. The Fifth Auditor's Report for 1886 shows that the fees collected by the consul at Pernambuco for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, were $973.50, but the gentleman from New York alleges that the fees amounted to $1,604, which he obtains as follows:

Pernambuco	$973 50
Beara	452 50
Macao	74 50
Natal	103 50
Total	1,604 00

In thus counting the fees of the whole consular district he makes a mistake and does me injustice, for I alleged that the consul at Pernambuco collected, in fees, $973.50, yet the bill proposes to increase his salary from $2,000 to $3,000.

The gentleman in his remarks undertook to show that my conclusions were erroneous, and I am therefore compelled to refer to these matters.

Now, I call his attention to other mistakes made by him. In his speech of February 10, published on page 1729 of the RECORD, he says: "Fees now retained by officers, to be hereafter paid by salaries, $120,000." In the report accompanying the bill under consideration written by him, page 5, he says that the fees collected by the officers whose positions it is now proposed to fill by salaried consuls amounted during the last fiscal year to $153,000. Here is a difference of $33,000 between his speech and his report.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman does not understand me.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. BELMONT, in his printed report accompanying this bill, says:

The total consular increase		$274,880
From this again should be deducted, on any fair computation, proportion of fees now collected and retained for salaries, rent, and other expenses of consular officers hereafter to be paid by fees	$120,000
Estimated gain to Treasury from increased collections	150,000
		270,000
Leaving net cost of consular changes proposed		4,880
Diplomatic service increase		50,500
		55,380

In his speech, page 1729 of the RECORD, he submits the following table:

As shown in the report, the total increase in the dipomatic service (including the cost of legation buildings for Japan and Siam) is			$50,500
The consular increase is (on the face of the appropriations)	$274,800
Less fees of consular agencies abolished, as shown in appendix to estimates	$10,400
Less fees now retained by officers to be hereafter paid by salaries	120,000
		130,400
			144,400
			194,900
From which, if the increase of revenue from closer collection of duties (which at the lowest estimate is placed at $150,000) be still further deducted			150,000
Leaves the total cost to the Treasury			40,900

I do not admit that the conclusions in these tables of the gentleman are correct. His item of $150,000 "estimated gain to the Treasury from increased collections" is a mistake and without foundation. I submit his tables simply to show that there is a difference of $14,480 between the total increase as presented in his report and as presented in his speech.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BELMONT. I move to strike out the last word. I do not desire to detain the committee. If my colleague felt compelled to justify his first tables I do not think it should have led him to the conclusion that I had made a mistake.

Mr. McCREARY. I only refer to it to show you that you do sometimes make a mistake.

Mr. BELMONT. There is no mistake made by me. I took the whole amount of fees collected by a consul because the gentleman from Kentucky was using those fees as a measure of the importance of the position; but he simply took the fees to which the main office was entitled, without reference to consular agents within the jurisdiction of that office, which should be taken into consideration when measuring the importance of the consulate by the fees collected. It was for that reason I said the gentleman from Kentucky was mistaken and had consulted the wrong tables.

As to the estimates presented in the report of the committee, reference to that report will show that the estimated net increase for the consular service was a little over $4,000, and for the whole bill about $54,000. The difference between that amount and the sum of $40,000 which I mentioned in debate is explained by the fact that in the discussion I deducted the decrease of actual compensation of consuls by the abolition of offices, and this deduction was not specifically set out in the report, though it was incidentally referred to. It is quite true the report states the amount of fees returned to the Treasury from feed officers is $153,000. Of this $153,000 the consuls retained $120,000. They did not turn in the full amount, but only retained $120,000.

I have no doubt my colleague will persist in his opinion, but I merely wish the House to understand the method the committee have pursued and the manner in which the estimates have been made at the Department of State, and the basis upon which my tables printed in the RECORD rests.

My colleague is mistaken in taking a table which shows the amount received by virtue of fees alone, and does not take into consideration the agencies which contribute to the amounts consuls retain.

Mr. HOLMAN. What per cent. do those above a thousand dollars get?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McCREARY. It is so clear to my mind I will not say more. I insist upon my point of order as to Pernambuco. Three thousand dollars is appropriated in the bill when the law only authorizes $2,000.

Mr. BELMONT. In view of the lateness of the hour I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, had according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10396) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

On motion of Mr. MILLARD, by unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. 10731) for the erection of a public building in the city of Binghamton, N. Y.; which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, in the city of Binghamton, in the State of New York, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, internal-revenue offices, and United States courts, and for other Government uses. The site and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $150,000; and the site purchased shall have the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys; and for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to said site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of New York shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

The report (by Mr. WILKINS) was read as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred House bill 10731, beg leave to submit the following report:

Binghamton, N. Y., is the county seat of Broome County, and is a rapidly growing and prosperous city. The census of 1880 showed the population to be 17,315. The census taken in the latter part of 1885 or the first of 1886 showed the population to be between 22,000 and 23,000. Its present population is fully 25,000. The city is situated at the mouth of the Chenango and Susquehanna Rivers, midway between New York city and Buffalo, a distance of 482 miles. Binghamton is the center of several railroads. The railroads entering the city are the New York, Lake Erie and Western; the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, which is a competing line with the Erie from New York city to the West; the Albany and Susquehanna; the Syracuse and Binghamton; and the Chenango Valley Railroad. The city has many large manufacturing industries, comprising almost every variety of production, including large iron and steel works, the manufacture of engines and boilers, boots and shoes, cigars, agricultural implements, &c.

More than 90,000,000 cigars were manufactured in 1886, and between 3,000 and 4,000 men and women are employed in this one industry. The Government is compelled to rent inadequate quarters for its post-office and internal-revenue offices. The lease for the present post-office is a ten-year lease, which will expire one year from the 1st of next October. The office employs 10 clerks and 8 letter-carriers. The present quarters are entirely too small, and no other building at all suitable for the purpose can be obtained. Suitable accommodations for the office will require the payment of an annual rent of not less than $2,000 or $2,500. The receipts of the post-office last year were $46,984.23, nearly $12,000 more than the receipts of the post-office at the city of Auburn. During the year 1886 the carriers handled more than 2,500,000 pieces of mail.

The United States revenue offices of the seventh division of the twenty-first district are located at Binghamton. This division consists of the counties of Broome, Chenango, Delaware, Otsego, and Tioga. The total collections of revenue for the year 1885 in this division were $252,819.23; for the year 1886, $310,-254.40, of which sum $266,979.17 was collected at Binghamton. A bill passed the House at the last session establishing a United States court at Binghamton. The general term of the supreme court of the sixth judicial district, comprising ten counties in the southern and central part of the State, has been held at Binghamton for many years. Its law library, consisting of many thousand volumes, including the State and United States reports, is located at Binghamton.

From the annual report of the Postmaster-General, showing the receipts of more than seventy-five post-offices where there are Government buildings, it appears that the annual postal revenue of nearly one-half of these offices is less than that of the post-office at Binghamton. The importance of the city, its rapid growth and prosperity, the accommodation of the post-office and United States internal-revenue offices, all require the erection of a suitable Government building at Binghamton.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. No. 10731, which accompanies this report.

The SPEAKER. There is a clerical error which should be corrected. "Have" should be "leave."

There was no objection, and the correction was made.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me the amount in the bill is large considering no court is held there.

Mr. MILLARD. The House has passed a bill establishing a court.

Mr. HISCOCK. And one of the reasons why a court is not held there is because there is no accommodation. The court now has power to assign a term for that place.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had appointed Mr. SAWYER (in place of Mr. CHACE, excused) as a member of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate upon the bill (H. R. 8346) authorizing the employment of mail messengers in the postal service.

Mr. WILLIS. I have a privileged motion I desire to submit.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to call up the notice which I gave on yesterday with reference to the bill (S. 194) to aid in establishment and temporary support of common schools, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. That will be done.

Mr. ELY. I ask unanimous consent———

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, and the Chair will proceed to execute the order of the House.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2929) to amend the act dividing the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and to divide the eastern and the western districts thereof into divisions, establishing district and circuit courts of the United States therein, &c.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BURNES, Mr. CULBERSON, and Mr. WADE.

MRS. M. E. WOODS.

The SPEAKER announced as managers on the part of the House at a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 2997) granting a pension to Mrs. M. E. Woods, Mr. LOVERING, Mr. PINDAR, and Mr. CONGER.

ALLEGED OUTRAGES IN TEXAS.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3286) to increase the naval establishment.

Mr. HOAR. The resolution offered by me yesterday, which went over, should first be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Pennsylvania, but the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday, which comes over under objection, is in order and takes precedence. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or the subcommittee of said committee who were authorized to inquire into certain alleged transactions in the State of Texas, be further authorized and directed, with the powers heretofore conferred upon them, to inquire whether there has been any attempt by the United States district attorney for the western district of Texas, or by the marshal of said district, or any of his deputies, to interfere with or obstruct said investigation, or to obstruct or intimidate witnesses for whom subpœnas have been issued by the authority of the Senate to appear before said committee and to report the facts and what action ought to be taken by the Senate in the premises.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COKE. I propose an amendment to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That before said investigation commences said officers shall have notice of the same, and the right to have witnesses summoned in their defense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose there is no doubt that any committee of the Senate authorized to investigate a question affecting an individual would give that individual notice of the same, and an opportunity to summon witnesses if they were needed. It seems to me such an amendment is almost an affront to a committee. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. COKE. I am not opposed to the investigation proposed in the resolution, although I can say to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senate that the information upon which it is based is absolutely false.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will permit me to state that it is in part a telegram from the district attorney himself sent to the Attorney-General.

Mr. COKE. I have no objection to the investigation, but I do desire, in justice to the parties to be investigated, that they shall be notified of it and have an opportunity to summon witnesses in their defense, as is provided in the amendment which I have offered.

The simple truth of this matter is that on last Monday week the first Federal grand jury that has been convened in that judicial district, since the alleged disturbance in Washington County, met, and the district attorney and the court determined to investigate the charges that had been made in the public press. Out of some twenty-five witnesses summoned for the prosecution here it happened that five were taken to Austin by legal process to testify before the grand jury. They left Brenham in the morning and reached Austin, and the district attorney and the court were apprised there of the fact that they had been summoned to Washington. They were immediately discharged and returned that evening to Brenham, and are now here.

That is the whole of it. That is the basis of this resolution. It is extremely unjust, Mr. President, to these gentlemen to be thus arraigned before the Senate of the United States, and it is at least as little as ought to be granted that they should have process for witnesses in their defense and that they should have notice of this investigation.

I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. The marshal who summoned these witnesses reports that after they were summoned to appear before the Senate committee they were summoned by a United States officer to appear at Austin, Tex., before the grand jury, some two months having expired since these alleged outrages and no action having been taken, although the district attorney was informed of them within a few days by an express complaint. The marshal who summoned them applied to the deputy of our Sergeant-at-Arms to find out the names of the other witnesses he was going to summon. Those persons then having been summoned, and saying that they were under a prior obligation to appear before the Senate committee, that officer seized them and took them to Austin—arrested them, as I am instructed. The witnesses who had reached Washington were summoned here to go to Texas forthwith—two of them, the petitioners.

Day before yesterday the Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Garland, inclosed to me for my information a telegram from the district attorney desiring him to have the witnesses who were summoned here held to appear in Texas. That may have been perfectly legitimate and proper and well intentioned, but it looks on its face like an attempt to intimidate and frighten these gentlemen. At any rate, that is the information which I have, and it is impossible for me to believe that the Senator from Texas is right when he thinks it is false, especially as the Senator thought the information on which the original resolution was based to be false.

But, Mr. President, no committee of which I am a member, or of which any member of this body is a member, on either side, in my judgment, would even make an investigation as to the personal conduct of anybody without giving the person accused notice and an opportunity to bring evidence in his defense, and to attach such a proviso as this to a resolution was never heard of before.

I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. MAXEY. I know it is not debatable, but I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. HOAR. Of course I will withhold the motion if the Senator from Texas desires to speak.

Mr. MAXEY. The officers complained of in the resolution, the United States attorney and the marshal, are esteemed in the State of Texas to be worthy and upright men. I believe them to be so. I never heard of a charge against either of those men, political or personal, until now, and these charges are, in my judgment, without the slightest foundation in fact. I court a thorough investigation. All I want is that these gentlemen have reasonable notice of the nature and character of the charges, so as to prepare their defense.

I believe it important, and in accordance with the principles of eternal justice, that the amendment offered by my colleague should be adopted. The Senator from Massachusetts does not gainsay the proposition that these gentlemen should be informed of the charge whereof they stand accused to the end that they may prepare themselves to meet the charge; but he insists that the committee will not refuse to give this notice, and that therefore the amendment of my colleague is not necessary.

Mr. President, when a grave charge has been brought against a public officer in the Senate of the United States that officer has a right to the necessary process that he may be enabled to defend his character. He has a right upon every principle of justice and every principle of law, biblical law, common law, civil law, and every other law, to be heard.

All that my colleague asks is that the other side shall be heard. We have the ex parte statement of self-constituted accusers, but we have not heard what these gentlemen have to say. I venture to assert that when they have the opportunity of meeting these charges they will come out without a stain upon their character. I, therefore, think the amendment offered by my colleague ought to be adopted.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts further withdraw his motion to lay the amendment on the table?

Mr. HOAR. I wish to send up two telegrams to be read, and then I will withdraw it so as to allow the Senator from Texas to proceed.

Mr. COKE. The amendment is necessary, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to allow the telegrams which have been sent to the desk to be read?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegrams will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, February 14, 1887.

SIR: The Attorney-General directs me to send you for your information the accompanying copy of a telegram just received from Mr. Kleberg, attorney of the United States for the western district of Texas, in relation to the Washington County outrages.

Very respectfully,

CECIL CLAY, Chief Clerk.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR,
Chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections,
United States Senate.

[Telegram.]

AUSTIN, TEX., February 14, 1887.

Have chairman committee on Washington County outrages wire me names of important Government witnesses who refuse to return to Texas, and hold them until subpœnaed.

RUD. KLEBERG,
United States Attorney.

Hon. A. H. GARLAND,
Attorney-General United States, Washington, D. C.

Mr. COKE. That telegram was sent by the district attorney for the purpose of compelling the attendance of all the witnesses who are here before the grand jury at Austin. It is an act of duty on the part of the district attorney which he is performing actively and energetically, and yet it is made here a ground of complaint against him.

Now, sir, the reason why I offered the amendment and why in my judgment it ought to be adopted is that the Committee on Privileges and Elections are already examining witnesses with reference to the alleged outrages in Washington County, Texas. Those witnesses should not be examined as to the charges contained in the resolution until the parties have been notified and have had an opportunity to have witnesses summoned in their defense. It is to prevent that, and to give to these gentlemen an opportunity to defend themselves, that I offered the amendment.

So far as Mr. Rankin, the marshal, and Mr. Kleberg, the district attorney, are concerned there are no better men in Texas or in Massachusetts than they are. They are as far from trying to intimidate witnesses or to obstruct the Senate in its investigation as the Senator from Massachusetts would be.

I have no objection to the proposed investigation into the conduct of these gentlemen. I know that they are right and have done right. I know that nothing can be brought against them. I do claim, however, Mr. President, that the Senate should adopt the amendment that I have proposed in order that the justice may be done them of allowing a defense against the charges before they are investigated and reported to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator now observes that he moves this amendment in order to prevent the Committee on Privileges and Elections or their subcommittee from committing a gross injustice by condemning a man without a hearing. No such order by the Senate in advance to a committee, not to do a great injustice, was ever heard of in practice.

Whether this be, as it seems to me, an attempt to intimidate these witnesses from testifying by holding out to them such penalties as that community I am afraid know too well how to inflict upon people, or whether it be in the course of duty, the committee will ascertain after hearing the parties.

I renew my motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. COKE. The resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts makes new parties to an investigation already proceeding. The object of my amendment is to prevent any investigation under the resolution now proceeding before the Committee on Privileges and Elections until the gentlemen have had an opportunity to be notified and to produce their witnesses.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. EUSTIS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he strike out the following words from the resolution:

Or the subcommittee of said committee.

The subcommittee investigating the subject of outrages in Texas will have a great number of witnesses to examine. This matter is entirely different; it affects the official conduct of United States officers, and I do not think that additional duty ought to be imposed upon the subcommittee. We ought not to be called upon to investigate everything that is occurring or that has occurred in Texas.

Mr. HOAR. The committee may make changes in the subcommittee from time to time as may be convenient.

Mr. EUSTIS. This is a suggestion by a vote of the Senate that the subcommittee now acting shall take up this matter.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, he will see, I think, that there is nothing in his suggestion. Under the original resolution of the Senate any subcommittee that the committee appoint are armed with the power of the full committee, so that it may not be necessary when you are merely taking testimony that the whole nine should be present. That subcommittee may be changed from time to time. If the Senator from Louisiana should happen to be called away he could call in the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] or some other member to act upon the subcommittee. The resolution simply uses this language in order that it may not compel the whole nine to be constantly present. It is the usual form of the Senate in ordering such investigations.

Mr. EUSTIS. I understand that the committee can appoint a subcommittee; of course it has the power to do that. But if the resolution is adopted as it is worded, the subcommittee now in existence may be called upon to go into this investigation at once and so confuse the investigation which is now pending with the one which is proposed, whereas they ought to be, in my judgment, entirely distinct.

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt the committee will so treat the subject.

Mr. EUSTIS. Therefore the objection made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] would be obviated in that sense, and the subcommittee now in existence would not have the power to at once engage in the investigation in regard to these Federal officials.

Mr. HOAR. I adhere to my motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas lie on the table.

Mr. COKE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] who is temporarily out of the Chamber. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). As was stated by the Senator from Indiana, my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas], is paired with him. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when the name of Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] on this question.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and therefore withdraw my vote. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 22; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3286) to increase the naval establishment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to allow me to call up——

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator from Florida will wait a few minutes I will give way, but I prefer to have the bill started and get it under way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now under consideration, and the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. STANFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON. I will say the same to the Senator from California. I ask him to wait a few minutes until we get the bill fairly started.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California addresses the Chair.

CO-OPERATION IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. STANFORD. I ask that the bill (S. 3022) to encourage co-operation and to provide for the formation of associations in the District of Columbia for the purpose of conducting any lawful business and dividing the profits among the members thereof be taken from the table with a view to its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. STANFORD. Mr. President, the bill which I have introduced (S. 3022) provides for the association and organization of individuals with or without capital. It gives no exclusive privileges, and is intended only to aid the natural right of association.

In a large sense, civilization itself rests and advances on the great principles of co-operation. The industries, the thoughts, the great ideas which produce vast and beneficial results, find their full development in association. Thus the discoveries in art and in science are distributed or availed of; and they inure to the benefit of the whole community—often to the whole civilized world.

So the organization of individuals for a common purpose gives the strength, the capacity, of the ablest to all in the association. The weakest, and the one of the least capacity, is brought up in advantages to the level of the best. The result of this association is to bring the individuals of the association closer to the entire fruits of their united industries. With a greater intelligence, and with a better understanding of the principles of co-operation, the adoption of them in practice will, in time, I imagine, cause most of the industries of the country to be carried on by these co-operative associations. The co-operation of individuals in kindred pursuits would have the effect of furnishing, from their variety of labor, continuous employment. Thus a combination of men could even do farming—rendering for hire their services to the farmers—and might find that continuity of labor so important to the laborer and conducive to the maximum power of production which arises from constant employment.

A country's prosperity must always mainly depend upon its power of production. This is to be brought about by the most intelligent direction and application of labor. Abundant illustrations might be given to show that the value of the labor of an individual, like the wealth of the country, will depend upon the power of production. The most notable example of this is to be found in the production of wheat in Egypt, in India, and in America. Wheat is raised in all these countries to compete in the same market—England. The compensation to the laborer on the banks of the Nile is a red radish; in India, about five cents a day. In my own State, California, the harvester receives $2.00 per day—forty times as much as his competitor receives in India. Now, these comparatively high wages could not be paid except upon a comparatively large production. The man in California receives forty times as much for a day's labor as a man in India; or the wages of one man in California equal those of forty men in India. And yet he competes successfully because he avails himself of the genius of inventors—cuts and threshes and puts into a sack a hundred pounds of wheat for a cent and a half.

And so in every other field of labor the compensation will always be in proportion to the production. The earth yields abundantly, through labor, to supply the wants of mankind. Her yield of supplies for the necessaries, the comforts, the elegancies, and the splendors of life are only measured by the amount of intelligent labor that is applied to the cultivation of the soil, to the working of mines, of quarries, and of forests and their products; and if there is want among the provident and industrious it must be for the lack of the intelligent direction and application of labor. How far these wants may be supplied by legislation is a problem; but I believe much aid may be given.

In the history of nations, want of the commonest necessaries has been the rule. Hitherto governments have been founded in force, maintained in force, and the principal thought has been to increase the force, or to so organize it as to preserve the government. Hence the large standing armies of Europe to-day. The theory of our Government is that it was instituted for the benefit of the people; that there are inalienable rights—rights which are superior to constitutions and laws, securing the individual in his rights of liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness, even to the extent of commanding the support of every other citizen in the whole country. These great principles, securing the freedom and the rights of the individual, insure to us forever a free government so long as the intelligence of the people is adequate in appreciating the principles upon which their government is founded. Hence we need no great standing armies to overawe and menace the people; and our time and thoughts can be directed to their general development and to improvement in their condition.

It is in the hope of strengthening and developing the intelligence and the productive power of the individual without capital, or with but little, that I have introduced this bill, believing it to be one great step toward attaining the highest possibility of abundance of the necessaries and comforts of life for every industrious and provident individual.

I believe that co-operation will bring out the highest capacities of those engaged in it. It will impart to each individual the stimulus of knowing that he or she may enjoy the full fruits of his or her skill and energy in their calling. In those countries where there is the most intelligence there is the greatest use made of labor-aiding machinery; and where this labor-aiding machinery is used most, as in our own country, there the compensation of the laborer is the largest. Even in Europe those countries that make most use of labor-aiding machinery have the best compensation for their labor.

Occasionally there is evidence of apprehension that labor-aiding machinery may deprive the laborer of the demand for his services; but any apprehension of that kind must readily disappear with the reflection that the wants of humanity are as boundless as the intelligence and capacity to conceive. With the ignorance of the Digger Indian there are few wants; no intelligence to conceive, and the demand for the labor supply of others is of the most limited kind. The more intelligent the people the greater are their wants, and with those increased wants the greater the demand for labor; and, in the universality of labor, the greater the capacity of individuals and communities to make exchange of their productions.

I have the hope and the faith that the principles of our Government, of our great bill of rights, as set forth in the Declaration of Independence, will yet pervade the whole civilized world; and as these ideas are adopted, and as they expand into the control of governments, so will disappear great standing armies; non-producers will be changed into fruitful producers, adding to the comforts and happiness of humanity. Then the principal attention of the governments will be directed toward developing the arts of peace and making humanity more happy.

In proposing the passage of a law of this kind, there is in it only an extension to persons without capital of the provisions that have existed heretofore in the laws provided for the association of those with capital. There is no invasion of the principles of association which have, happily, done so much in the development of the resources of our country and proved such a stimulus to its industry.

The principle of co-operation of individuals is a most democratic one. It enables the requisite combination of numbers and capital to engage in and develop every enterprise of promise, however large. It is the absolute protection of the people against the possible monopoly of the few, and renders offensive monopoly, and a burdensome one, impossible. The only possible monopoly with these laws in existence is one of beneficence, and to the extent that the wants and conditions of the people can be better supplied than by any other means. So far, only, can there be a monopoly in our country under these laws of co-operation.

One of the great advantages of association of this kind is that in case of disagreement, death, or failure of individuals, the organization goes on; and in this respect it is freed from the disadvantages of an ordinary partnership. Besides, the diverse capacities of the different individuals, whatever they may be, unite to make up a great whole of strength and of large capacity.

One of the difficulties in the employment of women arises from their domestic duties; but co-operation would provide for a general utilization of their capacities and permit the prosecution of their business without harm, because of the temporary incapacity of the individual to prosecute her calling. And if this co operation shall relieve them of the temporary incapacity arising from the duties incident to motherhood, then their capacity for production may be utilized to the greatest extent.

Very many of the industries would be open to and managed as well by women in their co-operative capacity as by men. The moral influences of co-operation are very great. All in the organization are interested in the welfare and good conduct of every other member. All the good influences of the whole are brought to bear in favor of the individual, and all the individual members unite to make the whole most powerful for the accomplishment of results.

Mr. President, I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 3286) to increase the naval establishment is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, there is not, to-day, one single seaport from Portland, Me., to Brazos Santiago, from Sitka to San Diego, defensible. There is absolute necessity, in my judgment, for the defense of our seaports.

I am not only in favor of building naval vessels adapted to the defense of our seaports as well as for war on the high seas, but for the establishment of seacoast batteries, for torpedoes, for every instrumentality necessary to place every seaport in the United States in a defensible condition.

I know this will cost money, and much of it; but if there be any truth on earth in the old maxim "in time of peace prepare for war," we are in a condition now to apply that maxim and to place our seaboard in comparative safety against the attack of any nation of the earth in the event of war.

We have an overflowing Treasury; all efforts to stop the inflow by tax reduction have so far proven futile, and we are asked to waste money day after day in useless expenditures—monuments, statues, every conceivable thing in which money can be thrown away. We have got in the habit of throwing it away to get it out of the Treasury and into circulation among the people. It is but a few days ago that we voted 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands in the State of California that have been accumulating there ever since that State was admitted into the Union, which has no more right to that amount than have all the rest of the States of the Union, because the land belonged to the United States, all the States having like interest.

In every way that can be conceived of we are wasting money. Here is a purpose, a wise purpose, a purpose to defend this country from any attacks that may be made from any quarter whatever, and the amount is not appalling to me. Wasteful, useless extravagance is appalling to me, and ought to be to every one, but money, however great the amount, wisely and economically expended in providing for the common defense has no terrors for me.

Mr. President, the great trouble with some public men is that they ask the question of themselves, not is the measure right, but will it be popular? The question for us to-day is, Is it right to place the seaports of the United States in a defensible condition? We can get up an army in sixty days without any difficulty with the splendid volunteer companies we have all over the country. We have an intelligent and enlightened people, and there is no difficulty whatever in improvising armies on short notice, but you can not improvise ships on short notice, you can not erect the necessary fortifications and batteries on the seacoast on short notice.

These things require time; and now with an overflowing Treasury, when there is a necessity for getting the surplus money in the Treasury out into circulation among the people for wise purposes, and when tax reduction is successfully resisted, there never was a better time, in my judgment, to begin the establishment of a navy.

What nation ever became a first-class power without a navy? It is true that by unwise laws, which appear to be impregnably fortified on the statute books, the merchant marine of this country has been driven from the high seas, and that there is but little necessity for the protection of the merchant marine by a navy because of this fact; but it is to be hoped that the time will come when the American flag will again float over American ships, and then there will be a need for a navy to protect that commerce upon the high seas. Sooner or later the eyes of the people will be opened, the scales will fall from their eyes, and protection will be a thing of the past; and when that happy day comes, and navigation laws enacted abreast with the spirit of the age, the American merchant will come back and come to stay.

But there is now a present pressing and immediate necessity for seacoast-defense, for a torpedo system, and for naval vessels which can act in concert with them for the protection of our seaports.

Is it for the defense of the dwellers on the seacoasts alone that I speak thus? At every seaport in the country is the wealth not only of the seaboard but of all that vast country back of it. The cotton of Texas, the wheat of the West, the grain of the West and Southwest, the wool, the pork, the beef, all these find their way to the seaboard, and there they are exposed to attack, in warehouses near the wharves, in the situation most exposed to attack, and in the event of an attack by a foreign foe upon our seaports, not only does the wealth of the cities themselves go down but also the accumulated products of the interior States. It is humiliating that a great country like this, which holds herself not only abreast of but the foremost of the nations of the earth, should be subjected to the risk of the destruction of her principal cities by a third-class power, because they have a navy and we have none.

I shall, therefore, vote for the measure, and vote for it with great pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALDRICH in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer another amendment. In lines 9 and 10 of section 1, to strike out the words "before either of said cruisers shall be accepted by the Government;" so as to read:

That the President is hereby authorized to have constructed, by contract, ten protected steel cruisers, with such armament for each as the Navy Department may deem suitable, each of said vessels to have a maximum speed of not less than 20 knots over the measured mile, such speed to be exhibited under such test or tests and conditions as the Navy Department may impose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend, after line 14 of section 1, by inserting:

to be available during five years from March 4, 1887.

So as to read:

The cost of all said cruisers, in the aggregate, complete, exclusive of armament, shall not be more than $15,000,000, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available during five years from March 4, 1887.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I offer the same amendment in section 4, to add to it:

To be available during five years from March 4, 1887.

So as to read:

SEC. 4. That for the armament of the vessels hereinbefore provided for the sum of $4,800,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available for five years from March 4, 1887.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. VEST. Is that the bill of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. No; when this bill is finished I propose to take up the other bill covering the other branch of the subject.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I should like to inquire the condition of the bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania reported the bill which is now under consideration. The Senator from Maine amended it by making reductions of so much for every quarter knot under 20 knots, and there is no limit down to 15, 16, or 17 knots an hour. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] said he desired 19 knots an hour, but I understand the bill as now perfected by the amendments fixes no limit as to the number of knots per hour.

Mr. CAMERON. Except the penalty. That is the only limit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

KANAWHA AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. KENNA submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2646) granting to the Ohio Central Railroad Company the right to lay its track through United States lock and dam property in the great Kanawha Valley, State of West Virginia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In line 2 of the Senate amendment, after the word "shall," insert the following: "If the Secretary of War, in his discretion, require it;" and the Senate agree to the same.

O. D. CONGER,
JOHN E. KENNA,
WARNER MILLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
TIMOTHY E. TARSNEY,
CHARLES F. CRISP,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 3288.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3288) to provide for the increase of the naval establishment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That for the purpose of increasing the naval establishment of the United States, the sums of money hereinafter named are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the President, in the exercise of his discretion, upon plans and specifications to be furnished by the Navy Department.

For the construction of heavily armored vessels or armored floating batteries or rams, to be used for coast and harbor defense, $10,000,000.

For the construction of light-draught gunboats, suitable for interior water ways and canal service, $1,200,000; said gunboats to be completed and tested within twelve months from the date of the signing of any contract for their construction.

For the construction of torpedo-boats of the highest attainable speed and efficiency, $600,000; said torpedo-boats to be completed and tested within twelve months from the signing of any contract for their construction.

For torpedoes and torpedo appliances, to be operated from naval vessels, floating batteries, or rams, $600,000.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. That for the armament of the vessels hereinbefore provided for the sum of $3,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. To follow out the action of the Senate on the other bill just passed, I offer the following amendment as a new section:

SEC. 3. That the material used in all the naval structures provided for in this bill, and the armament for the same, shall be furnished and manufactured in the United States, and all contracts made for their construction shall be under the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled "An act to increase the naval establishment."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the same amendment I offered to the other bill.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa submits an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. HALE. Let it be as a new section covering the whole bill.

Mr. ALLISON. It is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section to the bill:

SEC. —. That the appropriations made by this act shall be available during five years from March 4, 1887.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend in line 9 of section 1, after the word "vessels," by inserting the words "for sea-service;" so as to read:

For the construction of heavily armored vessels for sea-service or armored floating batteries or rams, to be used for coast and harbor defense, ten millions of dollars.

Mr. HALE. I can not consent to that. I see what the Senator is seeking to accomplish. While I might favor by itself a measure such as he seeks to accomplish, it is not incorporated in this bill.

The essential feature of the large appropriation in this bill is for coast defense, for armored vessels, or for batteries or rams or torpedo-boats, and I do not propose that the Secretary of the Navy shall go to work constructing the great heavily armored ships that cost from five to eight million dollars. I want him limited to such vessels and other structures as can be used for harbor defense. Under this bill any vessel or any other structure may be made that can be used from one harbor to another, but I am not willing to change the purpose of this bill by leaving it in such a way that the entire appropriation might be exhausted for one or two great ships to go to sea. That is why I oppose the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, we have heard so much about coast defenses and defenses for the harbors that it seems to me the Senate and Congress of the United States are in danger of going too far on that subject. I am willing to go as far as any Senator on this floor to provide the necessary defenses for the harbors of our coast, but I do submit to my friend from Maine and to the Senate that the Government of the United States would be put in a very awkward predicament if in case of trouble we should be confronted by a large and powerful navy of armored war-ships owned by a foreign government.

It is very well to have the fast cruisers we have provided for; it is very well to have a certain number of rams, or floating-batteries, or monitors, or torpedoes, or destroyers, or whatever you choose to call them, for coast defense; but this Government certainly is not going to leave itself in a position simply to defend its coast without any power whatever of meeting an enemy on the high seas. That is exactly the condition in which this bill and the bill we have just passed leave us.

I agree entirely with Admiral Porter, Admiral Rodgers, and other distinguished officers of the Navy that the Government ought to have perhaps seventy or eighty thousand tons of vessels of the class we have provided for in the bill we have just passed; but I am certainly misinformed if those gentlemen are not equally anxious that the Navy should be provided with from six to a dozen heavily armored war-ships of the most improved plan.

I know perfectly well that it has been said that a great many of the ships built by England, and Italy, and France, and Germany, and Russia have become obsolete, but it seems to me that this Government ought to be up to the position taken by foreign governments in the construction of naval vessels.

For myself, I do not attach so much importance to what is commonly called sea-coast defense. It has been stated again and again that we must expend $200,000,000 for the erection of permanent forts of steel or of masonry. Why, sir, the experience in the last civil war demonstrated beyond peradventure that there is not a harbor, or an inlet, or a creek, or a bay on any coast of the United States that can not be reasonably protected within thirty days after the troops are posted there. We are talking about building permanent fortifications and rams and floating batteries, without a single gun to put on them. There is not a gun to-day in the possession of the Government of the United States that any ordnance officer would advise to be erected upon any fort that might be built, unless it be one of those which have been recently built in the navy-yard at Washington. I undertake to say with some little experience, not in the fabrication of guns but in the use of them, that they can manufacture as good cannon in the navy-yard here as can be made in the world; and I believe that the 10, 8, and 6 inch guns that are being made there now, and some of them completed, will compare favorably with those of any other nation on the face of the earth. I would prefer, if I had my way, that a large sum of money, much larger even than that we have provided for, should be appropriated for the fabrication of improved artillery.

The coast defenses will take care of themselves, and any officer can erect earthworks upon any of the harbors except, perhaps, the Narrows of New York and some other places, within thirty days, certainly within two months, erect forts practically impregnable to the highest-power guns known to mankind. The experience in the last war demonstrates and proves that. There was Fort Sumter, that was practically untenable long before it was knocked down. There was Battery Weitzel, and there were other outworks on the seacoast of my State that were actually strengthened by bombardment. I am, therefore, opposed to appropriating so much money for what are called sea-coast defenses, and not one dollar for the building of ships of war to go upon the high seas to meet an enemy wherever he may present himself.

Mr. President, what would be thought of a general charged with the conduct of military operations who would fortify himself, without any preparation to mobilize his forces to meet an enemy in the field? That is practically what is proposed here. An adversary with whom we may have trouble is going to do exactly the opposite of what we designate. One of the first principles of naval warfare and tactics is to do exactly the opposite of what your enemy wants you to do. If a fleet were present off the coast of New York, or of Delaware, or of South Carolina, we have not a vessel to go 10 miles from the shore to meet him. We have already provided for the completion, I believe, of four monitors; we have provided for the building of quite a number of fast cruisers, and I am quite willing that a certain proportion of this money shall be appropriated to building floating batteries or rams or armored vessels for coast defense exclusively; but I do insist that whilst we are preparing to build a navy we ought at least to make some provision of war vessels, strictly speaking, to operate upon the high seas.

Mr. President, as I have stated, we have made reasonably fair progress in the building of what are known as cruisers to run down an enemy's commerce. I confess that that is not a very high order of naval warfare, rather a kind of bushwhacking arrangement. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] stated yesterday that we should prepare this cavalry of the seas. A government would be in a bad condition that had nothing but cavalry to go on the high seas. The general would be in a bad way on land that had nothing but cavalry with which to meet his enemy. Hence it is that I have offered this amendment, leaving it distinctly with the President and the Secretary of the Navy to appropriate a part of this money in the building of the most improved war ships that modern science has invented, and we shall never have a navy until we do it.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] suggests that this would involve an increase of the appropriation. I am quite willing to do it; I am willing to double it for that purpose. But we can never have a navy worthy of the name, in my opinion, until we have prepared not less than ten of the very best war ships that modern science and modern talent and modern methods have suggested.

I want, while we are preparing ourselves for the future, to do so upon a basis which will at least command the respect of the civilized nations of the earth. The mere erection of floating batteries is not enough, and about them I confess very frankly I have not a very high opinion, because they, too, were tested in the late war, and were not found to be very efficient even for seacoast defense. Rams served a certain purpose; the monitors served a certain purpose; but in discussing any future naval controversy that we may have it will not be safe to compare this Government in that controversy with the controversy that the United States Government had with the seceding States. The navy then was improvised, and in the then situation and condition of things it was a very strong one; but it must not be forgotten that the confederate government not only had no ships, but had no facilities or means for procuring or providing them, and therefore a wooden gunboat or a wooden frigate or a wooden steamship was about as good, practically, as an improved ironclad; but when we come in conflict with any of the great nations of the world with the improvements in naval construction, we shall find a very different condition of things.

I saw at Newport two years ago the best ships of the American Navy, seven of them; and whilst there one of the British ships of war, the Southampton, I think, came into the port. The committee of which I was a member inspected her from top to bottom, and I was informed by the admiral that that was only one of the second-class war ships of Great Britain; and yet, sir, that admiral would have wanted just about one hour to place himself in position in the open sea to sink every ship that the American Navy had there. We at least ought to have some vessels that would bear a fair comparison with the second-class ships of Great Britain.

Whilst I am in favor of this bill, I submit that my amendment ought to be adopted, because under it the Secretary of the Navy might be justified and authorized in expending a part of this money in building at least one of the best war ships that can be built in this country.

Mr. COKE. How long is the life of an iron or a steel-clad ship?

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose that the life of an iron or steel-clad ship would depend very much upon circumstances. I am not prepared now to state definitely how long the oldest of the ironclads of Great Britain have been in existence, but if a wooden ship would last as long as some of the wooden ships of the American Navy have lasted, I do not see why an iron ship should not live quite as long.

Mr. FRYE. A wooden ship outlasts an iron ship.

Mr. BUTLER. I am advised by Senators who are better informed than I am that a wooden ship would outlast an iron ship. I am not prepared to answer definitely what is the life of an iron ship, because it is comparatively a modern invention. I suppose it is impossible to determine as yet; certainly the iron vessels have not worn out so far.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina desires that the United States shall have as a part of its naval establishment a fleet of great armored ships, such as certain European powers have spent in the last fifteen years hundreds of millions of dollars for.

The history of the building and the trial and the use of these great, enormous naval ships is a most interesting history to read; it is a history of experiment; it is a history of lavish expenditure; it is a history of scores of vessels being built, tested, and tried, and abandoned as useless. The monitor pattern was tried, and exhausted millions upon millions of dollars. The entire belted ship was tried; the partially belted ship was tried; armor from 8 inches to 16 inches, and even greater, has been tried; and while this has been going on from time to time and this money has been expended the United States has waited and watched these experiments and saved its money. Undoubtedly to-day England and France and Italy and Germany and Russia, and Spain to some extent, have these great modern ships, such as the Senator from South Carolina desires, better than any they have produced heretofore, and very efficient ships. If the world shall ever see a great naval conflict that shall in its proportions and in its influences bear some relation to the great naval battles of the years past—to the Nile, Trafalgar, and other great sea fights—these vessels undoubtedly will be found the most efficient, the most destructive, the most death-dealing; and I do not say that in a proper place, upon a bill covering such a feature as the Senator from South Carolina desires, I would not support a proposition to build perhaps half a dozen such ships as he wants; but half a dozen such ships as the Senator desires, which shall put our navy in what he terms a respectable attitude compared with other great powers, would cost from thirty to fifty million dollars. These great structures have cost and are costing from five to eight million dollars each.

Already in the bill passed by Congress last year, which is now the law of the land, we have provided for the building of two heavily armed ships, and the Secretary of the Navy has that authority and to the extent of the limitations fixed in the act of Congress of August 3, 1886, he may go on and try and build such structures as these.

Mr. BUTLER. May I interrupt my friend for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it at all certain that the experiments which this bill contemplates in the way of floating batteries, rams, and armored vessels for coast defense, may not turn out to be ineffectual in the progress of science and the improvement of naval construction; and if his argument is good in regard to the larger war ships, it ought to be equally good as applicable to the very ships he provides for in the bill.

Mr. HALE. I was coming directly to that.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will permit me a moment further, I wish to put the question to him, and to all Senators who think as he does, whether it is not to be regarded as rather a humiliating position for the Government of the United States, one of the great nations of the earth, to depend upon the experience or the experiments of other nations for information in the construction of war ships. I submit that this Government is just as able, just as well qualified, just as competent, just as much in duty to its citizens bound to expend a reasonable amount of money by way of experiment, because as he stated awhile ago there is no doubt about the fact that some of these large ships have been found to be ineffectual. I want, for one, to put this Government upon terms of equality, at least, with the other nations of the earth, if we are going into the matter of building a navy, or to abandon the effort. I therefore would like to submit the question to the Senator from Maine, if he does not concur in the opinion that this Government ought to spend a reasonable amount of money by way of experiment.

Mr. HALE. I am first for security, safety, defense at home. After that has been secured, as I have said, I may be willing to join the Senator in favoring measures that shall build up for the United States some of these great heavily armored, plated ships. As I said before, the bill of last year provides for two of them, and the Secretary of the Navy has gone to work upon them, and in time we shall have those two. At the proper time we may add to that number and expend the money and so put ourselves on some equality with the other nations of the world in reference to our naval armament.

But the distinctive feature of this bill is the protection and defense of our great cities, our coast-line, the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific; and the structures provided for in this bill, I may say in answer to one of the questions urged by the Senator from South Carolina, do not involve the risk of spending money for nothing, that is involved in the more elaborate structures that he desires. These are more simple; the laws and rules applicable to them are better understood. A floating battery armed with heavy guns and enabled by its machinery to attain a high rate of speed, lying low in the water, is a simple construction that may be made this year as well as another year, and will cost very little money compared with the great ships that the Senator from South Carolina desires.

There is another feature in this bill. I do not profess any great knowledge on this subject. Indeed, I think investigation into this subject tends to teach a man that he really does not know very much about it. There is not much knowledge that can be demonstrated in it. But I have great faith in another feature that is in this bill for harbor defense, and that is the ram; somebody has called the ram a fort built on the ocean. It is simple in its construction. It is inexpensive. You need propulsion, power; and when you drive against any ship, I do not care what it is, of the best of the navies of the Old World, when you drive the prow of the ram into that ship you sink that ship. A ram is not exposed largely. She cannot be reached. She drives out day or night unnoticed, and if she strikes the hostile force she sinks it. Her construction is cheap. I know that certain minds of the country that have turned their attention largely to this subject, some very bright and intelligent men who have been studying and making experiments, believe that for harbor defense the ram is the best that is provided for in this bill. Then the torpedo-boat, with all modern appliances, and the torpedoes and other appliances may be very destructive as worked from naval ships. All of these come strictly within the domain that I seek to confine this bill to, and that is defense, not aggression, not craft that shall sail out upon the waters of the globe and offer battle with the navies of other powers, but for our protection at home.

As I said once before, I am for that first, and after that for a great armament of armored ships. We are proceeding this year and in the legislation of the years past carrying out these two features. The fast cruisers shall ply upon the sea at swift rates, making it dangerous as a preventive for other nations to engage in war with us, because their commerce would be our prey; and then at home, if a fleet should be brought here for the purpose of bombarding our great cities and laying them under contribution, that we shall have here such enginery, such naval structures as shall be able to meet them and beat them off and scatter them and make it unsafe for them here.

Mr. BUTLER. Just there again, may I ask the Senator from Maine how far he supposes one of the structures provided for in this bill would pursue a hostile navy?

Mr. HALE. I do not want to pursue her under this. If we drive the hostile navy off we have accomplished the purpose of this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. With the present high-power guns in the British navy, and the Italian navy, and the French navy, they could lie off the city of New York 10 or 12 miles and bombard certainly the city of Brooklyn.

Mr. HALE. I expect that everything which is built under this bill will be able to operate in water from six, eight to ten miles within reach of the guns.

Mr. BUTLER. Experience heretofore has been that a floating battery can not get outside the harbor.

Mr. HALE. That depends on how it is made. It has to be made for this very purpose, and I put into the bill the words that the Senator requires, "heavily armored vessels," so that the Secretary is given the discretion as to the kind of a naval structure he shall make. It may include a vessel for harbor defense. But I ask the Senate now in its action not to amend this bill so as to extend its scope, because if you do that you must add to the appropriations. Two ships such as the Senator from South Carolina desires would exhaust every dollar that is provided for in the bill; one ship of the greatest, heaviest, and most formidable kind would almost exhaust it, and if the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina carries, he must certainly follow it by moving that ten or fifteen millions more be added to the amount of the appropriation here, and I do not desire that this amount provided for in this bill shall be taken up in that way.

I have a large mass of figures, statistics, that I have had arranged and prepared and have studied upon this subject, showing what other nations have done in just this line; but I see that it is nearly 2 o'clock, and I believe the Senate wants to pass the bill, and I refrain from taking any more time.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I believe that I am within the bounds of strict historical accuracy when I say that there is no great war-ship belonging to any of the principal naval powers of this earth—England, France, Spain, or Italy—which has been constructed ten years that is not to-day antiquated and practically worthless. The struggle has been, in the first place, to cover a ship with an armor that no projectile could penetrate, and then to invent a gun that would throw a projectile which no armor could resist. And so the contest has been going on between guns and armor until to-day the 110-ton gun which is now mounted on the English ship will penetrate 35 inches of solid armor, and the result is that the ship must be loaded beyond the possibility of flotation in order to offer any security whatever against existing projectiles.

We have had, Mr. President, for many years this clamor for the appropriation of enormous sums for the construction of a navy for seacoast defenses; but I think the students of naval science and of gunnery for the last fifteen years will be satisfied that it has been the part of wisdom in the United States Government to allow these powers to try these costly and futile experiments, while we have been enabled to save our money and avail ourselves of the results of their experience.

The bill before us is vague in the extreme. The second paragraph provides:

> For the construction of heavily armored vessels or armored floating batteries or rams, to be used for coast and harbor defense, $10,000,000.

How many are to be constructed or under what plans they are to be constructed the bill makes no statement of. But I wish respectfully to submit, as we are dealing with the problem of seacoast defense at this time, that that problem never can be solved by the construction of a navy. At the mouth of the Gulf of Mexico four foreign powers have naval stations, Great Britain, France, Spain, and Denmark, and such is the curvature of our coast from the northernmost line of Maine to Galveston, on the Gulf of Mexico, that there is not a single one of our harbors or seaports or great commercial cities that can not be reached in four days from the naval station of England in the Windward Islands. They can assemble their fleet and can reach any port upon our coast from Portland, around by New York, Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Charleston, to Galveston within four days; and therefore we can not defend our seacoast by a navy unless we have one of sufficient magnitude at every vulnerable point strong enough to resist any force that can be assembled to assault it.

So I do not agree with the theory of the Committee on Naval Affairs that this problem of seacoast defense is to be solved by the construction of an extensive navy, especially in view of the fact that, with the new invention of dynamite shells to be thrown from mortar-like guns so that they will describe a peripheric curve in the atmosphere and fall upon the deck of any battery or ship that may be constructed, armor in the immediate future is to be rendered practically worthless.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Maine will confine himself and confine the efforts of the Senate in these matters, not to the construction of these great, unwieldy, useless floating batteries that must be confined to harbors, and that, there, will be practically useless for the purposes of defense, but to what he has expressed to be his opinion, the construction of a swift force of naval structures that shall prey upon commerce, as he describes it, in case of a foreign war, and defend our seaports against the similar force of rams, &c., that can be brought against it.

We have been appropriating money in the last few days, so far as the Senate is concerned, like wealthy men who care not how they give, millions upon millions, not for tribute, but for defense. I hope that we may pause in our headlong career long enough to have some definite, palpable, and tangible information either from the Senator from Maine, or from the Senator from Iowa, who is the great financial authority of this body, how much money there is in the Treasury, and how far this will affect the surplus about which there is so much agitation; and I shall be glad now before being called upon to vote these fifteen or eighteen millions in addition to what we have already appropriated for fortifications and for swift cruisers, if the Senator from Iowa would state how long this fountain of Pactolus will afford the golden stream that will be necessary to meet the appropriations that we are making by unnumbered millions. If the Senator from Iowa has studied that matter, I wish he would enlighten us now.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have watched, as undoubtedly the Senator from Kansas has, the progress of the appropriations respecting coast defenses and the improvement of our naval establishment and so on; and we have in the Senate voted to appropriate, as the Senator from Kansas says, with some degree of liberality to these objects; but I think not in such a way as to alarm the country in any sense or so as to intimate that we are extravagant in these appropriations.

The difficulty with these appropriations has been, as the Senator from Kansas knows, that for many years we have practically made no progress either in the matter of guns, or fortifications, or a naval establishment. Efforts have been made in prior years for that purpose, but they have met with severe opposition not only in this Chamber but elsewhere; and I think it is a source of congratulation to the Senate and to the country that those who sit on the opposite side of this Chamber have at this period in our history come and associated themselves with us in practical unanimity with reference to the necessity of something in the way of fortifying our coast, and in the re-establishment and rejuvenation of our Navy.

I have looked at these bills with some care, and although they are drawn, necessarily perhaps, so that great and most extraordinary discretion is left in the hands of the President of the United States and his subordinate, the Secretary of the Navy, yet I do not see how it is possible to throw around the President or the Secretary of the Navy stringent rules and requirements with reference to the expenditure of this money.

These bills, as I understand them, are bills in sequence as it were. In the first place the Committee on Coast Defenses have brought in bills looking to the establishment of manufactories in our own country that will have the ability to manufacture the armor, and the guns, and the ships that are proposed in these several bills. Why is this? It is impossible, as we know, either in this Chamber or the other Chamber to secure the passage of bills looking to the importation of ships already built or to the importation of the large amount of material that enters into the construction of ships. Therefore the first appropriation in the aggregate, if I am correct—and if I am incorrect the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] will correct me—in the two bills that were passed by this body a few days ago, provided for the expenditure ultimately of $21,000,000; but in the nature of these expenditures they can not be made within five years. So then that is an appropriation substantially of about $4,000,000 per annum for the next five years looking to the establishment of manufactories that will be able to produce the steel ingots which are necessary to the production of this armor and these heavy guns.

Then we have provided for two gun factories, one a naval establishment and the other an establishment for our Army, these gun factories to take the raw material which is supposed to be fabricated by these immense steel establishments and convert them into guns. That is my understanding. So I say to the Senator from Kansas that in my judgment it will not be possible in the next fiscal year under the first two bills, the bills reported by the Committee on Coast Defenses, to expend more than $4,000,000.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. Take this bill before us now. Should it pass Congress at this session with the second clause unamended providing for the construction of heavily armored vessels or armored floating batteries and rams to be used for coast and harbor defense, $10,000,000, is not that amount specifically appropriated and withdrawn from the Treasury as a charge upon the existing resources?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer that.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not talking about annual expenditure; that is another proposition. The Senator says the expenditure will necessarily be distributed over a number of years. My point is that this is a direct, specific appropriation of so much money, that is a charge upon the resources of the Treasury no matter when it is met.

Mr. ALLISON. The money appropriated in this bill is not segregated from the vast volume that is in the Treasury, and not one dollar of it can be used until a contract is made by the President of the United States for its expenditure.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg to say to the Senator from Iowa that the point made by the Senator from Kansas is met by the very amendment the Senator from Iowa offered to this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I am coming to that. What is this appropriation? Take the first item. It is "for the construction of heavily armored vessels or armored floating batteries or rams." Although the words "heavily armored" are not included in the second designation, I have no doubt that that is the intent and purpose, because if we are to build either floating batteries or rams in order to successfully defend our harbors they must be heavily armored. Now, I venture the statement that under the bill honestly administered it is not possible to expend one single dollar of that $10,000,000 in the next fiscal year.

Why? Because we have provided in this bill that all the materials that go into these heavy floating batteries shall be constructed of American material and be of American manufacture, and there is not a manufactory of steel in the United States to-day that can construct a steel plate which will be sufficient to cover these steel batteries here suggested and proposed. Therefore the bills that have been proposed by the Committee on Coast Defenses must first come into play, whereby we shall have the immense steel plants which will enable us, in our own country, to fabricate the great steel ingots from which these plates are rolled.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I interpose a word of explanation in the same line? Sixteen million dollars of the $21,000,000 appropriated is to be given to the rough parts of steel for guns and armor as delivered; and the preliminary work of preparing the plant is such that it is not expected that any considerable quantity can be delivered under a year and a half, so that $16,000,000 of that will not begin to go out until a year and a half after the passage of the bill, probably.

Mr. ALLISON. So that although this appears to be an appropriation in the present, it is really an appropriation for the future.

Now, why is it that it seems to be wise and necessary to make these appropriations at this time? It is because American manufacturers, as I understand (and I am merely repeating now what has been repeated often before in this Chamber and in the documents that lie upon our tables), will not invest the money necessary to constitute the plant which will enable them to produce this immense steel armor and these ingots for great guns, unless they shall have contracts that will extend forward one, two, three, four, or five years.

So really these appropriations, although they are apparently appropriations for the current fiscal year, yet are appropriations which in their intent and purpose are appropriations which are to extend over three, four, and five years. I have here now the two bills. The amount appropriated in the bill which we passed this morning reported from the Naval Committee by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] appropriates, as I have it, $19,800,000 in its totality. This bill appropriates $14,500,000. I believe that a fair, reasonable, prudent expenditure of this money will require five years of time before it shall be withdrawn from the Treasury, and it was for that reason that I offered the amendment I did offer.

I offered the amendment providing that this money should be available for a period of five years. If that amendment had not been adopted, under the existing state of the law every dollar of this money would be covered into the Treasury at the end of two years from the date of this appropriation. It will be an average expenditure of only $7,000,000, in round numbers, and then add the average expenditure of four or five million dollars under the bills proposed by the Coast Defenses Committee, and you have an annual expenditure under all these appropriations of only $12,000,000, having a double purpose of re-establishing our navy upon the ocean if that shall be the effect, and also contributing somewhat to our coast defense, whereby the great cities of our country will, in some measure at least, feel themselves more securely protected.

I do not believe, in further answer to the Senator from Kansas, that under these bills, taking them one and all, there will be expended to exceed $10,000,000 in the next fiscal year.

It might as well be said that we were making extravagant appropriations if the Committee on Appropriations were to come in here with a sundry civil bill covering five years of time and $100,000,000 of money. Why, gentlemen would say, how extravagant the Senate has become; here is a sundry civil bill that used to embrace $20,000,000, but this year we find it embracing $100,000,000, and therefore the Senate is trying to get rid of the surplus! No such motive, as I understand, is covered in this bill. It is for the purpose of making expenditures which both sides of the Chamber believe are necessary for the protection of our commerce on the ocean and for the defense of our harbors. Whatever portion of these appropriations is not expended, will not, in my judgment, materially affect the question of the surplus, so-called, which is now in the Treasury.

I will say to the Senator from Kansas, as I said the other day, that on the first day of July of this year we shall have paid every dollar of debt that we can pay. We shall still have in the Treasury, with all these expenditures made during the next fiscal year, from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 more money than we can use unless we buy up the unmatured bonds of the United States.

So then, as far as these bills have gone, in my judgment they do not materially affect the question of what shall be done in the future with the surplus in the Treasury, and the Senator from Kansas will bear in mind that each day and each year that we progress there will be pouring into the Treasury money from which these expenditures will be made, because this is not only a constantly recurring expenditure, but we have a constantly recurring income at the rate of $1,000,000 per day, so that this bill of itself would only take fifteen days of the income of the United States upon the present basis of income.

Then, Mr. President, whilst I think these bills might more carefully scrutinize the expenditure of the money, yet in their very nature we are obliged to impose upon the President a very large discretion in this expenditure, to trust to the officers of the Navy, to those who have given their lives to the study of this question, its expenditure in an honest and fair way.

I think—and I will say it now, because I may not have an opportunity again—one of the difficulties in our pathway is that these naval officers and the Department of the Navy constantly insist that they shall make the plans for our vessels. My opinion is that we should secure better vessels if we put the responsibility of making plans both for hulls and engines upon the constructors of the vessels, and say to them, "You produce us a vessel that will go 19 or 20 knots an hour with a certain amount of power and a certain space for armament, and then we will pay you the contract price." But we seem to have proceeded upon another plan and scheme in these bills, and I am not sufficiently familiar with our duty in that respect to propose amendments to them.

So, Mr. President, I think with reference to these appropriations thus far they do not materially affect the question of what is known as the surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate more than a few minutes, and simply to say a few words not in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Iowa, but in confirmation of what he has stated.

Whilst I vote for this bill and other bills looking to the establishment of a navy for the United States Government, the question of the surplus in the Treasury is not one of the elements in the consideration at all. It is perhaps fortunate that we have plenty of money; but I do not hesitate to say if it is established—and nobody seems to doubt that that fact is established—that we are in need of a better navy, I should vote for that appropriation if there was not a dollar of surplus in the Treasury. If every single dollar provided for in these various bills were necessary to be raised by taxation, I should vote for them. I do not know in any part of this country anywhere, North, South, East, or West, where there is a question about our requiring a better navy.

Two or three years ago when I had the honor to serve on a committee with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] he well remembers the absence of information not only in Congress but all over the United States as to the capacity of this country to produce steel. My friend remembers perfectly well that was the condition of things; and it was only after a very searching and thorough investigation on the part of that committee that we arrived at the fact that this country was quite competent and capable of producing as fine steel as can be produced in the world. I think one of the results of that inquiry established that fact.

Now, sir, as that Senator said so pointedly and truthfully the other day, it will be impossible for this Government to put itself in a condition of defense unless the Congress of the United States places at the disposal of the Executive Department money enough to justify men in this country in preparing the plant for the manufacture of steel. No sensible business man is going to put up a large expensive plant unless he can see far enough ahead of him in regard to his financial arrangements as to justify such an expenditure. Therefore, I think that it is of the very greatest possible consequence, whether we have a surplus in the Treasury or not, that this money should be appropriated in order to enable this country to put itself in a condition of defense against all the world. As to the amount of money to be expended, that is another question. My own opinion is that these appropriations are not too large. The money is not to be taken out of the Treasury in one year, or in two years, or perhaps in five years; but Congress in appropriating these large sums, if it should do so, advertises to the world that the Government of the United States is going forward in a careful, painstaking, business-like way to prepare for the construction of a respectable navy. I therefore repeat that the question of the surplus in the Treasury was not an element in my mind in the consideration of these bills; and I say that if there was not a dollar of surplus I should vote for them when it is established, as I have no doubt it is, that we require these ships. So it is not a matter of great consequence to me whether there is a surplus in the Treasury or not. If we need the money this Congress ought to appropriate it.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not propose at this time to enter at length into the discussion of the subject of coast defenses, although this bill provides in part for a system of defense recommended by the board on fortifications and other defenses; and a general discussion of the subject would be pertinent, but I feel that after the remarks which have been made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] something ought to be said in regard to the urgency and importance of defending our coasts.

I think the Senator is mistaken in his views as to the necessity and urgency of fortifications and in regard to the necessity of suitable foundations to receive the guns when they are made. It ought not to be necessary at this late day when the question of the importance of fortifying our coast has been urged upon the attention of Congress from year to year by the Secretaries of War in their annual reports, has been thoroughly examined and reported upon by committees of both Houses of Congress, has been examined and reported upon by boards which have been created by acts of Congress——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator from Oregon understand me as being opposed to fortifying our sea-coast?

Mr. DOLPH. I will say to the Senator that I understood him to state in substance that he thought it was unnecessary to make these large appropriations for fortifications on our sea-coast; that we could improvise, in case of war, sufficient foundation for large guns if we had them. That I think is probably a correct statement.

Mr. BUTLER. That was my proposition.

Mr. DOLPH. It would seem to be unnecessary after all the examinations and reports we have had on this subject, after the recommendations we have had from our committees, and from those in authority, and when almost the entire press of the country is urging upon our attention the importance of defending our coast, for me to urge its importance upon the Senate of the United States.

All our commercial cities upon both sea-coasts, the Atlantic and Pacific, upon the great lakes, and upon Puget Sound, are to-day exposed to destruction or equally ruinous tribute in case of a foreign war. We have not a single seaboard town upon either coast but what could be captured by a gunboat of a third-rate power. We have not a single fortified port upon either coast into which our shipping engaged in coastwise and foreign commerce could repair for safety in case of war. The board on fortifications and other defenses enumerated twenty-seven seaboard cities at which, in their opinion, defenses were most urgently needed, and they did not include in that enumeration a large number upon both coasts and not a single city upon the great lakes or upon Puget Sound.

Mr. Tilden, in his memorable letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives concerning sea-coast defenses, estimated that twelve seaport cities upon the Atlantic and Pacific coasts contained a population of 5,000,000 souls and destructible property of the value of $5,000,000,000, and in a recent article by Captain Greene on our sea-coast defenses, in Scribner's Monthly for January, he estimates that fifteen of our cities contain destructible property of the assessed value of $4,000,000,000.

Now, for the protection of all this vast amount of property, as has been stated here we have not a single war ship, we have not a single fort that is of any value as a defense, we have not a single gun for our fortifications. All the great powers of Europe are fortifying their coasts and by forts and turrets protected by the most approved armor, and are creating navies of modern war ships armed with the most powerful guns that have yet been made.

Mr. BUTLER. Right there may I ask the Senator another question? If we had those forts and not a single gun in position would the Government of the United States——

Mr. DOLPH. I will get through in a few moments. I promise not to enter into a lengthy discussion. I will come to that directly.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to the Senator proceeding as long as he pleases, but if it is disagreeable to interrupt him I will not do so.

Mr. DOLPH. Wait and see if I do not come to the point suggested. A war cloud hangs constantly over Europe, and every now and then we have complications with foreign countries that remind us that we can not always hope that the peace we have so long enjoyed will continue forever. Great Britain to-day possesses a fleet of gunboats which I have seen estimated somewhere at one hundred and eleven that upon a few hours' warning could be sent up the river Saint Lawrence and by the canal around the Saint Lawrence Rapids and by the Welland Canal to the great lakes to destroy our great cities and our extensive commerce there.

As has been said, Great Britain from her fortified harbors and naval stations at Halifax and Bermuda could in a few hours send her great war ships, armed with forged steel breech-loading rifles, throwing projectiles weighing a ton or more a distance of ten miles and upward, to destroy the principal cities along our Atlantic seacoast; and at Victoria on Vancouver Island she keeps constantly from one to three war ships convenient to the commercial cities along the Sound and upon the Columbia River, and within forty-eight hours to the wealthy and populous city of San Francisco. She has recently ordered, as has been stated in the public press of this country, twenty Armstrong 80-ton guns for her fortifications at Vancouver Island, to frown on our defenseless coast just across the straits of Juan de Fuca, and she has notified the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company to be ready to transport them with other war material across the continent in April next.

Even Chili possesses a war vessel that could anchor outside the Golden Gate at San Francisco and destroy the city, or, ignoring what we call forts there, our structures of brick and mortar and sand, armed with antiquated smooth bore cast-iron guns, insufficiently mounted and out of repair, steam unharmed up to the wharves of the city and under penalty of destruction lay the city under tribute, to be paid out of the private funds in her banks or out of the public funds in the subtreasury there. I clipped, a few days ago,——

Mr. MAXEY. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon in connection with his argument respecting the exposed condition of our seaboard that the cotton, the grain, all the products of the interior which are found in the great cities of New York and so on, are in warehouses near the wharves, and therefore in the most exposed condition to an attack by a naval vessel of any other portion of these seaports, and the destruction of them would be the destruction of a vast amount of property owned by people far in the interior and removed from the seaboard.

Mr. DOLPH. I called attention to that matter in some remarks I made on the fortification bill when it was under discussion at the last session. The accumulations of all our manufacturing and agricultural products are in the seaports and subject to capture and destruction, and the capture or destruction of one of these seaports would derange all our internal commerce.

But to return to San Francisco. I clipped from a San Francisco paper a few days since an imaginary description of an attack on San Francisco by two of the armored vessels of Great Britain. I ask that it be read. It will be interesting at this time as something that is quite possible if not probable.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Lieutenant Greble, of the artillery, pictured an attack on San Francisco by two British ironclads, the Benbow and the Collingwood. The Benbow has two 16-inch 110-ton breech-loading rifles and ten 6-inch breech-loaders in broadside. The Collingwood has four 12-inch breech-loaders and six 6-inch breech-loading rifles in broadside. Both command a range of some eight to nine miles. The commanding officer demands the surrender of the city. The demand is refused. Twenty-four hours are allowed for the departure of the women and the children; then the two ships take up a position inside the bar, south of Point Lobos, within seven miles of the city hall. "Suddenly a roar is heard, followed by another and another; soon the screech of the shells is followed by the crash of falling buildings; fire breaks out in a hundred different places; the fire department is helpless; the socialist and anarchist revel in the wholesale destruction, and strip and burn the buildings which the shells have spared; the whole city is on fire; men are looking out to save themselves, leaving their property to the mercy of Providence. San Francisco, the pride of the Golden State, is destroyed, and the enemy has a foothold on American soil which it will cost many lives to recover. A city with 233,000 inhabitants, $245,000,000 of property, 800 steamers or sailing vessels in its harbor, and vast interests of various kinds is dead, or so stricken that it will take years and years to nurse it back to its present prosperity.

Mr. DOLPH. Do Senators like the picture? As I have said, the realization is possible, and I might say I think truly probable. What is true of San Francisco is true of every commercial city along our entire sea-coasts and upon the great lakes.

The truth is that to-day the United States is under heavy bonds to keep the peace with all the world. The defenseless condition of our coasts and our unprotected commerce guarantees that in our intercourse with other nations we will observe the rules of courtesy and international law; nay, more, they place us at a humiliating disadvantage in any such controversy. In any such controversy we must be constantly reminded that discretion is the better part of valor. I say this without underrating our power and our resources and the courage and the patriotism of our people.

It has been said, and I repeat it, that with our great resources and our means of internal commerce and the patriotism and the courage of our people we could hurl the combined armies of the world from our shores; but in the mean time, in a contest with a great naval power, our great commercial cities would be exposed to destruction, our commerce would be swept from the face of the seas, our internal commerce would be deranged, and every industry of the country would be paralyzed. Such a condition of affairs is not creditable to the American Congress. To allow it longer to continue is criminal.

I do not understand that there is anything in our relations with foreign countries at this time to make the question of coast defenses more urgent than it has been heretofore. It has for years been urged upon our attention. I do not fear a rupture with Great Britain. If the friendship of the two nations is not sufficient to prevent war and compel a resort to arbitration in case of national differences, if war or peace with Great Britain depends as it does with other nations upon motives of self-interest, still there is no danger of war with Great Britain. She is under as heavy bonds to keep the peace with us as we are with her, and while we might not be able to meet her in a naval conflict upon the great seas with her great iron ships, as was intimated by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], we would soon be able to provide vessels of speed and power enough to sweep her commerce from the seas; and we could, with but a few hours' warning, occupy her possessions upon this continent with an invincible army. We would come out of the struggle able to make her pay for the cost of the war and for the damages she had done; we would come out with the vigor of youth in a condition to rapidly recuperate from our losses, while she would come out of the conflict with great loss to her commerce and the loss of her possessions upon the American continent.

We have provided, so far as the Senate could do it, for securing metal for the construction of guns and for their manufacture. One of the bills for that purpose reported from the Committee on Coast Defenses by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] as it passed the Senate, contained an appropriation for the purpose of providing foundations. I will read that provision. It is as follows:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of construction of fortifications and other works of coast defense, in accordance with the recommendations of the board on fortifications and other defenses, appointed by the President of the United States under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, $5,000,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, is hereby appropriated.

This sum might be used, should the bill pass the House, for the floating batteries and for torpedo boats, the construction of which is authorized by this bill. It might be used, and probably would be used, by the Secretary of War for foundations for guns when they are made.

I should like to say to the Senator from South Carolina, were he in his seat, that in the opinion of experts it will take quite as long to provide the foundations for the batteries of great guns necessary for the defense of our coasts at it will to provide the steel for their manufacture and to manfacture them. The idea that batteries of guns weighing one hundred tons and over can be placed upon a sand-heap or in a sand-pit and there operated is not warranted by the investigations which we have made and the recommendations which we have had. The emplacements for guns and other structures for forts must be of solid masonry, able to withstand the great strain and weight of the guns. At the mouth of the Mississippi River we must adopt floating batteries for defense, because suitable foundations can not there be obtained on account of the sandy condition of the soil. So at San Francisco Bay we must have for a complete defense floating batteries to go out and meet the enemy at sea, for, as I have said before, the city of San Francisco may be shelled from the sea.

This bill proposes an appropriation for the construction of floating batteries. By floating batteries is not meant great ships of war suitable for sea-service, but vessels of less draught and less speed and less capacity for storage, more heavily armed and carrying heavier batteries than any ships of war of other nations that can be sent against them. The object of having them of light draught is so that when pursued by a superior force they may get nearer to the shore than the enemy can safely go and escape destruction. The object in providing for them heavier arms and heavier batteries than any ships likely to be sent against them is obvious; it is that they may be able to successfully meet any and all enemies. They ought to be confined to the ports for the protection of which they are designed. Two batteries of this character are recommended for the Mississippi River and three for San Francisco Harbor.

As has been well said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], it is impracticable to defend our coasts by great war-ships alone. The board on fortifications and other defenses reported that twenty-seven ports urgently needed to be defended at the present time. Suppose Great Britain should send ten or fifteen of her great war ships to attack our coasts, and we had ten war vessels able to cope with them. Suppose those ten vessels were stationed at the port of New York. How would we know that the attack was to be made on New York? Suppose the attack was made on Baltimore, or Charleston, or Portland, Me. It can be seen at once that it would be impracticable to defend against an attack at an unexpected point by so small a number of ships. In order to effectually defend our coast by a navy alone we must have a fleet for every principal port upon both coasts equal to any probable fleet of the enemy that could be sent to attack any one of them.

For one, I am not in favor of entering upon the work of the construction of great armored ships until we have provided fortifications and other defenses for the protection of our coasts. I would rather see the money expended for this purpose and in providing cruisers of great speed, sufficiently armed, to prey upon the commerce of our enemies in case of war—commerce-destroyers, if you choose to call them such.

Mr. President, I do not care to extend my remarks. I think the importance of the coast defenses was underrated by the Senator from South Carolina. We have already, so far as the Senate may do it, taken steps to secure guns. We have already, so far as the Senate can do it, taken steps for an appropriation to secure the foundations. This bill is simply a supplement to the bills which passed the Senate after having been reported from the Committee on Coast Defenses, and I hope it will be passed without the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

I should like to submit a letter from the Chief of Engineers, which was sent to me by the Secretary of War with his indorsement at a time when I had offered an amendment for an appropriation of $10,000,000 to the fortification appropriation bill of last session, showing his recommendation for the expenditure of that appropriation if made. I submit it without reading as part of my remarks, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Chair hears no objection, and the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to state the objects to which the sum mentioned in Senator DOLPH's proposed amendment to the House bill for fortifications should, in my opinion, be devoted; and beg leave to suggest that a copy of this communication be sent to Senator DOLPH.

Assuming that the armor for the defenses will be provided in another bill, which has been reported in the Senate, I think that the whole of the money designated to be appropriated in the amendment to the fortification bill should be devoted to masonry and earthworks to receive the armor and guns, as follows:

For New York	$3,300,000
For San Francisco	3,000,000
For Boston	1,200,000
For the lake ports	900,000
For Hampton Roads	900,000
For New Orleans	700,000
	10,000,000

The appropriation should not be limited to the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1887, but should endure until expended, because it will require time to make preparations for these constructions.

Should it be necessary to divide the sum proposed between armor and the constructions in earth and masonry, it is recommended that the division be nearly equal. In this case, however, the money should be devoted to a less number of ports.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN NEWTON,
Chief of Engineers.

Hon. WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has drawn a very lurid and deplorable picture of the condition of our ships and of the lamentable condition of our Navy; but the question before the American people to-day, in view of all these declarations and all the excoriations administered to Congress from time to time by the public press, is, whose fault is it that this condition of affairs is now upon us? It is customary in the public press to deplore the inefficiency of Congress and to deprecate the fact that Congress is not willing, with an overflowing Treasury, to appropriate money for the purpose of defending our seaboard and building ships suitable to cope with those of foreign nations in a naval war.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has congratulated the country that we have economized in the way of large guns and armored vessels until other nations have blazed the pathway and have invented engines of war and floating armaments of which we can now take advantage by reason of their prowess. It may be thrashing old straw, but I want to remind the Senate and the country to-day that there is not in the history of the civilized world a page of maladministration equal to that of the Navy Department of the United States since 1865. It is not the fault of Congress that our shores to-day are defenseless and that we have no ships upon the ocean. It is not the fault of Congress that Admiral Porter of the United States Navy, our highest naval authority, says that we have to-day but one single war vessel that can go to sea safely, and that is the Dolphin. It is not the fault of Congress that to-day our seaboard cities could be powdered to ashes by the armored vessels of foreign nations, even those of Chili and of Italy.

So far from having been economical in naval expenditures, we have expended since 1865, after the close of the war up to the last year, $419,512,058.17 for naval purposes. I have here a tabular statement from the Navy Department, year by year, of this enormous expenditure. It is as follows:

Year.	Amount.	Year.	Amount.
1866	$43,285,662 00	1877	$14,958,035 61
1867	31,074,965 90	1878	17,664,958 25
1868	26,270,426 39	1879	14,827,854 14
1869	19,862,613 29	1880	13,536,521 28
1870	22,206,591 64	1881	15,686,671 66
1871	19,867,529 36	1882	15,024,316 33
1872	21,729,924 53	1883	15,291,169 33
1873	23,730,815 89	1884	17,293,167 47
1874	30,859,347 46	1885	16,021,461 52
1875	21,400,055 43

I know that the stereotyped reply will be made in answer to these statistics, "Oh, yes; we were compelled to keep up a navy of officers and men," the fact being that we have had here upon the streets of Washington, year after year for twenty years, naval lamp-posts, commanders and captains and lieutenants, without a ship and without a sailor and without a gun, this enormous naval establishment of men and officers with no navy and with no place for them to go, many of whom never saw salt water, except at a watering place, for years at a time.

If a British minister were compelled to stand with his budget in the Parliament of Great Britain and make such an exhibit as the Navy Department of the United States has made from 1865 to 1885 he would be pursued out of his place by the execrations of the whole English people. I repeat there is not a more shameful page of maladministration in the history of the civilized world. Here is a letter from the present Secretary of the Navy, dated May 25, 1886, which is without a parallel in the history of the administration of any Department of this or any other civilized government:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 25, 1886.

SIR: Replying to your telegram of this date I have to say that there were three hundred and twenty vessels of all classes on the Navy list in January, 1866, including those being built, laid up at the several stations, and those in commission for service. During the previous year (1865) three hundred and forty-nine vessels were disposed of by sale, and twenty-six lost or transferred from the Navy to owners or to other branches of the Government.

There are at present on the list eighty-seven vessels of all classes, including those being built, laid up, and those in commission for service, and of these only thirty-seven are considered serviceable.

Very respectfully,

W. C. WHITNEY, Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
House of Representatives.

Out of eighty-seven upon the roster of the Navy Department there are thirty-seven only that could go to sea at all.

Mr. PAYNE. Does that include everything?

Mr. VEST. It includes everything. The whole naval force of the Government to-day, out of eighty-seven vessels on the roster, is thirty-seven fit for duty. To recapitulate, in 1866 the Navy consisted of three hundred and twenty vessels. Notwithstanding a total expenditure of $419,512,058.17, of which $90,000,000 was expended for the construction and repair of vessels, there are to-day out of eighty-seven vessels only thirty-seven that are fit for service on the ocean. I say that exhibit is without any parallel in the history of maladministration.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator figures showing the expenditures on account of the Navy from the inauguration of the Government down to the close of the war?

Mr. VEST. No; I have only the annual expenditure from 1866 to 1885.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say, if the Senator will allow me, that some two or three years ago, when these matters were under discussion, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], not now in his seat, made a statement of this sort, which, so far as I remember, was unchallenged, that since the war a larger sum had been spent for naval purposes in the United States than had been spent from the inauguration of George Washington down to the end of the war, or the beginning of the war, I have forgotten which.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt that is the case. I have not the slightest doubt of it, because $420,000,000, without going into the figures, I have no sort of question would exceed the whole amount expended from the beginning of Washington's administration to the commencement of the war. Four hundred and twenty million dollars have been spent, and to-day we have but one single vessel that could last a half hour upon the ocean in a naval conflict with the most inferior naval power of the world, and out of eighty-seven vessels upon the naval roster there are fifty of them that can not go to sea at all.

I said some two years ago, I believe, upon this floor, in a debate with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who has charge of this bill, that if he would then bring in a bill to appropriate $50,000,000 for our seaboard defenses and for five armor-clad vessels to defend our ports, I would vote for it. Yet, after all these intervening months, when this lamentable condition of affairs has existed for twenty years, on February 12 last, these two bills are reported from the Naval Committee and brought before the Senate. I do not attribute any sinister design to the committee, but why is it that almost at the close of the session we are now confronted with an expenditure for fortifications and a Navy of $71,000,000, originating in the Senate, and these bills are to be thrust upon the House of Representatives in the very last throes and agonies of an expiring session.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, informs us that even with these expenditures there will be $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 of surplus in the Treasury in the next year, which we can only apply to the purchase of bonds at an enormous premium. That is just exactly what the people of the United States complain of to-day; it is that we are now making hot haste to spend in every conceivable form the surplus in the Treasury and not taking one dollar of taxation off the people of the United States. It would seem to a man not suspicious that there is a deliberate attempt here to spend in every sort of fashion in these last days of the session millions upon millions of dollars in order that we afterwards may be confronted with a proposition that there is no necessity for reducing taxes.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] alluded to the hot haste with which we were now expending millions of dollars upon every conceivable scheme and project. With the spirit of expenditure now abroad in this Chamber we would put an Aladdin's lamp in the hands of a receiver if this session could last two weeks longer.

The Senator from Iowa says that this money is not to be expended in a single year. No; it is like the $77,000,000 to be expended under the Blair bill. The money is appropriated to be paid out of the Treasury in annual installments. What business man would enter into obligations to expend $10,000 or $20,000 in the next two or three years, and not calculate that amount of expenditure in his business and make provision for it? When we appropriate this $71,000,000 to be expended in futuro, as we appropriated $77,000,000 under the Blair bill, what is the effect and result of it? It is that we must prepare our finances to meet these expenditures hereafter, and those appropriations must enter into the financial exhibits and calculations of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But, Mr. President, if my friend will pardon me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is this difference to be suggested, that, differing from a personal obligation of a man who enters into contracts, &c., which he can not recede from without the consent of the other side, all these appropriations are of course subject to be stopped by Congress whenever the public exigency requires it.

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes; but we understand, those of us who have been here even an inconsiderable time, that whenever such an act of appropriation is once passed through Congress we then invariably, when we attempt to curtail the expenditure, are met with the cry, "Oh, you pledged the public credit, and these States or these recipients of the bounty of the Government have anticipated it and made arrangements to receive it." We ought not as wise statesman, we ought not as trustees for the people, to incur these liabilities with the idea that hereafter Congress may be called upon to go back upon its own action, to repeal its own laws. We should look this thing in the face now, squarely and emphatically. If we propose now, in the last days of the session, to incur liabilities to the extent of $71,000,000, all I ask is that we may know more in regard to the details of that expenditure, that we may ascertain exactly how this money is to be expended. Although I am a member of the Democratic party, no provision in this or any other bill that gives unlimited discretion to the President or the head of a department will induce me at this time to enter upon the expenditure of this amount of money for any purpose whatever.

These bills ought to have been brought here before. The country has been in this deplorable condition for twenty years; and yet the party which had control of the Government for the largest portion of that time, nearly all the time control of both branches of Congress and the Executive, have allowed this condition of things to go on with an expenditure of $420,000,000, and now, knowing that the other branch of Congress is in possession of the Democratic party, they come here with this appropriation to be thrust upon the other House, and if it be there rejected, then to say to the country, "We attempted to provide a Navy, but we were prevented by the House of Representatives from doing so."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has made this same speech about the extravagance of the Navy Department in years past, every year since I have been a member of the body.

Mr. VEST. Yes; and I intend to make it.

Mr. HALE. And I have endeavored to answer it, to my best power and purpose. I shall not go much into that now.

The Senator says that the Republican party is responsible because the Navy has not been rebuilt, and that it has been in power and ought to have done it. Of those twenty years the Republican party has only had the power for eight years. During all the rest of the time, under Republican administrations, under advice and suggestions from Republican Secretaries of the Navy, under special messages sent in by the Presidents of the United States, the Republicans of the Senate and the Republicans of the House have endeavored to rebuild the American Navy. Measure after measure has been reported here setting this project afloat, trying to build new ships under the rules of construction of modern ingenuity and modern device, and ever and always the Senators upon that side of the Chamber, with hardly an exception, and the overwhelming force of the Democratic House of Representatives at the other end of the Capitol, have thrown themselves crosswise and athwart that enterprise and have prevented it. The spectacle is witnessed to-day that notwithstanding the Republican party has lost control of the administration of the Government, yet, for patriotic purposes and for the national security and defense, it is in favor of voting liberally, and perhaps lavishly, sums of money for this purpose, lodging the power in a Democratic administration, giving it to a Democratic President and a Democratic Secretary of the Navy, in opposition to the attitude of the Senator and his party in the years past; and the criticism now comes up that it is not guarded enough, and we are taunted because this has come in too late when we are proffering to the Democratic administration large sums of money, millions upon millions, to protect the country and secure its safety and prosperity.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, do I understand him to say that from 1865 to 1885 his party only controlled the Government for eight years?

Mr. HALE. It only controlled the entire power of the Government for eight years of that time.

Mr. VEST. With the exception of two years the Senate has been all that time under the control of the Republican party, and never in that time has there been a day when the Senator from Maine could not have introduced this identical bill at any period of the session.

Mr. HALE. During all this time, excepting the years I have stated, appropriations originated in the House of Representatives, and upon every bill that has been brought from the House of Representatives relating to the naval establishment the Senate has put on propositions to secure the defense and safety of the country by additional appropriations for building up the naval establishment and providing for the fortifications of the country. Last year, upon the subject of fortifications, the Senate passed a bill, which it has passed again this year, providing for a plant that should be able to create forgings and armored plate, and the House of Representatives entombed it. They never even gave it decent consideration; and the bill to-day is in conflict before a conference committee of the two Houses. There never has been a time, excepting the years I have excepted, when the Republican party was able to pass any of these projects. Now, as I have said, it comes forward with the power in the hands of gentlemen upon the other side, and it is criticised.

I wish to say one word more. I am not going to take up time, for I wish to get the bill through if I can before 3 o'clock. This old story about the extravagance of the Navy Department in years past has been gone over again and again. The $420,000,000 which the Senator says have been expended in twenty years have gone to maintain the naval establishment. Out of that not more than $60,000,000 have been appropriated for repairs and construction. It is a smaller sum than any other nation which begins to approach this in magnitude has spent in these years past. The Senator might as well arraign us for extravagance in expending during those years $500,000,000 for the Army when we have not to-day so big an army as we had twenty years ago. He might as well arraign a man for expending money in extravagance when using it in household expenses. You can not maintain a government, you can not keep up the personnel, you can not keep up the yards and docks, you can not keep up all the bureaus of the Department, without expending every year from $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, and that should not be charged to the naval establishment so far as its ships go, any more than it should be charged to the Army. That is the answer to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me? It is well enough to be accurate to a slight extent as we go on.

Mr. HALE. I thought so when the Senator was talking.

Mr. VEST. I have before me now a statement from the Secretary of the Navy in which he states that over $90,000,000 have been expended for the repair and construction of vessels during the twenty years from 1865 to 1885. I recollect very well that the Senator from Maine made the statement in debate before in regard to this very subject, some two sessions ago, that only about one-twentieth part of this expenditure had been for ships and repairs; but, the truth is, not more than one-fifth has been expended upon ships and repairs, as shown by the report of the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. Taking the Senator's figures, how much does it amount to per year? Less than $4,000,000 a year upon old wooden ships, decayed, going to pieces, which had to be rebuilt—which had to be kept afloat. The Democratic House would not let us build new ships, and we did not want the American flag to go off the seas, we did not want the waters of the globe to be unvexed by an American naval ship, and we had to repair what we had and rebuild what we had and put the money into these old hulks. It is a masterpiece of good management that so many of these ships have been kept afloat as they have been in years past, instead of mismanagement. I shall not take any more time.

Mr. HAWLEY. One or two statements have been made in the course of the debate that are somewhat calculated to mislead perhaps. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], for example, remarked that of the vessels in Europe constructed ten years and more than ten years ago all were antiquated and of no possible use now. That is a great mistake. There is no fighting ship of any grade that is absolutely worthless, and certainly all the leading navies of Europe have many ships built six, eight, ten, fifteen, or even twenty years ago which are exceedingly powerful, and will altogether overpass anything we can offer against them, either in the way of ship or coast defenses.

I wish to correct a misapprehension under which some gentlemen labor; it is this, that those who insist that there must be an extensive manufacture of powerful steel guns of the best modern description think our old cast-iron guns are useless and are to be thrown away; that we depreciate their value. Not at all, sir. They were good in their day; they are good of their kind now; they are valuable for harbors of shallow draught. So the old-fashioned 10-inch Columbiads will be a very powerful gun still against one of the lighter unarmored vessels. Many of our harbors can be defended with old converted rifles and old smoothbores. But those are not the places where an enemy would care to come. What are we to do in from 18 to 30 feet of water against the powerful ironclads and the magnificent modern rifles? It is against those we are to defend, and we are not seeking in these bills to defend against them on the open sea in the waters of the Atlantic, or to contest there on the sea with them, but to defend the points at which they will aim, and that is to be done to the very best advantage by heavy floating batteries and by the rams from which I think the Senator from Maine does not expect too much. I believe they would be among the most formidable vessels—highly armored, some of them well plated in front, and without a single gun, or torpedo, or Gatling gun even for defense, nothing but boats moving at the rate of 12 or 15 miles an hour, and weighing, if you please, not more than 1,000 tons each, if built of steel.

Let me correct another misapprehension. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] said that in six months or three months or in one month, with no strong defenses anywhere at the entrance of the harbors, innumerable ready hands would pile up sand and drift. The modern rifle will go through from 30 to 70 feet of sand. He says truly we have not the guns to defend them. That is true, but the first bill we have passed here is one that will start the work; it will make a beginning in the work of manufacturing the best modern guns of all descriptions.

The casual expression was used here, and has been used often in the newspapers, that some of the modern vessels with magnificent rifles and long range, could stand off and shell some of our cities at a distance of eight or ten miles. That is a wide misapprehension. There is no ship floating in the world that can afford to put her guns at an elevation of more than ten or twelve degrees, and they do not get their greatest range under an elevation of twenty-nine degrees. If they put it at much greater elevation the recoil in firing off the gun would smash any ship that was ever built. They have to make the upper deck as strong as they make the sides to defend against the great shock. The armored batteries proposed by the bill, while they are not expected to travel rapidly about the harbor, taking position according to the necessity of circumstances, can be built so broad and so strong, with so much displacement over so wide a space that they can make a considerable elevation, and they are superior, except in speed, to any of the fighting ships abroad.

I think these two bills of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Maine are proceeding in precisely the right direction, and we shall find if we pass these bills the War and the Navy Departments ready with innumerable plans upon paper adapted to the best modern ideas for proceeding to expend this money honestly and faithfully I have no doubt, as I am bound to believe. I, with the greatest cheerfulness, welcome the opportunity of placing this money in the hands of the Democratic Administration, because during the fourteen years since I first entered Congress I have heard every successive Republican Secretary of the Navy denounced and villified beyond human endurance for doing it, and year after year the Republicans never failed to challenge investigation, invited it, and threw open the door and opened the books and dared men to put their hands on corruption. We have had the investigations, and they have resulted in nothing; they have blown by in thin air; no crime or shame has been cast by any one of them. It has been impossible to devote any considerable sum of money to the building of new ships, and we have taken the old ones.

I welcome the patriotic language of the Senator from South Carolina. It is the beginning of a new day in the history of the country. I rejoice to hear him say that if there were not a single dollar left in the Treasury he would be willing to vote these bills and impose new taxation in order to meet them. It is the first good opportunity we have had during eight of the ten years, including this current year in the Congress just about to expire. During eight of those ten years the House of Representatives has been in the control of the Democratic party. It might have originated scores of measures for the good of the country. It has never, however, passed over to us so much as the sketch of a tariff bill. It takes these bills and others of the sort and puts them in the Tomb of the Capulets. It buries them under a complication of rules and a complication of malignant hatreds and oppositions that render it almost hopeless to expect that these or any other bills shall go through so long as the country permits the House of Representatives to be Democratic. That is the substantial trouble with us, that there is a spirit of determined obstruction and opposition elsewhere than in this body. Here, I am happy to say, there is scarcely a voice raised against anything like a reasonable, even if it be a very liberal, proposition to defend the country.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I, of course, do not want to interfere with the Senator from New Hampshire, but I think we may have a vote and get this bill out of the way in three minutes.

Mr. CALL. I have an amendment that I desire to propose.

Mr. BLAIR. If there are to be amendments offered discussion will follow.

Mr. HALE. Then I give notice that I shall try to call the bill up to-morrow, after the routine morning business.

DEATH OF SENATOR PIKE.

Mr. BLAIR. I submit a series of resolutions, and ask that they be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire submits for adoption a series of resolutions, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has learned with deep regret of the decease of Austin F. Pike, late a member of this body from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended that appropriate tribute may be paid to the high character and distinguished public services of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, once more the Senate is reminded that the great startling fact in life is death.

I have moved this resolution of respect for the dead and of condolence to the living because the nation has lost a patriot and a statesman; the community a citizen wise, trusted, and efficient; the family a model in all the domestic relations, whose loss is crushing as it is irreparable, and the Senate a member faithful, able, and beloved.

The late Senator Pike was a man of great natural powers, the architect of his own fortunes, who from an humble though honorable beginning made his way by constant progression to the highest and most responsible stations in life.

Few men did more of hard honest work than he, both in the preparation of his vigorous mind for the chosen arena whereon his youthful ambition determined to fight out the great combat to come, and also in the stern struggle of more than forty years which constituted his active professional, business, and public career.

Eminent in many things and with versatile qualifications for the service of society, he was pre-eminently a great lawyer and always devoted himself to his profession in marked preference to other pursuits.

In its active practice he found an opportunity for study and discipline which largely made up for the deprivation of that more liberal and broader preparatory education upon which he entered, but the completion of which circumstances denied to him.

Perhaps the bar of New Hampshire never has been surpassed in ability and high professional character.

From the organization of her government until the present time, with less than 10,000 square miles of territory, and even now not more than 400,000 people within her jurisdiction, she has constantly exhibited a wonderful galaxy of bright particular stars in that profession which has written almost every line in the legislation of freedom everywhere, and in this country, at least, has ever been true to the cause of the oppressed against arbitrary power. Her Sullivans, for three generations the great masters of forensic disputation which they elevated by the highest forms of logic and eloquence; Jeremiah Mason, the profoundest American master of the common law, and by the Great Expounder of the Constitution himself admitted to be the most formidable antagonist he had ever met; the two Websters, Daniel and his brother Ezekiel, unequaled, perhaps, save by each other, and certainly unsurpassed in the profession to which they belonged; Jeremiah Smith, the great chief-justice of our early history, whose name will live always in the memory of the profession and no less in the affectionate regard of the people of our State; Ichabod Bartlett, quick-witted, brilliant, versatile, yet profound; Noyes and Thompson, the tutors of Webster, whose high character and attainments were the models in the effort to imitate and equal which he necessarily became great; the Bells, who by families and generations were pre-eminent in every branch of law, in literature, and in statesmanship; and in later times, within my own memory, a plenitude of illustrious names of whom the time would fail me to speak, whom I saw and heard and revered in my younger years, and whose high character and surpassing abilities have grown in my estimation as larger experience and wider observation of men have forced comparison between them and others who in all parts of the country, on the bench and at the bar, have worthily upheld the dignity and administered the high trusts of the profession of law.

It was when a mere boy toiling on a hard hillisde farm, yet full of suppressed and dreamy aspirations, that on one occasion when called from my labor to that most picturesque and beautiful of American villages, Plymouth, N. H., which rests like a crown of peace on the banks of the Pemigewassett, that I timidly entered the old court-house and there first saw among his brethren at the bar, Hon. Austin F. Pike, whose decease is the mournful occasion of these commemorative ceremonies.

In those days the courts were schools of instruction. Every trial, even if the subject in controversy was trifling in character or in value, was fully attended by the people. It was a favorite saying of Chief-Justice Bell that there are no small cases. This is true. Every trial is a contest between principles which has for its object the discovery of truth and the administration of justice. Nothing is the law but the right, and a decision which involves but a penny or the slightest wrong to the person may become the precedent which controls millions or upon which may depend the liberties and lives of unnumbered citizens in future times.

In the absence of lectures, entertainments, and diversions, the people thronged to these judicial contests, and there, at least far more than at the present day, they learned the laws of the land. To my youthful imagination those lawyers and judges seemed a higher order of beings, and never since, even after I became an humble member of the fraternity, have I been able to divest myself of a feeling of deep reverence for the bench as a seat of judgment and as the highest earthly personification of the work of the great Lawgiver and Administrator of justice to the universe, while every member of the court who does his duty seems to me to be clothed with a direct authority in the discharge of the highest functions assigned to men.

Thus, nearly forty years ago, I first saw Mr. Pike engaged in the active duties of his profession. He was then a young man of medium height, of well-knit though rather delicate frame for one reared upon a New Hampshire farm, with a fine head, an intellectual but resolute expression of countenance, and an appearance of steady activity, both of body and mind, which made progress continually like the advance of time.

Ten years afterwards I made his acquaintance and have known him well during the lifetime of a generation, and until my entrance upon public life, with the exception of a few years' interruption by the war, in constant observation of and frequent association with him in the practice of the profession.

Mr. Pike was born in Hebron, Grafton County, New Hampshire, October 16, 1819. His father was Uriah Pike and his mother was Mary Page. The town is one of those places among our mountains which language cannot describe in their full and everlasting beauty, but which no child who is born there can ever forget or cease to love any more than he can become indifferent to the mother who bore him.

The parents were hardy, intelligent, upright and industrious farmers, with several children, living upon one of those hard old farms which seemed to be the natural scene of toil, yet so located amid the eternal beauties of the heavens and of the earth, and so tempering the rough struggle upon their rocky bosoms for existence, that happy is the child who is born to tug thereon for nutrition both of body and mind.

Young Austin was a studious, thoughtful boy, who worked wearily on with the rest through the years of childhood and early youth to assist in the joint effort of the family to obtain a livelihood. Up to the age of fifteen years he had no advantages in the way of education in books, save in the common district schools of the town.

Subsequently he attended a year each the academies at Plymouth, N. H., and Newbury, Vt. I have heard him describe the great difficulty with which by manual labor and by teaching school in the winter he defrayed his expenses by his own work. By great effort he prepared himself for college, but when ready to enter the Sophomore class his health broke down in consequence of the severe strain, and his dream of a liberal education vanished away. No one, unless he has experienced the same disappointment, knows how life is ever after a desolation. Speaking of his early struggles for intellectual discipline and advancement, he said, not long before his death: "To aid in obtaining the little education I got, my parents were able to afford me little more than my board and clothes, but I always had their hearty good wishes, their constant and tender encouragement." Parents and children like these have made their State and their country illustrious, and while they survive the empire of free institutions is secure.

At the age of twenty-two years he entered the office of Hon. George W. Nesmith, of Franklin, N. H., as a student of the law, and in that prosperous and influential town he dwelt the remainder of his life.

Judge Nesmith was the early and life-long personal friend of Mr. Webster, his most wise, sagacious counsellor, beloved and trusted by him until his death.

An able and learned lawyer, a highly cultivated and liberally educated gentleman, he was and is the very model of an honest man. His love of justice is the strongest element in a character of exceptional symmetry and strength. Beloved and trusted as no other man has been in our State for more than two whole generations of active life, Mr. Nesmith still survives to mourn for and to eulogize the man who forty-two years ago began the study of his profession under the care of so fit a master.

He was quick to observe and to commend the diligence, intelligence, and perseverance of the young man who thus entered upon active life. In three years Mr. Pike was admitted to the bar. He at once exhibited the qualities of an active, studious, diligent, and faithful practitioner and gave evidence of the prominence which he afterwards attained. He became a partner with Judge Nesmith, his instructor in the law, and afterwards the senior member of a firm with Hon. Daniel Barnard, now attorney-general, and when that firm dissolved, with Hon. Isaac N. Blodgett, now of the supreme court of the State. Continuing the active practice of his beloved pursuit when health and duty would permit, in the later part of his life, he associated with himself his son-in-law, Frank N. Parsons, esq., who, when health failed, assisted him greatly to carry the heavy burdens of professional and public life.

He was wedded to the law. It was impossible for him to be divorced from it. He loved it and its practice with a love that never faltered and a devotion which never wavered. I never knew a more diligent and assiduous student and practitioner of the profession.

He was early active in political life. He represented the town of Franklin in the Legislature of 1850, 1851, and 1852; and again in 1865 and 1866, during which last two sessions he was speaker of the house. He was a member of the State senate in 1857 and 1858, and was president of that body the latter year. Three years he was chairman of the Republican State committee, and he was a delegate to the memorable first Republican national convention which nominated General Frémont for the Presidency. He represented the second Congressional district in the Forty-third Congress, and in 1883, after one of the most extraordinary struggles known in American political life, all the conflicting and embittered elements of his party harmonized in his election to the Senate of the United States. He took his seat in this body December 3 of that year. His term would have expired March 3, 1889.

Political parties, and the country also, might oftener than they do feel grateful to that man who, by his admitted strength, elevation, and conspicuous fitness of character, presents to them a suitable candidate for harmonious and successful concentration in times of factional bitterness and distraction.

In private business affairs he was very successful, and he held many important positions of personal trust.

Mr. Pike was twice married. His first wife was Mrs. Elizabeth Farley, of Andover, Mass., step-daughter of ex-Governor Berry, the war governor of New Hampshire, who still survives rich in the love and honor of his fellow-citizens, and especially of the surviving soldiers of the State. This lady died in 1848, after only two years of married life.

In the year 1850 was consecrated his marriage with Miss Caroline White, daughter of Thomas R. White, esq., of Franklin. Of this union were born three children, now surviving. Edward E. Pike, who resides in Hebron amid the scenes of his father's nativity and to which he retained a never-failing attachment; Mrs. Parsons, the wife of his law partner, and Miss Leila F. Pike, who resides with her mother in the home of their bereavement.

I will say nothing of the sacred and tender relations of his domestic life except that they were of the most fortunate character. To those who have known the strength of mind and the loveliness of the nature of Mrs. Pike during their residence in the capital of the country or during these many years of happy wedded life in the State which they both honored even as it delighted to honor them, words of commendation or even of officious sympathy are as needless as they would be unavailing to her in the impenetrable gloom that has fallen upon her life—a gloom which defies all earthly consolation and which nothing can illumine save the light of love shining from the benignant countenance of her covenant God. She knows her refuge and her strength, and rests secure within that fortress which is higher than us all.

Mr. Pike's service in the Senate was performed under many disadvantages by reason of the brevity of its duration and the physical weakness and suffering of which he was the victim during almost its entire period. But it is still true that the public records bear testimony to a degree of fidelity, industry, and capacity which would have been honorable to any man in good health and in complete command of all his powers.

We know that nowhere else does real ability count for so little as during the early years of membership in this body; nowhere else does long service merely count for so much. But during the brief service of Mr. Pike he demonstrated that there were few, if any, stronger members of the legal profession in the Senate, which certainly contains some members unsurpassed in legal ability and that exalted personal worth which is the indispensable accompaniment of supreme legal power—for conscience is as essential as intellect to the great lawyer—than was my quiet, unpretentious colleague who gave his rare and full-ripened mind to the difficult and vexatious work of the Committee on the District of Columbia and of the Committee on Claims.

The high appreciation in which he was held by the Senate was demonstrated by his appointment to the chairmanship of the last named committee, on its reorganization two years after his service began.

If Mr. Pike could have lived and could have been possessed of the full measure of his real powers until the close even of a single term, I believe that he would have written a conspicuously honorable record for himself and for his State in the annals of the Senate.

As it is, we have reason to be proud of the much that he did and that it was done so faithfully and so well under circumstances when most men would have done little or nothing at all. That which might have been is not undone because of any fault of his, but by reason of obstacles beyond the force of human endeavor, the supreme decrees of fate.

In the summer season of 1885 a mountain shower poured down its flood, which ran violently through the street in front of the premises of Mr. Pike, in the village of Franklin. From the impulse to put his own hand to the work which was so natural to him, he hastened to turn the stream into a safer channel. The sudden and violent exertion either occasioned a new hurt or developed a latent weakness of the heart, and perhaps of surrounding organs, from which he never recovered.

That terrible form of disease known as angina pectoris (heart agony), of which died the lamented Sumner, and many other distinguished men, fastened its unrelenting clutch upon the issues of life, and for him in this world there never more was hope. Everything that mortal skill on the part of physicians, or endurance on the part of the patient, or anxious, loving assiduity on the part of friends, or devout reliance upon a benignant Providence could accomplish was done, but without avail. All the while declining, ofttime in the throes of most excrutiating torture, he labored on, smiling at pain and impending death. With him duty was the supreme consideration, and during his last session here—the first of the Forty-ninth Congress—he often seemed to me to be digging his grave with one hand while he wrought with patient industry and perfect nerve for his fellow-men with the other. He seemed superior to the uttermost pangs of disease and to the most terrible afflictions of fate. His soul power was certainly wonderful, and sometimes it awed me with a sense of the preternatural and sublime.

I never admitted to him any but cheerful anticipations, but it was easy to see that the hard sense which erred not when he judged the case of others was true in its teachings to himself. He may at times have hoped that he was deceived, but he never really believed it. He expected to die, to die instantly and without the slightest warning; yet still he worked and labored on. All must remember how for the last few weeks he was with us in the spring of 1886, his face whitened and his step faltered and his voice grew weak, and the appeal of unspeakable agony looked forth from his deep dark eyes. He was entering the valley of the shadow of death.

I can never forget the time when he came to my desk and putting his hand on my shoulder said:

"BLAIR, I'm going home. Brother GEORGE has kindly agreed to pair with me, and we leave to you to say when it shall be done. I'm going to the mountains; perhaps it will do me good."

I bade him good-by, and God speed. He replied to me cordially; gently we pressed each others hands. He passed wearily through the door and I never saw his living form again. And so the stricken Senator and his noble wife left the city for that peaceful village in the North hoping against hope for respite, not for full restoration. The sweet and invigorating influences of his native climate, the new leaf and the song of birds in the spring time, the thrill of renewed intercourse with old friends and with familiar associations seemed for a while to really strengthen him, and from time to time I heard of his supposed improvement until I flattered myself that his life might be spared even for years.

Exacting engagements prevented my visiting him, when suddenly, while in a distant State, I read in the telegraphic column the news of his instantaneous death.

Walking in the fields with a friend, he raised his arm and, pointing to a monument, he said, "The boundary is there." Instantly he had passed beyond the boundary of life and was in the unmeasured realms of eternity.

O, tell us men, angels, gods, what was it that happened then? But he was ready, and sleeps in the hope of a joyful resurrection.

Senator Pike died at his home in Franklin, N. H., on the 8th day of October, 1886. He was buried with the highest honors of the nation and of the State amid the lamentations of the people among whom he had lived and by whom he was loved so well, on the banks of the Merrimack, just where the cold and dancing waters of the Pennigewassett unite with those of the peaceful Winnepisaukee to form that wonderful stream which, while like all things of beauty it is a joy forever, is also, by its perpetual and blessed industry in the service of mankind, an appropriate type of his laborious and useful life.

In conclusion, I may briefly say of our departed friend that in the practice of his profession he was able, faithful, and successful. He was true to his client and true to the court. He had in a high degree the qualifications of a great judge, but though often proposed for judicial station he remained at the bar from choice. In political life he was broad, statesmanlike, and patriotic, free from partisan bitterness and the petty planning and plotting for personal or party advantage which are sometimes developed in the practical working of our form of government. He saw things in their larger relations and loved every inch of the national soil, and every citizen of the United States.

As a husband and father he was pure and affectionate, a very model in domestic life. In private intercourse few men were more pleasant or instructive, and young men invariably found in him a wise and sympathetic adviser and friend. He never forgot the intense struggle by which his own career had become victory, and he was full of suggestion, encouragement, and hope for those whose success depended on the same hard conditions upon which his own had been achieved.

He was a strong and trusted factor in all the affairs of the community and of the State, and has gone to his grave amid the sorrow and benediction of that people who knew him longest and therefore loved him best.

The nation has need of such men always and never more than now. His death at the opening of what I believe would have been a long and most valuable public service had his life and health been spared, is an affliction to the whole country, and the Senate may well pause even in the rapidly waning hours of the session to pay to his memory this tribute of honor and of love.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, there is nothing that I can add to what my distinguished friend from New Hampshire has said of Senator Pike; and to all that he has said of him, from my knowledge of that gentleman, I most cordially agree.

Senator Pike was an illustration, a type, an example of that New England rural life which has made New England society in respect of its order, its liberty, its observance of law, what it is. He was a man of the people. No college or university education gave him the lead above his fellow-men, but the common school and the common rural life of a well-ordered and self-respecting farming and rural community made him what he was by nature and by education, and gave him the just force that he had in all the public affairs to which he was called; not the brilliant orator, not the ambitious politician, not the amazing and scheming statesman looking sometimes for impossibilities and visionary things, but the sober, well-ordered, straightforward representative of a people of whom he was one, of which he was a pure example, and of which he was of course a true representative.

When that same perpetual fountain that made him such as he was and what he was shall have extended to every part of the continent that the United States has to do with, and every other part of it I may say, there will be of course precisely the same result—communities industrious, intelligent, moral, religious, self-respecting, and respecting every other body and people. So I think that to commemorate in this sad, but in one sense glad, way his life and services, is to pay a tribute to that pure republicanism and that pure democracy out of which I think alone can a republic subsist, of which he gives us such an example.

When I stood on a mellow afternoon of a brown October day at the side of the open grave that was to receive his body, I could not help thinking of what I am now saying, what a type and example he was, merely that, and that is ever so much, of that system of social order, and of social government, and of social law which appeared in all the communities where he was born, and where he lived, and where he died, an example that might be imitated everywhere as the best possible for human government on the earth. The pure democracy of the town meetings that he attended, the common school education of every one of the boys and girls of the communities in which he and his father had lived, the diversification of employment, the farmer supporting the manufacturer, the manufacturer finding a market for the farmer, every operation of social industry, every operation common to all of social education and progress, every sect of religious society, every liberty of opinion, every equal respect for law, existed as a type and an example and as a progress in that community. If it were so everywhere, the number of laws we should be asked to pass would be small indeed.

So, Mr. President, as I say, I can add nothing to what my friend from New Hampshire has stated of this man. A true, earnest, faithful, patient, industrious representative of the body of a people whom he did represent has left us, and so I speak not as regret and sorrow for him, but only as regret and sorrow for ourselves that he has gone from us.

But words, like tears, on such occasions are almost idle; we do not know what tears or words mean; but we have faith, as my friend from New Hampshire has said, that there is something in the hereafter that will open our eyes to wider and better possibilities.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, it was but a few months since that upon the far-off Pacific a people mourned for one they had delighted to honor, and in this Chamber we were assembled in sadness and sorrow to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of one of our number who had been called to go the way of all the earth. Since then once and again the great enemy of the human race has sent his unerring darts into our midst and stricken down the representative of a State.

Following with startling suddenness the death of him we mourn today came the announcement of the death of the patriot, soldier, and statesman, Logan, and again the land was filled with mourning and this Chamber was the scene of the outward demonstration of a grief which could find no adequate expression in words.

Human aid and human solace terminate at the grave or we would have gladly borne him upward upon a nation's outstretched hands. We would have accompanied him, and with the blessings of millions and the prayers of millions commended him to the divine favor.

The personal relations between Senator Pike and myself were of the most pleasant character. Entering the Senate at the same time, belonging to the same political party, elected under similar circumstances, of the same profession, and both being upon the Committee on Claims, where we were frequently thrown together, our acquaintance soon ripened into a personal friendship, which was strengthened by an additional bond of sympathy when, upon his return to the capital at the opening of the Forty-ninth Congress, I learned that his health was so impaired that his death might be expected at any moment.

I shall not attempt to give a biographical sketch of Senator Pike. That duty has already been ably and well performed by another. His biography is a repetition of the history of a majority of the eminent men of this country. It is the oft-told story of persevering industry overcoming all obstacles and securing for its possessor professional eminence and political honors.

Of his record in this body I can speak, because I had an opportunity to know what it was. With his work as a member of the Committee on Claims I was especially familiar. To that committee he proved to be a valuable acquisition. His legal acquirements, his experience, and his industry enabled him soon to master the questions of national and international law which are involved in the consideration of many of the claims before Congress, and gave him great facility in sifting the truth from the ex parte and often unsatisfactory testimony submitted in support of such claims.

His reports from that committee bear the evidence of painstaking care, indefatigable industry, and ripe legal learning. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, also, his learning and his experience as a lawyer were especially valuable. Many of the important measures reported from that committee during the Forty-eighth Congress were reported by him.

In the Senate he was always earnest, diligent, unobtrusive, independent, tenacious of his own opinion, and devoted to duty. His work was without ostentation, not calculated for show, but was of practical value to the Senate and to the country.

Such men are not always estimated at their true worth. Earnest, faithful, practical, honest work is quite as necessary, not only in this body but everywhere, and quite as valuable to the nation and the world as genius. But, in my judgment, politics was not his true field of usefulness. His qualifications, his habits, and his tastes, better fitted him for another calling, that in which by diligent attention and unremitting application he had arisen to eminence—the profession of the law.

The halls of justice, largely removed from the influence of public opinion, where the unbiased mind can sift truth from error in accordance with just and fixed rules, indifferent to results, was the field in which he was best calculated to succeed. We all know with what fortitude, notwithstanding the critical condition of his health, he assumed the arduous duties of the chairmanship of the Committee on Claims at the opening of the Forty-ninth Congress. He only left his post when, late in the session, his physicians prescribed for him absolute rest.

Even then, that his work might be completed as far as possible, he sought and obtained the consent of the Senate to take up for consideration, before his departure, the bills reported by him from the Committee on Claims. He left this Chamber for the quiet of his New Hampshire home, no doubt with the consciousness that he left it forever, and all of us, I think, who were acquainted with the circumstances of his case, believed it more than probable that he would never return.

It is to human ambition and the restless activity it produces that the world is chiefly indebted for its progress.

Man is placed upon the earth for action. Toil is decreed as the lot of every son of Adam. Every one has duties to perform in the world in securing the comfort and happiness of his fellow-men and exalting the destinies of the race; but as we approach the close of life by a wise provision of nature there is less of activity and more of contemplation, the soul gradually begins to relax its hold upon those things which in early years absorbed our attention and called forth our energies, from the struggles and contentions of life, and is attracted nearer to the author of its being.

Such, it appeared to me, was the case with our lamented brother when he left the National Capitol last spring. He seemed to be aware that the activities of his useful life were drawing to a close, and looking backward without regret and forward without fear, he calmly set his house in order for the expected summons which was to call him from the scenes of earth's activities.

We can not, if we would, draw aside the veil and follow him into the sacred precincts of his New Hampshire home, and picture the alternate hopes and fears, the constant solicitude, the fearful apprehension of the wife and the daughter, the fortitude and serenity of the husband and father, and at last the not unlooked-for but sudden coming of the grim messenger.

How impressive the lesson of this hour! As it is with our brother, so will it shortly be with us all.

Nature on every side with ten thousand voices proclaims in unison with the revealed word that "it is appointed unto man once to die." The decree is universal and irrevocable. Neither talent nor station will exempt us; worldly things can not aid us; human love can not succor us.

> The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
> And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour.
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Many of us are in the afternoon of life and are descending into the shadows of the evening, a few more years—possibly days—of toil, of struggle, and vicissitude and our labors will have been ended and "Life's fitful dream" will be over.

The angel of death appears to be constantly hovering over the National Capitol, his darts fly swift and thick into the ranks of the national representatives. Since the adjournment of the Forty-eighth Congress we have been called to mourn the death of the Presiding Officer of this body and three of our number, and nine times has the fell destroyer entered the House of Representatives and stricken a member from its rolls. We do well to pause to-day in the midst of the activities and contentions of life to contemplate death. It becomes us to come to such contemplation with subdued voices and bated breath as if in the immediate presence of the "insatiable archer."

I never look upon the face of the dead or sit in the house of mourning or stand by the open grave, but the thought "what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue," comes to me with overwhelming force. How transitory, how unsatisfactory are the prizes for which men so earnestly strive. Empty are the rewards of ambition—wealth, power, renown, what are they when a man stands face to face with death? Baubles, which amuse for a season, as children are amused by toys.

How at that time the tired and unsatisfied spirit turns from all these things which excite our passionate ambition, and from the unceasing turmoil, the restless strife, the desperate struggle for existence, the clashing of interests and purposes, the discontent and miseries of the race, to seek something more satisfying and more enduring.

> What is life? A bubble floating on that silent, rapid stream;
> Few, too few, its progress noting, till it bursts and ends the dream.

If the soul is not immortal, then indeed is death, which rends asunder earthly ties, strips us of our earthly possessions and sends us naked out of the world as we came into it, a great calamity. But is the grave the end of man? "Shall we go hence, and be no more seen?" No; we may be comforted with the reflection that "Death is nothing but the middle point between two lives, between this and another."

Faith looks beyond the grave and inspires within us a hope of immortality. The word of God proclaims that "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord: they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them;" "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle shall fail, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Our own intuitive consciousness and the almost universal belief of mankind are in accord with the Scriptures in asserting that the soul of man shall survive the tomb. The poet has given expression to this consciousness of immortality in the following lines:

> Oh! listen, man!
> A voice within us speaks that startling word,
> "Man, thou shalt never die!" Celestial voices
> Hymn it into our souls: according harps
> By angel-fingers touched, when the mild stars
> Of morning sang together, sound forth still
> The song of our great immortality;
> Thick clustering orbs, and this our fair domain,
> The tall dark mountains, and the deep-toned seas,
> Join in this solemn universal song.
> Oh! listen ye our spirits! drink it in
> From all the air! 'Tis in the gentle moonlight;
> 'Tis floating 'midst day's setting glories; Night,
> Wrapped in her sable robe, with silent step
> Comes to our bed, and breathes it in our ears:
> Night and the dawn, bright day and thoughtful eve,
> All time, all bounds, the limitless expanse,
> As one vast mystic instrument, are touched
> By an unseen living hand, and conscious chords
> Quiver with joy in this great jubilee.
> The dying hear it; and as sounds of earth
> Grow dull and distant, wake their passing souls
> To mingle in this heavenly harmony!

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I can not, without doing violence to my sense of the proprieties befitting this solemn occasion, sit by the side of this vacant chair without offering my slight tribute to the memory of the genial man who was my nearest neighbor from the time we entered the Senate together, nearly four years ago.

He left his seat in this body during the busiest days of the last session of Congress, and his parting words will ever live in my memory. He told me of the severe illness at his home prior to his return to his official duties, and of his apparently fruitless efforts to regain his health.

He spoke of the wearing work incident to his position as chairman of the Committee on Claims, and how much his inability to respond to the numerous demands made upon him harassed him. His conscientious devotion to duty showed itself in his strongly expressed regret that he must leave the only place where it could be performed, in pursuit of what he feared was the unattainable. I urged him to leave, saying that in the more healthful air of his native State he would probably recover and soon be himself. He said he must go home for rest and quiet, but had little hope for recovery. Reaching out his hand to grasp mine, his final words to me were "Good-bye, brother." It was with him the usual form of expression. The fraternal word came naturally to his kindly lips and was expressive of his generous nature.

During the Forty-eighth Congress I was a member of the Claims Committee with Senator Pike and know with what painstaking industry he did the work that devolved upon him. He handled the law and the facts incident to each case referred to him with the skill and analytical power of an experienced and thoroughly trained lawyer, impressing his fellows with the assurance that when he came to make his report it could be relied upon, and as a rule his conclusions could be safely followed.

His was a most kindly nature, leading him to aid the claimant whenever it was possible to do so without doing violence to his sense of right.

His opinion once formed, he was tenacious of it; not lacking in that element of conviction that must lie at the base of intelligent and conscientious action.

He had all an honest man's hatred of shams, and the only evidence of irritation I have ever seen exhibited by him, was when some proof of insincerity was apparent.

I came to have a very great respect for the quiet and unobtrusive man, who frequently gave in undertone to me, his neighbor, argument and reason for the faith within him that would, if spoken aloud, have commanded the attention of the "listening Senate."

Evil could never have been attractive to such a man as Senator Pike. He seemed to feel with Marcus Aurelius, "Whatever one may do or say, it is necessary that I should be a good man. As the emerald might say, 'Whatever one may say or do, I must remain an emerald and retain my color.'"

Those who knew him in the domestic circle and in his professional life have spoken of the many evidences showing him to have been truly good. I will not speak of him except as I knew him here during the brief time we were thrown so closely together, and my only desire in speaking at all comes from my high respect for the qualities that remain to me as a fragrant memory.

> Only the actions of the just > Smell sweet and blossom in the dust.

The final end of all to our deceased friend came in such form that we might wish our death to be like his. Much of opportunity for preparation for the dread summons, a gradual weakening of the physical and mental powers, and then "the end all here."

Shelley well describes it:

> First our pleasures die—and then
> Our hopes and then our fears—and when
> These are dead, the debt is due,
> Dust claims dust—and we die too.

But unlike the author of Queen Mab, who saw nothing beyond the grave, and to whom death was an eternal sleep, our friend believed, with all the strength of an earnest, honest nature, in the soul's immortality.

The "pleasing hope, the fond desire," the trusting belief, helped him through all his life and permitted him to look upon death as

> The great world's altar stairs
> That slope through darkness unto God.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, upon occasions like this,

> When thoughts
> Of the last bitter hour come like a blight > * * and sad images
> Of the stern agony and shrouded pall
> And breathless darkness and the narrow home
> Make us to shudder and grow sick at heart—

All human ambition sinks into insignificance, the rivalries and resentments of active life are forgotten, and our thoughts turn to the question of the patriarch, "If a man die shall he live again?"

The one characteristic that distinguishes us from all the rest of animate creation is our belief in and our hope of immortality. And if after having implanted within us—

> This pleasing hope, this fond desire,
> This longing after immortality,
> This secret dread and inward horror
> Of falling into naught—

We are indeed to come—

> To be a brother to the insensible rock,
> And to the sluggish clod which the rude swain
> Turns with his shovel, and treads upon—

Then the implanting this aspiration in our hearts and minds was a cruel mockery. If indeed this is the end it were better that we had been as the ox.

But in the language of the great Apostle to Agrippa, "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" In all ages among those created in God's own image this hope has been universal. Our bat-like inability to see what a bright light reveals does not prove that it does not exist. A wider and clearer vision will reveal to us that what to us seems "disorder is order not understood." Such are the paradoxes of nature that in our weakness the brightest light serves but to blind us, and darkness may serve to widen our comprehension and reveal glories never dreamed of before.

> Mysterious night, when our first parent knew
> Thee from report Divine, and heard thy name
> Did he not tremble for this lonely frame,
> This glorious canopy of light and blue?
> Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
> Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame
> Hesperus with the host of Heaven came,
> And, lo! Creation widened in man's view.
> Who could have thought such darkness lay concealed > Within thy beams, O sun! or who could find
> Whilst fly, and leaf, and insect stood revealed,
> That to such countless orbs thou mad'st us blind!
> Why do we then shun death with anxious strife?
> If light can thus deceive, wherefore not life?

The ages have given no higher or nobler expression to the hope of that hereafter which is hidden from us now by life and no expression of a firmer trust in Him who watches the sparrow's fall than the triumphant words of the patriarch:

> I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth:
> And though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God:
> Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another.

If, in the great beyond, in that existence which I like to think of as "the sweet bye-and-bye," the eternal I Am shall judge us by our actions here, by our dealings with our fellow-men, Mr. Pike will have nothing to fear.

My acquaintance with him began with this Congress. While we came from widely separated sections of our common country and differed on many questions of governmental policy, I had been a member of his committee but a very short time before his gentle manners, his uniformly courteous demeanor, and his constant and delicate attentions to the wishes and feelings of others, had attached me warmly to him.

In the discharge of the trying duties of chairman of the Committee on Claims I never saw him exhibit the least impatience or heard him turn away a claimant except with kindness.

A devotion to duty was a strong characteristic of the man, and he remained at his post of duty during the last session of the Senate long after the increasing heat admonished him that his health required that he should seek the rest and invigoration which he could find alone in his New England home.

Fully conscious of his condition he looked calmly and fearlessly forward, and seemed to desire nothing so much as to be found in the discharge of his duty when the expected summons came.

Surrounded by the hills he loved so well, near the beautiful village where his home was, he sleeps his last sleep; and I as his friend lay this last tribute upon his grave.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have not that facility of speech nor that acquaintance with elegant phraseology which will enable me to pay a beautiful or elegant tribute to the memory of our lamented friend Austin F. Pike; but I can pay to him, which if he could take note of these proceedings he would greatly prefer, an honest, sincere, and willing one.

Mr. President, I have not had a very long acquaintance with the deceased Senator. I can only speak of him as I knew, whilst we were both members of this body.

I knew nothing of his early history, and have not learned anything of it except what I have heard his colleague in this body say to-day in the elegant and forcible address which he has just made. I can therefore add nothing to what has been said as to the events of his life.

We were both at the same time members of the Committee on Claims. Mr. Pike first impressed me as a kind-hearted, polite, and generous man who felt kindly to his fellow-men and desired the happiness and comfort of those by whom he was surrounded. His gentle manner, his kind disposition soon won my respect and then my confidence and affection. I never knew a man who on so short an acquaintance so completely captivated both my head and heart.

Observing, Mr. President, Mr. Pike and his services in this Chamber, I will say that the discharge of his duties as he performed them required a high order of talent, a clear head, and a sound judgment. Observing the discharge of his duties as a member of the same committee, I discovered that he was an able, a well-trained, and a well-read lawyer. I found also that he had a very high capacity of grasping the truth from conflicting and contradictory evidence. I found also that he was careful and painstaking in preparation and investigation, and conscientious in the discharge of his duties as a member of that committee. I think that after his service for a very short term upon that committee he succeeded in winning not only the respect and kind feeling of every member of it, but also gained their entire faith and confidence in the correctness and integrity of his conclusions.

Mr. Pike, as I saw him and knew him, could not be classed with that very few who are considered by the world as the great Senators of this body. He belonged, though, to a class of Senators upon whose fidelity to duty, whose patience and care in investigating questions coming before the committees to which they belonged, depend in a very large degree the successful legislation of this body.

I remember to have noticed Mr. Pike's career as a member of this body with a little more than the interest which a mere stranger of an opposite political party would be supposed to feel for one with whom he is brought in contact. Mr. Pike came to the Senate from the Northeast, from a State bordering on Canada; I came from the Southeast, from the Gulf, and yet in the social intercourse, and the Senatorial and official intercourse which I had with him as a member of this body and as a member of the committee to which I have alluded, I never felt but that he might have come from Mississippi or I from New Hampshire.

I regarded him in his political affiliations as a firm, a conscientious, and consistent Republican; but he was singularly exempt from the bitterness of partisanship and from that asperity which grows out of political contests. I felt toward him something in this way, that, except upon pure party questions, I had as soon consult him and confide in his judgment and advice as that of any member of this body.

I have stated my impressions of Mr. Pike. I will not moralize upon this occasion or upon the event which we are now observing. I will only add that as far as my observation extended—and it was long enough and careful enough to let me understand him—I regarded him as an honest, an able, a diligent, and a patriotic Senator. If I were to talk longer I could not say more in his praise than I have. I regard his death as a loss to the Senate and to the country, and I feel that it was a personal loss to myself.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, the usage of the Senate, by which when death shall have set its seal upon the life of any of our associates, we are gathered as it were around the new-made grave to express with respect and affection the feelings and views which we entertain of our departed friends, however frequently it may engage our attention should never be permitted, and is never permitted, to become common-place or to cease to be impressive. It is impossible that an association that has been attended with personal regard and personal esteem for departed associates can be suffered to end without some proper recall to our minds of what it is about him that has endeared him to us, and to us what our relation is to that common and solemn fate that has severed him from us as it shall sever all of us sooner or later from our associates.

I had not the good fortune to be personally acquainted with Mr. Pike until I met him on the floor of the Senate on my access to the place which I occupy and have filled now for almost two years; but I had known of him as a lawyer and as a citizen of the State of New Hampshire; and as my summer home on the banks of that beautiful river that divides Vermont from New Hampshire has made me, as it were, a part of that community, it was not as a stranger that I met him, or as a stranger that he was so good as to meet me. And thus this brief period of less than two years of our association in the Senate seemed to start at once upon a familiar and recognized footing.

We New Englanders, from the narrowness of our territory, and from the greatness even, as we look at it, of our combined States, being so small as compared with some of the single States of the Union, are apt to feel a closer association and to pass over the boundaries of the States more readily than those who are more completely satisfied in the greatness and distinction of their individual State.

Mr. President, when we say that Mr. Pike was born and lived and was reared and died in the ordinary condition of New England life, with the value of those common possessions that we all there enjoy and that by him they were worthily lived up to, we speak of a life that has, from beginning to end, found nothing about it that was not in its circumstances and in its traits that which we might claim as the proper outgrowth of the institutions in which we have been reared and in which he lived to the end of his life. And when I thus speak of these circumstances and conditions of the life of our deceased friend and of the lives of the survivors that I see about me representing those States of New England, I do not speak of it as at all of an inferior condition of life. If admitted the brilliancy, if admitted the distinction that belong to more conspicuous communities are wanting, it does not lack any of the essential and substantial qualities of manhood and of patriotism and all that share in the greatness of American institutions and American prosperity and American fame, which after all find their basis in the individual qualities of the common people of the United States.

Nor, Mr. President, is it an insignificant course of life to have begun only with the same start with all one's neighbors, and they with us enjoying the same advantages, and that one should come as Mr. Pike came to do, step by step through an honorable profession to the possession of the confidence of his neighbors, and then to a share in the political life of his own State, and finally by the general consent and approval of his fellow-citizens to receive this crowning distinction of being a member of this Senate. It is not by fortune, nor is it by any incongruity that this life has thus grown up and thus been graced and honored. While it can not come to all, yet it can come to none but by qualities of mind, by labors of life, and by the heartfelt affection and respect of a community that thus his life is to be filled out.

Nor, Mr. President, is it a rightful view of a life that was circumscribed in early years, as that of Mr. Pike was, to speak of those circumstances as in our American system of society a disadvantage—as thereby having missed some of the opportunities of education and to have been required from the outset to be frugal, and careful, and industrious. It is from these beginnings and by these trainings that character and life are filled out; and it would be nearer the truih to say that when affluence and all the opportunities which life can furnish to the rich are provided for the young career in public life, in public service, in public distinction, all these can less easily be attained. How many are there of these who fall by the way? How often have the harder course of industry in early life and the frugal virtues that are thus required led to success in reaching the goal, while many have fallen by the way under these affluent and brilliant circumstances who might have triumphed but for these disadvantages?

That Mr. Pike was a distinguished lawyer there is no doubt; and that he earned from the beginning and enjoyed up to his death complete possession of the confidence of the community in that profession there is no doubt. And when we add the fact that in this second and, if you please, larger arena of political distinction his course was of the same manly nature, how can we fail to recognize that he is entitled in the fullest sense to all the honor and to all the respect that we can pay him? And when our meed is given that here he was without any reproach, and that he was the equal of all in the soundness of his judgment, in the purity of his conduct, and in the respect and esteem of his associates, we pronounce a credit to a life that needs no greater distinction.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, one week ago we met to pay our last tribute to a colleague who for many years had been brought out in bold relief by the calcium light of continuous high position. We spoke then not in terms of adulation or extravagant eulogy. His services were great, his life was pure, his aspirations lofty.

To-day we meet again to pay deference to friendship, to merit, and to death, and lay our last offerings upon the tomb of another who has been called from earth.

These men represent two types who, each walking well the path he trod, met finally here and then went onward to a common lot.

On one were focalized the rays from a million firesides. His lot had thrown him amid stirring events, and the elements in him had made him the point of the wedge which split opposing forces. The other reached the same goal by less brilliant but not less meritorious methods.

It is not given to all nor is the theater presented to achieve the double distinction of military and forensic success; yet in all that composite growth we call society the less brilliant is often as deserving and no less hardly won than the other. Each man was a type of different forces which, uniting, blending, and modifying each other, have harmoniously worked for the welfare of their country and mankind. General Logan was a tornado modified, regulated, and guided by the civilization of the church, the school-house, and the town meeting. Senator Pike, a product of that civilization, was the steady and conservative force born of two hundred and fifty years of love of liberty, of frugal living, of prevision of and provision for the future. The rigid exactions of his conditions and traditions have for their result the survival of the fittest in such men as he.

Born in a State fruitful in great men, he became early identified with the beautiful valley of the Merrimac, immortal in history and resonant with song.

He sprang from that stock which for two and a half centuries had battled with adverse circumstance. He drew nourishment from a soil which had been ground out by frost and tempest and sunshine from under the feet of the years. He came, possibly, of a blood which had consecrated the turf of Fort Erie and which gave its name to the lone sentinel which keeps its watch over the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains. He came of that stock which overwhelmed Baum at Bennington and harried Burgoyne to his final discomfiture at Saratoga. He came from that stock which poured its resistless stream through the gorges of the Alleghanies, carrying with it a new civilization of which the corner-stone was the equal rights of man.

His lot was cast mid less exciting scenes than his clansmen who went forth to new enterprise and new homes; but the part assigned to him in the parent hive was just as essential and contributed just as much to that great result which we call country. In looking over a sketch of his life, I find he was painstaking, truth-loving, and never-tiring in the part assigned him.

Living in the same town where he commenced his career, he passed through the usual gradations of public trust—always one step farther on, till he reached the highest honor his State could confer, without a stain upon his character, and, I believe, without a blemish on his soul.

To me, Mr. President, such a life as this is the poetry of sustained effort. Many men have done brilliant things, like Alvarado or Alonzo de Ojeda. In those cases the glamor and the romance attaches to the act, and not to the individual. But when a man for fifty years goes out and in before his neighbors in a town where he is known to all, and we find him always advancing in places of trust, with intermissions, perhaps, but never retrograding in the public esteem, we may safely say that this man is an entity, that he has integrity of mind and heart, that he is a solid fact, that he has filled his place, that the world has been better for his having lived. His life is a compound and a crystallization of a thousand efforts, a thousand aspirations, a thousand defeats, blending and transmuting all things into an ultimate and entire success.

Such a character, I believe, was Senator Pike's.

We entered the Senate together, and possibly there arose between us a community of feeling born of that coincidence. I often talked with him. I observed his industry, his painstaking methods. The conscientious habits of a lifetime followed him here and attended him in any task assigned or assumed.

As I look back upon our intercourse I believe the night which has since overtaken him was then casting its shadow across his pathway, and that he recognized the portent.

I handed him one day a metrical version of an old Scandinavian myth, which told of a city with fair towers and crennellated battlements wherein no one ever died. He read it with great interest and found consolation, it seemed to me, in the fact that endless living did not and could not satisfy the cravings of the human heart; that even there

> One and another who had been concealing
> The pain of life's long thrall,
> Forsook their pleasant places and came stealing
> Outside the city wall;
> Craving with wish that brooked no more denying,
> So long had it been crossed,
> The blessed possibility of dying,
> The treasure they had lost.
> Daily the stream of rest-seeking mortals
> Swelled to a broader tide.
> Till none were left within the city's portals,
> And graves grew green outside.

Addison tells a story of a dweller in Bagdad, who having a vision saw a bridge projected from a cloud on the hillside to a mist on a corresponding acclivity. Beneath flowed a deep, dark, and turbulent stream. The bridge rested on an hundred arches; the first seventy were firm and intact; the last thirty were crumbling and unsafe. An innumerable multitude was continually emerging from the cloud and struggled and jostled each other on the bridge. In the bridge were numberless traps, and through them the wayfarers kept falling to disappear in the stream beneath. A few kept on till they reached the last thirty arches, and with trembling step faltered along amid the crumbling stone, only prolonging by their utmost efforts the inevitable plunge into the tide beneath.

This was a picture of human life.

"Alas," said the beholder, "how is man given away to misery and mortality; tortured in life and swallowed up in death."

The good genius who had attended the dreamer told him to turn his eyes down the stream and there where the cloud had lifted he beheld innumerable islands decked "in living green." Their like "the eye of man had not seen, nor the heart of man conceived." Moving about in radiant apparel amid fountains and flowers, under translucent foliage which transmitted the light but intercepted the heat, he recognized many of those whom he had seen upon the bridge.

The good genius said these islands, more in number than the sands upon the shore, are the abode of good men after death. Is death to be feared that will convey thee to so happy an existence? Think not man was made in vain who has such an eternity reserved for him.

It is a pleasant thought to me, Mr. President, and a consolation when I mourn our colleagues who have joined the many whose memories are dear to me that they have gone as pioneers to that undiscovered country and that when we fall through the bridge or slip from the broken arches into the stream beneath to reappear, with God's help, on the islands of the blessed we shall not be received as strangers, but as longed-for and expected guests.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. President, it is with a saddened heart and under some embarrassment that I rise in this distinguished presence to add a closing word expressive of my regard for the late honored Senator from New Hampshire, whose loss from this deliberative body we all so deeply deplore. The State which he so ably represented, and the sister States which recognized his eminent worth, are sorrowful over the Providence that has taken away from us a full rounded manhood, so nearly complete in its human attributes as was that of the late Hon. Austin F. Pike. The sudden termination of an uninterrupted friendship of over thirty-five years is a personal loss that I sincerely mourn.

My colleague and others have made full reference to his early life, and I will speak of him only after he had struggled successfully with his many adversities and entered upon the active duties of his profession. The venerable Judge Nesmith, the warm friend and peer of the late Daniel Webster, was quick to perceive the well-balanced mind of his young law sudent. With a large and lucrative practice already established he clearly saw the importance of securing efficient aid in caring for its rapid extension. After Mr. Pike's admission to the bar, at the age of twenty-six, he became the partner of Judge Nesmith and so continued for a period of years. The law firm of Nesmith & Pike was justly regarded as among the most eminent in the State, and a young man was deemed fortunate who could gain admission into this office for legal training and study.

Through a brother of mine, the late Charles G. Cheney, esq., of Peterboro', N. H., a law student in this office, it was my privilege to learn of the rare combination of manly qualities Mr. Pike possessed, among which was the tender care he had for his students, his desire to excite an interest in their studies, and his solicitude for their advancement. His successful life, his recognition by his fellow-citizens, and final election to this honorable membership, found quick response from me in words of congratulations.

In political life he never occupied any doubtful position, but was always a gallant and conservative leader, unyielding only as impelled by the sound reasoning of a clear brain and an honest heart. Before he was elected a member of the Forty-third Congress he had respectively filled the offices of the speaker of the house of representatives and the president of the senate in the New Hampshire Legislature. Prior to his election to the United States Senate he had been offered the position of judge in our supreme judicial court, but declined to accept this honor.

Rarely does it occur in human existence where the exit from the finite to the infinite leaves impress of honors so complete and of a life so useful. His earthly record revealed the wise purpose of human existence, and the divinity in man was made manifest by the void left in the aching hearts of weeping friends. The culmination of life's possessions had been reached when—

* * * his great Creator drew
His spirit, as the sun the morning dew.

So sudden was his death that his life had passed away without even the ministering hands of his wife and family. We approach tenderly and solemnly into the presence of the inanimate forms of our friends, but are comforted with the hope that the spirit, although not visible, is yet near. We offer our words of sympathy to the hearts most sadly bereft, ourselves remembering "how brittle is the thread of life," and as we linger by the shore of the "shadowy river" a sublime faith in our Heavenly Father lifts the dark cloud, and with clearer vision we see the "beckoning hand" urging us on to the final reunion in the heavenly home.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the resolutions introduced by my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 17, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 16, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., as follows:

Almighty God, as the Members of this House have now gathered to pay the last tribute of respect and affection to the memory of a man who for so many years filled a large place in the public eye both in the field and in the Senate, and wrought with such indomitable energy and courage, whose hand was ever unstained by pelf, we pray Thee to impress upon us all the shortness and uncertainty of human life, and the fleeting nature of earthly honors and dignities! Help us to see that a man's true rewards in life are found in his own soul, self-enfolding the large results of experience, magnanimity, courage, heroism, purity of purpose; and that thus, and thus alone, we can attain glory, honor, immortality, eternal life. So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. We pray through Jesus Christ, our Lord, Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. What procedure is necessary to give the House the benefit of the facts in the case for which the House has been laboring for more than a year?

EMPLOYÉS IN GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the bill (S. 2877) to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2877) to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office. The pending question is on the motion to report the bill back to the House with a recommendation that the enacting clause be struck out.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. On that question the vote was taken, and the negative side was in the majority. The point of no quorum was made; but I understand that the gentleman who made that point withdraws it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point that no quorum voted withdrawn?

Mr. STEELE. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. No further count being insisted upon, the noes have it; and the motion is not agreed to.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 68, noes 33.

Mr. GOFF. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, and Mr. GOFF were appointed.

The tellers proceeded to make the count.

During the count, the following proceedings took place:

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Chairman, there appearing to be no quorum, I submit that it is the duty of the Chair to order the roll to be called.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Members are voting very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers have not made their report.

Mr. STEELE. Do not the rules require that the roll shall be called?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Not until we make our report. Members are voting very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not decide whether a quorum has voted or not until there is a final report.

Mr. GOFF. A "final report" has been made; the last two members who voted were reported to the Chair.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It takes two to make a "final report."

Mr. STEELE. I move a call of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is customary to continue the count by tellers as long as members manifest a disposition to vote.

Mr. STEELE. I move a call of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order; the tellers have not made their report.

Mr. STEELE. Then I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order pending the division now being taken upon the proposition that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. STEELE. Then I move to lay the bill on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. STEELE. Must we wait all day for a quorum? I will inquire of the Chair how long we must wait for a quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule fixes no time, but as long as members continue voting it is not usual for the Chair to order a call of the roll.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. A quorum has now voted.

Mr. GOFF. "It takes two to make a final report." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the tellers report ayes 131, noes 33. The ayes have it; and the committee determines to rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (S. 2877) to promote the efficiency of the General Land Office, had directed him to report the same back with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I call for the previous question on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the House take a recess until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion that the House take a recess.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 23, noes 94.

Mr. PERKINS. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. WEAVER of Iowa were appointed.

The tellers proceeded to make the count.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD a resolution of the Illinois Legislature.

Objection was made.

Mr. PERKINS (during the count). Mr. Speaker, I understand there are eleven minutes remaining to this committee. I ask that those eleven minutes be given to the next succeeding committee, and that we now proceed with business.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I prefer that the vote continue; I trust that we may have a quorum.

The SPEAKER (at 1 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.). The hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees has expired.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. COBB submitted the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2172) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

T. R. COBB,
H. S. VAN EATON,
L. E. PAYSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. N. DOLPH,
H. M. TELLER,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it will be well for me to make a statement to the House in regard to the conference report.

It will be remembered by the House we passed a bill during the last session forfeiting all the Northern Pacific land grant west of Bismarck. About that time the Senate passed this bill. It came over to the House and was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. The committeee struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserted the bill which had passed the House.

Now, the difference between the two bills I will state briefly. The House bill, as I have said, forfeits all of the grant west of Bismarck, amounting to about 36,000,000 of acres. The Senate bill, which was amended by the House, forfeited that portion of the grant west of the Cascade Mountains, or so much of that portion not covered by the road at the passage of the bill; in other words, all not coterminous with the completed road at the date of the passage of the bill. And it pretends to forfeit that portion of the grant from Wallula Junction down to Portland. That is the portion of the grant which the company never intends to earn in any form, a line running south of the Columbia River. This grant is north of the Columbia River, and if they should construct a road so as to earn, so to speak, that portion of the grant north of the Columbia River from Wallula Junction down to Portland, they would have two roads, one on each side of the Columbia River, running parallel with each other from a given point to another given point. That is the Senate bill.

Therefore it does not, in point of fact, forfeit any land except that portion of the Cascade branch west of the Cascade Mountains, which amounts to about three and a half millions of acres.

The committee of conference insists that bill ought not to pass.

There are other provisions which I might call attention to for a moment. It confirms to the purchasers of the company or to those who may have contracts with it, or those who may have in possession lands which were originally granted by the bill creating the corporation—it confirms to parties now claiming them in any way the possession of such lands east of Wallula Junction to the extent of the entire purchase by companies or individuals. West of that this bill of the Senate proposes the title from the railroad company to the purchaser shall vest in the purchaser to the extent of 320 acres to each individual. We believe, perhaps, that is wrong. But, however that may be, the question at issue is whether this Congress will forfeit three and a half millions of mountainous land and leave thirty-two millions unforfeited, which in justice should be forfeited, and which this House declared by more than four to one should be forfeited.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does not the Senate bill confirm 32,000,000 acres to the railroad company?

Mr. COBB. That is the end of this grant if the Senate bill should pass.

The report was adopted.

Mr. COBB. I move the House insist and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. COBB, Mr. VAN EATON, and Mr. PAYSON.

WIDOW OF JOHN A. LOGAN.

Mr. STEELE, by unanimous consent, presented the following; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Engrossed joint resolution No. 3.

Whereas General John A. Logan was one of the most distinguished volunteer soldiers in the late war for the preservation of the Union, and rendered signal service to the Republic both in war and in peace: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives be requested to support and do all that they honorably can to secure the passage of the bill now pending in Congress to grant a pension to the widow of John A. Logan.

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be hereby instructed to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives a copy of this resolution.

I, Webster Dixon, principal secretary of the senate of the State of Indiana, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and complete copy of joint resolution No. 3 as adopted by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Indiana January 13, 1887.

WEBSTER DIXON.
Principal Secretary Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I demand the regular order.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills under the special order, the object being to reach the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 66, noes 26.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. HATCH were appointed tellers.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I would be under obligations if the Chair would appoint somebody else to act as teller. I do not care to act as a teller when the point is made that no quorum has voted on a proposition to take up and consider a public proposition of importance like this. If the gentleman from Ohio wants to delay the business of the House and the country he has it in his power to do so by such motions.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think we have much more important business for consideration than this.

Mr. HATCH. Yes; provided somebody brings it up. No business has been called up, but still the gentleman seeks to delay this bill by such objections.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This is worse than no business.

Mr. HATCH. I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3) to prevent the claim of the war taxes under the act of March 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof, by the United States as a set-off against States having claims against the General Government.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] had the floor for thirty minutes. If he desires to go on now it is proper that he should have the floor for that purpose. If not, I do not see any good reason for taking up the bill in the sixteen minutes remaining of the time of the House until it begins the execution of the order heretofore made for the eulogies.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. As the hour of 2 o'clock is set apart for eulogies, I move that the House take a recess until that time.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask the gentleman to waive the motion for a moment while I suggest a matter on which I desire to ask unanimous consent, and to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. HAMMOND. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 41, noes 19; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

The recess having expired, the House at 2 o'clock resumed its session.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President in writing was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message announced the approval of House bills of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1280) to authorize Frank W. Hunt to erect and maintain a ferry across the Missouri River at the military reservation of Fort Buford, Dak.; and

A bill (H. R. 10056) granting to the Saint Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company the right of way through the Indian reservations in Northern Montana and Northwestern Dakota.

DEATH OF SENATOR LOGAN.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the resolutions of respect for the memory of the late Senator Logan passed by the Senate and transmitted to the House.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of John A. Logan, long a Senator from the State of Illinois, and a distinguished member of this body, business be now suspended, that the friends and associates of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to furnish an engrossed copy of the same to the family of the deceased Senator.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I now submit for present consideration the resolutions I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of John A. Logan, late a Senator from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the business of this House be suspended that appropriate honors may be paid to the memory of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to transmit to the family of the deceased a copy of these resolutions.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. There are a number of gentlemen who have expressed a desire to speak or to print remarks upon this occasion, and in their behalf I ask unanimous consent that permission be given generally to print, and also to extend remarks which may be delivered on this subject in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, Logan is dead, and we, his friends, comrades, colleagues, and admirers, have gathered here to-day to bear testimony to his worth; to stop for a few moments beside the new-made grave, as it were, and cover with flowers his last resting place. Nations have stood with uncovered heads in respectful honor of men whose works and deeds have been as nothing compared to Logan's.

For almost thirty years his official acts and personal doings have formed a considerable portion of the woof and warp of our country's history, and for the last twenty-five years there has scarcely been a day, and along the whole line hardly a point, where the form, the voice, the footprints of Logan could not be seen, heard, and recognized.

That Logan was a self-made man is, in a certain sense, true; but if by the term "self-made" any one understands or intends to convey the idea that he was born within the dark, cheerless, comfortless valley of poverty, ignorance, and lowly social position, he was not self-made. His father, Dr. John Logan, was a polished, cultivated, educated physician, surgeon, and gentleman of large means for the day and frontier country in which he lived. He occupied the highest social position, and was frequently honored by his people by elections to the State Legislature and other official positions. General Logan's mother belonged to one of the best families of the South, being a sister of Lieutenant-Governor and Judge Jenkins, formerly of Virginia, recently of Illinois.

While the old home was not a palace, it was comfortable, ample in size for the family, friends, and belated traveler passing that way. It was the rendezvous for the gentry, the politicians, and the best people of that country, who always found a welcome around the bountiful and hospitable board of Dr. Logan. Amid such scenes and surroundings, John Alexander Logan was born and reared. Schools and colleges were few and far between in Southern Illinois in those early days, and therefore an education was difficult to obtain. In educating and preparing himself for the conspicuons positions, both civil and military, occupied for so many years by him, he was indeed self-made.

Logan was a born warrior, full to overflowing with military genius, spirit, courage, and dash. His military record in the Mexican war was creditable and honorable for one of his years, but it was during the war of the rebellion that his military ardor and genius blazed forth in peerless splendor and glory. As colonel of the Thirty-first Illinois Regiment, he was almost worshiped by his officers and men; as the commander of a brigade, division, corps, and army, he was the central sun of all his command, and stood in their estimation as the invincible commander, the irresistible leader.

At the battles of Fort Donelson, Champion Hills, Vicksburg, Raymond, Resaca, Kenesaw Mountain, Peachtree Creek, Decatur, Atlanta, and Jonesboro' he led his forces always to victory. He was the most magnetic, romantically dashing soldier I ever saw upon the battlefield. Who of those who witnessed it can ever forget the picturesque splendor of his appearance and bearing as he dashed down the line as the new commander of the Army of the Tennessee, just after McPherson fell on that terrible 22d day of July, 1864.

The impetuous Hood had launched his forces upon our lines with the fury and power of an Alpine avalanche; McPherson the chivalrous had fallen; a half-defined panic seized our men, and they began falling back, steadily, almost doggedly, at first; but with fast-expiring courage and rapidly increasing speed they shrunk before the eager onslaught of the enemy. Just then Logan came tearing down the line at full speed. He was superbly mounted upon a powerful black stallion, a genuine charger, a war horse indeed; his long black hair floated out like a banner, his fearless eagle eyes were two flaming orbs, his face was as dark as the front of a storm cloud, and his voice was like the battle-blast of a bugle. Instantly the retreating, half panic-stricken soldiers changed front, reformed their line of battle, fixed bayonets, and followed Logan in an irresistible charge against the enemy, driving them in confusion from the field.

At the battle of Raymond it became necessary to change the position of a battery of artillery on the field. In moving to the new position the battery had to pass over a portion of the field where quite a number of the dead of both armies lay. Logan halted the battery, and while in full sight of the enemy and under fire, dismounted and helped with his own hands to tenderly remove the dead bodies, both Federal and confederate, from the road where the cannon had to pass.

Such chivalry, such magnanimity, such tenderness in the fire, shot, storm, and very hell of battle, has never been surpassed, nor equaled since the days of Bayard, Sidney, and De La Hay, of each of whom, and Logan, it could be truthfully said, "He was without fear and without reproach." Since the war he has been, and ever will be, regarded as the ideal volunteer soldier by his old comrades wherever dispersed.

Logan was a born leader in civil, as well as in military life. As a nisi prius lawyer he stood in the front rank of the profession, even before he entered Congress the first time. As a member of the Illinois Legislature he was chairman of the judiciary committee of the house.

In Congress, both in the House and Senate, his position and works have been so important and conspicuous for almost a quarter of a century that the country and the whole civilized world must be familiar with them.

He was a partisan, both in religion and politics. While not a conspicuous member of the church, he had a firm hold on his religious opinions, and believed with all his heart in the Christian religion and the doctrines and creed of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Nothing would stir his wrath more quickly or effectually than a sneer or gibe at the Christian religion.

And so in politics. While originally a Democrat, when brought face to face with and being compelled to choose between a National Government or a confederation of States, he at once unhesitatingly chose the National Government, rejecting the idea that this Government was a confederation of sovereign States, and at once became a Republican of the most pronounced type. He had the courage of his convictions and believed with all his soul in republicanism and in the idea that "this is a Government of the people, by the people, for the people." While greatly maligned and much abused and misrepresented by his political opponents, he was honored and beloved by his old neighbors and friends without regard to politics.

Few men have held so many hearts in the hollow of their hand as did John A. Logan. He was the most conspicuous political figure in the West, if not in the country; and in Illinois the vacancy caused by his death can never be filled.

His smile will ne'er again cheer comrade's heart,
Nor voice fall sweetly on the eager ear
Of listening multitudes. The nobler part
Is his. With boundless trust, faith pure and clear,
He rests within the bosom of his Lord.

Farewell to thee, or to that part which dies;
But to thy name and bright imperishable fame
We can not say farewell. Within our hearts their lies
A memory of thy glorious deeds and name
Which alone with death can die.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply sensible that no words of mine can add to the name and fame of General John A. Logan; and yet, coming as I do from the State in which he had his birth, and which at the time of his death he so ably represented in het Senate, and having for so many years had the honor of his acquaintance and friendship, I can not, in justice to my own feelings, permit this occasion to pass without paying some tribute, however humble it may be, to his memory. My first acquaintance with John A. Logan began in 1840, when we were yet but boys. His father, Dr. John Logan, whom I well remember, and mine, were in that year members of our State Legislature, and we accompanied them to Springfield, the then new capital of our State, where we first met and formed an acquaintance which a little later became intimate, and finally ripened into a friendship which continued uninterrupted and unbroken to the day of his death.

I remember John A. Logan as a member of our State Legislature in 1853, and again in 1857, when he was a member of the house and I a member of the senate. He was then an intense, an ardent Democrat, and I was first a Whig and then a Republican. But, however we differed politically, our personal intercourse was always pleasant and friendly; and no man could know Logan without respecting him for the strength of his character and for his frankness and his manliness.

In 1853 he must have been, if not the youngest, among the youngest members of the State Legislature, and yet he was a leading, prominent member of the house of representatives; took an active part in all the proceedings, and exhibited at that early day the same characteristics which in the last twenty-six or seven years of his life made him one among the most conspicuous figures in our national affairs; that is, he was earnest, enthusiastic, fearless. He had opinions and the courage of his convictions, and he maintained them with an ability which I know made his then political friends regard him as one of the most promising young men of the State.

Logan was a member of the Thirty-sixth and also of the Thirty-seventh Congress. But in 1861, before the expiration of his second term, he resigned his seat in Congress, went home to Illinois, raised a regiment, and entered into the military service of his country for the preservation of the Union. He served in the Thirty-sixth and in the Thirty-seventh Congress with ability and distinction. The distinguished member (Judge KELLEY) who sits before me served with him in the Thirty-seventh Congress, and can speak more accurately of his public service at that time than I can. But in 1861, in the last month of that memorable Congress which closed with the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln as President, Logan uttered these patriotic words:

I have been taught that the preservation of this glorious Union, with its broad flag waving over us as the shield of our protection on land and sea, is paramount to all parties and platforms that ever have existed or ever can exist. I would to-day, if I had the power, sink my own party and every other one with all their platforms into the vortex of ruin, without heaving a sigh or shedding a tear, to save the Union, or even to stay the revolution where it is.

This was the language of sublime patriotism, and if Logan had uttered no other words but these in that Congress they would of themselves have entitled him to the highest distinction as a noble citizen and a true patriot.

I was, Mr. Speaker, of Southern birth, and I loved my native land as a man ought to love it. But I loved this great Republic better if possible than I loved my own life; and knowing John A. Logan as well as I did, with his strong political and party prejudices, I can never forget how my heart warmed towards him when I heard of the noble, patriotic stand he had taken for the Union and for the flag of his country. Up to that time we had been politically opposed to each other. But from that on until I stood by his bedside, on that sad and deeply distressing 26th day of December, and saw him pass away, I never ceased to love and honor him.

I shall not attempt on this occasion to follow General Logan at length in all his brilliant and wonderful career after he entered the Union Army in 1861. Nor is it necessary for me to do so, for his military service at least is well known to all persons who admire great deeds and love and honor the glory of their countrymen. The story of the many memorable marches, battles, and campaigns in which Logan participated and won a glorious distinction and a name that will live forever fill the brightest pages of his country's history, and will be repeated by the children of the Republic, I trust, when all who now live shall have passed away.

Logan was in the meridian of life when he entered the army in 1861. He had served with some distinction as a soldier in the war with Mexico, and was not therefore altogether without experience in military life, and at once on again entering the military service of his country, animated as he was by the loftiest patriotism, he displayed such marked ability and such high soldierly qualities that his fame was assured in the very first battles in which he participated. We can not well think of Belmont, of Henry, and of Donelson without associating the name of Logan with them. At Donelson really the first great victory of the war was won; and Illinois certainly had her full share of the glory of that victory. Every patriot in the land, and especially every citizen of Illinois, should ever feel a just degree of pride in remembering the names of Grant, and Wallace, and McClernand, and Logan, and Oglesby, and Morrison, and Ransom with all the other brave and gallant soldiers of Illinois who helped to fight the battle and win the victory at Donelson.

Well might the governor of Massachusetts congratulate the governor of Illinois on the gallantry of her troops in giving to the country the first great victory of the war. And, Mr. Speaker, Logan was a conspicuous figure in the battle of Donelson; and it was there he shed his first blood in defense of the Union and the flag of his country. But at Corinth, at Port Gibson, Raymond, Jackson, Champion Hills, and Vicksburg, at Rocky Faced Ridge, at Resaca, and all the memorable battles of the Atlanta campaign; on the march from Atlanta to the sea, and up through the Carolinas to Bentonville, N. C., where I believe he fought his last battle of the war for the Union; and wherever this brave, gallant, patriotic soldier went at the head of his command, he upheld and defended the flag of his country, with a heroism and a patriotism absolutely sublime.

At Goldsborough, N. C., I met General Logan for the first time during the war; I called on him at his headquarters, and received from him a cordial and pleasant greeting. But I was strongly impressed with the wonderful change which I found in him since I had last seen him. He was changed in his manner. He had none of the rollicking air of his earlier years. He had manifestly grown with his great opportunities. The great responsibilities which had rested upon him, first as commander of a regiment, then of a brigade, then of a division, and finally of an army corps, in the field, and engaged in active military operations, had developed in him a higher, better, and nobler manhood. The fearful scenes through which he had passed had given him more sober views of life. There was nothing of profanity or frivolty in his conversation. He spoke of the wonderful War through which we had been passing, and which, as Richmond was then in our occupation, he fondly hoped would soon be over. He expressed the belief that we would emerge from under the dark cloud of war stronger and better as a nation and a people than ever before.

It was a pleasure to me to hear him speak so hopefully of the future of our country, for in the courage of his great soul he saw no serious obstacles in the way of our future national greatness and glory. There was no pride, no pomp, no ostentation in his manner; and I was deeply gratified to see that he bore the high rank and distinguished honors, which he had fairly won by his own gallantry, with becoming modesty. And I can say to-day, Mr. Speaker, that I left his headquarters at that time with a feeling of pride in John A. Logan as a citizen of the State of Illinois, which has never diminished in all the years that have followed.

Mr. Speaker, Logan was a great soldier. He was not only a soldier of great courage, but he had great ability to command men; and he fairly won for himself every promotion he received, from the beginning to the end of the war, by his valor, his ability, and his patriotism. He richly deserves the reputation so universally accorded to him of being the great volunteer general of the Union Army. And from the time he drew his sword in defense of the Union until he sheathed it at the close of the war, when peace was restored and the Union saved, there was no stain, no dishonor upon it. He served honorably and faithfully in whatever capacity he was placed, and by his soldierly bearing in every battle he fought he inspired in his men a confidence and courage which repelled all thought of defeat. How many old soldiers I have heard say to me, "We always felt safer and better when we knew Logan was near."

Was ever any general more beloved, more idolized by his men than was Logan? And did ever any general love and honor the soldiers who fought under him, and I may say all soldiers who followed the flag in defense of the Union, than did John A. Logan? I think I can safely say No! in answer to both these questions. He was at all times and under all circumstances the soldier's friend. He was their friend during the war, whether in the camp, on the march, or on the battlefield. And ever since the war he has been their friend. In his active military service, marching and moving from State to State, none knew better than he how much of suffering, how much of exposure and hardship soldiers had to endure in fighting the battles of their country. He knew how they had impaired health and periled life itself to save the Republic, and at all times and on all occasions, when proper to do so, he insisted that justice should be done the soldier, and I believe that his death produced a more profound sorrow in the hearts of the old soldiers of the country than that of any other man who has died since the war, unless it may have been the death of that great soldier, General Grant.

But it is not for the military service of General Logan alone, glorious as that has been, that we should honor his name. I have spoken of his service in civil life before the war. But since the war he has represented the State of Illinois in Congress, either as a member of the House or the Senate, continuously from 1866 to the day of his death, with an intermission of two years, and always with great ability and fidelity. No man has ever been more faithful to public duty than John A. Logan. He has been true to every trust confided to him, and is entitled to quite as much distinction for his energy and industry, his integrity and ability in the councils of the nation since the war as he was for his heroic courage, his gallantry, and his patriotism in the military service during the war. John A. Logan was one of the most untiring, energetic, industrious, fearless men I have ever known in public life. I have often wondered how he accomplished so much work as he did, for but few, if any, of our public men have taken a more active part in all our important national legislation in the last twenty years than Logan. And yet he loved his friends devotedly, and when I have called upon him I found him generally surrounded by a house full of acquaintances and friends; and when he found time or opportunity to prepare himself so well as he did for his public duties was to me a mystery.

But Logan was in many respects a remarkable man. He never shirked either duty or danger. He never approached public questions or public duties limpingly or haltingly. On the contrary, he met them boldly and without hesitation. He was as quick to form an opinion as he was frank to express and bold to defend it after it was formed. He was a man of positive character and convictions, and always asserted himself in whatever position he was placed, if it was in the performance of a public duty; but it was without arrogance or an assumption of self-importance. It has been said that he was ambitious to be President, and if he was it was an honorable ambition, and many of us who knew him best and honored him for his great deeds believed that his distinguished services both in civil and military life fairly entitled him to that honor. But he was manly and honorable in his ambition, and was never a trimmer nor time-server; he never dodged or tried to dodge any question nor avoid any responsibility for fear it might affect his Presidential aspirations. He was always a true man, and you knew exactly where to find him and what to depend upon.

It has been said that Logan was not without his faults, and so he was not. If he had been he would not have been human. But he had as few of them as most of men. Some say that he was impatient at opposition, and that this was a weakness of his character. I know, Mr. Speaker, he was sometimes impatient at opposition; but I have attributed it to the earnestness of his nature, the absolute honesty of his convictions, and a strong belief that he was in the right, and it was difficult for him to understand why others could not see the matter in the same strong light in which he saw it. And this impatience of opposition was not always an evidence of weakness, but often of strength of character. Whatever faults, however, General Logan may have had, he certainly had great virtues, and many noble qualities both of head and heart. He was a loving, devoted husband, a kind, affectionate father, a generous, true friend, and an honest, manly man.

But he has left us. This man of wonderful activity, of untiring energy and industry, of earnest patriotism, of heroic courage and distinguished ability—this illustrious citizen, soldier, and Senator has gone out from among us to return no more forever. He has left us, as many of us who knew him best and loved him most believed, before he had reached the zenith of his usefulness, and when we hoped higher honors were yet in store for him.

Mr. Speaker, I stood at the bedside of John A. Logan when he was dying and saw him pass peacefully away. And the scene, one of the most affecting and I may say deeply distressing I ever witnessed, can never be obliterated from my memory. To see this strong man, this friend and brother, this distinguished and much-beloved citizen and Senator of my own State, struggling with that enemy of our race to whom we must all sooner or later surrender, and to witness the deep anguish, the bitter grief of his heart-broken wife and children, filled my heart with an inexpressible sadness, with a depth of sorrow never felt before in the death of any public man, however distinguished. And to-day my heart, and I trust all our hearts, go out in tenderest sympathy for that noble woman, his grief-stricken widow, and her children, who sit under the shadow of a great sorrow.

Mr. Speaker, we shall miss Logan in the councils of the nation. We shall miss him in the State which gave him birth, and where he filled a large place in the hearts and affections of the people. General Logan has been greatly beloved and honored by the State of Illinois, and in return he has shed honor and renown upon the State by faithful and honorable service, and by the luster of his great deeds. And to-day we deplore his death and mourn his loss as a calamity to the State and to the entire country. But he leaves behind him a brilliant record, a noble example, and a name and fame which will live forever.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, a great citizen who filled high public stations for more than a quarter of a century has passed away, and the House of Representatives turns aside from its usual public duties that it may place in its permanent and official records a tribute to his memory and manifest in some degree its appreciation of his lofty character and illustrious services.

General Logan was a conspicuous figure in war, and scarcely less conspicuous in peace. Whether on the field of arms or in the forum where ideas clash, General Logan was ever at the front.

Mr. Speaker, he was a leader of men, having convictions, with the courage to utter and enforce them in any place and to defend them against any adversary. He was never long in the rear among the followers. Starting there, his resolute and resistless spirit soon impressed itself upon his fellows, and he was quickly advanced to his true and rightful rank of leadership. Without the aid of fortune, without the help of influential friends, he won his successive stations of honor by the force of his own integrity and industry, his own high character and indomitable will.

And it may be said of him that he justly represents one of the best types of American manhood, and illustrates in his life the outcome and the possibilities of the American youth under the generous influences of our free institutions.

Participating in two wars, the records of both attest his courage and devotion, his valor and his sacrifices for the country which he loved so well, and to which he more than once dedicated everything he possessed, even life itself. Reared a Democrat, he turned away from many of the old party leaders when the trying crisis came which was to determine whether the Union was to be saved or to be severed. He joined his old friend and party leader, Stephen A. Douglas, with all the ardor of his strong nature, and the safety and preservation of the Union became the overshadowing and absorbing purpose of his life. His creed was his country. Patriotism was the sole plank in his platform. Everything must yield to this thought; every other consideration must be subordinated to it, and he threw the whole force of his great character at the very outset into the struggle for national life. To him no sacrifice was too great, no undertaking too difficult, no charge too desperate, no exposure too severe, no siege too hazardous. He commanded, Mr. Speaker, on the battle line, and never ordered his men to go where he would not lead. His skirmishers were never so close to the enemy's guns as to keep him away. He was every inch a soldier, dashing and fearless, often exposing himself unnecessarily against the earnest protests of his commanders and his comrades.

Wherever the fire was the hottest, wherever the line was most exposed, wherever the danger was most imminent John A. Logan was always to be found. He seemed the very incarnation of soldierly valor and vigor. Belmont and Donelson, Champion Hills and Vicksburg, Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain tell the story of his lofty courage, of his martial qualities, of his genius to command and of his matchless heroism, as these great battles tell to all mankind the dreadful cost of liberty and the price of nationality.

Great and commanding, however, Mr. Speaker, as were his services in war the true eulogist of General Logan can never pass unnoticed the important services rendered immediately preceding his enlistment and afterward in arousing an intense, a deep, a profound love for country and a strong and lasting sentiment for the cause of the Union not only in his own State, but in every one of the Northern States; and the full measure and influence of his prompt action and courageous stand at that time never can be estimated. His patriotic words penetrated the hearts and the homes of the people of twenty-two States. They increased enlistment. They swelled the muster-rolls of States. They moved the indifferent to prompt action, they drew the doubting into the ranks of the country's defenders.

His first election to Congress was in the year made memorable by the debate between Lincoln and Douglas. In the presidential contest of 1860 following he was the enthusiastic friend and supporter of Douglas. But the moment secession was initiated and the Union threatened he was among the first to tender his sword and his services to Abraham Lincoln and to throw the weight of his great character and resolute soûl on the side represented by the political rival of his old friend. He resigned his seat in Congress to raise a regiment, and it is a noteworthy fact that in the Congressional district which he represented more soldiers were sent to the front according to its population than in any other Congressional district in the United States. It is a further significant fact, that in 1860 when he ran for Congress as a Democratic candidate, in what was known as the old ninth Congressional district, he received a majority of over 13,000; and six years afterwards, when at the conclusion of the war he ran as a candidate of the Republican party in the State of Illinois as Representative to Congress at large, the same old Ninth district that had given him a Democratic majority of 13,000 in 1860 gave him a Republican majority of over 3,000 in 1866. Whatever else these facts may teach, Mr. Speaker, they clearly show one thing, that John A. Logan's old constituency approved of his course, was proud of his illustrious services, and followed the flag which he bore, which was the flag of the stars.

His service in this House and in the Senate almost uninterruptedly since 1867 was marked by great industry, by rugged honesty, by devotion to the interests of the country and to the whole country, to the rights of the citizen, and especially by a devotion to the interests of his late comrades in arms.

He was a strong and forcible debater. He was a most thorough master of the subjects he discussed, and an intense believer in the policy and principles he advocated. In popular discussion upon the hustings he had no superiors, and but few equals. He seized the hearts and the consciences of men, and moved great multitudes with that fury of enthusiasm with which he had moved his soldiers in the field.

Mr. Speaker, it is high tribute to any man, it is high tribute to John A. Logan, to say that in the House of Representatives where sat Thaddeus Stevens, Robert C. Schenck, James G. Blaine, and James A. Garfield, Henry Winter Davis, and William D. Kelley, he stood equal in favor and in power in party control. And it is equally high tribute to him to say that in the Senate of the United States, where sat Charles Sumner and Oliver P. Morton, Hannibal Hamlin and Zachariah Chandler, John Sherman and George F. Edmunds, Roscoe Conkling and Justin Morrill, he firmly divided with them the power and responsibility of Republican leadership. No higher eulogy could be bestowed upon any man, no more honorable distinction could be coveted.

It has been said here to-day, Mr. Speaker, that John A. Logan was a partisan, that he was a party man. So he was. He believed in the Republican party; but while he believed in the Republican party, its purposes and aspirations, he was no blind follower of party caucuses or of partisan administrations. The world knows how Logan loved his old commander, General Grant. He loved him with a simple faith; he had been his friend in all his active years; he had presented his name for the first time to the Republican National Convention in 1868, as the candidate of the then dominant party for the Presidency of the United States, and he had stood by him and supported him with his utmost energy in every subsequent contest that he made for that great office. But, loving Grant, he had yet the independence and the courage to dissent from his judgment and his policies on more than one memorable occasion, and I recall one such occasion now, Mr. Speaker, which can not be remembered by any of us without enhancing our admiration for the dead Senator.

It was when the contest between President Grant and Charles Sumner was at its height; it was when the party caucus had decreed that the veteran statesman of Massachusetts, the apostle of freedom, must be deposed from the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, a position he had so long and with such marked distinction filled, a position for which he was eminently qualified by education, ability, and experience. John A. Logan was one of four Republican Senators who uttered earnest and emphatic protest against that action, and his grand utterances on that occasion should be remembered, for they are worthy of the hero of a hundred battles. Here are his words:

> Twelve years ago, when I came to Congress, I differed with the Senator from Massachusetts in my political opinions. I had always recognized him as a man of great ability, as a man of sterling integrity and worth. Yet I had no sympathy whatever with his political views. But I was attracted toward him in my sympathies and feelings because of the fact that I stood many times in this Chamber and saw him stand like a Roman senator and hurl away the curs of slavery as they snapped and snarled at him. I many times saw him disperse them in debate on the floor of the Senate. I learned then to admire him, although I did not fully agree with him. He then, sir, led the army of liberty in this country. He was its leader in the Senate, its leader everywhere; as its orator, as its advocate, as the man who advanced opinions, as the man who went far in advance and beckoned to others to come forward with him and give liberty to all the people of this country. During the terrible war through which we have passed he was one of the great leaders in the Senate. Through all our trials and difficulties, through our misfortunes and our triumphs, he stood at the head of the men in favor of liberty in the land. When this administration came into power he still, as the great debater, as the great statesman in the land, stood at the head of all.

So General Logan spoke of Charles Sumner; and, so feeling, he could not consent to witness the humiliation of him who had stood on the advanced outpost of liberty and aroused public thought and quickened public conscience in favor of freedom for all men. His sense of justice was very strong and very deep; his convictions of fair play were of the kind that made him the prompt and ready defender of those who were to be dealt with unfairly. He was always an open adversary; he never fought under concealment; he never fought in darkness or in ambush; he was always direct in his methods, whether in war or in peace, and "the path of his thought was straight like that of the swift cannon-ball, shattering that it may reach, and shattering what it reaches."

Mr. Speaker, he was not only quick to defend Charles Sumner, but he was as prompt to defend his old comrade and leader, General Grant, when a little later he was unjustly (as Logan believed) attacked in the Senate, and the warp and woof of the thought of his defense both of Sumner and of Grant is exactly the same. He puts the defense of both upon the ground of what they have done for their country. In defense of General Grant he opened with this simple but pathetic inquiry: "What has the tanner from Galena done?" And then, answering his own question, he said:

> He has written his history in deeds which will live so long as pens are dipped in ink, so long as men read, and so long as history is written.
> The history of that man is worth something. It is valuable. It is not a history of glittering generalities and declamation in speeches, but it is a history of great deeds and great things accomplished for this country.

He reviewed his brilliant achievements at the head of the Western army, and said:

> General Grant was then brought to the Army of the Potomac. He made a success, he won the battle, victory perched on our banner, we succeeded, slavery was abolished, and our country saved.

The man who had done all that, Logan declared, was worthy to be commended, not condemned. Then he made a most telling appeal to his associates to stand by the great captain who, at the head of a million of men, had made perpetual the best government in the world.

Mr. Speaker, General Logan's military career, standing alone, would have given him a high place in history and a secure one in the hearts of his countrymen. General Logan's legislative career, standing alone, would have given him an enduring reputation, associating his name with some of the most important legislation of the time and the century.

But united, they present a combination of forces and of qualities, they present a success in both careers almost unrivaled in the history of men. He lived during a period of very great activities and forces, and he impressed himself upon his age and time. To me the dominant and controlling force in his life was his intense patriotism.

It stamped all of his acts and utterances and was the chief inspiration of the great work he wrought. His book, recently published, is a masterful appeal to the patriotism of the people. His death, so sudden and unlooked for, was a shock to his countrymen and caused universal sorrow among all classes in every part of the Union. No class so deeply mourned his taking away as the great volunteer army and their surviving families and friends. They were closely related to him. They regarded him as their never-failing friend. He had been the first commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, and to him this mighty soldier organization, numbering more than four hundred thousand, was indebted for much of its efficiency in the field of charity.

He was the idol of the army in which he served—the ideal citizen volunteer of the Republic, the pride of all of the armies, and affectionately beloved by all who loved the Union.

Honored and respected by his commanders, held in affectionate regard by the rank and file, who found in him a heroic leader and devoted friend. He advocated the most generous bounties and pensions, and much of this character of legislation was constructed by his hand. So in sympathy was he with the brave men who risked all for country that he demanded for them the most generous treatment. I heard him declare last summer, to an audience of 10,000 people, gathered from all sections of the country, at the annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at San Francisco, that he believed that the Government should grant from its overflowing treasury and boundless resources a pension to every Union soldier who was incapable of taking care of himself, asserting with all the fervor of his patriotic soul that the Government was unworthy of itself and of the blood and treasure it cost to save it which would permit any of its defenders to become inmates of the poorhouses of the land, or be the objects of private charity.

Mr. Speaker, the old soldiers will miss him. The old oak around which their hearts were entwined, to which their hopes clung, has fallen. The old veterans have lost their sturdy friend. The Congress of the United States has lost one of its ablest counselors, the Republican party one of its confessed leaders, the country one of its noble defenders.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely sympathize with the State of Illinois and the entire country in the loss to the public councils of General John A. Logan, whose valor and skill upon the battlefield were supplemented and rounded out by a career of great usefulness in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States.

He was a child of the people, and he received at their hands almost every honor that could be appropriately bestowed. He was a fair and complete illustration of the justice and the resulting strength of our form of government, in this, that it gives to the worthy and industrious citizen an opportunity to reach the highest positions known to the laws.

The records of our public men are the indications of the destiny of our country, either for weal or woe. They represent the moral height to which the people grew in their time. They are examples for the study of the generations which are to follow them.

Therefore, when a man like John A. Logan passes off the scene, it is our grateful duty to recall every act of his which, whether in the field or in the forum, was characterized by deep conviction and by undoubted moral and personal courage.

The full story of his life will be told in truthful and loving words by the members of the Illinois delegation and by his political friends on this floor; but I can not refrain from expressing this brief tribute of my respect to the memory of a public man who deserved so well of his country.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, whoever pays a proper tribute to the memory of General Logan must write the history of the country during the late war and the years succeeding.

With Lincoln, Grant, Sherman, and Thomas he was a factor—and not the least in the settlement of those questions which determine the fate of a nation, ay, of a civilization.

Southern Illinois was mainly peopled by immigrants from the Southern States. It was natural that they should bring with them the sentiments of the section from which they came. The prevailing sentiment was one of sympathy with the South and its institutions.

Logan was born and nurtured in Southern Illinois, and it was natural that he should be affected by the sentiments and prejudices of his surroundings.

In early manhood he became a leader among his fellows. He was a soldier in the Mexican war; later a member of the Illinois Legislature. In 1860, at the age of thirty-four, he was elected for a second term to the National House of Representatives as a Democrat.

The greatest popular leader in the ranks of the Democratic party for a generation immediately preceding the war was Stephen A. Douglas. Logan was his admirer, supporter, and trusted friend; he gave him most earnest support in the contest in 1860 for the Presidency. The session of Congress immediately preceding the inauguration of Lincoln was one of the most eventful and, it then appeared, most disastrous in the history of the country. The secession of one or more Southern States was of almost weekly occurrence. Fear, uncertainty, and panic were abroad in the land. There seemed to be no thoroughfare leading to the preservation of the Union.

An effort by force to preserve the Constitution and enforce the laws, seemed certain to not only involve the United States in a war with the seceding States, but also to light the fires of civil warfare throughout the North. Especially was the danger imminent in the West, and more especially in Southern Illinois and Indiana.

It was even suggested by the mayor of New York that that metropolis should secede and form an independent city.

The blood of the people had not cooled between the time of choosing Presidential electors in the fall of 1860 and the inauguration of Lincoln on the 4th of March, 1861.

Many Democratic partisans claimed that the Union was destroyed by the secession of States; that there was no power under the Constitution to preserve the unity of the Republic by force, and even if such power existed, it would be wicked to use it. Some Republicans pronounced in favor of allowing "the wayward sisters to depart in peace."

The people were anxiously asking what will Douglas do, and what will be the position of Logan? Many Democrats expected them to take grounds against Lincoln's administration, and against the use of force in preserving the Union. Douglas, just before his death, made that series of most effective speeches—the last one in Chicago—in which he gave President Lincoln and the Government his hearty and unreserved support. Logan, with entire devotion to the country, united with him. To them there were only two parties, one for, and the other against, the preservation of the Union.

When Douglas died Logan took his place as a leader, entered the army, and did not lay down his arms until the war closed. At the commencement of the war, through the efforts of Douglas and Logan, the North was saved from the ravages of civil warfare within its borders.

Logan is universally acknowledged to have been the greatest volunteer general of the late war. In effectiveness of service to the Republic history will accord him an equal meed of praise with any officer, either regular or volunteer, in the late war. The regular Army is trained in the profession of arms; it is set apart from the mass of the people; its methods are arbitrary; in the very nature of its constitution it is without entire sympathy with the people. It is the element of force, to be set in motion after all other agencies have failed.

Our people boast that our principal reliance is upon a citizen soldiery for the defense of the Republic. Such an army, a block of the people, called from the ordinary avocations of life, retains the hopes, fears, prejudices, and sentiments of the people at large, from which it is taken. With such an army public opinion is all-powerful.

Logan not only proved a great general in the field, but by placing his fingers upon his own pulse was enabled to count the heart-beats of the whole people.

The people recognized that he was one of them. They gave him their confidence; to confidence they added respect, and to respect love. These he retained until his death.

He was a friend of the people, and the people were his friends. Logan was criticised for his devotion to the well-being of his companions in arms. He felt that the country could not give them too high a meed of praise. He was convinced that the liberty of the citizen—his security in the rights of property—in short, the very existence of the Republic itself, was owing principally to the sacrifices, the bravery, the patriotism of the soldiers of the late war. He believed that gratitude and a sound public policy alike demanded that the United States should be liberal in contributing to the support of those who were disabled in the line of duty, and in caring for those who are now disabled and dependent.

Time, no doubt, will demonstrate that in this policy he was correct.

After the close of the war he was twice elected to Congress as Representative at Large, and three times as Senator from the State of Illinois. Nature made him a leader, and he did lead—in civil as well as in military life.

His death is the nation's loss. His record is the nation's inheritance. He molded events in great crises. His achievements are examples of the value of ability when coupled with convictions. Whatever he did he did with all his might. His life will be a healthy incentive to action to the millions who are to follow after him.

Logan dead will be a potent factor for good when those people who drift without convictions, priding themselves upon their culture in lieu thereof, are dead and forgotten.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the time accorded me—ten minutes—is much too brief to enable me to even glance at the history which records the grand achievements of the illustrious dead in honor of whose memory we are met. John A. Logan sleeps with his fathers. The final audit of his life's account has been made up.

The record discloses nothing that invokes the charity and shield of the maxim which constrains us to "speak nothing but good of the dead." No friend of the deceased need with pen or speech paint an ideal man and call it Logan. His name and fame will stand the test of searching scrutiny conducted in the light of truth. That Logan was a leader among men is conceded. That he occupied a position of commanding influence among his associates in public life and in private station can not be questioned. To what he owed his position as a leader, what elements in his make-up gave him commanding influence, may not be so generally recognized.

He was a strong man morally and mentally. Not intellectually great nor yet equipped with that rich store of mental furnishing supplied by the schools which enables some of lighter mental caliber to pass current before the world as profound thinkers, "men of pith and moment." Logan was born and reared on the frontier.

The strong qualities that made him a man of mark, a citizen of controlling influence, were inherent, were God-given, not acquired.

They were not the result of training in the schools, nor yet due to an overmastering intellect. If upon these arsenals alone he had been compelled to rely to equip himself for the contests in which he was to engage, he might never have risen above the dreary level of plodding mediocrity.

Along the highway of his public career, as in the walks of private life, he daily met men who were in the matter of sheer intellectual endowments his superiors, but such men too often present what Logan did not, a mere accumulation of intellectual power, uncoupled, and seemingly not capable, by reason of some lack, of being coupled to useful purpose or great employment. As has been said, in the inventory of his mental outfit there could not be found that wide range of learning gathered in the schools which men on every side of him could boast.

In fact he was constantly criticised by gentlemen the thin and wasted soil of whose intellects had in the schools been cultivated to exhaustion and were of depth so shallow that an idea that had strength and vigor enough to require a tap root would sicken and die, and where only the pinks and pansies that tend merely to grace and beautify the field of thought and action could be sprouted.

Let it not be inferred that he despised or was indifferent to ripe learning. Far from it. In just appreciation of its advantages Logan gave to his children the opportunities of collegiate training which the hard lines of the frontiersman denied to their father. I only meant to say he held in merited contempt mere pedantic criticism from that—

> Set of dull, conceited hashes
> Who confuse their brains in college classes,
> Go in sterks and come out asses,
> Plain truth to speak,
> And hope to climb the steep Parnassus
> By dint o' Greek.

In judging of men he was accustomed to scratch through the veneering that studied polish may put on, and ascertain the true quality of the family timber.

No, sir, Logan could not justly claim great intellectual superiority. He had not the grace and accuracy of diction which may be acquired in the halls of learning.

What made this man a leader of men? What gave him influential prominence throughout the country? It was, I submit, due in the main to the inherent qualities of heart he possessed; his uncompromising devotion to what he conceived to be duty. With him, between right and wrong there was no middle ground. Between right and wrong there could not consistently with the high obligations of duty be any compromise. In him there was found coupled with the unselfish and unequaled zeal of a Covenanter Calvinist, if you please, the chivalric bearing of a cavalier.

He was of the material of which martyrs are made. If a sense of duty required, he would have suffered at the stake with John Rogers. And by the same token he might not have been seriously troubled at the taking off of Servetus. John A. Logan's highest ambition was to be right. His stubborn and inflexible will anchored him immovably to his convictions. Hence he never drifted and never wavered.

It was never necessary to run the courses and measure the distances of his political career in order to fix his position. Once establish the base-line of right and you could find Logan.

To what, to him, was duty he was as constant as a fixed star to its course in the heavens.

Up to 1861 he was a Democrat in the strictest partisan sense. The Democratic party was the agency through which all great good to our country was to be worked out.

The party horizon came down all around him—he could not or did not appear to see beyond it. Then came a time when that too narrow range of vision was extended. The veil that obscured the more enlarged view of portentous events was lifted by the conflict of 1861.

Logan stood for the first time to contemplate what stubborn adherence to party lines meant. He saw portending in the near future a Constitution overthrown and defied, the Union dismembered, a Government disrupted and destroyed.

From that moment love of party was swallowed up in love of country. His duty to him at least was clear. The integrity of the Union, the supremacy of the Constitution, the acknowledged sovereignty of the flag were henceforth to him above all else. With what uncompromising zeal, unselfish devotion, and undaunted heroism he served the cause of his country in the field and in the councils of the nation is known to all his countrymen. In that service, as in all else, Logan refused to surrender his convictions for one moment. His stubborn adherence to his own judgment sometimes made him a disagreeable disputant. He would be inclined to consider the soundness of his judgment and weigh correctness of his conclusions unless the integrity of one or both was called in question. That done, with him discussion was at an end; thereafter his yielding in any degree was impossible, as he deemed the slightest concession might be construed into admitting a trace of excuse for asserting that any motive other than the highest good controlled his action.

The Calvinistic faith of his mother, the stern integrity of his father blending in the son fitted him for a leader, and made him a man whose influence could not but be healthful. He would have been Moreau at Hohenlinden, but was incapable of being Moreau at Dresden. He would have led at Malvern Hill, and marched toward the sound of the cannon and the rising dust of battle at Bull Run.

He was ambitious to be President, but in the pursuit of that worthy ambition he never practised the small arts of the demagogue nor resorted to the tricks which mere political expediency suggest. Such an example and illustration of worthy political ambition may not be without its use at this time.

These, in my judgment, are the crowning glories of Logan's character: That in all his course he sought "to walk in the light." Inflexible adherence to duty, as that duty was revealed to him. Incorruptible integrity in every field of action, and in every employment. Unselfish devotion to country and friends.

These attributes of his character shine more resplendent now that he walks no more among us.

He seemed not to have lived the time allotted to man. But if his last ambition was not gratified, it can truly be said that his fondest hopes were realized in having lived to see the supremacy of the flag established and recognized throughout all our borders, the Union restored, and the Republic he so loved and served occupying the proud position of "first among the nations of the earth."

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the nation lingers by the grave of Logan! His funeral sermon has been preached in the presence of the people and by his coffin, but that was not enough for his memory. Every church, every post of the Grand Army of the Republic, the United States Senate, the House of Representatives, nearly every home and every heart in this great land have offered tributes to the memory of this mighty fallen chief.

Weeks have passed since the bells of the nation tolled him to rest, and yet the people remain uncovered.

It is no common man whose fall shocks sixty millions of people.

I come to the sad duty of this hour not to speak for others, but to render the heart offerings of a comrade and a friend.

A GREAT SOLDIER.

We first naturally think of General Logan as a soldier. So strong was he at every post of duty that history must hesitate to pronounce upon him as the greater soldier or the greater statesman.

Though not trained to arms, he was a great soldier. The volunteers with one voice claim this. The leading generals of the country, those schooled for war, admit it.

He fought as one who ever kept in mind the great cause that called him to the field.

If true of any man, it can be said that danger and death had no terrors for Logan.

Restless when the enemy was afar, he became eager and fired by the approach of battle and a consuming whirlwind when the charge was sounded.

His presence drove fear from the hearts of the soldiery. He was inspiring, fearless, conquering.

The tumult of battle and the roar of cannon made him the imperial personification of a great fighter.

In thinking of Logan as a soldier, forget not his greatest attribute. Not for ambition did he draw his sword, but for his country and all his countrymen.

A GREAT STATESMAN.

But few men combine the qualities of a great soldier and a great statesman—Logan was both. The courage and wisdom needed for a great statesman are of a higher order than the courage and wisdom needed by a great commander. It requires a higher, mightier courage to face and control a sweeping Niagara of popular thought than it does to face death or command an army of men. Logan was one of the few men of his time who combined both essentials for these high trusts. Most statesmen, like some generals, follow their forces. The great statesman, like the great general, must lead. On any field Logan was "a born leader of men." On both fields he kept close to the people. He was earnest, approachable, courtly, chivalrous. He was intellectual, thoughtful, studious, and independent. He was tenacious, stubborn, untiring, honest. He would strike back if attacked, and strike at once, and his blow would be remembered. He was sensitive as a child, but generous as a mother. He was eloquent and profound. His range of vision and sweep of thought took in the whole country. He was a strong partisan, but a stronger American. He had peers as a statesman, but not one that could look down upon him.

A MAN OF THE PEOPLE.

He was a man of the people in an eminent degree. His devotion to them was as sincere as was their love for him. He was too big a man to be cramped or disturbed by the arbitrary laws of society, as made up of the rich and those who talk of the "family" and "blood;" but he was most at home with those of simple manners, free from the conventionalities that grow like weeds about the homes of wealth.

Seldom did wealth support the career of Logan. It was the people who followed him from obscurity to the Senate.

But few men come out of the trying, cruel, searching conflict of a national campaign stronger than when they enter it. This John A. Logan did in 1884. When nominated, his party knew him to be strong with the people, but the great strength and popularity that he developed was a surprise to his party. In the moment of his defeat he was greater than he who wore the laurel.

It was in the country at large as in my own State in 1884. His passage through Iowa was a triumphal march, and his pathway could be traced by the surging, shouting masses of the people.

The historians will tell of General Logan and of Senator Logan, but the living will remember him as the "Black Eagle," "Black Jack," and "Honest John."

He was an open, honest, brave, powerful tribune of the people. He was one of the great commoners of his time.

THE SOLDIER'S FRIEND.

He was a warm, true friend of the old soldier. No soldier from any part of the Union with a just claim for help ever appealed to him in vain. He knew, and never forgot, what they had done and suffered for the country. The fact that the money centers, most benefited by his comrades' blood, were daily turning a colder face and a tighter hand to the old veterans, enraged him. God grant that his holy indignation may survive him! He resolved all doubts in favor of the soldier, and entertained no doubts for the helpless ones that the dead comrade left with his country.

As a powerful, kind, untiring friend of his old comrades he had no equal, and no man can wear his mantle.

You need not seek a burial spot for John A. Logan. He is buried in and can not be removed from the warm, loving hearts of his old comrades in arms.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the pen of history can only do justice to so great a record as that which John A. Logan has bequeathed to his country. We can pay on an occasion like this only a brief tribute to his memory. Other gentlemen have spoken not only of the public record in civil life but of the great military career of this distinguished citizen in very fitting language. I can not permit this occasion to pass without at least adding a word to the record of this memorial service in honor of the dead statesman and military chieftain.

John A. Logan came into this Hall as a member of the House at one of the most anxious periods of our history, the beginning of the Thirty-sixth Congress. It was a period of disquietude, a vague and undefined belief was stealing into the minds of all men that the tremendous issue which for half a century statesmanship had held suspended was demanding a decision in a voice too loud and imperative to admit denial. The hour of revolution was at hand! While not taking an active part in current business of the House, John A. Logan displayed from the beginning qualities and powers that gave promise of the great career in civil and military life which he was destined to complete. The State of Illinois was then represented in the House and Senate by an unusually able body of men. Stephen A. Douglas and Lyman Trumbull were Senators; Washburn, afterwards so distinguished in this House and later as our minister to France during the war between France and Germany; Lovejoy, the greatest of the anti-slavery leaders of the Northwest. McClernand, Farnsworth, Fouke, Kellogg Morris, and Robinson, were his colleagues in the House—a very strong body of men. All of them were either then men of national reputation or afterwards achieved distinction in civil or military life. McClernand, Farnsworth, and Fouke won distinction in the Union Army; and yet with such colleagues John A. Logan was a striking feature of the House from the time he took the seat where my friend [Mr. EDEN] now sits. His manly deportment, the fire and vigor of his occasional remarks, the resoluteness of his purpose as expressed in every gesture of his hand and tone of voice, commanded attention and gave promise of a great career if the occasion should arise, and of honorable distinction under any conditions of human life.

John A. Logan entered this Hall in the flower and vigor of youth, in a house composed largely of young men, but four of whom, two from the South and two from the northern section of the Union still retain seats on this floor, he was a prominent actor in the House from the beginning, he was the highest type of a strong, positive, rugged, fearless, man, whose opinions were absolute convictions, controlling and mastering. As a politician and partisan he neither gave nor asked quarter. He had been educated in a school of politics where devotion to the Union of the States and the Constitution of the United States was paramount to all else; and impressed with the belief that the Union could only be maintained by guaranteeing to every State of the Union the absolute and exclusive right to control its own domestic institutions, he resented with fiery indignation any intermeddling of the citizens of one State with the local institutions of another, and saw in the ascendency of his own political party the only safety for the Union of the States. To him the Union of the States was the fortress of free institutions, and at every hazard it must be maintained.

He never hesitated in the expression of his political opinions, and they were not modified during his service in the Thirty-sixth Congress or the short called session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, which met on the 4th day of July, 1861, and yet, I think, it was manifest when Congress met in the month of December, 1860, that if what all men feared, and yet no man expressed, should fall upon the country, the horrors of civil war, that the force of opinion which had committed him, in common with the great party of the North with which he was then identified, to the policy I have mentioned would impel him, if war only could maintain the Union, to accept the appeal to arms without hesitation whatever might be the result. If the Union could not be maintained by the sweet influences of peace, it must be maintained by war.

He would have preserved the Union by compromise, by concessions—he indorsed cordially, as I believe, not simply by his vote, but cordially and earnestly, the declaration submitted to the House by John J. Crittenden on the 22d day of July, 1861, declaring the objects of the war, and did not modify his views upon that subject during that session of Congress, and before the next session he had entered upon his great career in the Union Army. But "war legislates" and remolds and revolutionizes public opinion. Great public disorders which shake the foundations of government have a mighty mastery over the opinions of men. I am satisfied that General Logan did not at any time hesitate in his devotion to the Union, hostile as he was to the principles of the great party which obtained control of the Government in 1860. No matter what party was in power, he was for the Union.

A meeting was held in this Capitol in the month of December, 1860. Most of the Democrats of the Senate and House from the northern section of the Union were present, to discuss the pending perils of the country. John A. Logan and, I think, all of his colleagues were present. Opinions were freely expressed. When it came to the question of what should be done in the event that the Union should be threatened, and the calamity of war came upon us, one of the most outspoken champions of the Union was John A. Logan. He did not hesitate in the declaration of his opinion. In any emergency, whatever should be the result to the institutions of the States, the Union must be maintained. Yet he spoke as a Democrat, with no attempt to conceal his hostility to the party soon to enter upon the control of the Government.

When at a subsequent period he became convinced that the Union could not be restored with African slavery, that its continued existence would be ultimately fatal to our free institutions, he freely avowed his opinions. He returned to this House after the close of the war firmly impressed with the belief that every vestige of slavery should be wiped out and that the policy of the party which controlled the Government during the war could alone secure the peace and safely of the Union, and with unfaltering fidelity adhered to the fortunes of that party up to the hour of his death.

I believe General Logan, while a member of the House, and before he resigned his seat here to take command in the Army, did not make a definite expression of opinion on the questions of the pending war. Perhaps no opportunity occurred when his views could be definitely expressed; but I think I am justified in saying that General Logan fully accepted the views of his political friends of the North, and stood by them while he remained a member of the House and before entering the Army, and that the school of politics in which he was educated and the principles of public policy he had adopted led him and them to but one result—the Union must be maintained, if not by peace, by the dread alternative of war.

General Logan and all of his Democratic colleagues of the Thirty-sixth Congress were devoted friends of Stephen A. Douglas. They accepted his political views without question. They stood by him without faltering. They had come into the House through that great contest, to which reference has been made, between the two great leaders, Douglas and Lincoln. When war became inevitable it is well known that Mr. Douglas promptly gave assurance to his great and successful rival then President of the United States that in a war for the Union the administration should have his undivided support. It was also in perfect harmony with General Logan's opinions and character, and his devotion to that great statesman, that he should espouse with his whole soul the cause of the Union. General Logan was a man in many respects of the same type with Mr. Douglas; both were devoted friends of their country, firm, confident, and fearless. When war was inevitable, the declaration of Mr. Douglas of his purpose to stand by the Union at every hazard thrilled the country and animated his friends. General Logan and most of his immediate associates adopted at an early moment the same patriotic policy.

I have not spoken of the military career of General Logan. It has been well presented by others—his associates in arms. It is of itself a great and commanding record. I have only referred to General Logan in his earlier relations to public life. While it may not be claimed perhaps that in intellectual power and attainments he is to be classed as one of the great statesmen of our country, yet there were qualities of true greatness in General Logan that can not be questioned, his achievements, both in civil and military affairs, make him a great character in our history. The rugged, fearless, positiveness of his character, his indomitable strength of will, his manly integrity, made him a great man. He had the qualities that gather large bodies of men around a leader. His friendships were strong and warm. He did not shrink from his enemies. No man ever had more devoted friends, or those who would make greater sacrifices to advance his interests.

In the judgment of the present generation General Logan has made a great record both in civil and military life, in statesmanship as well as in the field, that judgment, we may confidently believe, will be confirmed by impartial history. He will occupy a large space in the history of our country. To the generations that are coming he will be a grand type of American manhood. His name, a synonym of patriotism and honor—

> One of the few, the immortal names,
> That were not born to die.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, in the language of the resolution now pending, the ordinary business of legislation is suspended that the friends and associates of the deceased Senator, John A. Logan, may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues. In the brief time allowed it will be impossible to even allude to the many important acts of his busy and eventful life. Much has been said in the press, in the Senate Chamber, and in public meetings held all over the country since his death in refer ence to his character and public services. I feel that I can scarcely add anything of interest on this occasion.

I saw him for the first time in January, 1857, just thirty years ago. He was then a member of the house of representatives of the State of Illinois, and I was a student at Illinois College, at Jacksonville. I had visited Springfield to witness the inauguration of Gov. William H. Bissell. When I entered the legislative hall, the youthful and impetuous Logan was speaking. He at once arrested my attention. I have never forgotten the scene. There was great interest manifested, and party spirit ran high. He seemed to move upon his political foes as if charging an enemy upon a field of battle. His speech occupied two days in delivery, and in severity of language and vehemence of manner excelled, perhaps, all other efforts of his life. He was one of the leaders of the Democratic party in the Legislature and had been selected by his friends as the orator for the occasion.

Governor Bissell had been a prominent Democrat, but had differed with his party on the Kansas and Nebraska bills: he became the candidate of the Republicans for governor, and was elected. He was a man of great ability, and his candidacy had resulted in a political campaign of unprecedented acrimony and bitter invectives. The heated discussions before the people were carried into the Legislature. When the motion was made to print 20,000 copies of Governor Bissell's message, Logan moved to amend so as to provide for printing but half the usual number. The debate lasted more than a week, and was one of the most memorable ever witnessed in the State, which is noted for great political contests.

The body was Democratic, and Logan's motion prevailed. From that time forward his reputation as a party leader was established. During the thirty years which have elapsed he has occupied a prominent position in State and national affairs. He passed at once from the arena of State politics to the councils of the nation. He was elected a Representative in Congress from the ninth Congressional district in 1858, receiving 15,878 votes while his opponent, David L. Phillips, received but 2,796. The political contest of that year, 1858, was one memorable in the history of Illinois, and provoked the liveliest interest throughout the whole country.

It was during this campaign that the joint debates between Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas occurred, the result of which was the re-election of Douglas to the Senate and the election of Lincoln in 1860 to the Presidency of the United States. In this great contest Logan was a conspicuous figure and one of the staunchest supporters of Senator Douglas. In 1860 Logan was a candidate for re-election and his growing popularity was evinced by the increased vote he received, namely, 20,863, while his opponent received but 5,207 votes. He resigned his seat in Congress in 1861, and entered the army as colonel of an Illinois regiment.

By regular promotions for gallant and meritorious conduct he reached the rank of major-general. His military record is one of the most brilliant of the late war. Had he been educated at West Point and thus relieved from the prejudice which existed in the regular Army against volunteer generals, there is little doubt that he would have risen to the chief command of the Army. But he did not need the training and learning of West Point to make him a soldier. He was a born soldier. His practical training as a soldier in the Mexican war, and his careful study of military history and the science of war had peculiarly fitted him for a great military leader. He could not only command men, but he could obey the commands of his superiors. He believed in military discipline.

When General Sherman denied him the command of the Army of the Tennessee before Atlanta, a position which his skill and bravery had won for him, he cheerfully submitted and urged his friends to make no complaints or protests. I can not follow him in all his battles during the long and eventful war. Suffice it to say that he shrank from no hardship, he feared no danger, he faltered in nothing. Beloved by his men, and respected by his fellow-officers, he won the admiration of the people, and his memory will be cherished by his countrymen for all time to come.

He was a careful student of military history. Those whose pleasure it was to converse with him were struck with his wonderful fund of information in regard to the events of the war. He could readily point out the positions of the opposing forces in every battle during the late war. He could give the numbers and regiments engaged in every important battle, and indicate the casulties on either side. He frequently conversed after the close of the war with the leaders in the confederate army, and notably with General Longstreet, with whom he was on intimate and friendly terms. The last book he ever read was the Memoirs of General Lee. Much of these Memoirs was read to General Logan by his secretary during his last illness. He never failed to detect an error and point it out at the time. He read military history with the liveliest interest. In his investigation of the Fitz-John Porter case he carefully read and reread every scrap of testimony, every report, and all contemporaneous history, in order to completely master the subject.

After the close of the war he was again re-elected as a Representative in Congress, serving in the Fortieth and Forty-first Congresses. He was three times elected United States Senator from the State of Illinois, and had served not quite two years of his last term when he died. His career as a statesman is scarcely less brilliant than that as a soldier. His was a busy life. Whether in war or in peace, he was always doing something. His energy and power of endurance were wonderful. The amount of mental labor which he performed was enough to wreck the stoutest physique. In his Congressional duties he was untiring and ever vigilant. His correspondence was enormous, but he managed to give attention to every demand upon him.

The soldiers of the late war had in Senator Logan a most faithful and devoted friend. They never appealed to him in vain. They seemed to look to him for all general and special legislation in their behalf. In his death they lost their ablest advocate and truest friend.

I leave to others more in sympathy with his political views than myself to speak more at length and more appropriately of his public record. I desire to refer briefly to his private virtues.

He was a most devoted husband and father. His home was his place of greatest happiness. He was kind to his wife, indulgent to his children, and devoted to them all. His domestic life was a model of simplicity. Freed from the cares of official duties, he hastened to his home, always to receive the greetings of a beloved wife and happy children. His greatest enjoyment was at his own fireside, surrounded by his family. Here he lost all of the cares of the world, laid aside all the vexations of political contests, shut out the pomp and circumstance of official station, and gave himself up to domestic affairs. He spent his evenings at home. He rarely visited the clubs or places of public amusement. His family, his library, and fireside were more attractive to him than the pleasures of the outside world.

General Logan's devotion to his mother and family was a marked characteristic. Inheriting his father's warm heart and dauntless courage and his mother's unbending dignity, singleness of purpose, and untiring energy, he was the embodiment of the finest qualities that go to make up a truly noble character and one worthy of emulation. His father had so high an opinion of his genius and ability that he said in his will that he left "John nothing, as he knew he would succeed in life and carve out his own fortune." And right well did he fulfill the predictions of his father. His powers of endurance were marvelous; his sympathies easily touched.

Once during Grant's administration among the numbers calling one morning for help from General Logan to procure situations, &c., was a little boy about fourteen years old. Upon General Logan saying to him, "My boy, what can I do for you?" he replied, "General, I am a soldier's orphan, and I wish to get an appointment either as midshipman at Annapolis or a cadet at West Point." The general inquired, "Who have you to indorse you? I know nothing about you." The boy answered, "I have only my father's record in the war and my widowed and good mother. But, general, if you will do this I will surely prove worthy. I am going to succeed or die."

The general told the boy to meet him at the White House the following morning, and it is needless to add the boy got his appointment, and is now an officer in the Army. The boy's vim and honesty won the general's confidence and sympathy.

Again, one morning a young girl presented herself with the numbers that came every morning during General Logan's whole official life. She said: "General, I come to you without one single thing to support my statements, and depending solely upon your kindness and sympathy; but I am desperate. My mother is dying of consumption; she formerly worked in the Printing and Engraving Bureau for the support of herself, my little brother, and myself; but she has been lying for weeks near death, and we have pawned almost everything to get her medicine and food. I must do something, frail as I am, and I beg you to help me. I could not see my mother die and not have made this effort to help her. She could even die contented could she know that I had something to do to earn something for brother and myself."

The general's great eyes filled with tears, and he told her to go to the Printing Office the following morning and he hoped he could get the Public Printer to give her work. It was done, and that frail girl has ever since earned an honest living for that brother and herself, having laid away that sainted mother soon after obtaining her position. Among the first floral tributes laid upon Logan's bier bore the modest card of that grateful girl, who feels that in Logan's death the best friend of the unfortunate had gone to his reward. Aggressive, intense, and relentless in the discharge of every duty, justice was so ground in his nature that it could not be warped by partisanship. His magnanimity was one of the finest traits in his character—ever ready to forgive and even forget an injury. Trustful and sincere in all his friendships he was frequently called upon to regret the bad faith of those he trusted. In such cases he grieved as if death instead of treachery had robbed him of his friend.

There was nothing honorable he would not do to serve those who had befriended him. But when those whom he had befriended turned upon him or betrayed him his mortification knew no bounds. Nothing seemed so base to him as ingratitude. This he felt as "the most unkindest cut of all." It was to him "more strong than traitors' arms," and "quite vanquished him." Always true to others, he expected and exacted fidelity in return.

Much has been said in reference to General Logan's courage. His courage was never questioned. It was prompted by honor and principle, and not born of brute force, as exemplified in the correspondence and his conduct when challenged to fight a duel by a member of this House a few years ago. He did not feel called upon to accept the challenge in order to prove his courage; but, regarding the code duello as a relic of barbarism, he treated the challenge with deserved contempt.

He was sensitive to public criticisms. His last days were rendered unhappy and his ailments undoubtedly aggravated by newspaper assaults upon his motives and official conduct.

When one reads the eulogies pronounced upon his life and character by his colleagues in the Senate, it is almost incredible that such a man as Logan had been so recently subjected to such cruel assaults as were from day to day published by newspapers having large circulation and great powers for inflicting wrong and blasting reputations.

In the Senate, on the 9th instant, his colleagues, who are best able to speak of his true character and worth, bore testimony to his public and private virtues.

Senator CULLOM, of Illinois, said:

Mr. President, few men in American history have left so positive an impress on the public mind and so glorious a record to be known and read of all men as has General Logan. The pen of the historian can not fail to write the name of Logan as one prominently identified with the great movements and measures which have saved the Union and made the nation free and great and glorious within the last thirty years.

Like Lincoln, his heart and hands were ever for the people. He came up from the ranks of the people, believed in the purity and integrity of the masses, and was always ready and eager to speak for them. He was a true republican and believed firmly in republican government. He despised tyranny in all its forms wherever he found it. He was always true to his convictions and to his friends, and no power or influence could induce him to forsake either.

Senator MORGAN, of Alabama, said:

He was a true husband, a true father, a true friend, and when that is said of a man, and you can add to it also that he was a true patriot, a true soldier, and a true statesman, I do not know what else could be grouped into the human character to make it more sublime than that.

Senator EDMUNDS, of Vermont, said:

His was the gentlest of hearts, the truest of natures, the highest of spirits, that feels and considers the weaknesses of human nature and who does not let small things stand in the way of his generous friendship and affection for those with whom he is thrown. And so in the midst of a career that had been so honorable in every branch of the public service, and with just ambitions and just powers to a yet longer life of great public usefulness, he disappears from among us—not dead—promoted, as I think, leaving us to mourn, not his departure for his sake, but that the value of his conspicuous example, the strength of his conspicuous experience in public affairs, and the wisdom of his counsels have been withdrawn.

Senator MANDERSON, of Nebraska, said:

He originated the ever-beautiful Memorial Day and constantly urged its observance. It was a revelation to many that this sturdy soldier should have conceived the poetic idea that the graves of the Union dead should receive their yearly tribute of flowers. The thought was born of his love for them. There was much that was refined beneath the bold, frank exterior.

The bravest are the tenderest,
The loving are the daring.

A friend who knew him well writes of him:

"His domestic life was an exquisite idyl. It was fragrant with faith and tenderness. It was a poem whose rhythm was never marred."

Senator ALLISON, of Iowa, said:

He never knowingly did an injustice to his associates, and if he found that he had done so unconsciously, he was swift and ready to make reparation. He was conscientious in the discharge of his public duties.

In his death the nation has lost one of its ablest counselors; his comrades in the army one of their most ardent and devoted supporters; we in this Chamber a valued co-worker and friend.

Senator HAWLEY, of Connecticut, said:

He was generous, he was frank, he was tender. Possibly that will sound strangely to many people who did not know him as we did. He had as tender a heart as entered these doors. He was one of the bravest men physically and morally that ever lived. He was a brilliant and great volunteer soldier. He was an incorruptible citizen and legislator. His patriotism was unsurpassed in enthusiasm, intensity, and faith.

Senator SPOONER, of Wisconsin, said:

He will live, sir, in the hearts of men until the history of his time shall have faded utterly away. With each returning May, wherever there is a soldier's grave—and where is there not a soldier's grave?—the people now living and those to come after us will remember the name of Logan, the patriot, soldier, orator, and statesman, and will bring, in honor of his memory, the beautiful flowers of the springtime and the sweet incense of praise and prayer.

Senator COCKRELL, of Missouri, said:

As a husband and father he was devoted, faithful, tender, loving, and warmly appreciative of the boundless love and undying devotion of his noble wife and dutiful children. As a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church he was "not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

The name, the fame, the life, and the illustrious and successful achievements of General Logan are now the common heritage of our great country and people, and will be cherished and remembered by the present and coming generations.

Senator FRYE, of Maine, said:

Mr. President, there is not a Senator within the sound of my voice, and there are Senators here who have served in the councils of the nation many years with John A. Logan, who ever knew him to hesitate or waver in or shrink from any expression of opinion as to any subject under consideration, who ever knew him to avoid a vote, who ever suspected him of taking any account whatsoever of what effect his words or his acts would have upon his own personal or political fortunes. There is not a Senator within the sound of my voice who, when Logan had expressed his opinions, the result of his convictions, ever dreamed that he was not entirely, faultlessly sincere in the expression.

Senator PLUMB, of Kansas, said:

Logan fought his own way, won his own victories, made his own fame secure.

Scrutinizing the list of those who, emerging from comparative obscurity, have contributed the noblest service to the Republic and made themselves a record for immortality, the name of Logan will be found written not far below those of Lincoln and of Grant.

Senator SABIN, of Minnesota, said:

An inscrutible Providence has removed a great and good man, and the memories which cluster about his name as a member of this body are so fresh and personal that we can scarcely realize the great loss which this Senate and country has sustained; but his useful life and shining example are left to guide the feet of coming generations.

Senator PALMER, of Michigan, said:

Amid the many heroic figures which stand out on the luminous background of the past quarter of a century none will be regarded with more affection and interest than that sturdy and intrepid form portrayed in silhouette, clear cut and pronounced in its outlines as in its mental traits.

Happy the State which has borne such a citizen. Thrice happy the people who, appreciating his virtues, shall give him a place in the valhalla of her heroes for the encouragement and inspiration of the youth of the future.

Senator FARWELL, of Illinois, said:

General Logan was the bravest of soldiers, an able statesman, and an honest man.

No higher tribute can be paid to man than this, and this is the offering which I bring. The late President of the United States, General Grant, said to me that he could never forget General Logan's great services to his country. In battle always brave, never faltering, always ready.

He is greatest who serves his country best. And shall we not class him as one of these?

Such are the tributes paid Senator Logan by those who knew him best. Such testimonials coming from honorable Senators representing all sections and political parties, will form the aggregate judgment of his times and fix the estimate in which he will be held by future generations.

One would have supposed that a Senator from a great State, who had been prominently before the public for thirty years, and whose character, as set forth by his Senatorial colleagues and associates, was well known to the country would have been free from the ordinary abuse and reckless denunciation which is so frequently heaped upon those who are less known and less appreciated. But not so.

In this land of ours which boasts the freedom of the press as one of the chief characteristics of our free institutions there are those who, for the sake of publishing sensational matter, or to gratify disappointed ambition, or revenge imaginary neglect are ready to assassinate the characters of the purest and the best of our public men. But such assaults only serve to attract attention to the baseness of their authors, and can no more damage the character of a man like Logan than they could fix a stigma upon Lincoln or upon Washington, the father of his country.

Mr. Speaker, nothing can be said to add to the fame or greatness of our departed friend. His work is done. His race is run. He sleeps the sleep that knows no waking. But his works will live after him. Adown the pathway of time coming generations will read of his deeds of courage, of his devotion to the public weal, of his love for his mother, his wife, his children, and country, and wonder as the years glide by whether they will ever behold his like again.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Logan will be regarded as the most striking figure of our civil war. He was the greatest of the Union volunteers.

As such he will stand in history. As such he will be eulogized to-day. His eulogy perhaps would come more fittingly from his comrades in arms, of whom there are many in this House. But his fame belongs to all of us; and each of us who knew him, either in the Army or in civil life, may well desire to pay a tribute to his memory.

It might not be appropriate for me to attempt to analyze his character as a military commander. That he was great in tactics or strategy, I know too little of tactics and strategy to say, and it may be that his military career does not afford material enough to enable even a military critic to judge whether he would have been a great commander in the sense in which Cromwell and Napoleon were great. His military fame will rest and rest securely on other grounds.

He was the loved and trusted volunteer leader of volunteers. The citizen soldiers of the Northwest, enlisted in a war for the preservation of the Union, were ready to follow him to the death, because they knew that his courage, like theirs, was neither contempt of life nor disregard of danger, nor thirst for mere military glory. It was the courage of patriotism, not less ardent because thoughtful, which places the life of the citizen at the service of the State in peace as well as in war, and regards military service only as a part of that larger service which the citizen owes at all times to the Republic which shelters him and his children.

Macaulay, speaking of the famous army of the Long Parliament, says:

> These persons, sober, moral, diligent, and accustomed to reflect, had been induced to take up arms, not by the pressure of want, not by the love of novelty and license, not by the arts of recruiting officers, but by religious and political zeal, mingled with the desire of distinction and promotion. The boast of the soldiers was, as we find it recorded in their solemn resolutions, that they had not been forced into the service, nor had enlisted chiefly for the sake of lucre; that they were no janizaries, but free-born Englishman, who had, of their own accord, put their lives in jeopardy for the liberty and religion of England, and whose right and duty it was to watch over the welfare of the nation which they had saved.

Such, in the main, were the volunteers of our civil war, and such, in a high degree, were the regiments of the Northwestern States, who made up the famous Fifteenth Corps. They were more effective, perhaps, as a military force under the command of Logan than they would have been under a merely professional soldier. They recognized in him not merely an accomplished commander, but a fellow-citizen and a friend, whose hopes, feelings, and purposes accorded with their own. As they knew that he would spare neither them nor himself in the service of the Union, so they knew that he would expose them to no unnecessary danger, or sacrifice their lives to his own military ambition. Therefore it was that after his troops had come to understand his character as a commander, a regiment under his lead seemed sometimes to become a brigade, a brigade seemed to have the strength of a division, and wheresoever Logan thought it his duty to lead, fifteen thousand thinking bayonets were ready to follow.

History will take no leaf from the laurels which Logan won in the civil war, because he was reluctant to believe that civil war was necessary. No man can impugn his patriotism because at the time when others were preparing for the conflict which they saw was inevitable Logan still hoped against hope that some form of compromise might yet take away the bitter cup from the lips of the nation.

Wendell Phillips said, in April, 1861:

> Civil war is a momentous evil. It needs the soundest, most solemn justification. I rejoice before God to-day for every word that I have spoken counseling peace, but I rejoice also with an especially profound gratitude that now, the first time in my anti-slavery life, I speak under the Stars and Stripes, and welcome the tread of Massachusetts men marshaled for war.

It was not given to all in those dark days to look through the rising clouds of civil war and see in the clear light beyond the slaves enfranchised and the Union stronger than before by the removal of the great cause of difference between the sections.

It was not given to Logan to see this. To him also civil war was a momentous evil, and he did not see in civil war, as Wendell Phillips did, a possible solution of the slavery question. Till the clash of arms actually came, till the exultation and humiliation of a great battle had inflamed all hearts, he thought he saw only a minority of secessionists at the South and a minority of abolitionists at the North striving to kindle their own frenzy in the hearts of the great majority of Union-loving men in both sections of the country.

> You gallant Union men at the South—

Said he—

> who are standing against a fierce and bitter storm, if nothing be done to calm it, and you are hurled over the precipice into the deep, yawning gulf of disunion, for your heroic stand in this fearful crisis history will immortalize your names, and your children will read with illuminated faces the faithful sketch of your patriotic devotion to your country.

Perhaps we must admit that, for months after the fall of Fort Sumter, Logan doubted whether the Union could be restored by force of arms. He had said so in Congress:

> The enforcement of the law at the point of the bayonet will not cement this Union again, it will not make us friends, nor will it settle the slavery question.

He probably did not believe that the North would endure the sacrifices of a long war; nor did he believe that the rebellion would yield without a desperate struggle.

To him, therefore, the actual clash of arms between the Union and the rebel forces seemed to mark the beginning of an eternal estrangement between the North and South, which time would only embitter. Influenced as he was by forebodings, felt at the same time by thousands of others in all sections of the country, it was not to be expected that he should have given a cordial support to the war policy of the Lincoln administration.

But the time came when Logan's attitude toward the administration of Mr. Lincoln and his war policy changed as if in the twinkling of an eye. It was by no elaborate course of reasoning; it was by a sudden flash of insight that he saw that the war was inevitable, and that the North was resolved. He saw, he understood, he obeyed, as unhesitatingly as did the apostle to the Gentiles when he beheld the great light that shone on the way to Damascus and heard the voice crying "Saul! Saul!"

He stood one morning in Washington and saw the regiments from the Northwestern States, his own section of the country, march by him on their way to the front to take part in the impending battle of Bull Run. The sight struck home upon his heart and his understanding like a revelation from Heaven. The volunteers of Wisconsin and Minnesota made him think, perhaps, of the volunteers of Illinois, then far to the front in the Mississippi Valley. Perhaps he thought of the Mexican war, and the gallant part which his own State had borne in it; of Shields at Cerro Gordo; of Bissell and Hardin, and the steady valor of the Illinois line when they faced an enemy for the first time on the plateau of Buena Vista.

In these raw troops now marching by, fresh from the farms of Wisconsin and the lumber camps of Minnesota, he saw the loyal North in arms resolved to maintain the Union, and he now knew, for the first time, that the only way to enduring peace must he hewed with the sword.

He saw his own duty also. He could thank God, as Wendell Phillips had, for every word he had spoken counseling peace, but his heart told him that henceforth the only place of honor and duty for him, the only place where his spirit could be at peace with itself, would be in the camp, or on the march, or in the line of battle with the volunteers of Illinois.

He did not hesitate. To restore the Union. He put upon the hazard not only life and fortune as others did, but what was perhaps far more to him, his darling popularity.

He went into his district. He made as brave a charge upon the prejudices of Southern Illinois as he ever made upon the confederate lines. He made his people see what he had seen on that July morning in Washington, that the safety of the great Republic, the freedom and happiness of millions yet unborn, in the South as well as in the North, must be sought by the dreadful path of civil war.

Thus the first service which Logan rendered in the war for the Union was a victory won by his eloquent tongue before he had drawn his sword.

> The very men—

Said General Grant—

> who at first made it necessary to guard the roads of Southern Illinois became the defenders of the Union. His district, which at first had promised to give such trouble to the Government, filled every call made upon it for troops without resorting to the draft. That Congressional district stands credited at the War Department to-day with furnishing more men for the army than it was called upon to supply.

I shall not try to recount Logan's military services in the Union cause during the next four years. There are many others in this House more competent than I to recall the history of those stirring events, of which they were themselves a part. Let me, however, speak of that one of his many victories, the glory of which, brighter and more enduring than mere military renown, he does not share with any man, or regiment, or army corps. It was the victory which he won over his own feeling of disappointment and personal wrong when the command of the Army of the Tennessee was taken from him. He had served with that army from Belmont to the Atlanta campaign. He had risen through all grades from colonel to corps commander. He had taken command of the army, as General Grant reminds us, in the midst of a hotly contested battle. His glance, his voice, his magnificent bearing had infused courage and discipline into dispirited and retreating troops.

Under the influence of his personal presence they became steady in an instant. A few minutes more and they were moving to victory like one of Cromwell's brigades, with the precision of machines, and the wild fanaticism of crusaders. At Logan's call they pressed forward to avenge McPherson's death with such impetuous fury that eight thousand of the enemy's dead and wounded were left upon the field. Logan had fairly won the right to command the Army of the Tennessee. When this command, so fairly won, so eagerly desired, was taken from him, merely because he had received his military training at the rude hands of actual war, and not amid the sheltered walks and trim lawns of a military academy, his patriotism faltered indeed, but it did not fail. He was tempted to resign from the Army. What West Point graduat could have blamed him if he had done so? But he was true to himself and to the Union he had sworn to defend. Perhaps he remembered the words he had spoken in 1862:

> I have entered the field to die if need be for the Government, and never expect to return to peaceful pursuits till the object of this war of preservation has been accomplished.

He returned to the command of his army corps. By his indefatigable zeal in a subordinate position, he gave a living example of that doctrine of military fidelity which, many years afterward, he was to urge so eloquently in the Senate, that neither personal dislike nor personal disappointment could excuse a subordinate officer either for disobeying orders or for slackness in obeying them.

Of Logan as a legislator I have no time to speak. Faithful as he was to all his public duties, it is not as a legislator that he will be remembered. He accomplished much in Congress; but if he had accomplished more, his fame would still rest on his military record; and his military record, for this generation at least, is written not only in the annals of the campaigns in which he took part but in the hearts of tens of thousands of surviving volunteers of the war who have so long looked up to him as the bright exemplar of their own patriotism, the record of which they will hand down as an honored heritage to their children and their children's children.

One trait of Logan's character has attracted the attention of all who met him in public or private life. He was a sincere and devoted friend of his friends, and he was not the secret enemy of any man. Open, straightforward sincerity in word and action was such a prominent characteristic of his demeanor toward friend and enemy alike that we may not unfairly apply to him the description which Clarendon gives of the great Duke of Buckingham:

> His kindness and affection to his friends was so vehement that it was as so many marriages for better and worse, and so many leagues offensive and defensive, as if he thought himself obliged to love all his friends and to make war upon all they were angry with, let the cause be what it would. And it can not be denied that he was an enemy in the same excess, and prosecuted those he looked upon as his enemies with the utmost rigor and animosity, and was not easily induced to a reconciliation. And yet there are some examples of his receding in that particular. And in the highest passion he was so far from stooping to any dissimulation whereby his displeasure might be concealed and covered till he had attained his revenge (the low method of courts), that he never endeavored to do any man an ill office before he first told him what he was to expect from him, and reproached him with the injuries he had done, with so much generosity, that the person found it in his power to receive further satisfaction in the way he would choose for himself.

When a great man dies in the maturity of his intellectual powers, before he has even reached the threshold of old age, we are apt to deplore not merely our loss, but his own. We are apt to regret as a loss to him as well as to ourselves the many years of usefulness and comparative comfort which he might yet have enjoyed. The feeling is not always a reasonable one. Who can tell whether Logan's old age would have been a happy one? Some men there are, like Washington at Mount Vernon, like Jefferson at Monticello, who, after a life of active participation in public affairs, can quietly withdraw from the current of events, and spend their declining years in private life, watching the gradual decay of bodily strength and mental vigor with the same calm resignation, and even with the same sober happiness, with which they watch the lengthening shadows at the close of a summer day. Such an old age is not the common lot of public men. It is possible only to a few. We can not be sure that it would have been Logan's lot, had he been spared to live out his three score years and ten.

His life almost from boyhood had been one of political activity. Would he have been content, like Washington, to resign life's active duties at the inexorable bidding of advancing age? He was not sure even of bodily health. The fatigues, the wounds, the exposures of the war had begun already to tell upon his constitution. For him, perhaps, it is better as it is. His death is our loss rather than his own. Better, perhaps, for this keen, ambitious spirit to pass from life in the full maturity of his mental powers; his career not yet completed; the last and brightest goal of his ambition still before his eyes and almost within his reach.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, integrity is the basic principle of all moral character—integrity in its broadest sense, integrity of thought, integrity of word, integrity of deed.

Laborious industry is the indispensable condition of all success which is honestly achieved.

No less an important element in human greatness is courage.

Not merely that valor which asserts itself in the presence of danger, nor that fortitude which enables us to suffer and endure, nor that resolution which falters not at difficulties, nor yet that heroism which despises danger and overrides what to the more discreet and timid seems insurmountable barriers, but rather that rarest of all virtues among men, that moral courage which prompts the upright man to sacrifice public favor, to accept defeat, to undergo humiliation, and even public censure if necessary, in obedience to the dictates of conscience and in the discharge of public duty.

My personal relations with General Logan was limited to a passing acquaintance and a few meetings on matters of public business. But I am persuaded from all I knew of him that he possessed all the qualities I have mentioned and to a pre-eminent degree.

At a time when others holding similar positions of honor and trust lived sumptuously and grew rich General Logan kept his frugal and simple ways, and finally died comparatively poor.

In high stations of public trust, when others were falling on all sides entangled in the meshes of public scandals and besmirched by improper connection with corrupt legislation and doubtful enterprises, General Logan steered clear of all questionable transactions, and finally bequeathed to his family that which is better than riches, the splendid legacy of a good name.

That he was indefatigably industrious, zealous, and scrupulously faithful in the discharge of every public duty those who knew him best cheerfully attest, and this I believe to have been the key to his great success.

Few men are born great. The truest, the safest, the wisest are the plodders. I do not believe General Logan was either brilliant or in any sense what the world calls a genius. But he was more; he was a great worker, an honest thinker, and a courageous actor. No man ever doubted his courage, moral or physical. His public record will show separations from his party and friends on many public questions and a dogged pertinacity in the maintenance of his convictions against all odds, and even in defiance of public opinion.

He was by nature self-reliant, but circumstances had wrought no small work in the formation of his character. He had grown up and lived his whole life in the great West, that part of our country the wonderful development of which can scarcely be comprehended, a development which it required courage, industry, endurance, patience, and self-reliance to work out.

General Logan was a prominent actor amid all the busy struggles and changeful stages through which this great section passed from its infancy until his death. He had imbibed its vigorous spirit in his youth, and it was his strength and his support while he lived. He reflected its great energies and marvelous resources in his simple, industrious, and abstemious habits, his powerful frame, his great endurance, and determined resolution.

That great section of our country gives to history no better specimen of its productions than General Logan. Open, frank, without finesse, his methods were direct, and his purposes unconcealed. He was ambitious, but it was a laudable ambition guided by patriotism and inspired by a desire to benefit his fellow-men and promote the welfare of his country. I knew nothing personally of his domestic relations.

Of the story of his early love, his marriage, and the beautiful domestic life that followed, others have spoken and are better qualified to speak. I have ventured to speak only of his personal characteristics and his private and public worth. All understand his public services, extending through a long, eventful, and honorable public life.

These belong to history and are the proud heritage of his country which he served and honored and which in turn honored him.

It is difficult to determine whether his greatest achievements were in war or in peace. They were great in both. His long and honorable career is a tribute to our institutions and an honor to our marvelous civilization. His life furnishes a bright example for the ambitious youth of the Republic. He went out from among us in the prime of his usefulness and in the zenith of his influence and power.

In the great State of Illinois his place will not be easily filled. In the councils of his party he will be missed. In the Senate of the United States he will be long remembered. In the hearts of the citizen soldiery of the Union he is already enshrined.

Mr. Speaker, I esteem it a privilege, as it is a pleasure, to unite in paying this last tribute of respect to his memory.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Speaker, with no hope of adding anything to what has already been said in the way of correctly delineating the character of General Logan, I am still unwilling to let this occasion pass without paying my tribute to his memory. It was my fortune to serve under him during the war of the rebellion for more than a year, and in the same army—the Army of the Tennessee—for a much longer period.

In that fiery furnace of war, which tries the metal of which men are made, I learned to believe in him; not alone in his wonderful leadership as a soldier, but as one who loved his country above all other earthly things; who knew no divided allegiance, and who counted no sacrifice too great when made in defense of the flag which typified American liberty and unity.

Since the return of peace I have been one of those who believed in him as a political leader—as safe in council as he was heroic in war. The ways of Providence are mysterious; we submit to them because we must. Believing in a higher wisdom than that of men, we are ready to say it is best when our cherished hopes are crushed, our most earnest purposes thwarted.

I have felt that the annals of Illinois and her connection with the grandest and saddest periods of our national history would not be complete until the greatest of our volunteer soldiers should be called to the chief magistracy of the nation, and so complete in that great office the triumvirate, Lincoln, Grant, Logan—each with his own peculiar greatness—Illinois's contribution to the world's great names "that were not born to die."

It has seemed to me that the grand army of volunteers would never be fully honored and rewarded until the whole nation should do them homage by electing to the Presidency their recognized chieftain. But Providence has ordered otherwise, and we bow in humble submission, still protesting that one page of our history remains incomplete and must ever so remain.

From early manhood Logan was inspired by honorable ambition to deserve, and to take by so deserving, high rank among men.

For more than thirty years his name has been a part of the public history of his native State and for nearly as long of the nation. He has received honors, military and civic, above most men, but for all the honors conferred upon him by a grateful and appreciative people, he has returned to them more than measure for measure, many fold, in faithful and efficient service. We are and must ever remain his debtor, not more for what he has accomplished than for the beneficent influence of his example which remains for the living and for other generations.

General Logan was a man of convictions. He had no half beliefs. With untiring industry he sought for knowledge, and was content with nothing less than all that could be known about the great questions upon which he was called to act. Having reached a conclusion, it became to him truth itself, it possessed him and impelled to action. No man ever walked in the pathway pointed out by his own logic more firmly than he, regardless of consequences to himself.

With unbounded faith in popular government and in the wisdom which abides in the sober second thought of the people he had a profound contempt for the spirit of demagogy which trims for every passing breeze and seeks to make personal capital out of the ebullitions of passion, the temporary crazes which affect our poor human nature. Double dealing was impossible to him. He had no thoughts which he feared to utter, no purposes he cared to conceal.

He was ever ready to give and take hard blows in open and honorable contest. He never fought in ambush, nor sought success by concealment of his purpose where fairness demanded openness and candor.

A faithful friend and an uncompromising foe, he attracted strong friendships and invited bitter enmities. Hot and hasty in temper, he would always go more than half way in reconciliation. A strong partisan by nature, yet he would not remain silent when he thought his party associates were going wrong. A native of Illinois and loving his native State and her people with a passionate love, yet in public life he was an American citizen, too large a man to be hemmed in by State lines either in thought or service.

Among the soldiers of the "Grand Army" he was "Comrade" Logan. It was a comradeship of personal regard, of strong and endearing friendship, born amidst scenes of danger and death, made sacred by the memory of the fallen, and cemented by his ever-watchful care of their interests in all his public life.

For four long, eventful years he had been to them the ideal leader nearest to the rank and file. In all those years, to him and to them, there never was but one ending possible. And that ending, the supremacy of national authority over all the United States, an undivided nation, freedom's heritage and home.

There has ever been an abiding faith among his comrades that whatever others might do he would never apologize for the part that he and they took in that great struggle, and he never did. But they knew he was as generous as he was brave, and they have held up his hands with ready sympathy and hearty support in all his efforts to help rebuild the places laid waste by war, to restore everywhere a love for the Union, to secure to all the people the fruits of peaceful and honest industry, and the individual rights which belong to every citizen of the Republic.

To his soldiers his death is a personal bereavement which others can not fully appreciate. I can not dwell upon it. I dare not attempt to lift the veil which shuts out the public from this personal sorrow. Their leader in life, his death makes no vacancy for other leadership.

Dead! No longer standing in the Senate a representative of all that was best and bravest, a voice comes from his tomb, the voice of command, always with them, bidding them to remain faithful sentinels on the watch-towers of American liberty.

The death of General Logan is especially mourned by Western soldiers. The young men of the great West who sprung to arms at the first note of impending war formed the nucleus of that great division of the Army known as "the Army of the Tennessee." That army was almost exclusively composed of the men of '61 and '62 from the West and Northwest. It was the army that won the victories which made Grant commander-in-chief and Sherman his chief lieutenant. With that army the knightly McPherson won his triumphs and rode to his death.

With that army was all of General Logan's service from the beginning to the end of the war. The injustice which kept him from being its commander after McPherson fell gave him also the opportunity of showing to the country how great he could be in unselfish patriotism.

At Belmont and at Fort Donelson he gave token of the future great commander. But it was in that remarkable campaign in the rear of Vicksburg, when Grant cut loose from his base, and by a series of brilliant battles and victories, equal to any Napoleon ever won, forced Pemberton within the works at Vicksburg and finally compelled his surrender, that General Logan became the idol of his men and proved himself worthy to stand with Sherman and McPherson, safe on any field and equal to great occasions.

Thenceforth where Logan led his soldiers followed with implicit faith. Remembering Raymond and Champion Hills, from that time on they followed Logan into battle with full faith in a victorious ending. The war over, he remained their leader still.

I speak as a member of that old Army of the Tennessee—glorying in its volunteer hero; rejoicing in all his successes in the field, at home, in this House, and in yonder Senate Chamber; mourning his too early death.

While Logan has been the leader of his party in Illinois for many years he has never been a party dictator. He never resorted to the petty ways of the mere politician. Believing in the righteousness of his cause, he was always ready to give a reason for the faith that was in him. He knew his position, feared no rivalries, and trusted the people. Ability, integrity, courage of conviction, and indomitable will made of him a leader worthy of a great party. Let others speak of his failings and foibles if they will. For me they are buried in his grave, and Logan, the hero and the statesman, only remains.

Pure in public and private life, honest in thought as well as deed, he has left to mankind an example worthy of emulation; to the nation, his untarnished name and fame—best of legacies.

The Christian gentleman, the stalwart man, the tender husband, and the loving father has gone from our midst forever. His spirit has crossed the dark river to the presence of the Omnipotent in whom he trusted. His work is ended.

Be it ours to emulate his patriotism, to be watchful guardians of his good name and fame, and to cherish that Union of States and that universal liberty for which he died.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Speaker, in the full vigor of his life, in the rounded fame of achievement, and in the high career of his distinguished office John A. Logan has heard the Master's call.

Yonder, in the Senate Chamber, we saw him when here we met in December last, stout of heart, and stout of frame a—figure militant, foremost in the lists, his eye kindling with the fire of exultant life; and now he lies with folded hands across his breast, and his white face turned heavenward awaiting the opening of the mystery "when this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality."

I envy not the feelings of the man who does not "mourn with those who mourn" the strong man stricken in his prime, the fearless chief, the father, the husband, the statesman, the friend, whose life was to so many the source of pride and joy and satisfaction. And with those who knew him best and loved him most, I bow my head beside the bier of Logan.

It is not for me to assume that I am the person to attempt critical analysis of his character or the recital of his achievements, nor do I conceive indeed that the time has yet arrived when calm-browed history may assign to him the exact place to which he was entitled in the ranks of America's great men.

Descended through both ancestral lines of Scotch-Irish stock, he inherited the frank, ardent, pertinacious, and courageous elements of character which have made that sturdy strain, wherever planted, foremost in adventurous enterprise and hardy undertaking. A partisan by nature, and living in times and situations that made partisans of the coldest bosoms, we can not yet behold him in an atmosphere calm enough and clear enough to draw his lineaments with precision. But through the smoke of conflict and the haze of passion, there was that in Logan so distinctive that his commanding features will never be mistaken for anothers; and there were elements of his character and of his performances which made him worthy the respect and admiration of all, whether they be counted as his friends or foes.

Born myself under and following a different star from that which guided his footsteps, and living my life in opposition to most of the ideas which he pressed to the front with all the ardor and vigor of his dauntless nature, my standpoint has not been such as to make me the suitable eulogist of his deeds or render me capable of becoming his impartial judge. But whatsoever may be the standpoint from which we contemplate his remarkable career we can not look upon him otherwise than as a man singled out from his fellows by conspicuous traits, and by those traits which are universally acknowledged and honored as chiefest among manly virtues.

As said of him in the Senate Chamber by one who confronted him in the first and last battle which he fought, he was marked by "grand individuality and striking characteristics." And by another not less his opponent in the forum and the field: "No braver man ever lived, and the Almighty Creator endowed him with many other and great virtues."

No glint is given as in these words alone of his long, varied, and brilliant services; but they constitute an epitaph chiseled by the hand of truth upon the marble tablet of enduring memory, and they will live as the unaffected tribute of sterling men to one who was himself a sterling man and leader of men.

The reason that Logan's name is so universally honored lies in the fact that he lived his life in the light, and had no cause to fear the light. In his character and in his record there are no dark mysterious phases. In an era fertile in the production of distinguished men, and that brought men to the front according to the strength that was in them, he stands upon a pedestal high and erect, a clear cut, magnificent individuality, purely American in its type, heroic in its mold, marked by the masculine lines of power in thought and power in action, bespeaking the will to do, eloquent of the soul to dare.

Did he accomplish much? Yes; he possessed a robust mind, he knew that a straight line was the shortest distance between two points, and he went that line, "horse, foot, and dragoons," from purpose to object. He was a tireless worker, difficulties and dangers did not deter him, and he has left behind him lasting memorials of his work with sword and tongue and pen.

Was he a great orator? Yes; not in the grace of classic art, not in the polish of rounded period, but in the earnestness of his utterances, the cogency of his thought, and in the power to persuade.

Was he a great soldier? Yes; great in the personal prowess of the brave knight who faces those not less brave with valor that does not hesitate or flinch from the encounter, and great in abilities to inspire, marshal, and lead hosts to battle.

Was he beloved by his soldiers? Yes; he was thoughtful of them, he was reckless of himself, and he fought in front of them.

Was he a great political leader? Yes; he believed in his own side, and espoused it with enthusiasm; he stood up to it with fidelity whether it won or lost; he never took two sides at the same time, or wabbled between them; he was strong in council; steady in the conflict, and powerful before the people.

Was he respected by his opponents? Yes; even though they thought that he was severe in his judgments and bitter in his expressions, they sincerely respected him, because they realized that in him was the upright, fearless spirit that said its say and did its deed, and left to God the consequence. They respected him because he was candid and outspoken, and did not wreathe his sword in myrtle boughs. They respected him because they knew he did not carry political hostility into private relations; because he was often kind and generous to his political opponents, as I personally know and am pleased to testify, and because he never prostituted his public place to private gain.

So high is honesty among the virtues that it condones all errors of judgment. So splendid is courage that when it stands by honor's side it makes the man seem god-like.

The man who has been laid by loving hands to his final rest was honest and he was brave, and mankind will honor his name and memory.

Mr. Speaker and Representatives, those of us whose middle life is abreast of the living day have witnessed scenes as stirring as ever blotted history with blood, and as decisive as any that ever turned its currents. We have seen brothers fall by brother's hand, States upset with anarchy, the flames leap over lovely fields and stately cities. Then out of chaos and misery and death and ruin we have looked up again to the boundless heavens where the sun shone new risen.

Down in Richmond by the James we have seen the men of Boston wreathing with garlands the statue of Stonewall Jackson. Away in the Shenandoah Valley, where tongues of fire once licked the clouds, we have seen Federal soldiers amidst the Confederate graves upon the heights of Winchester, strewing them with flowers, and on bended knees offering prayers for peaceful home and happy country. Amid such scenes as these the people of the land have felt their hearts new opened; and I thank God that the miracles of war which American courage accomplished, and the miracles of material progress which have filled the wilderness with happy and industrious populations, are now to be crowned with that miracle of divine love working through the hearts of men that makes us feel the tie that binds to common humanity and common country.

With humble spirit I commune with you to-day who pronounce blessings upon the dust of him who was a chief amongst your chieftains, and who won by his valorous hand and upright heart the honors paid him by the people.

If errors he committed, may the good God forgive them. His virtues they were many and they were great. May they live forever, the well-spring of pride and inspiration to all his countrymen. To his memory, honor. To his ashes, peace.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, on the last evening he was in the Senate Chamber I conversed with John A. Logan.

His business with the world was done.

I recall his face now, a noble image of the intrinsic Logan, as we here to-day speak of his pilgrimage through life.

Sixty years of life, a brief section of swift-flowing time, but in it for true, hard labor and valor of action there has been none truer or braver than he.

A farmer boy, at school in Southern Illinois; before manhood, a soldier in our battles with far off Mexico eager for glory, winning honors. A lawyer, a prosecuting attorney, and yielding to his bent for politics, a member, a leader in the Illinois Legislature.

At thirty-two, a Democratic member of this House, elected and re-elected as a Representative of the States-rights party. In his place here, true to it, until convinced that loyalty to party was disloyalty to the Union, when he closed his desk, left his seat, though not mustered in, fell in line with a regiment marching over the Potomac yonder, and fought for the Union in the first battle as a private soldier.

Then, doing manifold victorious battle as he went along, he emerged at the triumphant close of war from among a million volunteers the foremost, the ideal volunteer soldier.

In the whirlwind of the passing time we saw him at Donelson charging at the head of his decimated regiment and grievously wounded.

At the close of the siege of Vicksburg we heard his Great Captain declare that Major-General Logan was fitted to command an independent army.

Before Atlanta, when McPherson fell in the early morning light, we beheld astride his black horse Black Jack Logan, leading an army to victory, pointing the way from Atlanta to the sea.

At the grand review on yonder Avenue we saw him commanding the Army of the Tennessee.

While his hand was still familiar with the sword-hilt, while the habits of the camp were still visible in his port and swarthy face, he was returned to his seat in this Chamber, a man who knew in every fiber, who, with heroic daring, had laid it to heart, that it is good to fight on the right side.

On this floor, and in the Senate, whither he was soon called, and twice returned, his first care was for the Union volunteers, their widows and orphans. The wounds on his own body, the grievous pain he endured with proud reticence for a quarter of a century, only served to remind him of those who with him, or like him, suffered, hungry or athirst, in heat or snow, the marches without rest, the nights without sleep, the fevers or pestilence gathering over an army in slumber, or the night-watches in rain that froze as it fell, as well as the wounds in battle.

He was thus the nearest, best friend of the volunteer, the peer of the highest officer, a brother to the humblest soldier, the sponsor of the Grand Army of the Republic, the founder of "Memorial Day."

Faults and prejudices he had, but he was always loyal to truth and duty.

Frank, impetuous, decisive, honest, he advocated his convictions with a scorn of personal consequence, in peace as in war, whether as a manager of the impeachment of President Johnson, defending Senator Payne, condemning General Porter, legislating for the reconstruction, or laboring for the education of an enfranchised race.

The manliest of men, a marvelous leader of the people, a famous, popular orator, a great general, a statesman.

Unsullied he bore his crowding honors worthily in public life, and rejoiced in the sweet contentment of an almost ideal home life.

The friend of Lincoln and Grant, with their greater names posterity will associate Logan's heroic face, painted now, as on the azure of eternity, serene, victorious.

God grant that the light he leaves behind him may illumine the path of those who may serve our country in her need for generations to come.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. John A. Logan dead; no, not dead!

> There is no Death! What seems so is transition;
> This life of mortal breath
> Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
> Whose portal we call Death.

The noble traits of character of John A. Logan have been indelibly stamped upon the hearts of the American people.

His whole life as warrior and statesman was dedicated to giving full force and significance to that affirmation of the Declaration of Independence, "That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

When that mighty effort for the destruction of constitutional liberty had well nigh sapped the foundations of this Republic; when weak and wavering men, to avoid the terrible consequences of war, were willing to make concessions looking to the separation of this Union, then it was that John A. Logan, rising above all considerations of party policy, inspired by a patriotism and love of country as fervent as that which moved the heart of William Wallace to strike mightily for freedom when he believed that the tyrant had invaded the dignity of his home and that black treachery was torturing away the freedom of his countrymen, then it was, I say, that this great warrior and statesman breathed upon the discontented and wavering elements of his own party utterances of such pure and patriotic devotion to his whole united country as will make his memory as lasting and imperishable as the Republic itself.

The noble traits of his character in his devotion to his country were made more conspicuous because of his life-long affiliation with a party that was now engaged in a war for the destruction of the Union and a dedication of one part thereof to human slavery.

Before the bugle blast of war had called any of our country's defenders to the field, but when every movement of the discontented elements attested to the fearful truth that civil war with all its dire consequences was about to test the national bond, upon this floor, in February, 1861, John A Logan said:

> I have been taught that the preservation of this glorious Union, with its broad flag waving over us as the shield of our protection on land and sea, is paramount to all parties and platforms that ever have existed or ever can exist. I would to-day, if I had the power, sink my own party, and every other one, with all their platforms, into the vortex of ruin, without heaving a sigh or shedding a tear, to save the Union or even to stay the revolution where it is.

This was but a patriotic declaration before the clash of arms, but in confirmation of his entire consecration and devotion to the preservation of the Union we have only to let impartial history bear witness. Not content to serve his country in the Halls of Congress, away from the exposure and danger of shot and shell, this brave man rushed into the thickest of battle.

Where Logan went victory perched upon the Stars and Stripes. He was the inspiration, and his soldiers followed him into battle with a spirit of confidence and determination that knows no defeat.

From whatever cause that may be assigned by the faithful chronicler of events, yet no one will ever attempt to gainsay that where John A. Logan went there was victory, there was fighting. He was one whose presence meant a contest, a struggle to the death. Let Belmont, and Donelson, and Vicksburg, and Corinth, and Champion Hills, and other battlefields attest to the truthfulness of this allegation.

In that contest for the preservation of the nation—for right against wrong, for freedom against slavery, for all that was good and pure and noble against all that was wicked and wrong and oppressive, wherein from the beginning of the contest to the close more than two and one-half millions of citizen soldiers placed their lives upon the altar of their country in that contest—we do know that John A. Logan was the greatest volunteer soldier, the greatest commander taken from civil life. He was the recognized leader of that great army of volunteer soldiers, and from the close of the war has been the defender and champion of the cause of the common soldier in the Congress of the United States.

The defenders of our common country whose valor has been attested upon a hundred battlefields have lost their greatest friend, and our country has lost a great warrior and pure statesman.

John A. Logan has been in the public service, almost continuously, for more than thirty years, and during all these years of faithful service his conduct has been so pure that not even a suggestion of corruption was ever associated with his name.

His mission in life was not a struggle for the accumulation of gold; he sought not to pacify his conscience with the gilded bubble of wealth; he neglected not the elements of intellectual and moral greatness for the sordid and perishable things of time. His whole life was dedicated to his country, to human rights, to making more firm and lasting the foundations of this Republic. He has woven his name in history with illustrious and praiseworthy deeds.

Oh, that we had more Logans in the public service! More whose every thought and every effort were given to the discharge of public duty; more who sought no opportunity from public position to secure ill-gotten gains to the detriment of the general public; more who come to high public place because the public demand their service and not because the place is made the subject of barter or to serve some special interest.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, when on the 26th day of December last the intelligence was flashed across the land and under the seas that John A. Logan was dead, to millions of men it came with a sense of personal loss and bereavement.

There were men among us of greater learning than he, men more famous in statecraft, more profound in the law, more eloquent as orators, and some few greater as soldiers; but I greatly doubt whether among the sixty millions of people in this Republic there was one other man whose death would have touched the hearts of so many persons with a feeling of individual loss as did the death of Logan.

This is a phenomenon worthy of our study. Here was a man who was neither learned, nor polished, nor rich, nor aristocratic; but he had made himself felt across this great continent and his name familiar among all English-speaking people.

Whatever other traits he may have possessed or may have lacked, he was a forceful man. Wherever he came throughout his whole life men became conscious that a new force had entered into the problem to be solved, a force that was positive and could not be ignored.

His was a masterful nature that bent circumstances to his will, and brought men around him to work with him and for him. It is given to but few men in a generation to become so positive a force among his fellow-man as Logan was.

I said "as Logan was;" I might have said as Logan is; for character does not die with the mortal frame, and his character, his influence, and his achievements have entered into the forces that are developing our national and individual life.

There seems to be an epoch in the formative stage of all new states favorable to the growth of strong men.

I was struck recently, in reading the life of Abraham Lincoln, with the remarkable group of men that sprung up in the early history of Illinois.

When the seat of government was first removed to Springfield there were found at that young capital at one time Lincoln, whose name stands second to none in American history; Douglas, the Little Giant, Lincoln's great competitor for the Presidency; Davis, justice of the Supreme Court, Senator and acting Vice-President; Browning, Senator and Cabinet officer; Trumbull, Senator and jurist; Baker, Senator and general; and Shields, general and three times Senator from as many different Commonwealths.

It was while all these men were still upon the stage, and, in fact, in the very prime of their early manhood, that Logan first appeared in political life, in 1852, as a member of the Illinois Legislature.

He was an admirer and became a follower of Stephen A. Douglas. I am impressed with the belief that in many respects his character was more largely formed upon that of Douglas than of any other man. They had the same strong, dominant will, the same courage and fearlessness in following out a conviction, the same pugnacity and persistence in fighting their contests to the finish. They were alike exceedingly forceful among men, and natural leaders. Under the influence of the example of such men as I have named Logan began the career which was to be so potential for his country and for humanity.

A character is the product of all the forces that enter into it, and the first great formative force is heredity. Logan was of Scotch-Irish descent, a very sturdy and very vigorous stock, which has given us some of the strongest men that have blessed our country.

The next great mold of character is the influences of childhood and youth. Logan was born upon a farm in the comparative isolation of a newly settled region. His mother was of Scotch descent and possessed those strong traits for which that people are distinguished.

The men around him were of the large, strong, generous type that develops upon the frontier, and he inevitably partook of the spirit of the boundless prairie and the freedom that has never felt the fetters and constraints of aggregated humanity in cities.

Just as he was emerging from youth came the war with Mexico, and a combination of patriotism with the spirit of adventure drew him into the ranks of the army in that struggle. It was a mere episode in his life, but it was an index to the character of the coming man.

Then came the study of the law, and at the age of twenty-six we find him in the Legislature of his State, from which Lincoln had but four years before graduated into the halls of Congress.

After being again elected to the Legislature in 1856, Logan, in 1858, was himself elected to Congress, at the age of thirty-two, where he commenced that public career which only ended when, on the day after the last Christmas-tide, he laid all his honors and burdens down.

Meanwhile a new force and influence had come into his life. In 1855 he had married that devoted woman who thenceforth and throughout his life became his helper and his good genius. We may not speak more of her here. What his life would have been had he never met Mary A. Cunningham it would be impossible to guess, but it is safe to say that it would have been less useful and less illustrious than it was.

It was here in Washington that his real career began and his real character shone forth. The nation was already entering the penumbra of the dread eclipse of war.

The chill and shadow of the coming event was already upon the hearts of the people.

Born, as he was, in Southern Illinois, a promontory, as it were, of the free States projecting far down into the gulf of slavery, and peopled largely with settlers from the adjacent slave States, his whole political education was in sympathy with Southern views, and it was natural, almost inevitable, that he should ally himself with the party which had been the champion of Southern institutions. The great contest of 1858 between Lincoln and Douglas had been already fought, and the same political wave that carried Douglas back into the Senate swept Logan into the House.

While serving his first term here the whole country was startled and shocked by John Brown's raid upon Harper's Ferry. It was a declaration of war by one man. It was a small affair in itself—just a fanatical old man and a few devoted followers hurling themselves to death upon the jagged rocks of a continent of wrong, but it was the flash of the meteor bursting from obscurity, lurid for a moment, then plunging down to darkness and deeper night; it was the low grumble and jar of the earthquake which tells that the "sure and firm-set earth" is swimming beneath our feet.

Old John Brown was summarily tried, convicted, and hanged, but his scaffold became the scene of exaltation of a grand self-immolation for the uplifting of lowliest man.

> John Brown's body lay moldering in the ground,
> But his soul went marching on.

It marched to the South and it marched to the North, and everywhere it was a gleaming sword summoning the nation to the death-struggle of Freedom and Slavery.

We said that the only question was between Union and disunion, but we knew in our hearts that the issue was broader than that—that the real issue was freedom or slavery, and the hour had come for the nation to choose.

> Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
> In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side;
> Some great cause, God's new Messiah offering each the bloom or blight,
> Parts the goats upon the left hand, and the sheep upon the right;
> And the choice goes by forever 'twixt that darkness and that light.

Perhaps few men were ever more strongly attached to a party than Logan was to his, but when it came to a question between party and country he knew no such thing as party allegiance.

The first shot that cleft the stillness of Charleston Harbor as it boomed across the bay against Sumter, severed the last tie that bound him to a party he had loved and labored for until he had reached one-half the allotted age of man. In the fierce heat of his patriotism everything that might hold him back from supreme devotion to his country was burned away—utterly consumed.

He at once resigned his seat in Congress, and returned to his State, that those who had looked to him as their political oracle might hear his rallying voice, and be held firmly to the cause of the Union. With all the force and intensity of his nature he summoned his old political friends to the standard of his country, and a short time saw him at the head of a volunteer regiment, the Thirty-first Illinois.

It is no part of my purpose to follow him through the annals of the war. It is a splendid record of patriotism, devotion, courage, and magnificent leadership.

Belmont, Donelson, Corinth, Champion Hills, Jackson, Raymond, and Vicksburg witnessed his valor and took reflected luster from the gleam of his sword.

Resaca, Kenesaw, Atlanta, and Jonesboro' are linked with his fame, and in large part owe their glory to his prowess.

He never elbowed his way to promotion, but promotion came to him almost of necessity.

The eagle of the colonel gave way to the star on his shoulders after Donelson, and that again was replaced by the double stars of the major-general, and these were but imperfect indices of his growth.

As a soldier he was the very impersonation of intense energy. Men followed him because they had no choice but follow him.

He was first of all intensely patriotic; he was as brave as patriotic, and as magnanimous as he was brave.

He possessed the confidence of his superiors, and the enthusiastic love of his soldiers.

Of his return to Congress after the war and his career here for almost twenty years, I have not time to speak. Others have done that far better than I could. But during the four years that I knew him here it seemed to me that his life as a Senator and statesman was but the projecture into another sphere of the traits that made him the splendid soldier that he was—intense patriotism, unlimited courage, strong virile force, honesty that was unassailable, devotion to duty that took little account of consequences to self.

My acquaintance with General Logan began almost immediately on my arrival at the capital. The first business brought before the committee on which I had the honor to serve was the case of Fitz John Porter; and in that connection I was at once brought into contact with General Logan. I was deeply impressed with the earnestness of his conviction and the intensity of his feelings, and his utter loathing of what he believed to be a betrayal of trust. As he would speak of it his indignation would flame up, his form would seem to dilate, and his eye would flash as if with the old light of battle, and I could imagine how he would have ridden down the line as he did at Peach Tree Creek, with his black hair streaming on the wind and his battle-blade flashing before his rushing battalions.

Does any one doubt that Logan was great? No one but a great man can fill a continent with his name, can hold a great commonwealth in his grasp, can bind unknown millions to him who have never seen his face, so that his loss shall seem to each a personal bereavement. This Logan did. But he is discharged the service of this life—mustered out for promotion.

Mr. Speaker, the devoted patriot, the brave soldier, the courageous statesman, the unsoiled Senator, the devoted husband and father, the soldier's friend, the peerless volunteer—he shall walk with us here no more.

The tender flowers we laid upon his coffin on that last, sad day of the old year have long since withered, and their fragrance passed away. Neither their loveliness nor their perfume had power to hold him back from the dissolution of mortality nor from the corruption of the grave.

And so with our eulogies to-day. They will fade with the passing hour. "The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what he did here."

If his fame depended upon this fleeting breath of eulogy it would not be worth the having. His name may save our words from utter oblivion, but all our praise will not prolong his memory by a single day. His fame rests securely in the nation that he loved and helped to save, in the millions of hearts that he taught the priceless lesson of patriotism, in the thousands of homes that he made brighter and happier by his life.

His voice is silent in your council hall
Forever; and whatever tempest lower,
Forever silent. Even if they broke
In thunder, silent; yet remember all
He spoke among you, and the man who spoke.
Who never sold the truth to serve the hour,
Nor paltered with eternal God for power.

Mr. WILSON. I can not speak of General Logan with the kindling glow of personal friendship, or even of political sympathy, that has been the inspiration of many tributes to-day. I knew him but slightly in the occasional contact of public life, and not at all in the intimate relations of private life. To me he was only what what he was to the great body of his countrymen—a fellow-citizen, a distinguished fellow-citizen, who, in all the period covered by my memory of political affairs, has been a positive figure in the arena of American politics. To give a sketch of his life, however brief, would be to tread a path many times trodden already, and I possess no fund of personal reminiscences from which, on an occasion like this, a speaker may appropriately fill in the soft and delicate traits of character, unseen in its general outline.

I must, therefore, speak of General Logan, simply as the clear-cut and distinct figure that has so long been familiar to the American people, for I think no one will deny that he stood out with an individuality all his own, even in that small class of public men to whom public service is a steady and unbroken career, and not, as it is to most of us, merely a parenthesis in some other calling. What was the trait in General Logan's character that drew and fastened to him as a permanent possession the favor of his fellow-citizens?

Not a broad and thoughtful statesmanship, for while there is a growing conviction that in this respect he was underrated, still he was not prominent as the author of public policies or of great party measures; not a great power in Congressional debate, nor in magnetic oratory before the people, although he was strong in both; not the unquestioned integrity that passed with clean hands through all the temptations and opportunities of place and power, for this was shared by many others among his colleagues both living and dead; not party leadership or ardent party zeal that loved the fray and was happiest when in the thickest of the fight. Concede to him all these traits, some in the fullest, all in a respectable measure, and we must still look beyond them for the chief source of General Logan's hold upon the favor of his countrymen, the warm attachment of friends, the hearty respect of enemies.

The cap-stone and crowning virtue of his character was its brave and transparent singleness. Men saw his robust virtues and admired them; they likewise saw his faults and forgot them, because he wore them both upon his breast. They believed him to be just what he seemed to be, nothing more and nothing less. He did not walk the stage in the mask of an actor.

And thus, Mr. Speaker, he had grown upon his countrymen as one who might fitly use as his own the words which Homer puts in the mouth of the hero of his Iliad.

For I hate with perfect hatred,
Hate him like the gates of hell,
Who within him one thought harbors
While his lips another tell.

This rare and noble virtue was the key to General Logan's hold on public favor, and his ever-widening popularity.

But, Mr. Speaker, General Logan was not only, and perhaps not chiefly, known as a civilian and Senator. When the seed of discord planted, or, rather should I say, consciously and helplessly left in our Federal Constitution by its framers, had, before the lapse of a single century of national existence, under the forcing heat of the slavery struggle, burst into the blood-red flower of civil war, General Logan was among the first, and most eager, to take part in the conflict. Of all the men that went forth from this Capitol, to range themselves on the one or the other side in that Titanic struggle, of all the men that entered either army from civil life, he came back bringing the greenest laurels and having achieved the most unfading glory, and, in the more than twenty years that have since elapsed, the luster of that martial glory added much to his power and influence in the councils of his party and of his country.

Mr. Speaker, it is a noteworthy fact that in the memorial services, one week ago in the Senate, no heartier tributes were offered than those which came from men who had met him, not only in the hot contests of partisan strife, but in the fiercer combats of real war. They were sincere tributes of manly men to a manly man. Ah, Mr. Speaker, we glory in our material greatness, our unequaled empire, with its sixty millions of freemen, our growth in wealth, the dazzling sweep of mechanical invention, our cities, and railroads, and telegraphs; but, sir, let us remember that after all the man is greater than all these, the man is more than the city, more than the railroad or steam-engine, more than the electric telegraph.

No prouder boast was ever made than that of the old Ithacan, when he said that his little island was "a rough, wild, nurse land, but its crops were men."

Was there anything in his life more manly and more pathetic than the prayer that mingled so often with the dying breath and dying thoughts of the successful warrior, when at Mount McGregor, he, too, surrendered to a warrior stronger than himself that prayer for the complete return of harmony and good feeling among his once divided countrymen? When after centuries of stubborn contest the strife between the two orders at Rome had finally ceased, the strife that so often threatened to dissolve the state and quench forever its rising star; and plebeian and patrician, turning from the bitterness of the past and remembering only its glories, joined in the career of greatness that has as yet no counterpart in history, the old warrior Camillus vowed a temple to Concord, and a later generation of Romans built that temple, whose remains are yet seen in the forum.

Mr. Speaker, was not the dying prayer of General Grant such an inspiration, such an injunction, such a vow? And will not some generation yet to come, it may be sooner than we expect, a generation freer from the passions and prejudices of the strife than we dare to be, build a temple to Concord, and in it place the marble statues of Grant and Lee, of Stonewall Jackson and Thomas, of Hancock and Stuart, of Hood, and Logan, and others not named, some yet among the living? Then, when future generations of American citizens shall view that temple, though they may possess a higher civilization than we enjoy, a greater material prosperity, and a wealth and invention beyond the vista of our imagination, yet, if they are worthy of the heritage we transmit to them, and equal to the responsibilities and duties which are theirs, they will stand uncovered in that presence and exclaim: "We have much that our fathers had not, we know much that our fathers knew not, but in this august company who can deny that their crops were men."

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, I bring a tribute from Massachusetts and place it reverently on the grave of Logan. He had not, I believe, a drop of our blood in his veins; I do not know that he was ever within our borders excepting once or twice briefly in transit. His manners, his method of thought and speech, his political ideas, were not always by any means in accord with ours, yet I venture to say this soldier and statesman of the West, at the time of his death, held the first place in the hearts of the soldiers and common people of Massachusetts, who are her chiefest pride.

Few men in this age and country combined in so marked degree the characteristics which go to make up personal popularity. His massive frame, his glowing eye, his splendid strength, his undaunted courage would have made a hero of him at any time in any land. He would have "held the bridge" with Horatius, "in the brave days of old;" he would have led, amid clashing swords and spears, the wild warriors who came down from the north to the sack of Rome; he would have couched lance in battle or in tourney with the toughest of Froissart's knights. As a patriot soldier he was bravest among the brave. At Belmont, at Donelson, at Vicksburg, at Atlanta, he led where any dared to follow. He never dodged a bullet or turned his face from the front. Had he been called to do it, he would have scaled Wagner by the side of Shaw, or have kept his saddle, as Lowell did in the valley, after his death wound, to lead one more charge against the breaking but still stubborn foe.

To these splendid physical traits he added a self-culture, a coolness of judgment, and a power and quickness of comprehension which made him a consummate general. At the first signal from Manassas he marched out of Washington as a common soldier with a musket on his shoulder. Four years later, the war all over, he rode back in triumph a major-general at the head of the proud Army of the Tennessee. Had this been all when he died a grateful nation would have kept vigil at his bier, for a mighty man had fallen; the beauty of the land lay dead in her high places.

But this was not all. By the sword peace had been won, but peace as well as war was to have work and triumphs for Logan. For more than twenty years he served in Congress, making his way by force of will, by clearness of judgment, by appreciation of popular instincts, and by honesty of purpose and action in such a degree that at his death his fame as a Senator was scarcely eclipsed by his old fame as a soldier.

Logan was born poor and died poor. Perhaps he never knew the grinding poverty through which Lincoln and Webster and Garfield passed, but he had to make his own way in the world and earn his own bread. He was not much versed in the learning of the schools, but he learned readily with his eyes and ears, and few men in the Senate knew how to use the English language more correctly and effectively. Had he been born rich, had he been trained in the curriculum of the universities, he could never have been Logan. Not down from the heights, but up through tribulation and toil and suffering come the leaders of a free people, the founders, the guardians, the saviors of free institutions. Wealth is a good thing; we all want it; education a better; all should seek it. But wealth and education in these days have their dangers. The gilded youth who dawdle out their little lives in the clubs and streets of city life either die unknown and unseen or are rudely jostled when they come in contact with the actualities of life. Let them take thought lest they be handicapped by what ought to help. Only hard work of hand and of head will make Logans. Unless a halt is soon called in wasteful extravagance, in servile imitation of foreign customs, in selfish living, the time will come when it will be easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to find a seat in the high places of popular confidence and trust. Logan—the poor man, the hard-working man—was full of popular sympathies. As a general he always cared for his soldiers; as a legislator the humblest and poorest were the ones he strove first to serve. He never cringed to the wealthy and powerful that thrift might follow fawning. He was a true gentleman, not polished in the ways of the courtier, or refined in the finesses of social life. Had he lived in the days of chivalry he would not very much have graced his lady's bower, or have sung very softly troubadour lays under her lattice, but he would have leaped into the lions' den or the raging whirlpool to win and wear her glove; he would have faced any odds in defence of her honor. Bluff, hearty, honest, he never sought to conceal, and he could not deceive.

Logan was a manly man. He knew his own merits, and that they were not always fully recognized and rewarded; but he accepted what came to him, not always, perhaps, quite patiently, but with no abatement of patriotic ardor and effort. "Greater is he who ruleth his own spirit than he who taketh a city." This fiery, passionate man could control himself. He could watch and direct the movements of a great army, forgetting none of the duties of a general, while his blood was boiling with the excitement of a common soldier in the fierce joy of battle. He could and repeatedly did accept the second place when he felt that the first was his by right.

All his life he was a public man. From law, from all private business, he turned away. He was not ashamed to seek and hold office. In youth, clerk of courts, member of the Legislature, member of Congress, the army, and then he was legislator and statesman to the end. He did not consider it a mean ambition to strive to gain favor and distinction in the public service. I do not believe that he was ashamed when called a politician, or that he thought it a thing for which to apologize that he sought to be true to his friends and to help those to offices for which they were fitted who had helped him to rise. I presume he felt that a man who is willing to do honest work has as good a right to seek it in public service as elsewhere, and that he deserves credit rather than ridicule and hostile criticism for being willing to accept and perform the duties of public office.

He gave his whole life to these duties; not its dregs, not what was left after he had achieved success in a profession, or a fortune in trade, but accepted as long as he should live comparative poverty, hard work, obloquy, the abuse of rivals, and the misrepresentations of those who were incapable of comprehending his character and his aims for the privilege of serving his country in the manner he had chosen. I declare his life to have been quite as worthy and honorable as that of the men who follow their own selfish pursuits and sneer at politics and politicians while they busily ply their muck-rakes to make their piles of dirty wealth a little larger. All honor and praise to the man who is ready to give to his country a life of hard and honest work, and is not ashamed to be pointed at as an office-holder and politician for so doing. Let the young men of the country be encouraged by the example of Logan and learn that there is no higher ambition than to fill worthily positions of public trust.

Logan was a strong man. He never counted his friends or his foes. He knew his own position, and if he could not win others to it he was ready to defend it alone.

He is dead—dead in the maturity of his strength and the plenitude of his powers—but his example lives. He has won a high place in our national Pantheon; his name will live in history; his memory is a precious legacy to those whom he has left behind him. Is this all? Has the strong man utterly passed away? Stands he no longer as a tower of strength for refuge and defense? Not so. It can not be. The bugle-call should not sound "lights out" at his tomb. His light is not out; though invisible to us, it still shines. Somewhere in the infinite realm of immortal life the great spirit still lives, clad in the panoply of a rich and well-improved earthly experience, ready for such service at any time and anywhere as opportunity shall offer and Omnipotence appoint.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, again it has become our duty, as it is our pleasure, to add a tribute of respect to the memory of a great public servant—one whose name has long been engraven upon the history of this country. We have put aside the business of the day that we may bear testimony to his great worth and excellence.

John A. Logan was neighbor to the people of my State. He was loved and esteemed by them as if he had been one of their number. His great public service had brought him in contact with them, and, in fact, with the people every where in the Northwest, where he spent the most of his life. He had learned their wishes, and had responded in a way that met their approval. In one sense we are but creatures of the present hour; it is but a question of time for most men to pass away even from the memory of their contemporaries, but such was not the destiny of John A. Logan. He lived for a better purpose, and he will live on, while millions pass behind the veil to be heard of no more.

God gave Logan a talent and force of character seldom found among men.

Born in humble life, he passed through the school of experience on his upward journey. He thus learned to feel the great wants and necessities so essential to the happiness of the common people. His self-education taught him lessons not easily forgotten. The life he led in his early days gave him much of his strength and popularity among his fellows.

Every country must have its leaders. The cares of state rest upon official heads, but principle and sentiment are nursed and crystallized by those unburdened with official work or cares of state.

A country like this, where gather people from every nation of the globe, uniting under one flag, with one object in view, which is the formation of a government for their mutual protection, must have leaders—men who advise, direct, and command for the common good.

Logan was a natural leader, both as a soldier and as a statesman. He had few equals in either sphere, and still less in the two combined. It is difficult to determine in which character he excelled most. But in either he served his country nobly and well.

As a soldier he was fearless, and he was as gallant as he was brave, as generous as he was firm.

In the House of Representatives, and afterwards in the Senate, he was the author and advocate of measures of great national interest. He took front rank as a legislator, always advocating whatever he believed to be right and for the interest of the people. If he erred, it was an error of the head and not of the heart.

When the late war broke out he was not politically identified with the administration then in power. He was not in harmony with the party that had its conduct and responsibility. But his love for the old flag that had once led him to victory, his devotion and loyalty to the country that had given him birth, lifted him far above party, its ties or prejudice. It was enough for him that his country was in peril. Whatever party could suppress the rebellion was the party of John A. Logan.

The memories of his youth when he marched with the old flag to the capital of Mexico revived his love and devotion for his country, and again he was found in the front ranks of our Army. He went not as a stranger to battle but with a practical experience that well fitted him for the occasion. We had generals, trained in the arts of war, men of experience, educated for the purpose, men with commissions and arms already in line. But these were not sufficient. Our country called for volunteers. With them and the millions behind them, everthing was possible; without them, nothing. General Logan was the representative of that element. He was early in the field. Thousands followed him, and the Union Army was swollen to enormous proportions. These were the soldiery that saved the Union; without them it could never have been saved. It matters little whether Logan was always right or seldom wrong, the ends which he accomplished hide from view the manner in which they were accomplished. His military career was a success, and history will record him as a great leader of men.

When the war was over he turned again to the pursuits of civil life, but could not long remain a student of his own affairs. He saw before him a disordered Government and a suffering people, a people who had claims upon the country they had saved. He obeyed the summons that sent him to the national capitol. Here he made a record of which we are proud, a record that places him beside the great commanders whose names will be fostered and revered by generations yet to come.

As an orator General Logan had few superiors. His force and logic gave emphasis to his easy flow of language, and he carried conviction with marvelous success. He was industrious, a close student, and deep thinker. Fearlessly he approached his subject and pressed it upon his hearers with great force and eloquence.

For many years he has been the acknowledged friend of the Union soldier. The man who had spent his vigor and was wasting away or who was wounded or maimed found in him a most earnest advocate. He treated them as the wards of the nation. His sympathetic heart felt the sacrifice they had made that our country might live. He believed in them and in their patriotism when they risked their lives and went to the field. He would have placed the strong arm of the Government about them and stayed them up in their declining years. For these men his liberality had no limit.

The year which has just passed has laid to rest some of the grandest men of our time. The angel of death has selected from the wisest and the best. Among them no one will be mourned more than the man of whom we speak to-day. He was known and read of by all men, by the young and the old. In every State, in every city and town the name of John A. Logan is dear to those who love their country and its defenders.

His death carries sorrow and grief into the homes of the millions, and they join us to-day in these words of praise.

His great service as a soldier in two wars, his distinguished ability as a statesman, his power and eloquence upon the rostrum, his devotion to the poor and the suffering have made him conspicuous and dear to the American people, and he will be remembered and loved by them as the great soldier statesman by generations yet to come.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, the man who so conducts the order of his life that when the summons come, bidding him join the majority beyond, and leave vacant his chair at the family board, the social circle, or the nation's council where he was wont to be met, as to leave behind him indelibly impressed upon his age marks or traits of character worthy of emulation, that man has not lived in vain; the world and his fellows are benefited by his being, and such a life may fitly be said to be like unto "a tree planted by the rivers of water that bringeth forth his fruit in his season, whose leaves shall not wither," and whom no evil can befall, whether he be alive or dead.

Sir, when the history of our times shall come to be written by the just and impartial historian the order of a life as I have just described will be accredited to the late General John A. Logan.

To-day the House of Representatives pauses and for the time being sets aside the work of legislation that must for weal or woe affect the living, and with bowed heads and hearts filled with sympathy face the stern realities of death, and recognize that a great light has gone out from among the nation's counsellors, no more to raise his voice in defense of right, or lift an arm to strike a blow in behalf of justice and protection to the weak and humble poor, who from every city, village, and hamlet in the land bewail his loss, and join with us at this hour in placing to his memory from the storehouse of thought ointments of sweet-smelling savor, mingled with fragrant flowers, plucked from the garden of kindness, sown by the noble deeds of him whom they called friend. Sir, my acquaintance with the late Senator Logan was not such an one as would entitle me to speak of his many great and noble qualities as father, husband, or friend, or soldier. This I leave for those who enjoyed a place in his social circle, and whose contact with him in everyday life gave them the opportunities to speak as they have of him in that regard.

Hence in the brief remarks that I shall submit I will speak of the illustrious dead from that portion of his life that shines forth with such effulgency as to strike the admiration of all, whether friend or foe. Sir, if there was any one trait of that strong character that appeared stronger than the other it was his great love for his country and the deep and abiding faith that his country was destined by God himself to be that country in which liberty in its broadest and most comprehensive term should find its greatest fulfillment. It was, sir, this love of country that made him search after truth, and when found, according to the lights before him he disregarded party tenets or dictation; yea, even the counsel of friends if they in the least appeared to jar with what his reason and his heart suggested to be for the interest of his whole country. He may be charged by those who are accustomed blindly to follow leadership or to look only upon the surface for results of being sometimes harsh and impetuous with those who did not agree with him. Yet, sir, such, if they would delve deep for causes and effects, will find that such a nature as his, accustomed to reach results by direct reasoning with truth, avoiding ingenious methods, could have no patience nor tolerance for that sophistry which would endeavor to make the worst appear the better reason; and having himself a strong and determined will, abject submission to the will or dictation of others when in conflict with what he believed right could not be understood or appreciated by him.

No greater example of love for one's country can be found than Logan's patriotic act when he exchanged a seat upon this floor for a common soldier's lot amid the stern realities and severity of camp life when the well-being of his country was threatened, the Union endangered, and sound to arms for the right was heard all over the land. How well he kept that pledge he then made let the answer be given by the fifty-two well-fought battles in which he was successfully engaged from July 21, 1861, to April 26, 1865. Deeds like these will live in song and story and be recounted when and wherever the bards or historians gather to recite noble deeds for the emulation of the youth of this or any other land. Next to General Logan's great love for his country was his love and veneration for his comrades in arms, a love and veneration so pure and holy that it blessed both him that gave and him that received, so that when the dread summon came that bade that noble soul sunder the golden chord of life and leave its cerements of clay, to put off mortality and put on immortality, every one of his late comrades in arms felt that not only their great volunteer leader had crossed the river invisible to mortal view, but also that a friend, an advocate, and, yea, almost a father, had been taken from them.

> Can storied urn, or animated bust,
> Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
> Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
> Or flatt'ry soothe the dull cold ear of death?

Mr. Speaker, this ceremony is not solely in honor of the dead, for neither "storied urn nor animated bust;" but, sir, it is that the lesson of this noble life, ended so suddenly, yet filled with honor and usefulness, may be emphasized and adorned as far as we are able to emphasize and adorn it; that the same love of country, love for one's fellow, may be held up as a noble example to those who may come after us, and that posterity may know that the American Republic has and can produce heroes equal to if not surpassing in valor, fidelity, and patriotism the fabled heroes of ancient Greece or Rome. With full measure the lesson comes to us that—

> The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
> And all that beauty, all that wealth, e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour;
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Speaker, we honor ourselves in honoring the memory of John A. Logan. Nothing that we can say or do to-day can add to nor detract from the renown of our distinguished dead, for it is no less than fame proclaims it, and it could be no greater than it is. Those who knew him well will cherish their recollections of him through life, and the nation in whose interests he lived, for whose supremacy he contended, will, in chiseled marble and enduring bronze, cause him to speak with lips that will move not, yet talk, to those who loved him in life, who sincerely mourn him in death, and to millions innumerable of those who, coming with the generations yet unborn, will honor his patriotism, his honesty, his sterling worth, and will worship at the shrine of human liberty, at which he knelt with all the earnestness of his grand manhood.

Mr. Speaker, General Logan was the idol of the citizen soldiery of the war for the Union, and he was worthy of their admiration, for he was as grand as his cause and as true as steel. It is not disparagement to our grand galaxy of volunteer heroes to say that among the many he was the one. As the magnificent image of the Christ-God, in the great cathedral of Monreale, dominates the immensity of the building, as Pallas ruled supreme in the Parthenon, and Zeus in his Olympian temple, so does the name of Logan alone transcendental stand among that throng of heroes, dominating as with a single impulse the hearts of those who, neglecting all pursuits, abandoning all professions, leaving home, wife, children, all, of every creed and all parties, marched under the banner of the Union "into the very jaws of death" and tasted of the bitter dregs of the cup of sorrow and of pain in order that republican institutions might not perish from the face of the earth.

General Logan lived in an eventful period and died in the fullness of his glory. He was an active participant in the memorable struggles that will render the ninteenth century famous in battle and in history. He was no laggard in the strife, but he was always to the front with the banner in his hands. He was determined in his purposes, sincere in his convictions, and grand in his achievements. Contending for republican government, he lived to see the Constitution of his country cleansed of impurities and firmly established on the eternal principles of truth and justice. He was a devotee at the shrine of human liberty, and he lived to see all men free. He believed in the education of the people, and he lived to see his country blessed with the grandest system of free universal education that a propitious Providence has ever permitted the children of men to enjoy. With all the earnestness of his impulsive nature did he love the starry banner of our independence, the emblem of our nation's power, and he lived to see it typify, at last, all that is great in human action, all that is grand in human thought.

It is not laudation for us to say that in all these stirring scenes and wonderful changes he played a leader's part and that he stamped his strong individuality on these pages, so grandly written in the book of our history. It is but common justice for us to concede it.

He is dead; he has gone. It seems but yesterday that he was here, that we welcomed him with the cordial greeting he always received, and to which he was always entitled, and now the places that have known him so long and so well will see him not again forever, and yet he will live here for all time. He will be with us, Mr. Speaker, while we tarry, and he will stay after we have gone. His is one of those illustrious lives that death can not destroy.

Loving husband, kind father, honored statesman, grand soldier, true friend, honest man, may your sleep in the quiet city of the dead be the rest of those who,

> Sustained and soothed
> By an unfaltering trust, approach their grave,
> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams, and may the boundless mercy of the lowly Nazarene, who gave us the precepts of your true and Christian life, and who, as the Christ King, washed all your sins away, save you to the eternal glories of the heavenly kingdom; that such a life and such a death as yours proclaim must be.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, we come to pay tribute to the memory of John A. Logan, whose name has rung through the world and won its meed of praise.

Living men may contemplate his character and draw from it lessons of purest virtue and loftiest patriotism. His whole career was a bright example of unselfish devotion to duty.

Indeed the Republic drew profit from his life. In centuries to come, amid the grandeur of its power and the unclouded splendor of its renown, the historian of our country will point to Logan as one who did much in his day to save the Republic from death.

Sounding words can not tell the strength of mind, the physical courage, the daring and fortitude that made up his character. When he led our flag to victory and gave to glory and to fame the fields on which armies struggled, when amid the carnage of the hour he rode along his line, suffering with pain from bleeding wounds, inspiring his troops with his own brave spirit, until like a restless wave they swept away every obstacle, the selfish and ungenerous may have spoken unkindly of him, but now that he is beyond the reach of ambition the man does not live who would have the name of John A. Logan forgotten. His is a name that the world will not willingly let die. He needs no splendid arches of victory, no monumental pile pointing toward heaven and covered all over with the story of his deeds to perpetuate his memory, for he is enshrined in the hearts of the people, there to remain as long as a sentiment of justice is felt or a cord of sympathetic virtue vibrates in a human heart.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, death with equal pace knocks at the palaces of the rich and the cabins of the poor.

So often, and oh! how sadly, has this Congress been reminded of the uncertainty of human life in the removal of members; and how many conspicuous in national affairs have been taken in a few brief months!

Chief among them all was he whose death has occasioned this meeting. It is held not as an exhibition of personal grief or sadness, but as a formal recognition of, and a sincere tribute to, honest worth, to duty well performed; due in justice to his memory; coming from those who knew him in his public career, the record of which will prove an incentive to emulation to those who are left and are yet to come.

The time, therefore, taken in the pause in the hurry and bustle of the business of legislation, in stating estimates of the character and eulogies—considerate always, if not tender and loving—of departed brothers is not unprofitably spent.

Mr. Speaker, General Logan was my friend, and I perform a sad duty to the memory of one whose good will and confidence was so prized in his lifetime by me when I attempt to add a single leaf to the garland of tribute which shall be rendered to him and his memory this day.

I am aware too, sir, that nothing that we say or do here will add to the sense of the appreciation of the American people of General Logan, of his excellent character, his splendid record as a husband and father, a citizen, a soldier, a statesman, a friend.

The task of giving the details of his wonderful military career I leave to those who know from personal experience its history and its success.

The fortune of assignment in these ceremonies absolve me from the propriety of reciting the successes of his civil life, as these have been so well stated by those who have preceded me, and further reference would be only repetition. And so I speak of him as my friend; as I knew him; as he impressed himself upon me; as a man whose life was devoted to the public good, as it was spent almost wholly in the public service.

His chief characteristic to me was his earnestness in whatever he was engaged. His devotion to his friends was conspicuous for its intensity. His love for the soldiers of the civil war—his companions in arms—was best evidenced by his labors for their interests and by their affection for him. His affection for his State was as that of the Roman for "the city of seven hills." Duty, honor, and integrity were active principles in his daily life, and he squared his conduct by their requirements. In his affections he was generous and ardent; his bravery, his courage was always conspicuous; true in his nature and of gentle heart, and magnanimous in all his dealings.

Patriotism with him was more than a sentiment; it was a deep-seated principle.

Love of country, its institutions, its Constitution, and its laws, was his inspiration from the days of his early manhood.

To insincerity he was a stranger; to him conviction carried with it the sense of duty to follow it; and with his bravery, his frankness, no one was ever in ignorance as to his position on any question. To such a degree was this carried that at times his position in his party was hazarded by fearless assertion of his ideas of right as opposed to those of mere temporary policy or expediency.

His support of friend or measure was never half-hearted or grudging, and his opposition was always earnest, vigorous, and determined.

He was generous to a fault; though of strong will, sometimes regarded as stubborn and imperious, yet this grew out of the intensity of his nature, and was always subordinated to his keen sense of right.

General Logan was a born leader. He was endowed by nature with all the attributes and qualities for such a position, believing that his party was right because its principles and policy were so largely shaped by him, with his energy and dash, his vigor and earnestness, his intellectual power and breadth of mind vested him with the right, as well as the ability, to command the following which he had in our State as well as in national affairs.

He had the aggressiveness which always comes from a true courage.

Not gifted with the arts of the mere rhetorician, yet the masses of the people were always deeply moved and largely controlled by his earnest appeals; he had an eloquence which always accompanies intense convictions, and which always made itself felt where smoother phrases would have failed.

His intensity and devotion to his own party, leading to his vigorous assaults upon the other, made him often the target of calumny, but all shafts of slander fell idle and harmless, injuring only the originators.

He was above them all; the slanders of political campaigns ended with them; no friend was ever weakened by them; he rested then, as now, above them all, "in the eternal sunshine of a perpetual fame."

He was ambitious; he was stimulated by the success which he attained, because deserved, to reach the highest position of honor and trust in the nation; and his friends cherished the confident hope that, had his life been spared, he would have attained that.

His life was a success. Born of the common people, without early advantages of education or scholarly association, earning successive promotions by the favor of the people, with their confidences and trusts he reached the Senate of the United States, the highest point in political preferment in the nation but one.

He died the deserved possessor of these honors and left his family that best of heritage, a reputation untarnished, an integrity unimpaired, and a feeling on the part of the whole people that the loss in his death was one common to all.

Of him it may be truly said:

Divinely gifted man,
Whose life in low estate began,
And on a simple village green,

Who breaks his birth's invidious bars,
And grasps the skirts of happy chance
And breasts the blows of circumstance,
And grapples with his evil stars;

Who makes by force his merit known,
And lives to clutch the golden keys
To mold a mighty State's decrees,
And shape the whisper of the throne;

And moving up from high to higher,
Becomes, on fortune's crowning slope,
The pillar of of a people's hope,
The center of a world's desire.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Speaker, the heart that would not be sad and the eye that would not be dim while memory in its many forms clusters around the dead patriot, soldier, and statesman in whose honor the nation's Representatives are to-day assembled must be hard and dry indeed.

Amid grief so deep and so universal no words of mine can fitly portray the sorrow of the volunteer soldiers of the war for the maintenance of the Union over the irreparable loss of their grand chieftain. The heart speaks loudest when the lips will not move.

John A. Logan was regarded as national property. His genius, his virtues, his great services in peace and in war, were esteemed a part of the inheritance of the whole people. Bold and direct in his opinions and actions, however they were sustained or combated, he was nevertheless admired by all for his great abilities as he was honored and respected for his purity of character. His fame was national, and his loss has been felt as national. The whole country, not only his State which loved and honored him, mourns over his sad death. The evidences of genuine sorrow in all sections of our country, when his demise was announced, indicates a strong national sympathy, a bond of union which political differences can not weaken, much less destroy.

General Logan was at the top among the great heroes of the Union during and since the war; he won immortality on the field and in the forum; he had impressed himself upon the age, and he is missed as a shining light extinguished in the darkest hour of the night.

Mr. Speaker, "the chevalier of the army of the West, without stain and without reproach, John A. Logan, was the son of an Irish rebel of '98." It has been said that he was of Scotch ancestry, but this is a mistake. General Logan himself, at the reception given in his honor by the citizens of Virginia City, Nev., on his return from the last national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic held at San Francisco, in answer to a question in relation to his ancestry, publicly declared that there was not a drop of Indian blood in his veins, that his father was a pure Irishman, and that although his mother was born in the State of North Carolina, her father and mother were both pure Irish. Dr. John Logan, General Logan's father, was very active as the associate in Ireland of Wolfe Tone and other Irish rebels in the organization of the United Irishmen of '98, and on account of this activity he was forced to leave the land of his forefathers and come to this country. Dr. Logan and the other Irish rebels of '98 were inspired by the noble deeds of patriotic Irishmen in our Revolutionary war.

The fame and the glory of their countrymen, Jeremiah O'Brien and General Sullivan, Commodore Barry and General Pickens, General Stark and the Rutledges, Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, and Anthony Wayne, Sergeant Jasper and General Richard Montgomery, General Knox and Charles Thompson, and many others, was upon the lips and deep in the hearts of the '98 men at home, and the Irish blood, so freely shed in America's battles for liberty, had taken root upon Irish soil. And so it was that John A. Logan inherited from his Irish father that love for the Union, patriotism, and devotion to civil liberty which made him famous among Americans, and which, at the outbreak of the recent war, naturally led him to declare for "the preservation of this glorious Union," and impelled him to shoulder his musket and to fight for "Liberty and Union" to the finish.

I shall not recount the splendid story of his life. His deeds in war and in peace have gained for him imperishable renown.

I, myself, the son of an Irishman, may be pardoned for refering to General Logan's ancestry, and to the part the race from which he descended took, not only in our Revolutionary struggle, but also in our late terrible conflict for the Union. As Andrew Jackson fought at New Orleans, McDonough at Lake Champlain, Shields and Rielly in the Mexican war, so did the Irish regiments, the Irish brigade, and the Irish legion, perform deeds of valor unsurpassed in the recent war. Who among the surviving veterans of the Union can ever forget Logan and Phil. Sheridan, Harney and Mulligan, Phil. Kearney and Hayes, Baker, French, McCall, Corcoran, Meagher, and thousands of other gallant Irish and Irish-American soldiers who fought and died that the nation might live. Alas, John A. Logan, the foremost general of volunteers, is dead. I think I can hear some comrade say, "Would that he had fallen on the battlefield with the flag he loved so well waving over him, and the shout of triumph ringing in his ears." No; his task at the close of the war was only half finished. He has since bravely fought on other battlefields, and in the press of the continued conflict he conquered peace, prosperity, and happiness for his country. His journey from the cradle to the grave is done.

Brave, gallant, honest, noble-hearted Logan tenderly loved the boys in blue. Beloved leader, faithful, steadfast friend, they will never forget you. Veterans of the Union Army, and old soldiers of the Mexican War, it is manly to weep and to mourn over the grave of General Logan, for you have lost your most devoted, your most powerful friend and advocate in the councils of the nation.

He it was that originated the beautiful memorial services over the graves of the soldier dead. Crippled veterans and stalwart soldiers, aged mothers—ye, whose sons were sacrified upon the country's battlefields—broken-hearted widows, comrades of the Grand Army and Loyal Legion, sons and daughters of the Boys in Blue, upon each observance of that day gather the most beautiful, the most fragrant flowers of May and deck the grave of John A. Logan.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the death of General Logan has suddenly removed the greatest of the volunteers who survived. The shock of surprise and sorrow was scarcely greater here, where we suddenly missed him from each day's action, than it was throughout the whole country, so closely was he knit to the hearts of tens of thousands who watched from day to day all that he did—and he did more than other men all the time. His abrupt taking off in the midst of greatest activity was something akin to falling in battle; for there was no sign of coming age or decaying strength in his thick jet-black hair, his keen eye, and his powerful frame that stood four-square to all the winds that blow. He was, as he looked, a hearty man, of sturdy, tenacious, Scotch-Irish stock. He drew his blood from positive, independent characters, both father and mother.

The surroundings in which his youth was passed tested and developed these qualities. He was of a good family. The people and events where he lived were much like those around Lincoln, and the two men had many qualities in common, owing largely to their similar surroundings. One was an aversion to all affectations. Directness and simplicity in action, directness in expression marked both these men. In all their utterances quotations, however pretty and tempting, rarely had a place; and in their action, from first to last in their long careers, each step was determined by an independent and singularly clear judgment. Discipline of mind had been attained, not in the great academies, but in the intensity of application to affairs, to the problems of daily existence that from the beginning insured success in the constant struggles of life. They were hard students, learning the lesson of each day perfectly to apply it at once to action.

Logan commenced his life in the fashion so common to ambitious young men in our country—studying law and soon striking off into politics. Within a year from the time he commenced studying law he was so practical a politician, and so successful, that he was elected county clerk. Still working at the law, studying for awhile in the Louisville University, and still diverging into politics with each opportunity, he reached the Legislature when just past his twenty-fifth year, and then for awhile became prosecuting attorney. There are several gentlemen on this floor who can remember well the reputation he so rapidly gained as a dashing, aggressive criminal lawyer—the untiring energy with which he tried a case. He soon became one of the Democratic leaders in the Legislature, and, still a young man, in 1859, came to this body.

I vividly remember him at that time when, I believe, he was the youngest member of the Illinois delegation, full of strength and youth, and of a hearty defiant nature, always ready for work, quick to help in a measure with all his might, and prompt to meet blow for blow with all his zeal and force in every contest. Logan did not then take as wide views of public questions as in after life, but what he saw he saw in complete clearness, and in his devotion to his political views, accepting all their consequences with a boldness and sincerity that looked like audacity. He had both moral and physical courage, and he quickly showed it after he came here in that stormy Congress. It was a turbulent time, foreshadowing the bloodier strife soon to come. He was an intense partisan, a Democrat of the strongest partisanship in that angry time. Suddenly when the attack was made upon his country and the Union was in danger, he changed squarely.

Think how much such a strong nature had to give up and overcome in his own heart when he abandoned his party and rushed in with those whom he had not only opposed, but really had often detested. And this he did, not by halves, but throwing away everything at once, devoting his whole being to his country. It was a noble and exalted patriotism in a soul, tried and purified by a great inward struggle, and then grandly consecrated to his country. In that memorable hour there were many instances of men who developed great qualities before unknown to themselves. It is profitable now, in these prosaic days of politics, that run on lower lines and colder questions when some of the chief party differences are matters of calculation, to refresh our spirits by recurring to that heroic epoch when the shock of conflicting motives liberated the electricity of life and revealed the recesses of men's better natures.

Then he became altogether a soldier. He had a natural aptitude for fighting. When hardly more than a boy he had had a dash of military life in the Mexican war, where he acquitted himself well, and, short as was the time he served, rose rapidly to honor and rank. In the greater war that followed he was utterly absorbed and devoted to the cause for which he fought. He had no other thought. He quit his seat in Congress and went out as a citizen volunteer to share in the fight and the disaster of Bull Run. He hurried home and raised a regiment and plunged into the struggle. From the first fight at Belmont he was in the clang of arms, through marches, skirmishes, sieges, battles; advancing, retreating; defending, attacking, as perfect a type of the great and successful soldier as ever lived. His strong frame and undaunted spirit were not subdued or broken by exposure, exhaustion, or the wounds five times received in battle. Pressing on continuously and upward, he rose higher in command with each battle and campaign until he ran the whole scale of military glory which he had begun a citizen without uniform, and from which he emerged a corps commander.

His soldiers admired him with an enthusiasm that grew with the war and his glory. They followed him with trusting confidence and they loved him, then and always after. His warm heart answered in generous sympathy this affectionate admiration from his thousands of soldiers, and this was why he never for a moment forgot them or their interests in all his public life through the more than twenty years that have passed since the war. All the world knows with what eloquence he pleaded their cause on this floor and in the Senate. Patiently and persistently he contended for them in a hundred parliamentary struggles over bills which concerned them. He pressed with passionate earnestness the claims of the broken soldier, and the debt owing to him by that nation which was so rapidly forgetting him in its hurry to greatness and riches. And when their Senator comrade died the soldiers lost a friend whose devotion to them nothing but death could diminish. There has been sorrow in the countless homes of soldiers, especially in the Northwest.

Every member from that region who sits about me has been touched by the letters we constantly receive from constituents referring to the loss of Logan. Their sorrow is akin to the anguish felt in his own family, by that silent fireside, where the honored lady who shared his labors and his triumphs now weeps through desolate days and nights for the beloved husband so suddenly stricken down.

He was a plain and approachable man. The soldier class respected him as a great captain, and they loved him because of his simple way of life. Poor in purse but rich in manly qualities, they felt that he was like unto them; that they could go near him as a comrade; that he understood their troubles; that he appreciated their services and their sacrifices; that their story never grew old to him though the war was over long ago.

He was as bold and successful a manager in politics as in war. His political campaigns were always aggressive. He had strong beliefs. His principles were clear to his own mind, and he pressed them with vehement eloquence, meeting controversy half way by fearless attack. When assailed he always turned his defense into a fierce assault. He was a most effective stump orator. As early as 1858, in that famous campaign, led, on either side, by Lincoln and Douglas, and so fruitful of great consequences, he was one of the best speakers in the State. His voice was so powerful then, and for ten years afterwards, that it reached the farthest limits of the enormous gatherings that always assembled when the people heard that Logan was to speak. His positive and direct style and vigorous, plain reasoning went straight to men's minds. He had a rollicking humor at times, and often, especially in his speeches during and after the war, a fiery rush of passionate appeal that swept great audiences into stormy enthusiasm.

In counsel with his party he inspired confidence by his own confidence, and also by his caution and his boldness combined. He knew Illinois politics even to the details of each county, and gradually became the leading spirit in the Republican party there, whom all consulted. The success that followed him like destiny through so many struggles confirmed his supremacy. When he died he was the representative Republican of that great State.

There was one specially manly trait in his character which all the politicians in Illinois knew full well, his devotion to the interests of a friend. No matter whether he was present to push his cause or not Logan did not forget him. He was not vindictive enough to remember his anger long after a contest with an opponent, but he was careful, even tenacious, in remembering a friend who had done or suffered for him, and never failed to watch over all that concerned him.

The minor features and details in the long story of his life and its work will gradually lose some of their interest as those who have known him pass away with advancing time. But there are some immense facts which will last in history and preserve his name through many centuries, keeping it fresh in the knowledge of men.

First. The great service he rendered to his country as a soldier in the most critical period in the life of the Republic.

Second. His incessant labors as a legislator for over thirty years in behalf of every measure that he believed to be for the elevation of all the people. He made a mistake sometimes, but as soon as he discovered it he promptly changed and frankly avowed it. His whole life was progress. He wanted to see the children of the poorest man educated. He encouraged love of country and care for those who suffered for it. He strove to build up and develop every interest and every industry that would tend to make the lives of men comfortable, intelligent, and happy. He gave in his own life an example of spotless integrity as a public man. He was full of ambition, but nothing in it was sordid or venal. His ambitions were all noble. He gave the best years of his life to the cause of free government and human liberty.

Looking back to-day over his splendid career, cut off when he was in his highest usefulness, every one feels the great loss the nation suffered on the day when that incompleted life was abruptly terminated. There seemed many years before him still to serve the country he loved so well with his great powers matured by long and varied experience.

But it is over. His work is done. The story of Logan's life will illumine the brightest pages of our history, and the fruits of his incessant labors, all devoted to his country and his fellow men, and known to all the world, will preserve his name and perpetuate his influence beyond his life through all the long hereafter.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker and Representatives, it gives me pleasure to unite with you in this Hall to do honor to the memory of the distinguished soldier and statesman who was recently stricken down in the pride of manhood and in the midst of usefulness. I discharge this duty the more cheerfully as it is a manifestation of that broad and comprehensive patriotism which underlies the American character, and, in the presence of misfortune, unites us as one. We are all citizens of a great and glorious country, having common hopes and aspirations. And while it is still in early manhood and with material resources by no means developed, far surpasses in its accomplishments all similar creations of the past. We should and do appreciate the blessings and unusual advantages we here enjoy, and it is the inspiration arising from the freedom of our institutions and the progress of our people that made possible the successful career of John A. Logan.

Seldom in history do we behold illustrious examples of success achieved through individual efforts in more than one special calling, and thus is made more emphatic the blended triumphs we in him behold. Without the heritage of fortune or the prestige of an illustrious name, John A. Logan sprang from the loins of the people; he claimed leadership among men, and by industry, integrity, and high resolves the ranks were open to him; he marched to the front, and held his position until the last dread summons came. A man of strong purpose, unyielding disposition, and fearless in the assertion of his convictions, he was an adversary not willingly to be encountered. He was too much of a partisan to suffer the betrayal of his party into the hands of those who would seek its advancement by questionable means and ambiguous methods. When he believed it necessary to assert the right and expose the wrong, his blows fell as unrelentingly on the head of a party friend as on that of a political adversary. To maintain a political leadership under such circumstances required commanding talents and distinguished virtues.

By the adjustment of his garments to suit the popular eye, by the adaptation of his language to catch the popular ear, and by graces of manner to win the multitude Cicero succeeded in securing applause for beautiful orations; but the impression was transient. Not so with Demosthenes, the Athenian. He labored under a natural impediment of speech which welling thoughts commanded to be overcome; and when he arose to address an audience they bent upon his words, their passions were aroused, and they cried out, "We will march against Philip; we will conquer or die." While I do not compare the subject of these ceremonies as a debater to this matchless orator, yet there was a resemblance between them. Logan was without the adventitious aid of a polished education by which to express his thoughts, yet he drove directly to his subject, and never despaired so long as there was hope of success. Upon the battlefield, as in the forum, there was similarity of action.

A volunteer soldier, he looked not so much to the method as to the object to be accomplished. He wielded not the high-tempered scimitar of a Saladin, but rather the trenchant, two-edged sword of Richard the Lion-Hearted. That one of his ardent, sanguine temperament should have presented only the dark side of his political shield to the Southern people after the close of our unrelenting and protracted civil war was not unnatural. It was felt by us in the South that he did not appreciate the sincerity and magnanimity of our professions of patriotism, which we knew were honorable and patriotic. Between those who dared and suffered upon the ensanguined field there was no estrangement, no personal bitterness. Too many were the deeds of fraternal kindness rendered upon battle-fields and in prisons, by those on either side, ever to be forgotten.

I well remember that amid the terrible carnage at Chancellorsville, when the woods were fired by the discharge of artillery, as the wounded Federal soldiers were in danger of being subjected to the most agonizing death by burning, others saw as well as myself men from the confederate picket-line rush out under the fire of the foe and rake away the combustible leaves from around those disabled by their own shot. I also remember soon after the close of this bloody drama, when the "pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noonday" was desolating some of the fairest cities of the South, the generous people of the North promptly brought material aid and ministering hands to alleviate, if not to stay, the terrible scourge.

Between such soldiers and such people there could be no enduring enmity. The grand soldier of the South made possible the grand soldier of the North, and their achievements are the common heritage of our common country. In this contest brother was often arrayed against brother. They spoke a common language and were of a common origin. The mistakes of the earlier part of the war as to each other's courage had been dissipated upon many bloody fields. They knew that this war was not of their own seeking, and being over, desired to return to their father's house, there to remain in peace. It was natural, therefore, they should view with resentment the acts or declaration of any public man seeming to question their good faith or impugn their motives.

The strong character and vehement nature of General Logan were such as made him prefer to accomplish his ends by force rather than through the suggestions of clemency. This was the side of his character which was presented to the Southern people, who, while they had confidence in his integrity and believed that as a public man he would fulfill every promise with the utmost fidelity, yet it inculcated feelings of resentment in the minds of those who had not been brought into contact with him.

In writing and speaking he was not always considerate of the feelings of those to whom he was opposed in the war. Yet while they would have preferred to applaud his magnanimity toward the vanquished, they are not strenuous to condemn the natural impulses of his ardent nature.

By his maternal side he was descended from a strong and patriotic family of my own State, and in appearance and manner partook of their hardy and impassioned nature. Whether following the fortunes of his great leader, Stephen A. Douglas, before the war, or battling for the cause of the Union, or as a stalwart Republican in later days, he was always a fearless and vigorous fighter. Many people had emigrated from the South to Southern Illinois who during the early stages of the war bitterly opposed the coercive measures of the North. In their ranks were found many who had been the most active and zealous political friends of General Logan. The sacrifices which at the call of his country sundered these ties of friendship left their ineffaceable impress on his character. He burned his ships behind him and turned his face toward those who shared his fortune upon the tented field.

In public life he was recognized as the great advocate and friend of the Union soldier, and his efforts in their behalf apotheosized him as their great political leader. My personal acquaintance with him was limited, and I speak only from impressions entertained by those among whom I live. From Southern Representatives with whom he served in Congress I have heard of his liberality, sincerity, and honesty in dealing with Southern men and measures, and I was gratified to know of this phase of his character. "Passing away" is the superscription written above the heads of all those who once wore the blue and the gray. In a few years the long roll will be beaten to summons hence all the survivors of this grand martial array.

When they are gone the flowers will bloom as sweetly, the sun shine as brightly, the silent watchers of the night move on as serenely, and the world prove as joyous as it was in their youth. Why, then, dwell upon the past, with its hardships and resentments, when our hopes and fears are now mainly with the future?

In conclusion I place this garland upon the tomb of General Logan, and will add this, though he walked amid temptations his character was stainless, and that while he served his country faithfully he died poor. It is pleasing to reflect that in the hearts and abundance of his appreciative countrymen his family are not forgotten.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to pronounce any formal or extended eulogy on the life, public services, and private virtues of John A. Logan. The time allotted for the delivery of eulogies in this Hall by his colleagues in Congress is so limited, and so many gentleman have spoken and so many still desire to speak, that further elaborate discourse at this time would be inappropriate.

But, Mr. Speaker, extended eulogies in this place are unnecessary to perpetuate the national name and fame of John A. Logan. Others may die while members of this National Legislature whose services to their constituents and their country may better be preserved and maintained in the future by the speeches of colleagues and the records of these bodies than otherwise. It is not so, sir, with the fame and renown and virtures of the great man we mourn to-day.

Mr. Speaker, we, his colleagues, can do but little toward upholding or perpetuating the fame or glory of him whose reputation for exalted patriotism, untarnished honor, unswerving courage, and for all the public and private virtues have already become watchwords with the great mass of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, the story of John A. Logan's life will be told and dwelt upon, and told again, on all fitting occasions in the future all over this country. They will be specially recited in orations delivered before the associations of the Grand Army of the Republic, which he founded and loved so much. His comrades of the Grand Army, all of whom acknowledge him as their greatest and most valued friend, will memorialize his name and recite his virtues in fraternity and loyalty so long as a sufficient number of them remain on earth to pay honor to those who have gone before. The great body of the American people who recognized John A. Logan as their statesman, champion, and friend will perpetuate his name and virtues in bronze and marble long after his contemporary colleagues, comrades, and friends shall have followed him to the grave.

And, Mr. Speaker, when some future Homer shall write the epic poem of the nineteenth century and give a narrative of the heroic period of the American Republic, John A. Logan will appear as one of the heroic characters in that drama.

Mr. Speaker, I knew General Logan perhaps more intimately than any of the members of this House outside of his colleagues from the State of Illinois. I have known him well for over twenty years. I knew him in the Army before that, when I served in the Army of the Tennessee in the Atlanta campaign. He has done me many favors. He has several times visited me at my own home. I have conversed with him alone many summer evenings, in the cool air of Colorado, upon the topics he had most at heart in this life, until I not only admired and honored him, for every American did that, but I learned to love him. Loving him as I did, I consider it one of the happiest privileges of my life to have spent the last night on earth by the bedside of my great and dear friend, assisting what little I could to smooth his last journey over the dark river from the known to the unknown.

Mr. Speaker, if proving more than equal to the greatest emergencies that can arise in life; if succeeding to the command of a great army when its commander had fallen on the field and it was in confusion and suffering reverses, and by the very force of his genius and personal valor turning defeat into victory; if, when the passions of thousands of men were raging to and fro in the balance, throwing himself into the midst of these turbulent masses and by the power of his unconquerable spirit in action controlling and guiding them into the paths of right and duty are the acts that characterize greatness, John A. Logan was a great man.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen John A. Logan under the most trying circumstances in which it pleases Providence to place poor mortal man. I have seen him upon the dreadful field of conflict, where the groans of the wounded and dying, the thunder of artillery, the crash of rifled cannon balls through the trees of the forest, the whiz of musket bullets, and the loud yells of the apparently, and for the time being, victorious enemy made it seem a pandemonium indeed, his piercing black eye penetrating the field of carnage, his streaming black hair waving in the very wind of bursting shells with a coolness and personal gallantry that made him seem more than mortal, that brought order out of chaos and wrested victory from defeat.

Sir, I have seen him again and watched him grappling with his political enemies on the field of debate upon this floor in 1868, when the old charges were made and reiterated that he had sympathized with armed movements against his country in her time of need, and he threw these charges back into the teeth of those who made them with such patriotic indignation and eloquent invective that he silenced his opponents and came out of the debate triumphant.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen him again in the social intimacy of his own and of my own home, where neither war nor debate excited his manly serenity, telling anecdotes for the amusement of all around the domestic circle; and a nobler, kinder hearted, more patriotic, courageous, or honorable man than John A. Logan never lived. He was one of the greatest statesmen and the greatest citizen soldier of Americas.

Mr. Speaker, many have denied that John A. Logan was a great man. Some because in the heat of debate he sometimes articulated language which was not perfect, when tested by the strict rules of verbal criticism. Others said he was not great because he was not learned and accomplished in belles-lettres, and others because he was unlearned in the arts and sciences.

Mr. Speaker, great acquirements, learning, and accomplishments in such things never made a great man. If, while General Logan was battling to overcome the hardships of pioneer life his time had been spent poring over books in Eastern colleges; if, when the war with Mexico broke out and he was twenty years of age his own taste or ambition or that of his parents had sent him to seats of learning in Germany, to be filled with all the knowledge that books and professors could impart, instead of going to the battlefields of his country; if, during the years intervening between the Mexican war and 1858, when he was elected a member of this House from Southern Illinois, his time had been divided between reading polite literature, traveling in Europe, visiting art galleries, and mixing in the highest society, and the remainder of it only devoted to the profession of the law in some large city, it is certain he never would have rendered the great services to his country in her time of need which his countrymen now universally acknowledge; and he never would have died universally mourned as the champion and friend of the American people. He never would have passed down to history as one of the great statesmen and the greatest American citizen-soldier of his time. As that brilliant orator and statesman from Virginia, John Randolph, of Roanoke, once said in this House:

The talent for government lies in two things, sagacity to perceive and the decision to act. Genuine statesmen were never made by such training. * * * Let a house be on fire and you will soon see in that confusion who has the talent to command. * * * Who believes that Washington could write as good a book or report as Jefferson, or make as able a speech as Hamilton? Who is there that believes that Cromwell would have made as good a judge as Lord Hale? No, Mr. Speaker, these learned and accomplished men find their proper place under those who are fitted to command and to command them among the rest. * * * Great logicians and great scholars are for that very reason unfit to be rulers. Would Hannibal have crossed the Alps where there were no roads, with elephants, in the face of the war-like hardy mountaineers, and have carried terror to the very gates of Rome if his youth had been spent in poring over books? "Are you not ashamed," said a philosopher, to one who was born to rule, "Are you not ashamed to play so well upon the flute?" There is much which becomes a secondary man to know, much that it is necessary for him to know, that a first-rate man ought to be ashamed to know. No head was ever clear and sound that was stuffed with book-learning. * * * After all, the chief must draw upon his subalterns for much that he does not know and can not perform himself

Mr. Speaker, the eloquent statesman and orator of Virginia has here shown in a strong light the reasons why John A. Logan was a great man, notwithstanding he was not a learned and accomplished man in the common acceptation of the term.

In his domestic relations General Logan was one of the happiest and most fortunate of men. In the early days of his manhood, I may truly say in the beautiful language of another:

He found in the wilderness of this world one without whose participation his bliss would have been joyless; but in whose sympathy even his sorrows could find a charm; whose smile has cheered his toil; whose love has pillowed up all his misfortunes; and whose angel spirit has guided him through darkness and danger and despair amid the world's frowns and the friend's perfidy and been more than friend and world and all to him.

The influence of this beautiful domestic relation over him was great. That influence modified his stern and ardent nature in many of the other relations of life. I attribute to this influence somewhat the reason that during his bitterest, and what may have been said his most ambitious, contests in life, he never lost sight of the domestic, social, and other interests of the American people at the moment of his greatest triumphs. For home, after all, is where those delicate feelings are to be cherished which give to society its most attractive charms; and here must those affections take root which spread their tendrils abroad and embrace the whole family of man.

We are told of Agamemnon, who sacrificed his daughter to war-like ambition; of Virginius, who with his own hands could slay a daughter to produce a political revolution; of Cato, who divorced or took back his wife as public affairs seemed to require; but the age in which these men were considered great was not characterized by the purity of conjugal relations and those domestic ties of social intercourse which lie at the very foundation of our Government by the people. In these ancient heroes there may be much to admire, but little that we can love. For, as has been said:

What more dreary than the prospects of a man who knows not the endearments of domestic life. He may have all the sterner virtues. He may have power. He may be tricked out with all the magnificence of wealth, elevated by the dignity of office, or respected for genius and learning; but what is all this worth? What is his greatness? It is like the chilling grandeur of his own marble monument. Travelers look with awe and pass it by in silence, for it contains no record of these acts of private kindness and domestic virtues upon which men love to dwell.

Mr. Speaker, if John A. Logan's life had been without the influence of these domestic charms he would not be so universally regretted by all the American people; and American history will point to this portion of his life as one of the bright examples to be followed by those Americans who wish to be universally admired and mourned by the people of their country.

Mr. Speaker, John A. Logan was a great orator. His speech was very eloquent. This distinction has often been denied to him. It has been said that his rhythm was not finished and harmonious; that his rhetoric would not stand the test of literary criticism; that some of his strong and rugged apostrophes and illustrations did not suit the taste of the accomplished schools of oratory or eloquence. In a certain sense this may be true. But, Mr. Speaker, the true object of eloquence is to persuade, and of oratory to produce conviction. When we test the speeches of John A. Logan, delivered on public and important occasions, by their results, we can not deny to him the distinction of being a great orator and an eloquent man.

Mr. Speaker, as has been said by Webster:

True eloquence indeed does not consist in speech. It can not be brought from far. Labor and learning may toil for it, but they will toil for it in vain. It must exist in the man, in the subject, and in the occasion. * * * The graces taught in the schools, the costly ornaments and studied contrivances of speech shock and disgust men when their own lives and the fate of their wives, their children, and their country hang on the decision of the hour. Then words have lost their power, rhetoric is vain, and all elaborate oratory contemptible. * * * Then patriotism is eloquent; then self-devotion is eloquent. The clear conception outrunning the deductions of logic, the high purpose, the firm resolve, the dauntless spirit speaking on the tongue, beaming from the eye, informing every feature and urging the whole man onward, right onward, to his object. This is eloquence; or rather, it is something greater and higher than all eloquence; it is action, noble, sublime, God-like action.

Mr. Speaker, are not these words of one of the great masters, whose eloquence and oratory adorned and influenced both Houses of Congress for so many years, specially applicable to the oratory of John A. Logan? Have we a man in this generation who, at critical periods in our country's history, at times, sir, when the fate of our country was at stake and "the die seemed to spin somewhat doubtful," threw himself into the breach with a more dauntless spirit, with a more firm resolve speaking on his tongue or beaming from his eye and urging him on with a more sublime and God-like action than John A. Logan? It is matter of history that at such times he changed the opinions and convictions of thousands of men by the power of his oratory.

Mr. Speaker, ask that greatest chieftain and man of his time, U. S. Grant, whether Logan was an orator, and he would tell you that in 1861, when he, Grant, was organizing the new recruits of Illinois into regiments at the State rendezvous, and on account of a misunderstanding with them about the term of enlistment a large number of them were threatening to go back home when asked to swear in for three years, and were in a state of mutiny, he applied to Logan for advice as to how to control them. Logan said, speak to them, reason with them, and appeal to them. The great silent commander replied: "I can not speak to them, I never made a speech in my life; won't you speak to them?" "Certainly," said Logan. The recruits were collected together on the parade ground, and Logan appealed to their patriotism, their courage, their pride, and manhood and duty to their country in such an eloquent and impetuous manner that the cheer soon rang out, and the cry of "Union and freedom" floated upon the evening air, and those, a short time before, mutinous recruits all enlisted for three years or during the war, and this was the result of the oratory of John A. Logan.

Mr. Speaker, many said Logan was ambitious; that he sought the highest prize in the gift of the American people. And why should he not? Had not he who had done so much to preserve the Union of this Republic and its free institutions; who had spilled his blood upon her battlefields and spent over two-thirds of his manhood days in her service a right to aspire to the Chief Magistracy? Yes, Mr. Speaker, Logan was ambitious. But who will say that his ambition ever caused him to swerve one iota from his convictions of duty and his principles under any circumstances whatever.

The contemporaries of the great triumvirate of eloquence and statesmanship, Webster, Clay, and Calhoun, often charged each of them with deviating from some of their former convictions to avoid opposition from the people in their ambition for the coveted prize.

Mr. Speaker, here is where John A. Logan's character and convictions stand forth in bold relief in the political history of this country. For, whatever may have been charged against other aspirants for the Presidency, whether occupying seats in the Congress, or if out of Congress writing speeches and letters on every promising occasion, no one would presume to intimate that Logan ever evaded any public question, ever avoided even expressing his convictions boldly in debate upon any pending measure, or that he ever tried to ride upon the crest of the popular wave or trimmed his sails to a temporary or other breeze to aid in sailing into the Chief Magistrate's harbor.

Mr. Speaker, he has passed away, and we poor mortals can do nothing more than mourn his loss and revere and keep the memory of his many virtues for our own bright example. No American has died in this generation who will be so universally missed by all classes and conditions of men as John A. Logan. The Grand Army of the Republic soldiers will miss him when endeavoring to obtain their rights. The statesmen will miss his cool and unfaltering intrepidity in the support of measures for the good of our country. The great mass of the people will miss and mourn him when their rights require courageous defense.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Speaker, the eloquent tributes to the memory of General Logan recently pronounced in the higher branch of Congress, as well as similar eulogies delivered to-day by my respected colleagues of the House of Representatives, admonish me that no words of mine can add to the measure of profound grief expressed for the loss of so true, tried, and honored citizen of the American Republic. But, sir, I would be derelict to the constituency which I have the honor to represent, recusant to the impulses of my own heart, and unmindful of the many acts of disinterested kindness received from the late distinguished Senator from Illinois, did I fail to testify my brief but humble appreciation of his worth, not only as a statesman and wise counselor, but as a man among men.

I have not awaited the hour of his death to praise John A. Logan, for it was my fortune to know him, perhaps not intimately in the social sense, but measurably as we were brought into contact and collision in the various political conflicts in Illinois. He was a foeman worthy of the foeman's steel, but withal generous and considerate in the hour of victory, submitting to defeat without murmur or complaint. My respect for John A. Logan augmented into admiration when the grand spectacle was presented of his graceful submission to the will of the majority expressed adversely to his election to the Vice-Presidency in November, 1884.

What most commanded my respect for General Logan, and doubtless the respect of others, was his entire freedom from pride of place, and kindness with which the humblest and plainest citizen was uniformly received by him, and not only by him but by his good wife, his helpmeet and staff, and by every member of the Logan household.

His methods were the very essence of plainness and unostentation, and as we all know from personal experience that public men are importuned frequently beyond the pale of endurance, yet rarely, if ever, did General Logan, impetuous as was his nature, permit himself to manifest impatience or annoyance when thus besieged. There were none so poor, so lowly, or so obscure but who could find their way freely to his presence.

Ingratitude, that superabundant vice of political life, from the stings of which but few, if any, public men are free, gave General Logan the greatest pain. Himself a grateful man, never forgetting a kindness and holding himself always on the alert to repay a hundred fold, he was keenly sensitive to ingratitude from persons he had befriended, and he befriended many. Those who are familiar with political events in the State of Illinois and elsewhere will doubtless recall many pronounced instances wherein General Logan was made to suffer grievously at the hands of pretended friends, who should have been the very last on earth to turn against him. Even when this wrong was laid upon his very threshold, he magnanimously held his peace.

In General Logan's composition, as it seemed to me, the qualities of physical and moral courage were happily blended. His integrity of purpose could not be successfully questioned, and I have noticed that he vastly preferred to perform acts of kindness even to enemies than to punish them. His sense of justice was acute to a degree, and the realization that he had been unwittingly unjust wounded him greatly. It frequently requires great courage to remedy an injustice, but General Logan never shrank from or avoided what he conceived to be his duty in this regard.

I have often instituted a comparison in my own mind of like traits of character possessed by General Logan with some of those of Samuel Adams, of Revolutionary fame. I can well imagine that had Logan been a member of the Continental Congress, when that body declared the colonies free and independent of England's domination, he would have boldly proclaimed with Samuel Adams:

> I should advise persisting in our struggle for liberty, though it were revealed from Heaven that nine hundred and ninety-nine were to perish and only one of a thousand were to survive and retain his liberty! One such freeman must possess more virtue and enjoy more happiness than a thousand slaves; and let him propagate his like, and transmit to them what he hath so nobly preserved.

Like Samuel Adams, John A. Logan combined in a remarkable manner those qualities of firmness and aggressiveness that qualify a man to be the asserter of the rights of the people. Like Samuel Adams, he was superior to pecuniary considerations, and proved his cause by the virtue of his conduct. Like Samuel Adams, the service he rendered his country in the national councils was not by brilliancy of talent or profoundness of learning, but through resolute decision, unceasing watchfulness, and heroic perseverance.

General Logan's military achievements are written in living light upon the pages of history. I was not a soldier, for it must be remembered the various pursuits and necessities of life do not permit all to follow to the tented field; but when a mere youth, serving apprenticeship at the trade of ship-carpenter and working at repairs upon the Federal gunboats at Cairo and Mound City, my eyes were eagerly strained toward the Federal lines where Grant, Logan, Mulligan, Morrison, Henderson, Rowell, Black, Thomas, Plumb, Carr, and other loyal sons of Illinois, heading their columns of brave men were upholding the cause of the Union at the peril of their lives.

From my own personal knowledge I am enabled to state that General Logan deeply sympathized with the efforts made, not only at the present period, but in days gone by, to free Ireland from the yoke of oppression, to secure equal application of British laws and afford that land a benign and friendly government, rather than afflict her with the curse of landlordism and visit endless outrages upon the Irish people without even the pretense of remedy or the confession of injustice. It was but natural that the Irish blood coursing in his veins should find outlet in sympathy for his kindred; but, apart from this, had he derived the source of life from any other nationality, his generous heart would have gone out to the weak and oppressed, vainly appealing to tyrants for home rule, and surcease from persecution from absentees who, owning the fruitful lands of the Irish isle, lived riot elsewhere upon the sweat and toil of its wretched and dependent farm-peasantry.

John A. Logan was not the man to learn without emotion and indignation of women and children starving at the wayside of Irish roads, evicted from their humble homes, their cow and pig, their beds and bedding, seized by the constabulary on warrants of distress for rent they could not pay because of failure of the crops. He drew broadly the line of demarkation between free America, where the honest settler is provided, through humane laws, with a homestead on the public domain, and the endless horrors of tenant life in Ireland, to which the English Government persistently closes its eyes and denies every reasonable proposition of amelioration.

General Logan entertained the profoundest admiration for the patriot Robert Emmett, and I have heard him say that it was a marvel how a youth of but eighteen years could have so stirred Ireland to the very core by the enthusiasm of his eloquence; Emmett, who at the early age of twenty-three, a martyr to the cause of Irish independence, met no mercy at the hands of the English Government and perished on the scaffold, convicted of high treason, notwithstanding the nobility of his demeanor at the mockery-trial, and which evoked the pitying admiration of even those who clamored for his execution for the alleged benefit of example.

Does any one in this age suppose that the blood of Robert Emmett or the suicide of Theobald Wolf Tone to escape the scaffold have been forgotten and yielded no harvest? England may have ignored the eloquence of Richard Lalor Shiel, of Waterford, vindicating in the House of Commons the Irish people from the aspersions of Lord Lyndhurst, but General Logan admired Shiel's impassioned appeal for justice to Irishmen and memorized the closing words of his peroration:

> The blood of England, Scotland, and of Ireland flowed in the same stream and drenched the same field. When the chill morning dawned their dead lay cold and stark together; in the same deep pit their bodies were deposited; the green corn of spring is now breaking from their commingled dust; the dew falls from Heaven upon their union in the grave. Partaking in every peril, in the glory shall we not be permitted to participate! And shall we be told, as a requital, that we are estranged from the country for whose salvation our life-blood was poured out!

When Logan died Ireland lost a firm friend and warm sympathizer. A great American has fallen in the very plenitude of his usefulness, and the Republic mourns the loss, as it has mourned the loss of other patriots gone before. The earth that entertained him at his birth, fed and all along his life sustained him in the performance of his duty, now that he has been abdicated by the rest of nature, like a gentle mother, embraces John Alexander Logan within her lap, and protects his mortal remains until the hope of resurrection shall be realized and the divine promise of a life beyond the grave fully redeemed. "The body returns," saith the Scripture, "to the earth from whence it came, and the soul to God that gave it."

His death was tranquil, surrounded by family and friends, and loving hands bore his body to the tomb. For this great boon we should be thankful. His widow and children know that the nation shares its deep grief with them, and to that extent only we can give them earthly consolation. Our friend died as he had lived, honored and respected, not alone by the people within the broad boundaries of the American Republic, but by man and woman in all lands where liberty or the hope of liberty throbs within their bosoms.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, "dust to dust and ashes to ashes" is decreed to all. Yet notwithstanding this common mortality, it has, since the morning stars first sang together, been the habit of our race to pay tribute to the honorable and chivalric dead, and with profound respect and sincere sorrow do we pause in the busy activities of life, suspend the business of this Chamber, and in saddened cadences laurel with rhetorical offerings the grave of one the world respected, the nation honored, the people loved, and patriots mourn, General John A. Logan.

It was in this Chamber that John Alexander Logan first became known to the people of this country, and it was from this Chamber that he went as a volunteer to fight in the first battle of Bull Run, as it was from this Chamber that he went to the capital of his native State and tendered his services to its governor that he might be enrolled as a defender of his country against the war of treason and rebellion just precipitated upon it by his late political associates. It required indomitable courage, sincere patriotism, and intense unselfish love of country to prompt to all this. But these were the distinguishing characteristics of this son of Illinois, and how we from the prairies of the Great West recall the sensations of that day.

How our hope was enkindled, our patriotism encouraged, our enthusiam strengthened, our spirits revived, and our cheeks made to glow with new faith and animation, as we learned that John A. Logan was strong enough to strike down the prejudices that surrounded him, the traditions that hampered him, the political affiliations that had dominated him, and with a mailed hand and matchless eloquence declare for his country, her institutions, and her people.

That period of strife is only recalled that we may speak of the grand achievements of this illustrious man.

From his first enlistment until the last gun was fired he was the incarnation of war. War to him was a terrible, a cruel reality, but that lives might be spared, peace secured, and tranquility restored, he would make war with the heaviest guns, the strongest battalions, the best equipped divisions, and prosecute it with all the energy and earnestness that could be given to human organizations. Time will not permit me to speak of his military record and achievements as I would like, and yet it is a story known to all.

But when the belching of cannon ceased, when victory crowned our arms, and peace was restored to our bleeding country, it saw General John A. Logan crowned by the plaudits of the people the greatest volunteer soldier of the Republic. He did not get at all times that recognition from his superiors in authority that he thought his distinguished services deserved; but he never sheathed his sword in discontent, he never refused in a spirit of insubordination to execute the orders of his superiors, and he never in the face of the enemy refused to give battle, or to contribute by his heroic presence and splendid bearing to the cause of his imperiled country, and the success of the Union arms.

In every council his voice was for battle, and in every battle his strong arm, brave deeds, and impetuous words were for victory.

Many there are in this House who will recall that day in front of Atlanta when the impetuous Hood hurled his gallant forces against the Union lines. No more memorable contest occurred during the war. McPherson had fallen and Logan was in command of the Army of the Tennessee, and against his command came the almost irresistible legions of Hood, determined to break the Union lines and to crown their efforts with a victory that would carry consternation to the Union forces and give hope and relief to the beleagured city of Atlanta.

Never did men fight with more gallantry, and never were men repulsed with more daring and heroism than was witnessed that day on that now historic field in the State of Georgia.

On both sides of their rifle-pits our boys struggled for the victory, and hatless, fearless, impetuous, and invincible, their beloved commander shared with them the danger, and by his magnetic presence and intrepid bearing was to them "an inspiration, a prophecy, and a success."

But it has been said that Logan was a political soldier. Is that to his detriment? Is it not rather to his credit? Shall it ever be the settled policy of this Republic that no man shall be honored with military rank at a time of war and of great national peril, except those who have been trained to the profession of arms and educated at the military schools of the country?

As was so well said in the Senate Chamber last week by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut:

> He was classed as a political general. I do not know that it was altogether an unfriendly remark. He was, sir; he had the honor to be a political general. It was a political war, and he was as strong in one field of battle as the other. The political generals did double duty. The anxiety during some of the great days of those four years was not that the soldiers of the Union would be unable to put down the rebellion in due time, but that the voters at the ballot-box might put down the war too early; and some of the political combats won by Logan and others at home were as useful to the cause of the Union as the triumphs of Vicksburg and Gettysburg. Baker, matchless as an orator, chivalrous and lovely in battle, was a political general. Garfield, giving promise of great generalship by an unconquerable industry and energy, and a brilliant courage in the face of the enemy's guns—Garfield, obeying what was almost a command, went from the Army to Congress. Frank Blair, with the trumpet tones of his voice and the quiver of his uplifted finger, was worth a corps of soldiers in his influence over Missouri, and he was a political general.

At the close of the war when the armies of the Republic were disbanded and martial strife had ceased, General Logan returned to his home. But there was no repose for him. By divine right he was a leader of men. At the forum, in the council chamber, and upon the hustings it was his imperial right to lead as well as upon the field of conflict and carnage, and after a short respite from public duties he was returned to this Chamber as the representative at large from the State of Illinois, and from that time on until the day of his death he was one of the most distinguished figures in our political history.

At all times aggressive and impulsive, he had the courage of his convictions. It can not be said that his character was without fault or criticism, but let it be recorded to his eternal honor that under all circumstances and to all classes he was an honest man. Sincere in his convictions, he despised shams and false pretense, and the glamour of hypocritical professions never deceived or captivated him.

Persistent in purpose and tireless in endeavor, by his indomitable will he overcame obstacles, converted embarrassments into opportunities, and made barriers but stepping-stones to greater things.

He was the first commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, and was the first to suggest the beautiful custom of strewing with the fragrant flowers of spring the graves of our heroic dead. Every man who wore the blue was his comrade. For them his labors were incessant, and the statute-books of this nation attest his constant devotion to their best interests, and to the best interests of those that were widowed or made fatherless by that merciless contest. He could never forget those who shared with him the weary march, the bivouac fires, the evening meal, the sanguinary engagements, and the glorious accomplishments that finally brought victory to our banners and peace and prosperity to our borders. For them, in his judgment, the coffers of the nation should be opened, and for them his heart ever warmed in fraternity, charity, and loyalty.

Mr. Speaker, few men in American history have left such an impress of their individuality upon the public mind and such a brilliant record of grand and glorious achievements as General John A. Logan.

Coming from the ranks of the people, he believed in the good sense and honesty of the masses, and his heart and hand were ever for their good. He was a firm Republican and believed in the genius and institutions of our republican Government, and tyranny in all forms and in all countries found an inveterate hater in him.

As citizen, as lawyer, as soldier, as legislator, as statesman and orator, as husband, father, and friend, we honor him, and his glory is a part of the resplendent and imperishable history of our country.

On the last day of the old year, with muffled drums and drooping flags, General John A. Logan was laid to rest. It was a raw, cloudy, December day, and the snow lay white on the country hills and crunched under the feet of the walkers in the streets of the city. A dull, gray sky hung overhead and at times the winter rain poured in freezing torrents upon the ground. All nature seemed touched with sympathy at the nation's loss, and joined in the tears and sobs of the mourning multitude. He had died the Sunday before, and how fitting that this closing scene in the soldier's life should come with the close of the year. John A. Logan and the old year went out together. That dark but handsome face, that manly bearing, will be seen no more on this side the "dark river" to whose cold tide we are all hastening.

But his memory will endure as long as the English language, and the remembrance of his great deeds will be as imperishable. Honest, incorruptible, and true, tender as a woman, brave as a lion, trusting as a child, his life passed to its ending without stain and without reproach.

In that beautiful home overlooking our capital city, where he hoped to spend so many happy hours, sits the widow in weeds and mourning.

A vacant chair, an empty uniform, medals of honor, and souvenirs of affection tell of the loved one who was, but comes no more.

In her desolation how vividly is recalled her constant devotion to the dead we honor. At home, abroad, in the field, in the forum, here, everywhere, she was his encouragement and almost constant companion, and the story of her services in the rude hospital on the banks of the Cumberland, in nursing back to life him who lay bleeding and exhausted from wounds and exposure received and endured on the field of Donelson, is a grand tribute to this truly American woman.

And with her tears and sobs are mingling to-day the tears and lamentations of hundred and thousands of the comrades of the late war, who, appreciating the services of General Logan in their behalf, mourn his death as a personal bereavement, and a loss to the country that is irreparable. And when the voice that called him hence shall summon those from whom it gave him grief to part, may they join him in the world of rest and peace—

> Where no storms ever beat on the glittering strands,
> And the years of eternity roll.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, in one of his most brilliant lectures delivered during the time of our civil war at the University of Cambridge, Goldwin Smith, speaking of that splendid Puritan corps known as the Ironsides, which Oliver Cromwell organized and disciplined, uses in substance this language: "That splendid yeomanry, with high hopes and convictions of their own, who conquered for English liberty at Naseby, at Worcester, and at Marston Moor, in their native England, are now seen no more. Here they have left a great, perhaps a fatal, gap in the ranks of freedom." "But," he adds with something of pride and enthusiasm, "under Grant and Sherman they still conquer for the good old cause."

And what, sir, is that good old cause? Do we not know that it is the cause of Liberty against Slavery? That it is the cause of freedom against privileged usurpation?

"That splendid yeomanry" which the historian thus eulogizes, transferred over sea, became the fathers and founders of this great Republic of the West. The heart and core, as we know, came from England. It was reinforced from Scotland and from Ireland. In later years it has welcomed German and Scandinavian auxiliaries. When the time came to sever the political connection between the colonies and Great Britain, a hundred years ago, it was the yeomanry, informed and instructed by Franklin, and Samuel Adams, and Thomas Jefferson, and led and disciplined by Greene, and Wayne, and Washington, who won the independence of these States and established this Union.

And when, in 1861, the storm of civil war "blackened all our horizon," it was the yeomanry, we know, who furnished the volunteer soldiers who filled the ranks of the Union Army, and in the most desperate of campaigns, in the direst civil war of all time, by their persistence, and steadiness, and valor, carried the starry flag to victory and saved to the cause of civil liberty and forthcoming generations this land of our love and devotion, and by universal consent first of these volunteers was John Alexander Logan! To-day we pause in this forum from our accustomed work, where he was once a living force and where his resonant voice was, in former years, wont to be heard, to do honor to his memory and to mark our estimate of the powers and merits of this man.

It is difficult for me, as I doubt not it is to all his old comrades, to think of Logan dead. He had so much virility, so much of real manliness, such pluck and brave persistence, that he seemed to be endowed with a kind of perennial youth. And so I doubt not he will always seem—for his fame will not die—to those multitudes who in the long years to come shall read the deeds of this splendid gentleman and stout soldier of the Union.

By the common consent of all his old comrades, and by the acquiescence of all who were not his comrades, and never saw him with the blaze of battle in his eyes, he was the typical and ideal volunteer soldier of the Union army during those four tremendous years when the stern question was, should the Republic live or die.

Mr. Speaker, John A. Logan believed with the faith which makes heroes and martyrs that in the maintenance of the Union, in the integrity of its territory, and in the complete ascendancy of its Constitution and laws were bound up, not alone the interests and welfare of one part of the nation, but the rights of all American citizens, the birthright of untold millions yet unborn, the triumph of republican liberty throughout the world, and, as a necessary sequence, the best results and fairest fruits of Christian civilization.

He believed, as did the Union volunteers, in the rights of all men, because they are men, and not "dumb, driven cattle;" and he knew, and his comrades knew, that the victory ought to be, and, in the providence of Him who raises up and pulls down nations at his will, would be, the victory of North and of South alike; that it would, in its final beneficent results, be the common heritage and common glory of their own, and of the children and children's children of those then "wearing the gray," who were arrayed in civil strife against them, but for whose manly courage and stalwart energy in a most mistaken cause they felt a stern respect and admiration like that which, in the great Russian campaign, the Cossacks of the Don felt for Marat, the great cavalry leader of France!

In this faith, when the day of wordy debate was past, when patchwork compromises would no longer do, when the dread question was put, Shall slavery or freedom be master on this continent? Logan made his decision. We all know his antecedents. We all know how loth he was to take up arms against his brethren. His mother was born at Nashville, almost in sight of the Hermitage. But the decision had to be made. He resigned his seat on this floor. He spoke with a tongue of fire to the yeomanry of his district and his State. He rallied around him a regiment. With his thousand comrades in arms he swore to maintain, to preserve, and to protect the Constitution of the United States, and he went forth to the dangers of uncertain war animated by the very spirit in which the angel of freedom speaks in the magnificent language of Whittier:

> Then Freedom sternly said, "I shun
> No strife nor pang beneath the sun
> When human rights are staked and won.
> I knelt with Zisco's hunted flock,
> I watched in Toussiant's cell of rock,
> I walked with Sidney to the block.
> The Moor of Marston felt my tread,
> Through Jersey snows the march I led,
> My voice Magenta's charges sped."

It was to maintain, not to disintegrate; to preserve, not to destroy, that Logan donned his country's uniform of blue. With reluctance, and almost with heart break he took up the gage of battle. He knew what war is. He knew its horrors, and all its blighting curses. But he was a man of the people. He was simply and always one of the plain people on whom Abraham Lincoln always relied.

Always affable, always approachable, careless of mere form for form's sake he would brook no disobedience of orders or dereliction of duty. His courage, which rose highest when dangers multiplied, was known to the humblest soldier in his command, and in the old Army of the Tennessee he was more to us than a Chevalier Bayard, for we always felt that in Logan we had not only a gallant and splendid general, but we had a comrade and a friend, tender and helpful, and true as well as brave and daring. Around the camp fire we called him "Johnny," or "Black Jack." But it was by way of endearment—as an expression of attachment and confidence.

He was ever king of hearts. His comrades loved him because they could not help it. And, sir, ever since the war-drum has ceased to beat he has been enshrined in the very hearts of the old soldiers of the Union. We loved him as we really loved no other great soldier of the war, and we know how he loved the boys in blue in return.

On the 3d of July, 1863, at Vicksburg, between the lines, it was my fortune, as it was of thousands of others, to see the meeting of Grant and Pemberton when the terms of the famous surrender were agreed to. Accompanying his great commander was Logan, then in the prime and very flower of his magnificent manhood. His long, black hair, how it shone in that sunlight!

I seem to see him to-day as he then stood on that open ground in the clear light of that hot July sun. His every unconscious pose and movement seemed instinct with his character and heroic purpose. And so, sir, he will ever stand out in the clear perspective of history. As he stood that day, out against a background of clear blue sky, the observed of all who saw that scene, so forever—fit comrade of his chieftan Grant—

> Let his great example stand
> Colossal, seen of every land,
> To keep the soldier firm, the statesman pure,
> Till through all lands and through all human story,
> The path of duty be the way to glory.

Mr. HAYNES. Mr. Speaker, if I were asked what element in General Logan's character I most admired, I should answer his constancy and his consistency. It was his high distinction to be generally recognized an the most illustrious example the war produced of the citizen soldier as distinguished from the professional; and when the great citizen armies disbanded and turned their faces so joyfully to their homes and the pursuits of peace, he maintained an equal distinction as the soldier's friend in the legislative councils of the nation. To the day of his death his course was such as commended him to his old comrades as a champion who never swerved and never weakened in defense of their rights and their interests. As a soldier he won by bravery and skill the plaudits not alone of those whose cause was his cause, but of those against whom his efforts were directed.

There is in the hearts of brave men who with their lives in their hands battle for their convictions a chord which vibrates with admiration and respect, and even with a sort of affection, for those among their opponents who deal the hardest blows in honorable warfare. Such a man was Logan the soldier, and it is a matter of common knowledge and observation with those of us who wore the Union blue that our regard for the manly, soldierly qualities of our fallen chief was shared in an almost equal degree by those who wore the confederate gray.

As he commanded the admiration of his comrades in war, in peace he won their love and their affection. On the battlefield he was their trusted leader. In the council halls he was their steadfast champion and friend. As a Senator he came to be recognized as the great pillar of strength upon which they confidently leaned, and it was a confidence which never was misplaced. Probably no one man had so great a part—certainly not a greater—in shaping, directing, and urging the legislation of the past twenty years in the special interest and for the relief of the soldiers of the Union and their dependents.

In the first years of returning peace to stand by the soldiers was only to float with the popular tide. The national heart was overflowing with gratitude toward those who with songs and hosannas brought the wayward sisters back to their seats by the national altar. Those were the days when the pulse was still beating with the exhilaration of close contact with mighty deeds and great achievements. It was not in the course of nature that the open generosity which characterized those years should long continue. It could not be otherwise than that gradually selfish considerations should assert themselves; that we should with greater pertinacity dwell upon the cost, and more frequently insist that "we can not afford it."

With the growth of that sentiment which now stands appalled at the magnitude of our pension-list and which shudders at every effort to extend it, General Logan's devotion to the soldiers' interest asserted itself in renewed efforts in their behalf. Oftener than otherwise the pencil of the venomous cartoonist when using him as a subject cartooned his efforts in behalf of the soldiers. But it was by this sign that a million men hailed Logan as a worthy leader, stood by him, swore by him, and attached themselves to him by bonds of affection which gave him a personal following such as but few of our public men have ever been able to boast.

When the tidings of his unexpected death was flashed over the country it brought mourning to the humble home of many a soldier to whom Logan was known only by name and by reputation. A million of these, who never met him, who never saw him, felt that they had suffered a personal loss which could never be replaced. It is a proud record that Logan has left as a soldier. It will be quoted that after a long public career he leaves a name unstained even by a suspicion of dishonor. But there will be no prouder monument to his memory than the love and affection which so long as life shall last will dwell in the hearts of those who were his comrades in the war which assured the perpetuity of the Union and the grandeur of our common country.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, it did not seem like Logan to die. That well-knit frame, piercing eye, and elastic step, all spoke of life and vigor, and added years of activity. But even as we looked with admiration upon his strength and vitality, the conquerer came, strength became weakness, and life was death.

> Ah, well, the years sweep swiftly on;
> Death's sickle does not, may not, rest,
> And shall not spare the brave, the best,
> For any prayer, for any moan.

And to-day we cease for a little while from our wonted labor, and sinking all that would separate us, stand animated by one thought and one fraternal feeling before the tomb wherein lies all that is mortal of a brother who has preceded us by but a few short days, God alone knows how few, to the other shore.

Others have spoken of his early life and its trials and triumphs, of his deeds of valor as the citizen soldier, and his long and brilliant career as a statesman. Mine the lot for a few brief minutes to speak of him as an orator and a scholar. To those whose fortune it was to hear him in debate or upon the platform it is not necessary to say that Logan was an orator in the highest and best sense of the term.

He did not use the tricks or cultivate the cheap devices of the mere declaimer. Life was too earnest for him, and his time too short for this. He had the best of all attributes of the orator, an intense conviction of the truth of his utterances, and an earnestness of manner born of that conviction. He spoke because he had something to say, and which he believed needed to be said. What he believed he believed with all the intense earnestness of his nature, and he uttered it with equal intensity and earnestness. However much a listener might differ from him in sentiment, that hearer always felt that Logan was sincere.

This it was which gave him such power as an orator. This it was which enchained the attention of his fellow Senators and thronged the halls where he spoke. The world will always listen to an earnest and sincere man. Rhetoric and grace and sweetness, rounded period, and swelling peroration, all these please the ear, but Logan hurled rugged truth, in impassioned utterance, at the mind and conscience of his hearers. He did not stop to parley, but thundered out his thought and moved straight upon the enemy's works. A debate was with him no dress-parade, but a battle as real and earnest for the time being as any he had helped to win as a soldier beneath his country's flag.

And yet when the occasion came he could be gentle as a child and tender as a woman. Let a comrade fall by the way and no tenderer or kinder voice spoke his virtues than the voice of Logan.

Less than one year ago, standing beside the tomb of his great leader, Grant, he uttered these words:

Friends, this noble man's work needs no monument, no written scroll, in order that it may be perpetuated. It is higher than the dome of St. Paul's, loftier than St. Peter's, it rears itself above the Pyramids, it soars beyond the highest mountain tops, and it is written in letters of the sunbeam across the blue arch that forever looks down upon the busy tribes of men.

Logan was a scholar. Born far from the culture of city and school, reared amid the surroundings of a new home in the then far West, he heard in his boyhood days the ruder forms of speech often incident to the frontier. Later he profited by the culture of the schools, yet sometimes when warmed in debate or carried away by his earnestness, he would momentarily forget that culture and relapse to the speech he learned in his boyhood days.

This was not often nor to any great extent, but slight as it was it was eagerly seized upon by those who would rather wound a proud and sensitive spirit than miss an item, and it was sent out to the world as his habitual custom. This was cruel and unjust. I personally know that it caused many a pang not only to his heart but to the heart of his noble and loving wife.

Logan was a scholar. Go to the library in yonder lonely home. Look over the volumes which fill its shelves. The best thought of ancient and modern times is there. The treasures of Greek and Roman stand side by side with the gems of German, French, and English literature. His books were read, studied, mastered. No idle ornaments these. Daily companions of the master were they. No delight so keen after his years of activity in camp and field as to sit surrounded by these mighty minds and hold deep converse with them, and as the years rolled by their influence was shown more and more with each successive utterance, until his great "oration at the tomb of Grant" showed how ripe a scholar he had become.

Human utterances pass away with the occasion and are forgotten. Here and there one survives and passes into the world's treasure-house of thought. That oration of his will live. It contains the seeds of immortality. None but the mind of a scholar could have conceived it, and wrought it into form with its wealth of illustration and allusion. As he calls upon the Pyramids of Egypt, the Tombs of Mexico, the Sculptures of Yucatan, and the Mounds of North America as mute witnesses of man's yearning after immortality, we think with what a wealth of effort these material structures were wrought, and forget the years of patient thought and unwearied study which qualify a mind to give to the world an immortal thought.

That patient thought, that unwearied study was his. Shall his work survive the coming centuries? The pyramid builder moldered into dust almost ere history began, and his work yet stands. So, too, the child rescued from "the marshes of the Nile" has left his impress on thirty centuries of mind and thought. A yearning for immortality, a desire to leave an impress upon the thought of his age, seems to have been upon Logan as he penned that oration, and it will take its place among the works the world will not let die.

But time hastens, and no word more may be allowed me. That busy brain is stilled, but somewhere in the broad universe of God that spirit lives. One famous to-day, standing by the open grave of a beloved brother, could only grope in the dark for some faint glimmerings from the other shore. George Eliot, as her mighty brain turned to things celestial, could only breath a despairing wish to join the "choir invisible," but to the clearer faith of Logan the life beyond was real, and in that faith he crossed the river. The battle is over and the soldier is at rest. God be thanked for his life. God be praised for such rest.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, where duty and veneration combine, even funereal sadness is made lighter and less sad. In common with the Senate, this House owes to the nation and to mankind the duty of recording its estimate of a departed public servant. As a fellow-citizen of the same city and State it becomes my duty to speak of the merits of our departed Logan. His demise leaves a felt vacancy in the Senate Chamber, where the drapery of sorrow woefully speaks the loss to that body.

Not less significant were the nation-wide acknowledgments of that loss echoed back to these Halls in the chimes of funeral bells across this continent. The North tolled their bereavement; the South rang out the same sad dirge, and the clanging was repeated from East and West. Such a man's death is the nation's loss, and each citizen singly deplores it. The bank of human friendship is invincible in its strength of deposit; but its great assets were lessened when John A. Logan was removed to a higher sphere.

There is an immortality beyond this life. The power of a great mind, the success of a superior human intellect, can not be buried in death, and Logan will live forever in memory's world. Upon our own and the actions of coming generations his living influence is and will be shown. The tracery of his character has become interwoven with the nature of this generation, and can not die while our Republic exists. His stern personality has stamped itself upon much of our abler legislation.

As we look upon his desk at the other end of the Capitol; as they wait in vain his coming to the Senate Chamber; as we tearfully acknowledge that at his family gathering "there is one vacant chair," we are forced to say Logan is dead; but other proofs bid us declare the influence of his life still burns and beats in the pulses of his surviving fellow-citizens.

As a private soldier in the United States Army in the war with Mexico; as one of that army's best staff officers; as a colonel, and finally major-general, in his country's cause for the suppression of the rebellion, the same marked characteristics governed General Logan—a stern sense of duty that would admit of neither compromise nor hesitation in performance.

At the beginning of the war the Republican idea in full had not been completely developed. It was an evolution from the conflict of two antagonistic opinions. An idea in government had yet to be worked out. The idea of Hamilton and the idea of Jefferson, formulated, as each believed, in the Constitution, were never appreciated by the people of the different sections of this Union—that of a centralized Government supported by independent local commonwealths called States. The problems of States-rights and National Government were involved and had to be satisfactorily adjusted.

In that adjustment General Logan could see that it was Union or no Union, fragmentary existence or a great nationality, and his sword flashed quick for Union, and flashed in triumph for the great and grand cause. The end which he sought was an undivided Union and universal freedom. He threw himself far into the battle, and never saw the rear until peace smiled over the Union restored and freedom re-established.

If we scan the whole life of John A. Logan—his mature years—those years which other men devote to the business of acquiring fortune, he consecrated to his country on bloody fields and in legislative halls, in the dual service of soldier and statesman. In a long career of usefulness and distinction in civil life, he most efficiently aided in those measures of reform legislation that do credit to this country. At the close of the war, worn and torn by the strain of battle, without stopping for rest, he threw all his strength into the breach the war had made between the sections to heal it by his statesmanship, and when death closed his eyes he was a poor man.

His civil services began in 1849 as clerk of his county court; he served his people in the Illinois Legislature in 1852, 1853, 1856, and 1857, and served in the Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh, Fortieth, and Forty-first Congresses, and in the United States Senate from 1871 to 1877. Again he obeyed the people's call and was returned to the United States Senate in 1879, and was re-elected in 1885, where he was found busy when the great summons came, "Cease from labor."

It would appear difficult to add to this lifetime of public service. When the boy had barely merged into the man he left home and its comforts, profession and its ambition, to enter the United States Army as a private in the war with Mexico. Again with his loyal fellow-citizens he volunteered to defend his country against internal enemies. He served throughout that war, starting in as colonel, coming out as major-general. His work was done amid the smoke and iron hail of Belmont, Donelson, Shiloh, Vicksburg, Lookout Mountain, Atlanta, and in the march to the sea.

By the brilliancy of his movements, by the chivalry of his conduct, he unconsciously made himself the idol of American soldiery. The peer of the highest, the friend of the humblest in the land, John A. Logan was a model American citizen. He was a statesman whose purity of character prevented his being a mere politician. Firm in his political convictions, as he was in all his opinions after due consideration, he was also as invincible a warrior in the arena of politics as when a soldier in the field of actual war, and as cowardice was impossible to him in the latter, so neither was he unjust or malicious in debate.

Successful or defeated, he came out of his public contests without the shadow of malice or revenge. In private life his character was as unspotted as in public. His integrity was never impugned, his motives never questioned, or his conduct charged with darkness. The graceful symmetry of his daily life left not a single angle upon which could hang the frosty breath of slander. The shafts of envious or malicious traducement struck harmlessly against that character or fell broken from its adamantine surface.

Viewing such a character in all its rounded grandeur, I may close my remarks by holding that character up as a picture-lesson to the young men of our country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr Speaker, when a few weeks ago, in the solitude of my own home, bowed down by a great personal sorrow, the news of the death of John A. Logan flashed over the wires, I could not but feel that another personal grief had come to my heart. For every man in this nation who loves liberty and loyalty and law loved him in whose memory these words of eulogy are being spoken to-day.

It was not my good fortune to intimately know General Logan, yet when I came to Washington in December, 1885, it was my privilege to bring a letter of introduction from one of his warmest personal friends, and I shall never forget the warmth of the greeting then received, or the kind request, frequently afterward repeated as we casually met, to visit him at his home. That pleasure was still in anticipation when death so suddenly removed the noble man and brave soldier, and carried to that household the darkness of desolation and the overwhelming grief of crushed and bleeding hearts.

But it was not necessary for one to personally know him to gain a knowledge of his character and attributes. His record is written on every page of the history of his country, especially since the troublous times commencing in 1860. When the nation needed brave men to defend it Logan threw all his energy, strength, and heroism into the scale and came out of that terrible struggle with a record for bravery and military skill equal at least to that of any man who fought on either side. Rapidly rising from a private to major-general, he was the pride and glory of the men whom he commanded.

His battles were nearly all victories, and in them he was a conspicuous figure, inspiring his men by deeds of daring unexcelled in the military history of the world. What wonder that he was the idol of the veterans of our late war! What wonder that the common soldier, recalling the events of that great conflict, turned to John A. Logan as his best friend! What wonder that wherever soldiers congregated—around the camp-fire and at their reunions—the mention of Logan's name was always greeted with manifestations of delight! And surely this record alone—the love and honor of the men who left home and loved ones to do brave battle for the Constitution and the Union—is enough to immortalize the memory of one of the greatest generals of modern times.

But Logan was not only a great soldier—he was equally a great civil leader. Examine the long record of his public life, and not a blot is on the page. Earnest, aggressive, and eloquent, his words always reflected honest convictions and high purposes. The arts of the demagogue were unknown to him, the tricks of the mere politician were antagonistic to his ideas of public duty. As so many have testified to-day, he loved truth for truth's sake, and despised pretense and shams of every kind. Loyal to his country, he was equally loyal to his convictions on all public matters, and wherever the finger of duty beckoned he followed fearlessly and triumphantly.

In every department of life—whether as soldier, legislator, counselor, or friend—in the Army, in the Senate, or anywhere among his fellow-men, he was the circle of profound respect and loving admiration, while in the sacred precincts of his own home he was the light, the joy, and the inspiration, and the deep and overwhelming grief that to-day sweeps over the heart of the loving companion of his life-work is, after all, the most eloquent tribute that can be paid to his memory.

Logan was a great man in the best meaning of that word. He was both physically and intellectually strong. He towered above the masses as some great tree towers above its fellows.

In my own State, on a lofty mountain peak, is the perfect face of a man, formed by the rocks without the aid of human intelligence or human effort. Tourists from distant lands come to gaze upon "the great stone face," and go away with feelings of awe and admiration. It is a grand face—grand in its dignity and its impressiveness—a face that haunts one in after years, and tells the story of nature's grandeur and glory. And so, too, there are men who tower to the mountain tops of human experience and acquirement, and look down upon their fellows in the valleys below. Such a man was Logan—a great, strong, noble soul—a natural leader of men, and utterly incapable of the petty meannesses that mar so many lives.

But, notwithstanding his greatness, for him "life's fitful fever" has ended. His ambitions, struggles, anxieties, disappointments, and triumphs are all equally at rest. Were it not for the greatness of his achievements it might be said that—

> Wealth and glory, and place and power,
> What are they worth to me or you?
> For the lease of life runs out in an hour,
> And Death stands ready to claim his due.
> Sounding honors or heaps of gold,
> Where are they all when all is told?

But for a man like Logan, who left a legacy of good deeds and honorable ambition, death only emphasizes the greatness of his life and adds increased luster to his name. And so long as humanity honors real worth and noble endeavor, the name of John A. Logan will be a cherished memory in the heart of every true citizen of the Republic.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Speaker, the stream of human life flows on ceaselessly, its tide never ebbs, the springs that support it are as unfailing as that great fountain of purity and love which constitutes the soul of the Universe, the Infinite Father of us all. To us who are but infinitesimal drops in the eddying flood of humanity the death knell of our fellows brings fitting occasions on which to fathom, if possible, the deep meaning and the true object of the miracle of our existence.

The fell destroyer comes to all ranks and conditions and hurls his fatal shafts at loved ones in the humble cottage and in the lordly mansion. No position or place can enable us to elude his summons when the appointed hour has fully come.

Since the commencement of the present Congress twelve members in both branches have joined the "silent majority," and it is that we who remain may pay proper tribute to the memory of the last of these, General John A. Logan, United States Senator from Illinois, that this hour is set apart.

Mr. Speaker, it is but a few weeks since Senator Logan sat in his honored seat in the other end of the Capitol in his accustomed health and in the full possession of that mental vigor with which he was so richly endowed; but, alas, he can never again occupy that seat; the funeral cortege has followed his mortal remains to the grave, and the nation is in mourning. From the sparkling waters of the Aroostook to the murky Rio Grande Del Norte, from the everglades of Florida to beyond the Olympic Mountains to far-off Alaska, there is no city or town, and scarce a rural neighborhood, where the thoughts and emotions of people have not been profoundly moved by the event we are here to contemplate.

Representatives, I appeal to you, what better use can we who for the present are intrusted with official power make of the present occasion than to seek here and now most earnestly for the secret of the dead Senator's stronghold on the confidence and affection of the American people? This seeking can not be successful without a broader view than any single life can furnish.

General Logan lived in a period of our national history replete with remarkable events—a period in which men in public life encountered those crucial tests that not only developed characters, but decided whether they were to live in the hearts of their countrymen as benefactors of the race, or, on the contrary, to be either entirely forgotten, or remembered only to be execrated. In the brief time allotted me I will only allude to a few of these tests as applied to General Logan, and these only to show that had he failed to perceive the right, or lacked the courage of his convictions, the name that is now on the lips of all would not be known to-day, nor his memory fondly cherished by sixty millions of people.

Returning from the Mexican war, in which it was but natural that one full of intellect, courage, ambition, and physical strength, as was young Logan, should enlist, we find him entering at once into politics, an active member of the dominant party, receiving promotion at its hands, first to the Legislature of his State, and then to Congress—ready and anxious to enter upon any work which promised to him political success.

At the period of which I am now speaking the storm which had been gathering for a quarter of a century was ready to burst upon the country. Lincoln, who up to this time was opposed by Logan, had been inaugurated President. The slave power thus beaten at the polls and defeated in its avowed purpose of extending the curse of slavery to every acre of our territorial domain, to the end that their darling institution might be made the corner-stone of the Republic, had already begun to move in open rebellion.

The great political party from which Logan had received recognition and place, although stunned and shocked by the proposed rebellion, was still the champion of slavery; the infamous doctrine of secession for the sake of slavery had no defender outside of the party of which he was a member, and it was under such conditions that the real qualities of John Alexander Logan were first put to the crucial test that was to settle his political career.

The shock of the rebellion revealed young Logan to himself; it found him a politician, it made him a statesman. The new light that shone upon him "was above the brightness of the sun," and in it he saw as never before the fell purpose of the "Great Conspiracy" and the dire consequences of its success. His eagle eye scanned the conflict as if it were a raging battle, and his mind was made up. To him liberty and union were one and inseparable, and on their perpetuity must advancing civilization depend; without them, he could see no hope for "liberty enlightening the world."

Mr. Speaker, it is easy for us now to look back upon this trying hour and in the light of history see that it was easy to ignore party and stand by the flag; but, sir, I can well understand that to cut loose once and forever from the ties that had bound young Logan (then but about thirty-two years of age) to his political associates, and to consecrate himself from that hour to the flag and to freedom, was to try him as by fire. The occasion was just such a one as was in its nature calculated to call into exercise those qualities of mind and heart that have made Senator Logan a conspicuous figure in our national history. It was his ability to perceive what duty demanded and courage to do it that made him what he was. This, sir, is the key-note to his character, this the secret of his power, this the pathway that led him to renown. Having chosen the true path in that trying hour, let us see how faithfully he followed it.

He knew full well that crushing the rebellion meant the emancipation of the negro and his elevation to citizenship, but he felt that it was right, and he dared to enlist all his powers to accomplish that end. He knew that rebellion such as that waged for the preservation of human slavery by a government based solely on the idea of man's right to freedom was a crime, and he never failed to denounce it as such. He knew that the true patriot would give his life, if need be, to his country; and without hesitation or delay he entered the service, was a true and gallant soldier, an able and successful commander, always ready to lead his men where duty called, whether to shelter and rest or to fighting and fatigue. Logan never turned his back on the foe in the fight, upon an opponent in debate, nor upon a friend anywhere. In all these things he was right, and dared to stand there because it was right.

When the rebellion had been crushed, and Logan was once more in his place in the councils of the nation, he met each question that arose in the trying work of reconstruction in the same way that he decided to change his political course—by choosing what was right, and going straight forward to accomplish it.

He was the soldiers' true friend, because he knew that the nation owes to the army of the Union a debt that it can never pay. With him it was no sham affection, it was a comrade's love for comrades, and in every speech and vote in Congress, and elsewhere, he never failed to make his regard for the members of the Grand Army effective for their good. For the soldier, whether officer or private, who through either cowardice or insubordination failed to obey the orders of his superiors, he had nothing but earnest condemnation which no influence could induce him to withhold.

He was for protection for the sake of protection, and because the principle is a right one it had his support.

He was for giving national aid to the cause of common-school education, believing that illiteracy is the natural enemy of free institutions and that its obliteration at whatever cost would be a saving of money to the nation. He believed that the enfranchised negro by being educated would better discharge his duties as a citizen, and with it would vindicate his right to a recognition as a peer among his fellow-men. It was by his especial championship that the bill now before this House to aid the common schools in the States and Territories was amended by an appropriation of $2,000,000 for the erection of school-houses wherever the colored people are too poor to erect them, so that all may secure the priceless boon of a common-school education.

His firm adherence to the right went with him into social and family life, and in these relations won for him the highest meed of praise. He knew full well that the heart of a true woman naturally furnishes to man a rich soil, which needs only his cultivation to insure ample returns in all that is needed to make home happy, and all this he enjoyed in abundant measure, an example to which all good citizens can point without exciting in any the blush of shame.

Mr. Speaker, if my time would permit I would touch briefly upon more of the acts of the great soldier and statesman that go to show that he owed his proud position as a public man to his fearlessness in doing whatever he thought to be right, but I must forbear.

Sir, the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor has furnished her full quota of the illustrious men who have been great actors in the period in our national history to which I have before referred. That grandest of Presidents (Lincoln) and that greatest of captains (Grant) both matured their manhood as citizens of Illinois, but Logan, worthy to have been the Chief Magistrate of the nation, the great volunteer general of the war, whose name and memory will be linked with Lincoln and Grant as long as history shall be read, Illinois proudly claims as her son.

Whatever may be the conclusion of the philosopher or the faith of the Christian as to the life to come, we can never again look upon the manly form of John Alexander Logan. His voice, so often raised in defense of the integrity of the Union and of universal freedom, will never more be heard in this Capitol; the people of the United States who have so often been moved by his earnest appeal will never greet him again with their hearty cheers; the veterans of the Union Army who loved him so well can never again rend the air with their shouts at his appearance; but he can not be forgotten.

Let monuments be erected to his memory, let orator and poet chronicle his worthy deeds; but when the marble no longer depicts to our eyes his manly figure, when eloquence and song can no longer charm us with the recital of his noble qualities, coming generations will speak of his worth and be influenced by his example.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I regard it as eminently fit and appropriate that Congress should in this formal manner place upon its records the testimony of the living to the worth, virtue, and high character of the man who was so recently one of its most distinguished members. But John A. Logan, to whose memory this House has ceased its ordinary business and strives to pay a sincere and heartfelt tribute, was much more than a distinguished Representative or Senator in Congress.

He was a man who in a life half a score years shorter than the Psalmist's alloted time, demeaned himself so well as citizen, as volunteer soldier, as commander of regiment, brigade, division, corps, and army, as legislator in these Halls that I am at a loss to say in which position he did most to gain that pre-eminence he so justly holds in the hearts of his countrymen.

His was an active life that from early manhood down to within a few days of his death scarce knew a day's repose. Endowed with a strong constitution and unusual vigor of body and mind, he might, so far as we can judge, with ordinary labor in the usual walks of life have lived to a good old age.

But he had a brain and will that would not endure rest and quiet, and he literally "wore his life away" as a prominent actor in the stirring, eventful, and, I may say in part, fearful and terrible times in which his lot was cast. It was his fortune to live in an age in which the greatest events of modern times have transpired. We do not, perhaps, fully realize that we have ourselves been eye-witnesses and, in part, humble participants of the most important part of our country's history. No matter how grand or glorious a future lies before us, to the generations yet to come, the history of our country for the past thirty years must for all time be the most interesting and important to the student and patriot. During all this time the record of the life and services of John A. Logan is so blended with the history of our country that they are inseparable.

It is not that in every quality of mind or capacity for service he excelled each and all of his associates, but it is because in every position he has occupied, from the lowest to the highest, he has acquitted himself as one of the best representative citizens of his age. Since the death of Grant, the great chieftain whose soul went up to God from Mount McGregor, no citizen of the United States was so well known as Logan. His name was in very truth a household word throughout the land. His every act was open to inspection and criticism. How honestly, how wisely, how modestly he has borne himself in every condition and under every circumstance let history answer; yea, more, let those who were from time to time his opponents be his judges and his reputation is safe.

He will be remembered as a progressive statesman, who was prompt to recognize the high responsibilities and duties that came in his day upon this nation. He strove to garner the fruits of the war, that coming generations might enjoy the benefits of the heroic sacrifices that were made to save the Government. He was a sincere advocate of the rights of labor, a friend of law and order, and consistently demanded the protection of all American industries from foreign pauper competition.

Of his success as a leader in times of peace and in the broad field of true politics I leave others to speak more at length.

As has already been well said here to-day, he sat in this hall with Thaddeus Stevens, James G. Blaine, and James A. Garfield, and was accounted their equal in party control; that in the Senate of the United States he divided leadership with Charles Sumner, Oliver P. Morton, Roscoe Conkling, and John Sherman, and but few men have ever lived in our country who had so many enthusiastic, devoted followers who hoped to see him the Chief Magistrate.

It was my fortune to serve for four years as a soldier in the Army of the Tennessee, of which General Logan was from the first a prominent leader, and at last its commander, and I know I speak the general sentiment of the soldiers of that army when I join in deep sorrow and with full and overflowing heart to pay a tribute of honor, friendship, and love to his memory. The Army of the Tennessee was successively commanded by Grant, Sherman, McPherson, Howard, and Logan. It has always been the boast of those who served in it that it never had a commander that was not a success and never had one removed except to be given a higher command. Yet it was as a subordinate and later as a successor to such distinguished and never-to-be-forgotten men that Logan won and maintained the high place he holds in the confidence and esteem of the soldiers of that army.

Long before he became its commander he was as well known to the men of the Army of the Tennessee as either Grant, Sherman, or McPherson. I do not mean to say he was superior to either of them. But he was a real soldier, a man of immense force and power, who had the confidence of the army, and I can recall more than one occasion when his presence on the field under fire was, in my judgment, worth "more than a thousand men." There is, perhaps, no soldier who served in that army but who can recall incidents of the camp, the march, and the field in which Logan was prominent and with which he will always associate his name.

It would be a pleasure to here recount the battles, marches, and campaigns in which he took a prominent part, but time will not permit. To do so would be but to repeat the greater part of the story of the four years' gallant and heroic service of the Army of the Tennessee. That story is a well known part of our country's glorious history. It embraces Belmont and Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, and Vicksburg, Lookout Mountain, and Missionary Ridge. It includes the terrible campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta, with its weeks of unceasing battle, described by a private soldier in a letter to his wife as "the battle of May and June," the March to the sea, with Savannah, Bentonville, and Raleigh.

But the four long years of war ended. "Glad was our army that morning" when we heard the joyful news that Johnston had surrendered. Peace had come at last and visions of home and loved ones were before us.

Soon the grand review followed at Washington, where the veteran armies of the Union were accorded a triumph unequaled in history. Then the Army of the Tennessee, under the command of General Logan, moved to Louisville, Ky., preliminary to its muster out of service. I hold in my possession now, as one of the most valued mementoes of the war, the order from General Logan directing me to proceed with my regiment to the State where it was organized, to muster it out of service and send the men to their homes.

It is the wonder of the world that immense armies of veteran soldiers like we had at the close of the civil war could be disbanded at once, and that men inured to long service in the field would make peaceable, industrious citizens. But it should be remembered that Logan and the soldiers he commanded entered the Army not for military glory, nor for love of the profession of arms. The alarm of war found them citizens busily engaged in the employments that many years of peace made possible in our beloved country. The threatenings of wicked men to destroy the Government had so long fallen unheeded upon their ears that some said this people lack the courage and the manhood to resent an insult or defend the heritage of their fathers.

But when the first blow was struck by traitor hands, and the Chief Magistrate called the citizens to arms, how changed? Then it was that the farmer boys left their homes, the mechanic his shop, the student his books, organized themselves into companies and regiments, tendered their services as soldiers to their country, and marched to the front with an enthusiasm and a determination that astonished the world. Nor was it an enthusiasm of the hour, to be chilled by the first reverse or defeat. It was a settled determination, born of the belief that they were right and their enemies were wrong. It was a firm conviction that underlying the contest was a great moral principle, and, appealing to the god of battles for his support, they went forth to fight for their country as their highest duty.

No wonder that such soldiers as these, when the rebellion was destroyed and the Government was saved with the blot of slavery effaced, laid down their arms, went to their homes, and became the best of citizens.

We yet see how uncomplainingly many of these men bear the twinge and pain of wounds received in battle, which each year grow more severe, and pass their declining days with broken health and suffering with diseases contracted in their severe service.

It has been said here to-day, as it is often said elsewhere, that Logan was the highest type of this class of volunteer soldiers; that he was the personification of that host of patriotic young men who left homes and pleasant vocations at the call of their country. I think there is much truth in this, and that it is one of the highest honors that can be accorded to him. But I think there is too much weight given to the idea that he attained his popularity among soldiers because he was a volunteer officer as distinguished from officers who had been educated at West Point.

The Army of the Tennessee had for commanders Grant, Sherman, and McPherson, all regulars, and the surviving soldiers of that army, much as they love and cherish the memory of Logan, would not ask me to say here to-day that as a soldier and commander in the field he stood higher in their esteem than either of the three others I have named.

I consider that Logan's conduct and services since the war had much to do in giving him the pre-eminent place he undoubtedly holds to-day in the hearts of the surviving soldiers of the Republic. After the war he remained in full sympathy with them and has represented them earnestly and fully in Congress and wherever they needed a spokesman or friend.

He took great interest in all associations of soldiers; was an active member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and was justly esteemed as a represenative both in public and private life of that fraternity, charity, and loyalty on which the order is founded. He died from the effects of wounds received in battle and from disease contracted by exposure in the service. In this respect he is a representative of that vast host of soldiers who came home disabled and broken in health, whose lives are shortened by the service they gave their country.

How it must have grieved the generous, noble heart of Logan to see such men as these neglected by the Government they had saved and denied the assistance that just laws would have given them.

Not for himself did he demand additional laws to do justice to the soldiers of the country, for he denied himself a pension he so justly deserved and could have readily obtained, only that he might better serve his more unfortunate comrades.

When he died the disabled soldier and his dependent relatives lost not only their best but ablest friend. But he is gone from earth, and his body is laid to rest among his kindred in the land that gave him birth. A nation mourns his death. He has joined that grand army of patriots whose lives went out in the shock of battle or wasted away in hospital or prison pen. Henceforth he stands as a representative of the fallen.

On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards with solemn sound
The bivouac of the dead.

He died not of age or lingering decay. "His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." Within a few days of his death he was engaged in active work. We can recall his appearance almost like those who fell in the field, whose lives went out in their young manhood. It is a pleasing thought that we always recollect those who went to the army and came not back again as young and full of hope and high resolve. They are our "immortals." They never grow old. To their friends and kindred the fallen are ever young, and in memory live on in perpetual youth.

Such be the recollection of him we mourn to-day.

Logan was honored in his death by municipal and civil organizations, by army societies, and Grand Army posts as few men have ever been. From all over this broad land came resolutions of sincere condolence to the afflicted family.

Each year hereafter on memorial day, in every cemetery, churchyard, and God's acre throughout our country, where a soldier's grave is made green, there will be a wreath for him. In every neighborhood where they meet to "bedeck the soldiers' graves with flowers and bedew them with tears," when they give a double portion to the little mound that represents those who sleep in distant or unknown graves, some one "most loving of them all" will strew the flowers in memory of the man who instituted this beautiful ceremony.

The credit of inaugurating this custom is all due to John A. Logan, who, as commander of the Grand Army, issued this beautiful and now historic order:

The 30th of May, 1868, is designated for the purpose of strewing with flowers or otherwise decorating the graves of comrades who died in defense of their country during the late rebellion, and whose bodies now lie in almost every city, village, and hamlet churchyard in the land. In this observance no form of ceremony is presented, but posts and comrades will, in their own way, arrange such fitting services and testimonials of respect as circumstances will permit.

We are organized, comrades, as our regulations tell us, for the purpose, among other things, "of preserving and strengthening those kind and fraternal feelings which have bound together the soldiers, sailors, and marines who united to suppress the late rebellion."

What can aid more to assure this result than cherishing tenderly the memory of our heroic dead, who made their breasts a barricade between our country and its foes? Their soldier lives were the reveille of freedom to a race in chains, and their death the tattoo of rebellion's tyranny in arms. We should guard their graves with sacred vigilance. All that the consecrated wealth of the nation can add to their adornment and security is but a fitting tribute to the memory of her slain defenders. Let no wanton foot tread rudely on such hallowed grounds. Let pleasant paths invite the going and coming of reverent visitors and fond mourners. Let no vandalism of avarice or neglect, no ravages of time testify to the present or coming generations that we have forgotten as a people the cost of a free and undivided Republic.

If other eyes grow dull, and other hands slack, and other hearts cold in the solemn trust, ours shall keep it warm as long as the light and warmth of life remain to us.

Let us then, at the time appointed, gather around their sacred remains and garland the passionless mounds above them with the choicest flowers of springtime; let us raise above them the dear old flag they saved from dishonor; let us in this solemn presence renew our pledges to aid and assist those whom they have left among us, a sacred charge upon the nation's gratitude—the soldiers' and sailors' widows and orphans.

It is the purpose of the commander-in-chief to inaugurate this observance with the hope that it will be kept up from year to year while a survivor of the war remains to honor the memory of his departed comrades. He earnestly desires the press to lend its friendly aid in bringing it to the notice of comrades in all parts of the country in time for simultaneous compliance therewith.

Give him the honor he so feelingly, so eloquently claimed for his comrades, and let us be proud we are such a nation and have such examples among our people as the life and services of John A. Logan.

Others have spoken of his domestic life better than I can do. He was a kind father, a loving husband, and a sincere Christian; a man whose pure and exemplary conduct in private added additional luster to his distinguished public record. But his course on earth is finished; all we can say of him now is:

Close his eyes, his work is done;
What to him is friend or foeman,
Rise of moon or set of sun,
Hand of man, or kiss of woman?
Leave him to God's watching eye,
Trust him to the hand that made him;
Mortal love weeps idly by,
Christ alone has power to aid him.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, why is the gavel silent on the desk, the labors of this House suspended, and debate stilled in these Halls, and this presence in attendance? A great man has fallen, John A. Logan has been called to rest, and we are met to review his life's work and recount his virtues.

General Logan was a true type of the struggling, courageous, frontiersman of the West. Endowed with a splendid physique, courage, energy, and a strong will, he was well equipped for the boisterous voyage of life on which he was launched. He was a typical American. A self-made man, he started a poor boy and lived and died a poor man.

He imbibed from the wide-stretching prairies surrounding his humble home broad views and the true idea of freedom. He was a man possessed of profound convictions and of unbending will if he believed he was in the right. All his personal and intellectual qualties were positive.

In debate he was direct, intense, fearless. Bold in the assertion of his convictions, impetuous in their vindication, he scorned evasion and despised hypocrisy.

In the performance of duty he took no account of results and feared no consequences. He was familiar with all the weapons of debate, and he at times wielded the gentle power of persuasion, the convincing force of logic, and the strong blows of ridicule, often sweeping before him in a tempestuous outburst of eloquence all opposition to the high resolves and earnest convictions of his mighty soul.

If he lost anything by neglected education his great genius supplied the defect. He always had his armor on, and Logan, either in the forum or on the battlefield, was ever ready for the rencounter.

He was the advocate of liberty and the devoted friend of the human race. He loved his friends with unswerving fidelity and never deserted them. He was a friend of truth, and hated treason whether against his country or his friend.

He sought to preserve the Union and maintain the Constitution; he was the advocate of the universal freedom of man. He labored to restore peace and amity between the sections of our country, and performed his full share in healing the animosities engendered by the war. He sought to cherish industry and protect labor. He encouraged the settlement of our vast domain and the development of our resources. He came from the humbler class and his sympathies were always with the poor and the sons of toil. He was from them and one of them.

Along the highway over which our country and people have journeyed during the past quarter of a century John A. Logan may be seen and traced. If he was your antagonist, he was an open one, scorning to attack by stealth or fight from ambush. He struck his blows in front and in daylight. Ready to forgive and forget a slight or insult done him, he was as eager to repair an injury done another.

Wherever he was found he was stolid, sincere, intense, firm, honest, and courageous. If he was a brilliant figure in the political arena, he was none the less so in the military. It mattered little to Logan whether on the field of battle or in the Halls of Congress; whether conducting his troops at the assault of Donelson or maintaining a debate in the Senate of the United States; whether managing a great Presidential campaign, or leading his army through Georgia; whether caressing his loved ones at home, or enduring the privations of army life; whether trudging along the ranks as a private soldier, or riding his charger at the head of his army.

When our civil war burst like a terrible tempest upon the nation Logan buckled on his sword, rushed to battle and never halted until slavery was dead, freedom reigned triumphant, and the union of all the States secured. As resistless against the foe as an avalanche rushing headlong from Alpine heights to desolate the plains below he combined the desperation of Charles XII with the generosity of a Cæsar.

See General Logan and his troops storming the battlements at Vicksburg, first to break down the enemy's stronghold and lead the advance into the captured city; and as long as the "King of Rivers" flows by those bluffs will the heroism of Logan and his men be remembered. The memorable assault he led at Kenesaw will be remembered while that mountain stands on its foundations of granite. But he appeared most conspicuous on July 22, 1864, in front of Atlanta. The confederate General Hood made a desperate assault on the Union forces to free himself from the iron grasp of Sherman. In this engagement the army of the Tennessee was driven back, and General McPherson, its commander, fell.

Logan at once assumed command. He found the troops fatigued and dispirited, the enemy enthusiastic and exultant in their temporary victory.

> Cannon to right of them,
> Cannon to left of them,
> Cannon in front of them,
> Volley'd and thunder'd.

Logan appeared upon the scene. He aroused the energies of his men for battle, cheered the despondent, and rallied the faltering. With head uncovered, his long black hair flying over his shoulders as he galloped his foaming charger along the line, he looked the impersonation of Mars. His voice was heard above the din and clangor of battle shouting to his men, "Be brave and fear not; let your watchword be McPherson and revenge."

His troops caught the spirit of their commander, and hope and confidence assumed sway; they sprang into the conflict, rushed upon the enemy, and in an hour's time regained all that had been lost and turned threatened defeat into a glorious victory. It was this Ajax of the Army of the North who saved that day. The heroic deeds of General Logan in this battle will not be forgotten while the name of Atlanta is spoken by the children of men.

Although he had not the benefit of a military education, yet he rose to the highest rank ever held by a volunteer officer in our country, and he is justly entitled to the name of being the greatest general of the volunteer army of the Union. He served his country because he loved it.

During his military life he suffered much and endured much, was torn and mangled by shot received in action, yet he declined to receive a pension to which he was justly entitled. His services were not rendered for bounty, nor was his patriotism to be measured by dollars and cents. That his life was shortened by his exposures, sufferings, and wounds there is no room to doubt, but a mighty, patriotic people will cheerfully give to his disconsolate widow that pension which her husband declined while alive.

Mr. Speaker, although I had but a limited acquaintance with this great chieftain, yet I knew him as I saw him at the head of his troops in Tennessee and Georgia, and as I read him in the history of the times. He was the idol of the volunteer soldier, who loved him for his untiring devotion to their cause in peace as much as for his leadership in war.

Logan had a heart that never ceased to beat in sympathy and respect for the soldier that fought by his side, and to those heroic men who battled against him he held out the hand of a generous foe.

In peace he had no fortune but his genius, courage, and faith; in war, no friend but his valor and sword; yet we see him measuring arms with men of experience, rank, and power, and write his name high on the escutcheon of fame, leaving the world better for having lived in it.

He is dead; dead to his State, but he lives to the nation; dead to the family, but he lives to every lover of freedom on the globe.

Where he will be buried is not yet determined. A dozen cities ask for the honor of giving a resting-place to his ashes; and I venture to express the wish that one place suggested for interment may be adopted, that is Arlington. The place is so fitting, the surroundings so much in harmony with his great life.

In sight of the sacred urn at Mount Vernon an army of his dead comrades bivouacked around him, overlooking the capital of that nation he labored so much in peace to build up and suffered so hard in war to maintain. There may he rest in peace, where the vine and the wild rose will entwine their garlands over his grave; where the gentle evening breeze, through the sad pines, may sigh a dirge to him, and the historic Potomac murmur a requiem as it hurries on to the sea.

This great man will not be forgotten. His name and deeds are enrolled in the history of his age and he lives in the affections of a patriotic people. He will be remembered while liberty has a shrine and freedom a votary. His name will be cherished until the clouds forget to replenish the springs, the fountains to gush, or the rills to sing.

In ages hence his lofty deeds will "be acted o'er in the nations yet unborn and accents yet unknown."

Mr. Speaker, from the tears which this day fall on the bier of Logan the patriot, warrior, and statesman, there springs a rainbow spanning our heavens giving hope and promise of the immortality of the Republic.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DUNHAM). The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, respectfully represent:

That the interest of agriculture would be greatly promoted by the establishment of agricultural experiment-stations in connection with the agricultural schools founded under the act of 1862 providing for the endowment of agricultural colleges: Therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Legislature that the bill now pending before the House of Representatives, and known as Senate bill 372, appropriating $15,000 annually to the agricultural colleges of the several States and Territories for the establishment and maintenance of agricultural experiment-stations should become a law.

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this memorial and resolution be transmitted to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

GEO. W. RYLAND,
President of the Senate.
T. B. MILLS,
Speaker of the Assembly.

STATE OF WISCONSIN,
Department of State, ss.:

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Ernst G. Timme, secretary of state of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that the foregoing has been compared by me with the original in this office, and that the same is a true and correct copy thereof, and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal, at the capitol, in the city of Madison, this 14th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1887.

ERNST G. TIMME,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin; which, on motion of Mr. SAWYER, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial to Congress to pay all unappealed awards and judgments growing out of damages caused by the Fox and Wisconsin River improvement.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas by an act of Congress of the United States entitled, "An act to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers in the State of Wisconsin," approved March 3, 1875, by which, among other things, it is provided that in case any land or other property was then or should thereafter be flowed or injured by means of any part of said works of improvement theretofore or thereafter constructed, for which compensation was then or should thereafter become legally owing, the amount of such compensation should be ascertained in the manner provided by the laws of the State of Wisconsin; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States and the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin have by their decisions established the liability of the Government of the United States in such cases; and

Whereas a large number of farmers and other parties owning property adjacent to the waters of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, who were damaged on account of such improvements, having caused their damages to be assessed prior to March 1, A. D. 1886; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States recognizing the liability of the United States and the justness of the claims of respective parties above referred to, passed an act August 4, 1886, appropriating sufficient money to pay the awards and judgments then existing in full; and

Whereas other owners of lands which have been damaged by reason of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement have caused their damages to be assessed as provided by law, and which still remain unpaid: Therefore,

The Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorialize your honorable body that you make an appropriation to pay all unappealed awards and judgments which are now or may hereafter be reported to you by the Attorney-General of the United States, growing out of damages caused by the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement.

Resolved, That a duly authenticated copy of this memorial and resolution be transmitted to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House with the request that they lay them before their respective Houses, and also a copy to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

GEO. W. RYLAND,
President of the Senate.
T. B. MILLS,
Speaker of the Assembly.

STATE OF WISCONSIN,
Department of State, ss:

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Ernst G. Timme, secretary of state of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that the foregoing has been compared by me with the original in this office, and that the same is a true and correct copy thereof, and of the whole of such original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal, at the capitol, in the city of Madison, this 14th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1887.

ERNST G. TIMME,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a letter from the secretary of the Territory of Arizona, transmitting a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORIAL.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Fourteenth Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, beg leave to represent to your honorable bodies:

That the greater part of the public lands of this Territory are desert lands, which, in their present condition, are of no benefit to the National Government, the Territory, nor the settler.

That there is every probability that water necessary for irrigation could be procured by means of artesian wells, and that thus large tracts of these lands could be made useful, enriching the Territory and furnishing desirable homes for thousands of citizens; that the cost of sinking artesian wells is very great, and the inducements now held out are not sufficient to invite private capital to try the experiment. That Congress has refused or neglected to make any appropriations in this direction for our benefit, and that the Territory, knowing its needs and wants, can better judge what laws are necessary to place these lands in the hands of bona fide settlers; wherefore your petitioners respectfully ask that a bill be passed by your honorable body ceding these lands to the Territory of Arizona in such way that the Territory may be enabled to offer them to bona fide settlers who shall cause artesian water to flow thereon.

Resolved, That our delegate to Congress be, and he is hereby, instructed to use all honorable means to bring this subject to the earnest and favorable consideration of Congress.

And be it further resolved, That the secretary of the Territory be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be prepared three copies of this memorial and transmit the same, one to the President of the Senate, one to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and one to our Delegate in Congress.

SAM F. WEBB,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
A. CORNWALL,
President of the Council.

Transmitted to the Governor February 8, 1887.
Approved February 8, 1887.

C. MEYER ZULICK, Governor.

Mr. HOAR. I present resolutions of the Massachusetts Legislature in favor of coast defenses and the building of a navy. I suppose the resolutions should be read; they are very brief.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1887.

Resolutions in favor of coast defenses and the building of a navy.

Whereas the people of this Commonwealth, realizing the defenseless condition of the seaport cities and towns, not only of this State but of the whole country; and realizing, further, the incalculable loss that would befall these cities in the event of a war with a foreign power; and

Whereas the navy of the country is totally inadequate, in such an event, to render substantial aid, either in the defense of our cities and harbors or in protecting our commerce upon the high seas; and

Whereas this condition of our defenses assumes importance to Massachusetts, from the fact that the capitol of the State, together with its archives, are on the seaboard and liable to bombardment and destruction: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in general court assembled do most respectfully and earnestly urge upon Congress the appropriation of liberal sums for the purpose of coast defenses and for the building of a navy that will command the confidence of our own people and the respect of other nations.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 14, 1887.

Adopted. Sent up for concurrence.

EDWARD A. McLAUGHLIN, Clerk.

SENATE, February 14, 1887.

Adopted in concurrence.

E. HERBERT CLAPP, Clerk.

A true copy. Attest:

EDWARD A. McLAUGHLIN,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Justin Winsor, librarian of Harvard University, and other citizens of Massachusetts, praying for a modification of paragraphs 660 and 759 of the existing tariff relating to the importation of books, maps, and charts for scientific institutions; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present the petition of Joseph Battey and 83 other citizens of Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide in some way for a convention of American nations, the object of which shall be to discuss and agree upon a permanent high court of arbitration in which the civilized world may be represented, and to which may be referred those disputes that have usually led to war. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented 15 petitions signed by 2,591 business men and other residents of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of the bill to incorporate the Washington Cable Railway Company; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented nine petitions of citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of the bill to incorporate the Washington Cable Railway Company; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against any reduction of the duty on raisins; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I present the petition of Charles W. Denton, of Oregon, with accompanying affidavits, praying for a reconsideration of the bill for his relief. I move that all the papers relating to the case be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and that they be referred, together with this petition, to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Michigan, representing 7,000 citizens, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1579) granting to the people of the District of Columbia the right to determine by ballot whether intoxicating liquors may hereafter be legally manufactured and sold in the District; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON presented resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, favoring the passage of a substitute for the fortification appropriation bill now being considered by a conference committee; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB presented two petitions of Grand Army posts of Kansas, praying for the passage of the dependent relatives pension bill over the President's veto; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of J. E. Purvis Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Livingston Manor, N. Y., praying for the passage of the anti-Mormon bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3025) to extirpate contagious pleuropneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, and rinderpest among cattle, and to facilitate the exportation of cattle and the products of live-stock, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 3317) to enable Indian tribes to bring suits in the tribal name in the courts of the United States in certain cases; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 3226) to determine the liability of the United States under the law for damages to the property of citizens of the United States sustained in the depredations of Indians; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3304) to authorize the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Nations of Indians, respectively, to lease lands within their respective boundaries for mining purposes, and to validate leases heretofore made for said purposes by the proper authorities of any of said nations, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George N. Quintard and George E. Weed, assignees of John Roach, praying compensation for work done by order of the Navy Department under a public exigency requiring an increase of dimensions of the iron frame or hull of the monitor Puritan, and for the care, towage, wharfage, &c., of the Roanoke, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 3318) for the relief of George N. Quintard and George E. Weed, assignees of John Roach; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to say that I do not concur as a member of the Committee on Claims in that report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar and the report will be printed.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3280) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Lexington, Mo., reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8978) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River at or near Sheffield, Ala., and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3057) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and settle the accounts of certain States and the city of Baltimore growing out of moneys expended by said States and the city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT ON EUROPEAN RAILWAYS.

Mr. CULLOM. Some time last year the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce asked Mr. Simon Sterne, of New York, who was then going abroad, to make an investigation of the relation of the governments of Europe to the railways of those countries; which he has done, and he has made his report to the Secretary of State. The select committee instructed me to ask the Senate to print the document as a separate document, so that it may be in a form where we can look at it hereafter, as I think it contains valuable information relating to the subject that we have had under discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois, from the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, reports in favor of printing the report, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A report to Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, Secretary of State, on the relations of the governments of the nations of Western Europe to the railways, by Simon Sterne.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order to print will be made.

RICHARD B. RIANS.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2519) granting an increase of pension to Richard B. Rians, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the word "twenty-five," insert "thirty-five;" and that the House agree to the same.

PHILETUS SAWYER,
JAMES F. WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JNO. A. SWOPE,
E. H. CONGER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

POLYGAMY AND AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in bill form, for the convenience of Senators, the bill as agreed upon by the House and Senate conferees respecting bigamy, polygamy, and other things, inasmuch as if the matter should come over from the House of Representatives to-day, I should ask the Senate to go on immediately with it to-morrow morning, and I thought it would be a convenience instead of reading it in the RECORD, where it has been printed, that it be printed in bill form, so that every Senator could have it on his desk. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill (S. 10) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," be printed in bill form as agreed upon by the committee of conference.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that it be printed so as to show the amendments made by the Senate and the bill as finally agreed upon by the committee of conference, so that we may know exactly what the change in the status of the bill has been between the two Houses and in the committee of conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be extremely difficult, because the House amendment was one entire amendment, which struck out the whole of the Senate bill and inserted the body of the bill of their own, which contained, to be sure, about nine-tenths of the Senate bill in word and in form, but it was a total bill. I think if it be printed in the form I suggest that Senators who have the old Senate bill before them will see exactly where the differences are, which are very few indeed.

Mr. INGALLS. The differences between the House and the Senate were so radical that I think it is of great importance that they should appear, if possible, in print.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be done this way (unless there is a sufficient print now, and that may not be necessary), to print the Senate bill as it passed the Senate and the House amendment as it passed the House, and then the print I suggest in addition.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will meet the Senator's point.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the bill be printed in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the several bills will be printed as requested.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 3319) granting right of way and other privileges to the Hampton and Old Point Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHITTHORNE introduced a bill (S. 3320) to create a naval reserve of auxiliary cruisers, officers, and men from the mercantile marine of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MILLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3321) to authorize and to appropriate money to pay the cost of drilling wells over 3,000 feet deep in every State and in seven Territories, and to give all profits and the valuable minerals found in such wells for school purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAHONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying petition, to lie on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That W. G. Ford, administrator of the estate of John G. Robinson, have leave to withdraw the papers in respect to said claim from the files of the Senate, on the condition imposed by the rules.

REPORTS OF BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. BOWEN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 6,000 copies of any matter furnished by the Bureau of Ethnology relating to researches and discoveries connected with the study of the North American Indians: Provided, That the authorization shall apply only to matter now on hand or collected during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888; the same to be issued in parts, and the whole to form an annual volume of bulletins; 2,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the use of the Bureau of Ethnology.

SEC. 2. The sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the printing and binding of the aforesaid annual bulletins is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

PRINTING OF "FLAGS OF ALL NATIONS."

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring), That the "Flags of all Nations," prepared by order of the Secretary of the Navy by the Bureau of Navigation, be printed, and that 3,000 additional copies be printed, of which 800 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,200 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Navy Department, for issue to vessels of the Navy, and for sale at the cost of paper and printing, in accordance with section 432 of the Revised Statutes.

CLAIMS AGAINST FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the matters presented in the message of the President of February 14, 1887, relating to an agreement concluded between the minister of the United States at Madrid and the Spanish minister of state for the settlement of claims growing out of occurrences at Santiago de Cuba in regard to the persons of the officers and crew and passengers of the steamer Virginius; and also inquire into the matters presented in the message of the President of January 29, 1887, relating to awards made by the arbitrator in the cases of Antonio Pelletier and A. H. Lazare against the Republic of Hayti, under an agreement made between the Secretary of State of the United States and the minister plenipotentiary for the Republic of Hayti, dated 24th May, 1884.

And that said committee inquire and report whether the United States has any and what power or rightful authority to interfere in any way by legislation to control or dispose of the matters in dispute or in question between the parties interested in said agreements respectively.

2. That said committee further consider and report what action is required, in their opinion, to be taken by the Senate or by Congress in each of said matters in the event that the Senate or Congress shall decide that the United States have any duty to perform in respect thereof, and that said committee have leave also to report by resolution or bill such measures as will carry into effect the conclusions at which they shall arrive.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that resolution be printed and lie on the table until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed and lie on the table.

REPORT ON INTERNATIONAL SHEEP AND WOOL SHOW.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, to correct an error in Public Resolution No. 28, approved August 4, 1886, 2,000 additional copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture on the International Sheep and Wool Show held in Philadelphia, Pa., in September, 1880.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask consent to have the concurrent resolution passed. The printing resolution specified a number of copies for the House of Representatives and the Senate, &c., and at the end the number given was not as great as the number of those specified. It is a mere verbal correction, and I ask that the resolution be adopted.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOURS OF SESSION.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That for the remainder of the session the Senate will convene at 11 o'clock a. m. and, with a recess of one hour, will continue in session until 9 o'clock p. m.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

SAINT DOMINIC'S CHURCH.

Mr. VANCE. There is lying on the table a bill (H. R. 10799) for the relief of Saint Dominic's Church, in the District of Columbia.. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPENDENT RELATIVES PENSION ACT.

Mr. HOAR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the petitions presented by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] praying for the passage of the dependent relatives pension act over the veto of the President were laid upon the table. I wish merely to say a word upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts submits a motion to reconsider the vote indicated by him. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kansas just now presented two petitions of certain Grand Army posts, praying for the passage of what is known as the dependent relatives' pension bill over the veto of the President, and I wish to take this opportunity, while that subject is before the Senate, to call the attention of the country to one single fact alone in connection with the chief argument which is brought against that bill, and that is the alleged extravagant expenditure for this particular object which it will occasion.

I have obtained from the treasurer of the State of Massachusetts a statement of the State aid paid by that State to soldiers and their families during the last twenty years, by years. This State aid is paid out under the most careful supervision of very careful and economic officers. I have never heard a claim in any quarter of Massachusetts that there were any recipients of that bounty from the State of Massachusetts who were not persons in actual need, and a need caused by the loss of health or of the life of the head of the family in the service of the country. It does not include bounties, it does not include gratuities, it does not include anything except the simple provision for the need of soldiers and soldiers' widows and households occasioned by the war, and a need not supplied by the existing pension lists of the nation. I should like to have the statement read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The statement will be read, there being no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

State aid paid to soldiers and their families by Massachusetts.

1861	$454,972 15
1862	1,826,259 18

		10,510,966 70
Total paid in Massachusetts		18,765,299 78
Estimated for year 1886		375,000 00

Mr. HOAR. It will be seen that the State of Massachusetts, which is less than one-thirtieth in population of the people of this country, a State where opportunities for employment, opportunities for assistance from neighbors and friends are certainly as good and probably better than in nearly every other American State, has paid out upwards of $19,000,000 in the necessary economic supplementing, for the needs of soldiers and their widows, of the provisions of the national acts. That would make a sum, if carried out through the country in the same proportion, of at least $600,000,000. It seems to me that that table is the most emphatic answer to the claim on the part of the Executive that the increase of the national burden $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 of the present pension list is extravagant or unnecessary.

I now move that the petitions lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2519) granting an increase of pension to Richard B. Rians.

The message also announced that the House further insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 2172) restoring to the United States certain of the lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. COBB, Mr. VAN EATON, and Mr. PAYSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) to provide for the increase of the naval establishment.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to make a statement to the Senate. Yesterday morning I gave notice to the Senate that I should move to take up for consideration the river and harbor bill immediately after the conclusion of the morning business this morning. The Senator from Maine has moved now to take up the naval establishment bill. The report of the Committee on Commerce, to accompany the river and harbor bill, has not been returned from the Printing Office, and without the presence of the report I shall not insist upon taking up the bill; I am not prepared of course to go on with it. I wish to give notice now, in view of the fact that unanimous consent was given to take up the bill in regard to the Eads ship-railway and this naval bill to-day, and owing to the absence of the report, that I shall call up the river and harbor bill to-morrow morning immediately after the close of the morning business.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Maine to allow me to call up a Senate bill. It is very important that it should go to the House without delay. It is a bill to establish a port of entry at Tampa. It will not provoke any discussion, and it is a matter of great public importance.

Mr. HALE. I have been appealed to by so many Senators to give way that I have been obliged to say no to every one. The naval bill is nearly completed; it was almost passed last evening; and if we can go on with it now it can be ended very quickly, and then the business appropriate to the morning hour, or whatever may be called up from the Calendar, will naturally come up. I shall not be in the way of anybody more than a very few minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. Before we pass from the river and harbor bill, I wish to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. This bill, I see, is reported back with a single amendment in the nature of a substitute, but this amendment embraces nearly all, if not all, the items in the original bill. I think if the Senator from Minnesota would have a print of this bill made, which would show the alterations and changes made in the House text, it would be of great convenience to Senators. I have endeavored to make those alterations appear on my bill, but I find it a matter of some moment. I think if the Secretary could do it, it would greatly facilitate the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In reply to the Senator from Iowa, I desire to say to him and to the Senate that a bill in that shape has already been prepared and will be laid on the tables of Senators to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad of it.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) to provide for the increase of the naval establishment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. HALE. The Senator from South Carolina is absent from the Chamber, and desired me for him to withdraw the amendment, saying that he did not wish in any way to oppose or obstruct the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment being withdrawn, the bill will be reported to the Senate, if no further amendment be proposed.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment, which I ask may be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That the President of the United States shall establish at Pensacola, Fla., and Norfolk, Va., and at the Brooklyn navy-yard, and at the Mare Island navy-yard, in California, plants of the requisite machinery and implements for the construction of the steam vessels provided for in this act, which shall be leased, on reasonable terms, to be fixed by the President of the United States, to persons whose contracts shall be approved by the President of the United States for the construction of such vessels. That one or more of the vessels provided for in this act shall be constructed at each of the navy-yards provided for in this act. That $1,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purchase and erection of the plants and implements for the construction of such vessels.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this bill, like all the other bills which have preceded it from the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which there have been several, providing for the construction of naval vessels during my term of service, is subject to this objection: Although the present Secretary of the Navy and the President of the United States are given by the bills the control of this money to a certain extent, still in the condition of business in the country these expenditures are necessarily confined to a very small area of the country; in fact they will benefit but very few persons of large means concentrated in particular localities. If this bill shall be approved and become a law, it might properly be said to be a bill for the benefit of a few individuals rather than a bill to construct naval ships.

The discretion which is given is very large. We have no information and nothing upon which to predicate an intelligent vote as to what kind of naval defense is best to be adopted at this time, as to what character of armored vessels shall be built and will be most available for the defense of the country.

The Committee on Naval Affairs has not given us any information on this subject. The Senate might properly have expected some intelligible information from them on a subject of national importance, but we have not a word from them or from the Senator reporting the bill, and this same performance has been repeated every session since I have been here.

The suggestion that has been made, I believe in the New York Herald, of a mixed commission of civilians of scientific attainments and practical knowledge and naval officers who can take into consideration this subject and report to Congress the best and the most approved method of defense, I have no doubt would elicit general approval throughout the country.

There is no indisposition in any portion of the country to expend or to support a policy of expenditure of liberal amounts of money for a proper and approved method of defense of our coasts; but the question is, who can intelligently vote what that shall be? This bill gives an absolute discretion as to the character of armored vessels or coast batteries, with the amount of money that shall be expended, to the Secretary of the Navy. While I am in favor of very large discretion to executive officers, and a strict responsibility on their part, I think there is, perhaps, some force in the objection that we should have some intelligent idea of what is required before voting these large sums of money for this purpose.

But whatever method shall be adopted, whether we shall vote now, as I am not unwilling to do, this sum of money to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, thinking as I do, that a far better method can be devised, and that it is subject to the objection that the entire expenditure of this money must be in the present state of business in our country in the hands of a few or for the benefit of a few individuals and a few localities, I shall offer an amendment to the bill. I have no idea that it will receive any consideration or approval—all the expenditures proposed by the committee seem to have been more in the interest of a few individuals of large means than for the public service. When they realize the idea that the expenditures of the Government should be made for the public good, we may hope to have bills which will meet the approval of both Houses of Congress and of the people. This policy divorces the favorable opinion of the country in its widespread and distant regions from the support of a proper policy of naval defense; but if plants were established in the different localities where vessels might be built in the different navy-yards, either under the contract system or under the Government, it would not only benefit those particular regions by the expenditure of the money, but it would also bring to the support of the Government in this policy the favorable opinion of the people in those localities, and it would no doubt enlist a degree of talent and of ability and interest in the development of a proper system throughout the whole extent of this country which would be advantageous to the public service. I am opposed to this constant neglect of the people and the constant favor shown to those who control large means and great establishments. Let us do something to give the people of moderate means a chance to take hold of these works.

For that reason, Mr. President, I think it would be a wise policy for the Government to establish the proper plants in different localities at the different navy-yards which could be used for that purpose. Take, for instance, Pensacola, in Florida, which has the finest harbor of any port upon the Gulf, which is in more immediate contiguity to inexhaustible sources of iron capable of being made into the finest steel—in Alabama, and where every facility of nature and of art can easily and cheaply be concentrated for the construction of these vessels. Why should it not be done there? Is the absence of money, the plant, the capital, an objection? Would it not be wise in the Government to give an opportunity for that large body of the citizens of the United States who have not money, whose resources are limited, to combine and exhibit their skill and their capacity in the construction of these vessels? I can see no objection to a wise public policy which will allow the Government to afford that assistance which it can easily give and economically give, towards the construction of these vessels in these different localities; and for the purpose of having a vote upon it, and in order that the great expenditures of this Government may be distributed and dispersed throughout the country with some degree of fairness, I have offered this amendment to this bill. I am prepared, Mr. President, for an ungracious reception of this amendment. I realize how little sympathy exists with some members of this body for the ideas that prompt it. Nevertheless I am confident that this system will have to be adopted before any adequate system shall be adopted.

Mr. HALE. I hope this amendment will be voted down. It complicates the bill very greatly, changes its whole purpose and sentiment. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments, made as in Committee of the Whole, were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, shall the bill pass?

Mr. VEST. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were present, I do not know how he would vote, but I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 7; as follows:

DISTRICT SUITS BY FOREIGN EXECUTORS.

Mr. HARRIS. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first House bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (H. R. 7596) to enable foreign executors and administrators to sue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

It provides that any person or persons to whom letters testamentary or of administration have been or hereafter may be granted by the proper authority, in any of the United States or the Territories thereof, may maintain any suit or action and prosecute and recover any claim in the District of Columbia, in the same manner as if the letters testamentary or of administration had been granted to such person or persons by the proper authority in the District; and the letters testamentary or of administration, or a copy thereof, certified under the seal of the authority granting the same, shall be sufficient evidence to prove the granting thereof, and that the person or persons, as the case may be, hath or have administration. The supreme court of the District of Columbia may, upon petition of any one interested, require from such person or persons the security now required by law in like case from a resident administrator or executor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY NEAL.

The bill (H. R. 8597) for the relief of Henry Neal was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Henry Neal of $120, as compensation for services rendered by him as an employé of the House of Representatives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEXAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. MAXEY. Order of Business 1642, being the bill (H. R. 4841) to change the eastern and northern judicial districts of Texas, and for other purposes, was informally passed over. I ask that it be now called up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Would it not be better to go through first with the call?

Mr. MAXEY. Very well.

Mr. PLATT. Was not that a bill passed over without prejudice until the Senator from Texas should return?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Chair suggested that on account of the time consumed in going back it would be better to continue the call and then go back to the bill alluded to by the Senator from Texas, to which suggestion he yielded.

STABLE FOR HOUSE OFFICES.

The bill (H. R. 10091) for the construction of a stable for the use of the horses and wagons for the use of the offices of the House of Representatives was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. I ask that that bill go over to the other part of the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill will be placed on the Calendar under the ninth rule.

COURTS AT MISSISSIPPI CITY.

The bill (H. R. 10040) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Mississippi City, Miss., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert:

That a term of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi shall be held at Mississippi City, in said district, on the third Monday in February and on the third Monday in August in each year; and the clerks of said courts shall each appoint a deputy clerk to reside at said Mississippi City, who shall have the powers that may by law be exercised by his principal; and the marshal of said district shall appoint a deputy marshal to reside at said Mississippi City, and who shall have the powers of the other deputy marshals in said district.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer an amendment, and I will explain that the bill as it passed the House provided for a separate division of certain counties; the Judiciary Committee at that time were opposed to a separate division, and struck that out and provided for courts to be held at Mississippi City simply. Since that time the Judiciary Committee have changed their policy on that subject and agreed to several bills which provide for separate divisions. I have prepared an amendment which is an exact copy of one bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in another case, with some verbal amendments, and I offer that as a substitute for the committee's amendment. I send it to the desk. The Senate will notice that section 6 has been added in pursuance of a policy recently adopted by the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, it is proposed to insert:

That the counties of Hancock, Harrison, Jackson, Marion, Perry, and Green, being a part of the southern judicial district of Mississippi, shall be known as the southern division of said district; and circuit and district courts for the transaction of business pertaining to the persons and property in said southern division shall be held at Mississippi City on the third Mondays of February and August in each year.

SEC. 2. That the said courts to be held at Mississippi City as provided in section 1 of this act shall be possessed of and shall exercise all the powers and jurisdiction now possessed or exercised or which may hereafter be granted to or exercised by the circuit and district courts in said district now held at Jackson; and all laws regulating and defining how suits against persons or property located or found in judicial districts shall be brought shall be applicable to and govern the bringing of suits in said division; and all laws touching the removal of causes from State courts to United States courts shall apply to said courts hereby established; but all crimes and offenses heretofore committed within said southern district shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the clerks of the courts now held at Jackson, on demand of either party to any suit now pending in either of said courts, and properly belonging to the court at Mississippi City, to make out and certify a copy of the record and proceedings in such suit, and to transmit the same to the deputy clerk of the proper court at Mississippi City, who shall enter said cause on his docket, and the same shall be proceeded with as if it had been originally brought in said court. The fees for such transcript shall be paid by the party applying for the same.

SEC. 4. That the marshal and clerks of said southern district of Mississippi shall appoint deputies, who shall reside at Mississippi City, and act as marshal and clerks of said courts in place of their principals.

SEC. 5. That the United States shall not be at any expense in providing for a building or room for the holding of said courts in Mississippi City.

SEC. 6. That the grand and petit jurors empaneled in either of said courts shall act as grand and petit jurors for the other court held at the same term and place.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill was referred originally to the Committee on the Judiciary, by whom it was considered with great deliberation. I do not violate confidence in saying that it was a subject of very considerable discussion in the committee, and that its members were not united even in the amendment that was reported; and now amid unparalleled confusion in this Chamber that renders it impossible to hear what is read from the Secretary's desk, the Senator from Mississippi proposes a fundamental and radical change in the entire proposition. I do not think it is just or fair, and I shall take the liberty of objecting to the consideration of the bill further at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the next bill in order will be stated.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the bill be taken up and considered notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill, the objection to the contrary notwithstanding. The question is on that motion.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 20, noes 22.

STABLE FOR HOUSE OFFICES.

Mr. HALE. I have examined the bill to which I just now objected and wish to withdraw my objection. It is House bill 10091, No. 2062 in the Order of Business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be again reported. It has been read at length.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10091) for the construction of a stable for the use of the horses and wagons for the use of the offices of the House of Representatives.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments; in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "six;" after the word "thousand," in the same line, to insert "five hundred;" in line 6, after the word "under," to strike out "Edward Clark" and insert "the;" and in line 8, after the word "stable," to insert "carpenter shop."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I think the bill had better be read now as it stands amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $6,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, to be expended under the Architect of the Capitol, for the construction of a brick stable, carpenter shop, and wagon-sheds necessary, and fence inclosing the same, for the post-office and other offices of the House of Representatives, to be erected on the lot on the east side of Third street, between Maryland avenue and B street southwest, in the city of Washington, now occupied by and the property of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read "A bill for the construction of a building for stable and carpenter shop for the accommodation of the offices of the House of Representatives."

ADDITIONAL JUDGE IN NEW MEXICO.

The bill (H. R. 9642) to provide for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have the last section of that bill read once more.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That all offenses committed before the passage of this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect (except as to the number of judges) as if this act had not passed.

The bill was passed.

BRIDGE AT CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

The bill (H. R. 8880) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Chattanooga, Tenn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 3, after the word "that," to strike out "any corporation existing or which may be organized," and insert "the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company, organized," and after the word "passengers," at the end of line 12, to insert:

For reasonable rates or tolls, to be fixed by said company; and the Secretary of War shall have the right, from time to time, to revise, prescribe, and determine such rates or tolls.

So as to make the section read:

That the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company, organized under the laws of the State of Tennessee, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Tennessee River at or near Chattanooga, in the county of Hamilton, in said State. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the corporation by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot-passengers, for reasonable rates or tolls, to be fixed by said company; and the Secretary of War shall have the right, from time to time, to revise, prescribe, and determine such rates or tolls.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 2, to insert:

That the bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, and the same is hereby declared to be a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States, or for through railway passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile for their transmission over the railroads leading to said bridge; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal-telegraph purposes. That the said bridge shall be so constructed, either by draw, span, or otherwise, that a free and unobstructed passage may be secured to all water-craft navigating said river at the point aforesaid: Provided, That if said bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signals for the passage of boats or vessels; and said corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Secretary of War shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 5 in the following words:

SEC. 5. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 5. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act, so as to prevent or remove all material and substantial obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of the said bridge is hereby expressly reserved; and any alterations or changes that may be required by Congress in the bridge constructed under this act shall be made by the corporation owning or controlling the same, at his own expense. Furthermore, if the construction of said bridge shall not be commenced within two and completed within four years after the passage of this act, all privileges conferred hereby and this act shall become null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill and ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. Since a conference committee is to be appointed on the bill I wish to call the attention of the Senator who reported it to this clause in the bill:

Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the corporation by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers, for reasonable rates or tolls, to be fixed by said company; and the Secretary of War shall have the right, from time to time, to revise, prescribe, and determine such rates or tolls.

I have no doubt Congress may do it, but I have very great doubts whether Congress can delegate to the Secretary of War the right to fix tolls on a bridge for foot passengers and wagons. I merely call the attention of the Senator to it.

Mr. CONGER. I think a provision has been put in many bills giving the Secretary of War the right to decide questions arising between one railroad company having a bridge and other railroads about their approaches. It has been put in many other bills for the security of the public against tolls that might be unreasonable and extortionate. So far it has worked very well.

Mr. PLATT. I sympathize with the object of it but I do not believe Congress has any such power. I do not believe it can delegate any such authority to the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. CONGER, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. PLATT.

WILLIAM E. BOND.

The bill (H. R. 1741) for the relief of William E. Bond was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William E. Bond, late internal-revenue collector for the first district of North Carolina, $398.50, being the sum paid into the Treasury by him in excess of the taxes actually collected by him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS OF MIAMI AND SANDUSKY.

The bill (H. R. 6538) to define the boundaries of the collection districts of Miami and Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I inquire of the Chair if he understands that the description of the Miami district takes in a part of the territory of the district of Detroit?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not change the western boundary. It is only as to the jurisdiction about the islands.

Mr. CONGER. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD ACCOUNTS.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 170) authorizing an investigation of the books, accounts, and methods of Pacific railroads which have received aid from the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GORMAN. At the request of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], who is absent to-day, I ask that that joint resolution may go over without prejudice.

Mr. HOAR. There is no occasion to insert the words "without prejudice." I suppose I am stating nothing that it is improper to state when I say that that resolution has been placed upon an order of business agreed on, and it will never be convenient to discuss it under the five-minute rule. It may go over generally. I have an understanding with the Senator from New Jersey that it shall not be taken up until his return.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under objection.

CAPT. EDMOND G. FECHÉT.

The bill (H. R. 1173) to correct the record of Capt. Edmond G. Fechét was considered as in Committee of the Whole. In order to correct the record of Capt. Edmond G. Fechét, of the Eighth Regiment of Cavalry, United States Army, and fix his relative rank as provided in section 1219 of the Revised Statutes, the President is authorized to commisson Fechét a captain in the Eighth Regiment of Cavalry, to date from the 23d of May, 1870, that being the date his present commission as captain would have been dated had not an error been made in the first arrangement of the lieutenants of the regiment; but the issuing of such commission shall not entitle Fechét to any extra pay or compensation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT W. SPANG.

The bill (H. R. 9446) for the relief of Robert W. Spang was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of War to remove from the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army the charge of desertion against Private Robert W. Spang, late of Company B, Ninety-third Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next four cases on the Calendar being adversely reported will be considered as objected to.

Mr. HARRIS. Adverse reports do not come within the rule under which we are acting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will retain their places on this Calendar, being merely passed over informally.

Mr. HARRIS. They do not fall under the rule under which we are acting, and therefore they hold their places on the Calendar.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The bill (H. R. 1628) for the relief of the Continental Fire Insurance Company, the Eagle Fire Insurance Company, the City Fire Insurance Company, and the Commercial Mutual Insurance Company, all of New York city; the Western National Bank, the Merchants' National Bank, and the Maryland Fire Insurance Company, of Baltimore, Md., was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that had better go over; it will take up all the time of the morning.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the Senator will not object. There is a report in the case which will satisfy the Senate if it is read. I do not care to discuss the bill. It is reported favorably from the Finance Committee, and we can have a vote in five minutes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am now engaged in preparing the views of the minority on that bill. It can not be considered under this rule, and I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

Mr. MILLER. This bill was reported February 8. If the minority of the committee had any views to present, they could have presented them by this time. This bill is reported favorably by the committee; and if bills so reported to be considered under this rule are to be objected to by one Senator simply because he desires to defeat a bill in the Senate after having failed to defeat it in committee, I want to say that I may be considered as objecting to all other bills being taken up except by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. The question is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, under the rule the bill goes over.

Mr. MILLER. Let this bill retain its place. I will not undertake to stop the passage of bills of other Senators; but if this bill is to be taken out of its place on this Calendar, I shall move now to take it up most certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will retain its place on the Calendar. The Chair hears no objection to that suggestion.

Mr. MILLER. And I give notice that at the first opportunity under this rule again I shall move to take up that bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. And I give notice that I shall object, if here, to the passage of the bill in the public interest, and I desire to be present when the bill is considered. I shall be absent from my seat for the next two days.

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator is to be away the next two days, perhaps he will consent to take up the bill now and take all the time he wants to discuss it. I shall not consent to the bill being laid over two days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MILLER. I make it in order by moving to take the bill up. If the Senator wants a day or two, I am ready to proceed to the discussion of the bill at once.

Mr. ALDRICH. I cannot control the action of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been passed over without prejudice, and the next case will be stated.

Mr. MILLER. I have already given notice that I shall move to take up the bill at the first opportunity, whether the Senator from Rhode Island is present or not.

GRAVELED ROAD TO RICHMOND NATIONAL CEMETERY.

The bill (H. R. 7209) to authorize the construction of a graveled road to the Richmond National Cemetery, near Richmond, Va., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the attention of the Senator who reported that bill. It reads: "That the sum of twenty-five thousand be, and the same is hereby, appropriated." Does it mean "twenty-five thousand dollars?"

Mr. HAMPTON. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. HARRIS. It had better be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to insert the word "dollars" after the words "twenty-five thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDNANCE ACCOUNTS OF DAKOTA TERRITORY.

ROBERT POTTS.

ESTATE OF EDWIN T. PILKENTON.

The bill (H. R. 2517) for the relief of the estate of Edwin T. Pilkenton, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to the estate of Edwin T. Pilkenton, deceased, of $2,684.96, or so much thereof as the Secretary shall find was actually lost, in full satisfaction for his claim for that amount of internal-revenue tobacco-stamps which were destroyed by fire in the burning of his tobacco factory on the 3d of May, 1869, in Manchester, Va.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTIN H. M'CHESNEY.

The bill (H. R. 5289) affirming the action of the President of the United States in annulling and revoking an order dismissing Martin H. McChesney from service in the armies of the United States, and honorably discharging said McChesney from said service, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. Let the preamble be read.

The Chief Clerk read the preamble, as follows:

Whereas Martin H. McChesney, late a captain in Second Regiment New York Volunteer Mounted Rifles, was by an order from the War Department erroneously and improperly dismissed from the service of the Government for absence without leave, when the said McChesney was, and had been for many months prior thereto, a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy; and

Whereas by reason of his erroneous and improper dismissal as aforesaid the said McChesney is, under the rulings and decisions of the accounting officers of Government, deprived of certain pay and allowances to which he would otherwise have been entitled by reason of his services: Therefore.

Mr. PLATT. How long does that give pay from? I should like a little explanation of it more than appears in the preamble of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire that the report be read?

Mr. PLATT. If there is a report, I wish that the report may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WALTHALL February 8, 1887:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5289) affirming the action of the President of the United States annulling and revoking an order dismissing Martin H. McChesney from service in the armies of the United States and honorably discharging said McChesney from said service, having considered the same, report as follows:

Your committee, on the facts set forth in the following report, prepared by Mr. BRAGG, from the House Committee on Military Affairs, recommend that the bill pass.

Following that report the order of restoration therein referred to is presented:

It appears from the report of the Adjutant-General of the Army, which is hereto attached and made a part of this report, that Martin H. McChesney was a captain in Company E, Second New York Mounted Rifles, and was dismissed the service for "absence without leave" November 30, 1864, to take effect as of October 31, 1864.

It also appears that Captain McChesney was, when reported "absent without leave" and dismissed therefor, in fact a prisoner of war; that he subsequently made his escape and reported on March 18, 1865; and thereupon his case was reconsidered; and upon proof presented the order dismissing him was revoked, and in lieu thereof he was honorably discharged to take effect March 18, 1865.

The committee are unable to see or learn any good cause for question as to the pay and allowances which it is proper this officer should receive, but as it appears from the recital of the bill that some objection has been raised by the accounting officers, perhaps growing out of a question as to the regularity of the order of restoration and the right of pay under it, the committee deem it not only wise, but a matter of duty, to assist him in getting what is his due by legislation.

The bill, however, recites his discharge as of May 11, 1865, and if passed in this form would give pay and allowances to that date, when in fact the honorable discharge was made to take effect March 18, 1865, the date of his report.

The committee therefore report the bill back with an amendment, striking out the words "May 11" where the words occur, in the fifth and sixth lines of the second page of the bill, and inserting in place thereof the words "March 18," and when so amended recommend the bill do pass.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 20, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a bill (H. R. 5289), Forty-ninth Congress, first session) to affirm the action of the President in revoking an order dismissing Capt. Martin H. McChesney, Second New York Mounted Rifles Volunteers, and honorably discharging him from service, submitted to the Department by the Hon. E. S. BRAGG, chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, and to report as follows:

The records of this office show that Martin H. McChesney was mustered into service as captain Company E, Second New York Mounted Rifles Volunteers, with company, to date January 29, 1864, to serve three years.

Muster-roll of company from February 29 to September 1, 1864, (six-months' muster), reports him "Absent; sent to the hospital on or about May 22, 1864," and roll for September and October, 1864, "Missing since May 22, 1864; supposed to be a prisoner; error in last roll." Regimental return for May, 1864, is not on file. Return for June reports him "Absent without leave since May 21," and for July "Absent without leave, May 21; reported to be in Libby Prison."

On October 19, 1864, the commanding general Ninth Army Corps (General Parke) requested that Captain McChesney, who had been reported absent without leave since (time unknown), be returned for duty with his regiment in the field, his services being absolutely necessary on account of the small number of officers present for duty with the regiment.

Upon the receipt of that request at this office, Captain McChesney was on October 31, 1864, published officially for absence without leave, and cited to appear before the military commission, then in session in this city, and make defense to the charge against him. Having failed to appear, he was dismissed the service, to date October 31, 1864, for absence without leave, in special orders from this Department, dated November 30, 1864.

On March 18, 1865, he reported, by letter from this city, to the commissary-general of prisoners as follows: "I have the honor to submit to you the following statement, which I certify upon my honor to be true and correct: I was taken prisoner May 25, 1864, near Bowling Green, Va., and have been held as a prisoner by the rebel government until I made my escape and reported to General Sherman at Columbia, S. C., February 16, 1865. I left General Sherman at Fayetteville, N. C., March 12, 1865, with orders to report to you at Washington." He submitted with his report several letters from officers certifying that they had been prisoners of war with him.

March 20, 1865, the commissary-general of prisoners referred the report to the Adjutant-General, with the statement that "there is no record in this office of the imprisonment of Captain McChesney, but the within papers seem to establish his case." And on March 23, 1865, the papers were referred to the military commission, before which he had been previously cited to appear, for a rehearing, with remark that, "This being a peculiar case, should be very carefully considered." Captain McChesney was notified of the reference, and informed that he could appear before the commission and make defense should he deem it necessary.

The military commission, after mature deliberation, decided that the defense of the accused was satisfactory, and recommended his restoration to service.

The proceedings and report of the commission were, on April 24, 1865, referred to the commanding general Ninth Army Corps (General Parke) for remarks previous to final action by this Department, and returned May 3, 1865, with the statement that, "As the charge against the party in question arose from my request that he be returned to duty with his command, I would respectfully recommend, in view of the facts in the case, that he be restored to the service." Thereupon, by special orders dated May 11, 1865, from this office, the dismissal of Captain McChesney was revoked, and he was honorably discharged the service to date March 18, 1865, the date he reported as an escaped prisoner of war to the commissary-general of prisoners in this city.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. KELTON,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

[Special Orders No. 222.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Martin H. McChesney, Second New York Mounted Rifles, to date October 31, 1864, is hereby revoked, and he is honorably discharged the service of the United States, to date March 18, 1865, the date at which he reported as an escaped prisoner of war to the Adjutant-General of the Army. He will receive no final payments until he has satisfied the Pay Department that he is not indebted to the Government.

Mr. CULLOM. There was objection to that, and I did not know whether this was the same bill or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary will be read.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 2, line 6, after the word "Jackson," to strike out:

And for the purpose of exercising the jurisdiction herein conferred the said western division shall be a separate judicial district.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the marshal and clerks of said southern district of Mississippi shall appoint deputies, who shall reside at Vicksburg and act as marshal and clerk of said courts in place of their principals.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I noticed in the reading of this bill that it is provided that these four counties shall be a judicial district. Is that still in the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. CONGER. I notice in the words of the bill that it is provided that these four counties shall be a judicial district.

Mr. GEORGE. That is stricken out.

Mr. CONGER. What is it entitled now?

Mr. GEORGE. A division of the district.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been out of the Chamber on other business for a few moments, and I will inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether any amendments have been proposed other than those which were reported by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. GEORGE. None.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the bill (S. 222) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia, having been received by the President February 1, 1887, and not having been returned to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution it had become a law without his approval.

The message also announced that the President had on the 16th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1536) for the purchase of suitable grounds in the city of Owensborough, in the State of Kentucky, and the erection thereon of a public building for the post-office, United States collector's office, United States commissioner's office, and for the use of other United States officers in said city, and appropriating money for said purposes.

MRS. ARLANTA T. TAYLOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired——

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that Order of Business 1415, being the bill (H. R. 7310) granting a pension to Mrs. Arlanta T. Taylor, which I requested to lie over a day or two when this call was made, be now passed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADELICA PERRY.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to allow the Senate to take up and pass Order of Business 2176, House bill 4535. It is a pension bill and requires an amendment of a single letter in the name of the pensioner. It will have to go back to the House of Representatives to make that amendment, and it is so late in the session that it may be lost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill referred to by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4535) granting a pension to Adelisa Perry.

It proposes to place on the pension-roll, at $12 per month, the name of Adelisa Perry, of Worcester, Mass., who served as a nurse during the war of the rebellion, and is now incapacitated from earning a livelihood by sickness induced by that service.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the letter "s" in the name "Adelisa" be stricken out, and the letter "c" inserted. It is thought best that that change should be made.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. SAWYER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC SHIP-RAILWAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2288) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Railway Company, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. VAN WYCK to add at the end of section 2 of the amendment of Mr. VEST:

That no certificate for stock shall be issued until the same shall be fully paid for in money of the par value of said stock, and the money deposited in the treasury of said company; and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid.

No bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received shall be authorized or issued until such paid capital shall amount to the sum of $10,000,000, and no bonds shall be issued or disposed of at less than par value.

Mr. VEST. Since this bill was last under consideration in the Senate I have redraughted the amendment which I offered by way of substitute, and have endeavored to obviate a good many of the objections made to the bill in the debate. I ask consent to modify the proposition which I submitted as a substitute for the original bill as I have redrawn it, and I ask that it be read for information. That takes the place of all the amendments I have offered. I have endeavored to incorporate in this special substitute many of the provisions that were suggested by different Senators in the debate the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska withdraw his amendment to enable the Senator from Missouri to present his?

Mr. VAN WYCK. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri can be read for information. I do not desire to withdraw my amendment so that it will lose its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now submitted would not be in order until the amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska should be disposed of.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I withdraw mine for that purpose, but I shall renew it immediately after this is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves an amendment as a substitute for the amendment first offered by him, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

Whereas the Government of Mexico has granted unto James B. Eads, or to such company as he may organize, a concession containing certain powers, rights, and privileges in the matter of the construction and operation of a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, with an accessory railway, lines of telegraph, and water approaches, and has authorized said Eads to obtain a charter for said company either in Mexico or elsewhere: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of constructing and operating said ship-railway and its accessories hereinbefore recited, and for the full enjoyment of all the rights, privileges, and concessions contained in the hereinbefore-recited grant, and such others as may be hereafter secured from the Government of Mexico, said James B. SEC. 2. That the incorporators herein named or as many as they may choose from their number by a majority vote, shall have power to open books of subscription to the capital stock of said company, at such places within the United States or elsewhere as they may elect, and receive all subscriptions to said stock. When the Secretary of the Interior shall have certified that not less than $5,000,000 has been subscribed to said stock by responsible persons, and when 10 per cent. thereof shall have been paid in in cash, the said incorporators, or a majority of them, shall call a meeting of the stockholders, to be held either in the city of New York or in Washington, D. C. At least thirty days' notice of said meeting shall be given by mailing to each stockholder a written or printed circular calling his attention to the same, and by publication in at least two of the daily newspapers having general circulation in the city where the meeting is to be held. The stockholders present at said meeting, either personally or by proxy, shall elect a board of directors, who shall serve for such time as may be determined by a majority of the votes cast at said meeting, and who shall have such powers as are conferred by the by-laws. The stockholders shall also at said meeting adopt by-laws covering any or all of the matters mentioned in connection with by-laws in section 1 of this act, and any of said by-laws may be altered, amended, added to, or repealed at any time thereafter, as in the opinion of the stockholders the interests of the company may require. But no such amendment shall be made except by a majority vote of all the stockholders, either personally or by proxy, and at a meeting called for the purpose. At least twenty days' notice of any such meeting shall be published in a newspaper of general circulation in the city where the principal office of the company is located. At said first meeting of the stockholders it shall be the duty of the incorporators to deliver to the stockholders all moneys, stock-books, stock-certificates, property, and effects held by them and belonging to said company; and thereafter all power vested in said incorporators as such shall cease, and the stockholders and their successors shall thereafter constitute the corporation hereby created.

SEC. 3. That if stock to the amount of $10,000,000 shall not be subscribed, and 10 per cent. thereof actually paid in, before the expiration of two years next after the passage of this act, or if the work of constructing said railway shall not be actually commenced before and be in progress at the expiration of four years next after the passage of this act, the said corporation shall be deemed to have expired by limitation, and all its franchises and privileges shall be deemed to have absolutely ceased and become determined.

SEC. 4. That the principal office of the company shall be located and maintained either in New York city or Washington, D. C., as said company may elect. Said election shall be made by the company within six months next after the passage of this act, and notice thereof shall be published in a daily newspaper published in each of said cities at least once a week for four consecutive weeks, immediately following the date at which said election is made.

All meetings of the stockholders shall be held at said principal office of the company, and at least one such meeting shall be held in each year.

SEC. 5. That the United States shall, upon payment of three-fourths of the customary rates, and having first obtained the consent of the Government of Mexico as provided in said concession, enjoy the use of said railway for the transportation of troops, munitions of war, mails, and property: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be considered as a waiver of any rights which the United States may now have under any treaty heretofore made with Mexico.

SEC. 6. That the United States shall be entitled to such a representation on the board of directors of said company, not, however, in any event exceeding two-ninths of its members, as may be provided for in any treaty hereafter made between the United States and Mexico.

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to involve the United States in any pecuniary obligations whatever other than the payment of tolls as hereinbefore provided for.

SEC. 8. That said corporation shall exist and continue during the period of ninety-nine years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 9. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed, so far as they affect the corporation hereby created.

SEC. 10. That Congress shall at all times have the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act when in its judgment the public good may require, but not in violation of the rights of the company considered in equity.

Mr. MORRILL. I am anxious that this bill should be put in such shape as will enable me to give it my support. I notice that the Senator from Missouri in his proposed substitute still retains the provision of his original amendment by which the capital stock and bonds of the proposed corporation are to be $100,000,000, and that his subsequent amendment merely provides that there shall be $5,000,000 of stock subscribed for and 10 per cent. thereon paid in, that is to say, $500,000. It seems to me that that is inadequate to make this a bona fide buiness corporation, one that will receive the confidence of the community.

It is evidently a vast and magnificent project on the part of Captain Eads. I do not underrate his capacity as an engineer; he has succeeded in two other unique and original experiments; but this is an experiment that he has never tried. The question is, therefore, to say the very least, problematical as to his success. The chances may be certainly not more than one in two that it can succeed. I hope it will succeed. It will be a credit to the engineer and to American enterprise if it shall succeed in carrying vessels across the continent from one shore to the other elevated in some places 500 or more feet, and carrying them safely.

It is possible that this company may linger along and be delayed in its practical operations, so that the original incorporators, the names mentioned in the bill, may drop out one after another, and it may be left in the hands of managers who will only have an interest personal to themselves in disposing of bonds and making what profit they can out of them. It seems to me that the power to create $95,000,000 of bonds ought not to receive the gild of Congress unless there is a fair prospect that there will be some return to the investors. I am quite ready and willing to allow men of means to subscribe to this enterprise, but I do not wish to have it left in such shape that in a few years hence these bonds will be peddled out and distributed over the country into the hands of parties who are ignorant perhaps of the subject, and will be subjected therefore to a considerable loss.

It seems to me that it would be better for the corporation, that it would indicate a greater degree of confidence in the success of the enterprise, if a larger sum was first to be paid in as capital before they are allowed to issue this enormous amount of bonds. If there shall be any amendment made by which this matter can be properly regulated, I shall certainly vote for the bill; but if it should not be so amended, I do not see how it is possible for me to support it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to renew the amendment which I withdrew temporarily that the Senator from Missouri might submit his perfected substitute. I, therefore, offer the amendment to this substitute as it was pending previously.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the amendment which is now proposed by the Senator from Missouri is entirely new as I understand it. It is a new bill practically, I suppose, taking the text of the original amendment the Senator offered which has been under discussion now for a long time, and the better plan would be to take up that amendment of the Senator from Missouri and see whether we agree to its different provisions as we go along. I think that is the best plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The Chair may be in error, but he supposes that the Senator from Missouri has a right to modify his original amendment, and that therefore no vote as to the substitution of the amendment now proposed for the one originally offered is necessary.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought some vote had been taken on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment now offered by the Senator from Missouri is the pending amendment to the bill.

Mr. VEST. That is right. I have modified my original amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] proposes to amend the pending amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Where does that amendment come in?

Mr. VAN WYCK. At the end of the second section as it was previously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 2 it is proposed to add:

That no certificate for stock shall be issued till the same shall be fully paid for in money at the par value of said stock, and the money deposited in the treasury of said company; and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid. No bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received shall be authorized or issued until such paid capital shall amount to the sum of $10,000,000, and no bonds shall be issued or disposed of at less than par value.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I have heard no reason stated why this amendment should not be adopted, except the statement by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that we should deal with great liberality toward Captain Eads. That I do not understand to be the question here. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggested the same reason as the only answer to the proposition, that this was a great project and that Captain Eads was a distinguished engineer. Certainly; grant both; is that a sufficient reason why guards and protections should not be thrown around this project? Admit all that may be said in eulogy of Captain Eads, and I have no disposition to deny it, where is the certainty that Captain Eads is to be connected with this project even during his natural life? Where is the guaranty of the life of Captain Eads, that it will be one year, or two years, or five years? If Captain Eads draws out from this enterprise or departs this natural life, this creature into which we breathe the breath of life lives on. If it is a monstrosity, if it is a wrong, then it will be little shield or protection to the American Congress that it did what could not be tolerated or even excused only by way of eulogy or recognition of the virtues of Captain Eads.

This corporation which we propose to create for good or for evil has precisely the same human excellences and the same human infirmities that attach to all creatures and corporations of this kind. Every one created in the history of this nation and of other nations has first been founded upon the pretext which has been alleged here, the great excellence of the incorporators.

I called the attention the other day of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who I regret is not in his seat at this moment, to the experience of another great enterprise, the Pacific railroad companies, when they were organized; and the argument then made of the excellence, the virtue, the integrity, and the patriotism of the incorporators of the project was louder than this in favor of Captain Eads. We were admonished then, you will remember, that it was a project to save the national life; that it was to bind the Atlantic and Pacific together; and that those patriotic men, those philanthropic men who were the corporators were willing to come in and invest their private fortunes to build a road connecting the two oceans. What then? The Senator from Massachusetts himself was an active investigator on a committee in the other House which we remember exposed the credit mobilier frauds, and the very men, some of them from Massachusetts, who were so full of philanthropy and patriotism to serve their country, were the men who were deepest, I believe, or as deep as others, in the credit mobilier frauds that brought a scandal upon Congress and brought a scandal upon the United States.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. VAN WYCK. In a moment. Then Congress in its weak way endeavored to protect what was left by providing that they should issue no more stock and bonds except in payment of debts for bonds previously issued; but every organization, every party having control of the Pacific railroads violated the law of 1873 which Congress passed, and they heaped credit mobilier upon credit mobilier until they nearly wrecked the whole concern, and almost destroyed the security of the debt due to the Government. Now I will listen to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. It was a quaint saying of Mr. Lincoln, but it had a good deal of philosophy in it, that you never could burn gunpowder more than once. I do not know to whom from Massachusetts the Senator alludes, but I suppose I can imagine. There were men in Massachusetts to whom the country is indebted for the Union Pacific Railroad and upon whom at one time there was heaped scandal, but that powder was burnt a good many years ago. The time has come when the smoke of it has passed away, and the men who sacrificed their fortunes and staked everything they had in the service of their country in that great work as much as any soldier in the field are coming to be understood and to receive that meed of commendation from the country which their great undertaking and sacrifice merited. I have no doubt the Senator can parade here very much of violent and condemnatory language heaped upon those men, but, as I have said, that time has passed, and the sober, second, honest, clear judgment of the American people has erected a monument upon the highest point on that railroad to the memory of the men who were maligned in that day by those who are not worthy to unloose the latchets of their shoes.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I wish the other Senator from Massachusetts were here.

Mr. DAWES. I wish he were, too.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would refer to him as to the truthfulness of the concluding sentence uttered by the Senator from Massachusetts, that he is not worthy to unloose the shoe-latchet of those men, because his colleague was a Representative in the other House, and he signed a report which said all that I have said, and more, in regard to the promoters of stocks and bonds of the Union Pacific Railroad. I commend the report of his colleague to him.

Mr. DAWES. I had no doubt that the Senator had in his mind what has been paraded at least a hundred times on this and the other floor, the language of my colleague, not in the shape of a report, but in an argument that he made in another case. But if there is any word of it that reflects upon the integrity of Massachusetts men, to whom my friend alluded just now, and in whose behalf I speak, not the other men connected with railroad frauds—if there is a word of it that by just interpretation can reflect upon the honor of those men, if my colleague were here at this moment he would be swift to disabuse the mind of my friend from Nebraska of any such conclusion as that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My memory may be at fault; but the Senator from Massachusetts probably can tell me whether that Congress passed any resolution condemnatory of some persons connected with the Union Pacific Railroad and the credit mobilier in the House of Representatives. My friend will very probably remember. Did that body pass some resolutions condemnatory?

Mr. DAWES. Has the Senator forgotten so soon the purport of all this thing? I have not attempted to gainsay the fact that at the time and in the excitement there was scandal heaped upon Massachusetts men. I undertook only to say that that day had passed, and that a clearer judgment of the actions and motives of men had brought the conclusion that, instead of condemning those men, a monument to their memory had been erected which will abide long after I and some others of us shall have been forgotten.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If I recollect aright, Massachusetts did as much to heap this reproach upon Massachusetts men as any of the States of this Union. My memory, I think, is not at fault there, that Massachusetts did this towards Massachusetts men.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will indulge me a moment more, my colleague is now in his seat. My colleague has been invoked by the Senator from Nebraska in a way which I did not think was entirely justifiable, putting an interpretation upon words of my colleague that I did not think was just.

Mr. HOAR. I have just this instant come to my seat. I do not know what has been going on.

Mr. DAWES. I ought to say that my colleague was not in his seat when the statement was made, and that was the reason why I ventured to interrupt the Senator from Nebraska. My colleague can take care of himself here and anywhere else. I interposed only because my colleague was accidentally out of his seat and the Senator from Nebraska was invoking words of my colleague that he had used on another occasion, to heap obloquy upon honorable men in Massachusetts in a way that I did not think if my colleague were here he would justify. If the Senator from Nebraska wants to repeat his statement, my colleague is here and my colleague can speak.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Massachusetts is always very sensitive, and properly so, undoubtedly. There is no occasion for this parade, which the Senator speaks about, on the part of Massachusetts, that I can understand.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator expected that he could villify Massachusetts, or anybody in Massachusetts who has earned an honorable name in the world, and that any Massachusetts man would sit here in silence under that which he calls a parade of his own, he was quite mistaken.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Suppose I should happen by any way to have said that Massachusetts——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sees no objection to the colloquy, but for a Senator on rising to address the Chair would look a little more formal.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, suppose allusion had been made at some time that Massachusetts men were engaged in the slave trade and had ships fitted out and were actually engaged in selling human beings, would anybody suppose that that was a reproach upon Massachusetts which should call Massachusetts to its feet on this floor to talk about a parade?

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator from Nebraska think he is going to escape under a pretense of general remarks when he called Massachusetts by name and men in Massachusetts by name? The Senator's memory fails him worse than I supposed it would.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My memory may have been again at fault, but will the Senator please state what Massachusetts name I mentioned?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator said Massachusetts furnished the men connected with the Union Pacific Railroad. He described Massachusetts men, located in Massachusetts. The men connected with that railroad in Massachusetts stand out in history, and will there stand when men will be searching as with a lighted candle for the graves of the men who now or then vilified them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator from Massachusetts please answer my question before he retires from the Chamber? What Massachusetts name did I mention? The Senator has gone, like the last faint memory of a dream. When the Senator from Massachusetts talks about a parade and about gunpowder he ought to be willing to stay at least until the reverberation of his echo had ceased in the Chamber. He said I had mentioned a Massachusetts man by name, and I asked him whose name I had mentioned. The Senator gives a parting shot and departs from the scene.

I was speaking as I had a right to do, and as I propose to do long enough to call the attention of the Senate and the American people and the world to the fact, because the world is to be laid under contribution in buying the stocks and bonds of this project. I care not how excellent and how grand may be the head of the scheme, I shall call attention to it long enough to emphasize the fact that here is a charter of incorporation as dangerous or more than any which has been heretofore organized by the American Congress. I said I found no answer to the proposition of this measure from the Senator from Missouri, except the grandeur and excellence of the attributes which I acknowledged of Captain Eads, and then I said I found no answer from the Senator from Massachusetts except the same. Then I was continuing the suggestion which I made to that Senator a few evenings ago, that here was the Pacific Railroad, a scheme as grand as this project, and that at the time of its organization the excellence of the men who were connected with it was extolled, as is done here. It was said to be a project to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific; a project to bind this Union together in iron bands so that no rebellion in the future would ever disturb it. All that was said of the Union Pacific.

We started the corporation on its road, and I said when it was finished, or before, it was found that that grand corporation under the lead of men who were willing to invest their private fortunes for the salva tion of the Republic, was what? By an examination made in the other House it was found that there were frauds, frauds that would put to blush the projectors of other schemes in other portions of the world, frauds of such a nature as called for a resolution from the House of Representatives in denunciation of them, and that was not by any means brought about by the excitement of the period to which my friend refers.

Then I further said that Congress in 1873 provided that such things should not happen again in the future, and enacted a law that the corporation should issue no stocks or bonds in the future except for the payment of debts for bonds previously issued, but that law was persistently violated by every crowd that controled the Union Pacific, and they bade you defiance, they bade the laws of the American Congress defiance, they bade your courts defiance, they bade your executive departments defiance, for this monster railroad corporation seized them all by the throat.

Your executive departments knew that the Union Pacific Railroad were violating the statute of 1873. They knew it was being violated when they saw Jay Gould and his crowd actually steal, filch, plunder by corporate power the means which you had given them, and put in their own pockets from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. When they obtained the Kansas Pacific the stock and bonds cost them but a trifle, and by their own schemes they raised the Union Pacific stock until it was 120 in the market, and you knew it. Every legislator knew it; every branch of the executive department knew it. Then they proposed what? They proposed to consolidate the bankrupt Kansas Pacific with the Union Pacific, which had some life then with its stocks up to 120, and your Congress, your executive department, the whole Government sat still and saw them perpetrate that fraud. It was a fraud in the perpetration of which they violated every trust.

That was done by men who if their names appeared in a charter here to-day you would say were respectable men. Certainly they were honorable men in their way; they were men of responsibility certainly; and yet what was done? My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said that that is burnt powder. From those transactions Massachusetts is suffering to-day. Although the road has been robbed, the road has been bankrupted, the Government has a claim of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 against it, yet we have been asked here by Massachusetts men—and if the powder was burnt once the roar of it still echoes in Massachusetts and in the pockets of Massachusetts widows and orphans—we have been asked to do what? That the Government shall deal tenderly with this great corporation; that the Government debt is in peril; that we must let it rest for a time. We are told to remember that Massachusetts has innocent widows and orphans who have invested in the stock of the road, and we desire to protect it. That has been said within the last year on the floor of the Senate; and said, too, by a Senator from Massachusetts.

It is idle, then, for a Senator from Massachusetts now to talk about this being like burnt powder and a parade. You have the experience in Massachusetts yet. To-day you state that the present president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company honestly and innocently told the investors in Massachusetts that it was safe to invest in the road, and therefore Massachusetts widows and orphans invested, and they were innocent bona fide investors, and we have been appealed to to do no act that will have a tendency to affect their securities or cause them any loss. There is the end of your great corporation.

Now, have we not had warning enough with other corporations of the world? Do we propose to repeat this sort of thing, so that in years to come men may rise on this floor, as in the other House, and proclaim the great wrong and injustice done to them because we did not protect them from the corporations which we created?

I merely allude to this matter to show the necessity of doing something in that direction on the pending bill, and I referred to those as familiar illustrations.

One provision of my amendment is that there shall be no certificate of stock issued until the capital stock is fully paid. Who will antagonize that proposition? Will you tell me there is to be no limit in the bill except $100,000,000? There is nothing said as to what amount shall be in stock, or how much shall be in bonds. That is the point where fraudulent transactions have occurred in the past, and we know it.

At the risk of my friend parading or burning powder over again, I will say to him what he knows, that we have to-day saddled upon this country nearly $4,000,000,000, a sum greater than the national debt, for which there is no more consideration than the paper and the ink and the pen with which stock certificates or bonds were signed.

What right has a corporation to pay up 10 per cent. on its stock and then issue a certificate for full-paid stock? Will any gentleman in this Chamber tell me by what right the corporators can pay 10 per cent. out of their pocket and then put back 100 cents, as they propose to do in this and other corporations. If they do not propose to do it, why is the proposition now made by the committee that there shall be $5,000,000 of stocks and bonds subscribed out of $100,000,000, and 10 per cent. of that paid in, requiring only $500,000 in cash? That is all that is to be paid by the stockholders to set afloat this magnificent corporation, and what then?

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has proposed by an amendment that the Secretary of the Interior shall certify that these are reponsible parties. It would be imposing a great labor upon the Secretary of the Interior to require him to certify to the responsibility of parties who are strangers to him and who live throughout the whole length and breadth of this Republic, from New York to New Orleans. Yet the Secretary of the Interior is to be charged with the very delicate and difficult and laborious duty of certifying to the responsibility of these gentlemen.

After 10 per cent., or $500,000, has been paid in, what is to be done then? The incorporators are then to call the stockholders together and the stockholders are to regulate the whole matter by by-laws. You do not want anything better for any other corporation. That is what they have all had. By-laws are to regulate this matter. There is nothing to prohibit the stockholders from dividing up even the $500,000 among themselves when they get together; and if they provide by the by-laws that 5 per cent. shall be required, that settles the matter, and then they can proceed to issue bonds ad libitum up to $100-000,000.

I supposed we had had quite enough of such transactions in the history of this country. Of course, we do not expect to stop them altogether, but as I said before I propose to stay long enough to emphasize the character of this transaction. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] is an advocate of this bill I suppose, with this proposition in it, and he knows, for Louisiana suffered from just such a thing as this incorporating a railroad company, giving it a large grant of land, and the only thing that the company did for ten years was to issue bonds. I refer to the Backbone road, about which so much has been said here. They were not required even to pay any money, but to issue bonds, and that is all the railroad company did for ten or twelve years, and it scattered them broadcast throughout the country. Is there any reason why a corporation should be created and we should put into it the breath of life, giving it the power to issue a certificate for a hundred dollars' worth of stock when they do not pretend to pay more than $10 upon it, thus legalizing that which we have looked upon as a fraud? I trust the American Senate will hesitate some time before it does such a thing as that. Why do gentlemen hesitate? If it is expected that these men will pay dollar for dollar for their stock, then why do Senators hesitate and say they shall only pay 10 per cent. of the amount of $5,000,000, or $500,000 only, and then they are to be without any restraint?

My amendment goes on further and provides that up to $10,000,000 of subscriptions paid up they may issue an equal amount of stock; that they shall not be allowed to issue stock in excess of the amount they pay up until they have paid up $10,000,000, and then they may issue in excess of the amount, because that is supposed to be a guarantee that the project is carried on in good faith. That is all we have to do with this matter. If the project is in good faith, then make the restriction in the act of incorporation itself so as to protect innocent people if the project fails. Then if the motives of the projectors fail, it will not be in their power to entail upon this nation and upon the world all the injurious consequences which have resulted from the organization of corporations without a proper protection in the body of the charter to persons investing in the enterprise.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to support the bill and the pending amendment. I have the highest confidence in Captain Eads and I have entire faith in his successfully doing this great work. I think that is a conclusion which may be reasonably predicated upon the evidences which have been presented to us. Captain Eads has already accomplished works of so great importance and so far beyond the accepted opinions of engineering science that it is a reasonable conclusion that this great work can be successfully accomplished by him. He has also presented for our consideration propositions so well established that the conclusions which they demand may be said to have the certainty of a demonstration.

I should be willing and I would prefer to vote any amount of money that may be reasonably required to test and demonstrate the merits of this proposition, and have the Government of the United States either separately under proper treaty arrangements or by concert with Mexico, at the public cost, in the most economical and proper way, provide for the construction of this railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. I think it is discreditable to the intelligence, the wealth, and the capacity of this great country and of the legislative and executive power of the country that the Government has not long before this time made some adequate provision for the construction of this transit on the most approved plan that modern science would indicate across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The labor that it would employ and compensate, the opening that it would afford for the enterprise and talent of our American people, the cheap transportation it would give to the productions of California and the people of the Pacific Ocean, the country it will open to the occupation of our people, all these considerations require that this great work should be performed by the Government and kept under the control of the Government.

But the question before us is in regard to the propriety of establishing this corporation without proper limitations, without proper restraints. I think the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri scarcely goes as far as is necessary to furnish a reasonable protection to the people of this country. The great trouble of this country which threatens property and accumulation of every kind and promotes a spirit of discontent is the enormous imposition upon the labor of the country fraudulently made by the issue of stocks and securities of corporate bodies which have no honest basis, which are mere frauds, which pretend to represent money that has never been used, but which are nevertheless a power of taxation upon the labor of the country, and which take from the wages of every man, woman, and child in this country a large proportion of their labor for nothing, and legalize it, and permit it, having no sympathy on the part of those who represent the people, plundering them to the extent of hundreds of millions a year, and producing to that extent want and poverty and beggary among the people of the country. This is the great public evil that threatens the rights of property, and even the existence of the Republic in its present form, and which, if not corrected by wise and timely legislation, will correct itself perhaps unwisely, and to the great injury of the country.

Mr. President, this corporation may produce these same results, and I think it may be avoided and leave still a margin large enough for the speculative profits of those who may wish to engage in this enterprise.

I shall offer some amendments to the bill which I think the public interests require.

First, that the Government of the United States shall have the power to alter, amend, or repeal this charter, a power which I believe should be reserved in all charters of incorporation, whether they are important or unimportant.

Second, that there shall be no amount of stock or bonds issued greater than the actual and reasonable cost of the construction of this highway.

Third, that the Government of the United States shall be authorized to acquire the ownership of this property under proper treaty regulations, first obtaining the consent of the Government of Mexico.

I should be glad to see even this act of incorporation passed with these amendments to it. I esteem it a pleasure to be able to contribute something toward the success of Captain Eads or to afford the opportunity to him to test this great enterprise of his. I can not see that there is any occasion for this prolonged debate and discussion as to the respective merits of the Nicaragua scheme and this one. They are both required if they are practicable, and it does not matter a great deal whether the cost is $100,000,000 or $200,000,000; if that can be accomplished and the rates of trade and transportation be adjusted to some scale of interest upon the money actually and properly expended, it will be productive of benefit to every man, woman, and child in the country. But if they are allowed to be merely and purely speculative schemes to tax the productions of the country without limit, and unreasonably and without competition, it will not be a public benefit, but it will be an injury to the people of the country.

In my judgment, if this great work is to be accomplished by private enterprise it is important for its success that these limitations should be imposed upon it. The people who, after all that may be said about capitalists, have to furnish the money and the labor to accomplish it will have greater confidence in it if it shall be required to be conducted honestly, and with no greater burden of debt than is necessary for its construction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] to the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have both amendments read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute is very lengthy. It was read at length when it was offered. It is a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. PLATT. Has it been printed at all?

Mr. MORGAN. It just came in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has just been offered.

Mr. PLATT. I think it had better be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be read. The clerks suggest whether it is necessary to read the names of the incorporators.

Mr. VEST and others. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought an order was taken yesterday directing the printing of all the pending amendments.

Mr. VEST. This amendment was not offered until this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments were printed as directed. The Senator from Missouri has to-day offered a substitute for the substitute heretofore offered by him for the original bill, which he had a right to do, and which takes the place of the substitute formerly offered by him.

Mr. PLATT. Is it a substitute for the entire bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. PLATT. I think it had better be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be read. The Secretary will omit reading the names of the incorporators, which constitute a considerable portion of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the substitute, as directed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 2 of the substitute it is proposed to add:

That no certificates for stock shall be issued till the same shall be fully paid for in money, at the par value of said stock, and the money deposited in the treasury of said company; and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid. No bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received shall be authorized or issued until such paid capital shall amount to the sum of $10,000,000; and no bonds shall be issued or disposed of at less than par value.

Mr. HOAR. I stated to the Senator from Missouri the other day, and I also stated to some of the gentlemen who are interested in this bill, that I thought it was liable to some criticism in not sufficiently protecting the public against possible stock manipulating. I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska hear what I say. I do not think, from what I know of these corporators or from what I know of the persons who are likely to be associated with them in this scheme, that there is any practical danger from them in that direction; but it is important that the legislative precedents should be preserved. I had myself suggested some provisions which I thought ought to be added to the bill before it should become a law.

I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is too harsh, and I am led to that opinion by my experience of the corporation law of Massachusetts. I suppose that is the strictest corporation law in this country. The State of Massachusetts has imposed upon all corporations very stringent securities against bogus stock or bogus bonds, and against transactions of the kind which have occurred in this country on a pretty large scale. But it is not reasonable to require that no certificates for stock shall be issued until the whole is paid in in money at par. I think the honorable Senator from Nebraska will see that himself. In the origin of such an enterprise there must be negotiations to see whether the thing will go through before the stock is taken up. Before men are willing to pay $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 capital to the stock of a corporation they must know whether the corporation will be able to effect necessary loans. They must at least enter upon negotiations, and in many respects there will be causes of delay; and they may have to see whether the Mexican Government would extend the concession for a further period of time.

It seems to me, therefore, that it will be safe to follow what has been found perfectly safe in the experience of Massachusetts, by providing that no certificate of stock shall be issued until at least 10 per cent. thereof shall be fully paid for in money at par, and the money on deposit in the treasury of the company. That will enable the company to do all things in the nature of preliminaries.

Then further I suggest that we provide that said stock shall not be assignable, so that it will only vest in the original corporators, until the whole of the same shall have been so paid in. I wish to propose that amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, and then leave it as it stands, "and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid."

I propose, then, to limit the amount of bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received to $5,000,000 instead of $10,000,000, as is fixed in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. Five million dollars is a vast sum of money. This is an enterprise which is not to be conducted, as has been already said with great force, in this country. It is an attempt to build something in Mexico, and the money has to be raised from the great bankers and capitalists of this and foreign countries in great masses, masses of $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 at a time. It is not a case where the widow or the trustee invests a small saving, as in the case of our domestic corporations, which sell their bonds in little amounts of $50 or $100 apiece. Practically everybody who loans a dollar to this Mexican concern will have the ablest counsel who will look clear through to the bottom, read the act of incorporation and the by-laws and all the proceedings, as men do who are securing the safety of great transactions involving millions. It seems to me if we require $5,000,000 instead of $10,000,000, that is as much as is reasonable; and certainly the payment of $5,000,000 in cash into the treasury of this company will be a pretty good security that it is a bona fide transaction.

In the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Congress provided that the capital stock of that road should be an amount not exceeding, I think, $50,000,000; I do not know but that it was $100,000,000 in the beginning; at any rate it was some large sum; but it provided no minimum whatever. It was drawn just as this bill was drawn, as I called the attention of the Senator from Missouri the other day. There was no security against having a corporation without a capital stock of more than $500 and raising by debt $27,500,000 from the people of the United States in bonds.

The Union Pacific act contained a provision that the capital stock should be paid in in full in cash, but in point of fact that provision was evaded by the notorious credit mobilier scheme, under which the whole capital of that corporation was paid in in road building at about 40 cents on the dollar, and that was all; and the subscriptions which were made were made by clerks and such persons. One gentleman who was having a salary of about $500 a year subscribed, I think, for several million dollars of stock. He merely drew his check, and it was immediately paid back to him as the payment for the construction of part of the road which the principal whom he represented had paid. This provision, I suggest, is a perfect security against that.

I think also that this corporation having first got stock equal to the amount of whatever bonds are issued in its treasury up to $5,000,000, it is not reasonable to say that the bonds shall not be issued at less than par. In the case of a stringency in the money market which may come within the several years it will take to complete the road, you have either got to put the bonds at a great rate of interest, which is a constant inconvenience and hardship—at 6, 8, 10, or 12 per cent., when the usual rate of interest is 4 or 5 per cent.—or you have got to allow for the present stringency of the money market by selling the bonds at less than par. If you have a regulation such as the Senator from Nebraska provides, with my proposed amendment, that these men shall issue no bonds beyond the amount of their stock until they have manifested their credit and confidence in the scheme by paying in the vast sum of $5,000,000, which under no circumstances is to be taken out of the treasury to be paid to any of them again, it seems to me that is a reasonable security.

We do not want to hamper this gentleman who is putting at stake, as has been so well said, his whole private fortune, and putting at stake the fame which he has gained by his vast engineering successes, by imposing unreasonable or improper conditions. I therefore move to amend—and I hope the Senator from Nebraska will see that this amendment leaves the whole strength and vigor of his amendment untouched—by inserting after the word "till" the words "at least 10 per cent.;" so as to read:

That no certificate for stock shall be issued till at least 10 per cent. of the same shall be fully paid for in money, at the par value of said stock, and the money deposited in the treasury of said company.

Then after the words "said company" I move to insert:

And said stock shall not be assignable until the whole of the same shall have been paid in.

That will prevent any subscription of bogus stock which has not been actually paid for in cash. Then I leave the rest of the amendment until you get down to the word "ten" before "million," where I propose to substitute "five."

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am not disposed to antagonize the suggestions of the Senator from Massachusetts, because I think he feels about this matter as I do, but in order that the sense of the Senate may be taken upon it I wish he would let his amendment be formally acted upon.

Mr. HOAR. I move the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Nebraska to accept the amendments of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; I prefer that he should offer his amendments to my proposition. I do not wish to say anything in opposition to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

Mr. HOAR. It is to perfect the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1 of Mr. VAN WYCK's amendment, after the word "till," insert the words "at least 10 per cent. of;" in line 4, after the word "company," insert the words "and said stock shall not be assignable until the whole of the same shall have been so paid in;" and in line 8, before the word "million," strike out the word "ten" and insert "five;" so as to read:

That no certificates for stock shall be issued till at least 10 per cent. of the same shall be fully paid for in money, at the par value of said stock, and the money deposited in the treasury of said company; and said stock shall not be assignable until the whole of the same shall have been so paid in; and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid. No bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received shall be authorized or issued until such paid capital shall amount to the sum of $5,000,000; and no bonds shall be issued or disposed of at less than par value.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VEST. I have no sort of objection to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, if that will put the bill on its passage. All I want is to get the bill through in some shape or other. Therefore, I am very willing to accept the amendment as prepared by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as amended.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from Nebraska offered his amendment as an additional section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is offered as an addition to section 2.

Mr. VEST. I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts took the place of that offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOAR. No, my amendment amended the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. Now the Senator from Nebraska moves that, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. HOAR. I wish to be indulged in one observation, which will take but a moment. I had an errand at the other end of the Capitol in regard to a matter of public business, and was absent from my seat during the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska. I returned just as he and my colleague were concluding a colloquy. What had been said before my coming back to the Senate I do not know, but I inferred from an observation of my colleague, and from the answer to it of the Senator from Nebraska that some attack, or criticism, or condemnation of a very eminent citizen of Massachusetts, now gone to his grave, had been made by the Senator from Nebraska; and that a report which it was my duty to make in the House of Representatives in regard to the transaction known as the credit mobilier had been cited by him in support of his attack.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire at this point to say, so that it may go into the Senator's remarks where it belongs, that the RECORD I think will show that while I spoke of the credit mobilier and denounced it, I made no allusion to any individual to whom that remark can apply. I say that, because the Senator from Massachusetts was not present when my remarks were made. The Senator's colleague did say that, and then I desired to know from him what name I had mentioned, and he failed to answer. I desire to say that it was not my intention, and I do not think the RECORD will show that I did it, to make any allusion by name to any one. I spoke of the system, and said what had been done.

Mr. HOAR. The judgment which I expressed in that report must stand. I have had no occasion, on reflection, to change it, and the transaction there narrated must stand as a warning to all future legislators to be careful that they never again expose the American people to the danger then incurred.

Having said that, I wish to say of the gentlemen who were responsible in whole or in part, especially of one of them, that if he did anything which can not be vindicated in the cold judgment of posterity it was the case of a plain, simple man, unaccustomed to the refinements of business, not seeing transactions in their large legal relations, intent upon a great national and patriotic enterprise, looking at nothing else, blinded to the proper relation of everything except as it affected the attainment of that great object, an object not personal nor selfish, but purely patriotic, and that in spite of what his friends, his State and the Republic had to regret in his relation to that particular transaction, he went to an honored grave with the respect, the affection and the confidence of all men who knew him, of all parties, classes, conditions in life, and that the judgment of posterity, I think, will be that the monument which stands on the great dividing summit between the Atlantic and Pacific valleys carved with his name is a deserved honor and a deserved tribute of public gratitude and respect.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I only desire to say that there was nothing directly or indirectly in the suggestion I made except an allusion to the system generally. I referred to no individual connected with it; that was farthest from my thoughts; and I think it probably would not have entered any man's mind in this body listening to those suggestions unless the mind of the senior Senator from Massachusetts, who seemed to get somewhat nervous and fidgity on that occasion, and therefore insisted on putting his own construction on my language, I suppose because it disturbed him.

I esteem just as highly as the Senator does the individuals to whom he refers, for I knew them personally, and I would be the last man, I think the Senator knows, who would undertake to cast a reflection anywhere, particularly after the actors are gone where their actions could not be righted. I pointed, as I had a right to point, to the experience of the American nation, and I had a right to point to it as an example to the American people that we should shun in the future.

Nothing stronger was said by myself than the remarks which the Senator himself made when he showed the manner in which the stock was subscribed to the credit mobilier, and when the men guilty of such frauds actually paid the money back and accepted a check for millions when they knew the giver was not worth as many dollars. Knowing that, I put in this amendment that the stockholders should be deprived of the power to pay back any money that was ever paid in.

I have said this merely in justice to myself and in justice to those for whom I still have a kindly feeling, the great men connected with that great railway.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following amendment——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to the construction of his amendment:

The said stock shall not be assignable until the whole of the same shall be so paid in.

Does that refer to the whole $100,000,000?

Mr. HOAR. No; there is not any whole $100,000,000 of stock. The stock is not to exceed $100,000,000. Originally there was no limit. Now you have said they shall not issue bonds beyond the amount of the stock till up to $5,000,000. The directors of the company fix the amount of stock, whether $5,000,000 or $10,000,000. When stock is subscribed up to the $5,000,000, 10 per cent. of it must be actually paid in. Beyond that it can not be assignable until the whole is paid in.

Mr. VEST. This language is a little nebulous. It says "and said stock shall not be assignable." If it should say "the said stock so subscribed shall not be assignable" I should not object to it.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I will consent to that change.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, am I to understand that all the stock issued beyond the $5,000,000 is outside of the limitation prescribed in the amendment?

Mr. HOAR. I understand that when they have paid $5,000,000 in full in cash, and when they have paid 10 per cent. on any amount of stock that they issue, they can go on so far as to organize the company and do their preliminary work; but they can not issue more bonds than the amount of stock actually paid in until they have actually paid in $5,000,000 in stock. When they have paid $5,000,000 in stock, I understand they may issue $5,000,000 bonds, if they can get anybody to lend them the money.

Mr. GEORGE. What about the stock after the $5,000,000? Can they issue any amount of stock and put it on the market?

Mr. HOAR. "No certificate;" that applies to all stock, whatever amount they fix, whether five millions, or ten millions, or twenty millions—

No certificate for stock shall be issued till at least 10 per cent. of the same shall be fully paid for in money, * * * and said stock shall not be assignable.

So nobody can have it but the first owner until it is all paid up, whether three hundred million, if they see fit, or one hundred million.

Mr. CALL. I offer my amendment to come in as an additional section.

That the capital stock and bonded debt shall not exceed the actual and reasonable cost of the construction of such railway, and the rates charged on freight and transportation shall not be any greater than is necessary to pay a reasonable interest on the amount expended in the construction of said railway and for the necessary repairs and operations and improvements.

Mr. VEST. I hope the Senator will not insist on that. I am willing to take almost any amendment to get rid of this bill; but it is impossible for Congress to interpose at this time and say in the beginning of a novel enterprise, into which the United States does not put a dollar, what the charges that shall be made for transportation shall be. That is a question which Mexico has dealt with in the concession.

Mr. HOAR. It also enters into the question of the actual and legal validity of the bonds issued. Suppose a bona fide holder in Europe takes $10,000,000 of these bonds, and in order to make them good for anything he has to prove that they were within the limit? Nobody would take the bonds with that amendment in the bill.

Mr. VEST. Exactly; it leaves the whole question in such a condition that nobody who ought not to be put into a lunatic asylum eo instanti would put one dollar in this enterprise. How is it to be proved in New York or in any money market that no more bonds have been issued than the actual construction of the railway required? How can you fix now what is a reasonable rate of transportation when here is a concession from Mexico which fixes the maximum of charges to be made upon this road?

I beg the Senator from Florida not to press this amendment. Give Captain Eads at least a living chance in this matter—a man who has taken the chances he has. If capitalists are willing, after examining this matter, to put their money into it, let them do it without being obstructed by suggestions made here hurriedly to-day.

Mr. CALL. I do not think there is any soundness in the objections which have been made to the amendment.

In the first place, this is a very unnatural act of incorporation. We are legislating here, creating a corporate body to control and regulate property under the jurisdiction of another government. Of course that is anomalous. Our legislation is entirely void, extra-territorial. We know it can have no operation. We are making a corporation like the East India Company, but unlike it in one respect. It is like it in this respect, that it is to act in foreign jurisdictions and over property in another and different country. We are here now endeavoring to provide such regulations as will enable this power to be exercised without detriment to the people of this country.

Now what is the way to do that? This is a railway that is proposed to transport ships bearing productions for the consumption of this country. This is a railway that is proposed to be built with the money of the people of the United States. It will affect every person in it. But when we legislate here we do it upon the assumption that we are to have some control over this property, located, as it is, in a foreign country. What is the object of this incorporation here but to give assurance to the world that this great country has some superintending power, some interest in it? There is no other object. This corporation had better be in Mexico unless we are to regulate it and make some provision not only for the protection of those who control and direct it, but also for the people who invest their money in its stock and bonds, and for the people who will consume the products which it will bring to market, and who will ultimately pay both its cost of construction and all other charges which it may impose, and whose money will be lost should it prove a failure.

Mr. President, in whatever form the power to affect this railway and its franchises exists, when we create a corporate body for that purpose it is our duty to impose the proper limitations upon it. Will any one say that a corporation shall be permitted to increase its bonded indebtedness and its capital stock beyond the money actually used in the construction of the work, two, three, four, or five times; to plunder the people of the country by the exercise of a power of taxation based upon nothing, for money never used? Why, sir, this country rests now under an annual indebtedness of $400,000,000, which is taking from every poor man in this country the proceeds of his labor, owing to improvident legislation; and here is another scheme to bring about the same results, and one which I think will be an injury to Captain Eads and to this great work. Every corporation should be limited in the amount of debt which it can create, and all its franchises should be held subject to the will of the people. If this project should be successful, as I think it will be, we shall have given an unlimited power of taxation, of oppressing and burdening the people and the commerce of the world. Far better would it be to pay $100,000,000 out of the Treasury.

As to the objection that has been made, "how will a man know whether bonds have been issued in excess of the actual and reasonable cost," it is the business of the corporation, it is the business of legislation here to see that that information is furnished to the public; and if you can not create corporations without giving them the power to tax the people for money not used and not expended, you had better not create them at all. What use will this railway be if it is to tax at enormous rates the through freight and transportation of the productions of this country? What value will it be if this stock and these bonds are to be issued for twice the cost of construction and sold in this country to widows and orphans, as the phrase is so often used, as investors, or to honest poor people who may be induced to put their small savings in by the expectations of important results from it? I do not see any force in the objection that it is not the duty of the legislator to provide in creating a corporation that these results will not come upon the people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. What has become of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] which was amended by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts was adopted, and by common consent was afterwards modified by inserting a word.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to strike out "Secretary of the Interior" where it occurs, I think in line 6 of section 3, and insert "president of the company."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be made. Will the Senator from Alabama call the attention of the Secretary to the precise point where the amendment is to be made? It will be read so that there may be nó mistake about it.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "Secretary of the Interior" and insert "president of the company;" so as to read:

When the president of the company shall certify that not less than $5,000,000 has been subscribed to said stock by responsible persons, &c.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri whether, as the bill now stands after that amendment, any act is required to be performed by any officer of the Government of the United States in reference to this company?

Mr. VEST. None at all; no act by any official of the United States.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment to insert additional sections, which I send to the desk to be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as new sections the following:

SEC. —. That the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act of incorporation is hereby reserved to the United States.

SEC. —. That the Government of the United States shall have the right at any time to acquire the ownership and control of the property of this corporation, at such price as shall be ascertained by a fair appraisement of its value by appraisers, one of whom shall be appointed by the United States and the other by the said corporation, and a third who shall be selected by the two appointed persons: Provided, That the Government of Mexico shall first consent by treaty with the United States of America to the purchase of the property of said corporation in Mexico.

Mr. PLATT. Is that amendment divisible?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. PLATT. Then I wish the question might be first taken on the first section of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As a division of the question has been called for, the question then will be first on the adoption of the first section of the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The Chief Clerk read the first section of the amendment, as follows:

SEC. —. That the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act of incorporation is hereby reserved to the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that is in the bill now.

Mr. VEST. It is in the bill, but with the condition that it shall not interfere with the equitable rights of the company.

Mr. PLATT. Do I understand that it is or is not in the bill now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the provision in the substitute on that subject.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That Congress shall at all times have the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act when in its judgment the public good may require, but not in violation of the rights of the company considered in equity.

Mr. VEST. The latter clause of the amendment might be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida modify his amendment?

Mr. CALL. I modify it and strike out that clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3 of section 10, after the word "require," it is proposed to strike out "but not in violation of the rights of the company considered in equity;" so as to read:

That Congress shall at all times have the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act when in its judgment the public good may require.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the remaining amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. —. That the Government of the United States shall have the right at any time to acquire the ownership and control of the property of this corporation, at such price as shall be ascertained by a fair appraisement of its value by appraisers, one of whom shall be appointed by the United States and the other by the said corporation, and a third, who shall be selected by the two appointed persons: Provided, That the Republic of Mexico shall first consent by treaty with the United States of America to the purchase of the property of said corporation in Mexico.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from Missouri was asked in what grant of power on the face of the Constitution he found the authority to pass this bill; and he referred to the commerce clause of the Constitution, which grants to Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the States, and with the Indian tribes. I have not been able to satisfy myself that the power exists there. I do not concede that point.

It occurs to me that we are creating a corporation to transact business in a foreign country having no connection whatever with the business of transportation in the United States. It is absolutely extra-territorial. The country over which the proposed railroad, if built, will pass is not under the control or jurisdiction of the United States Government in any form whatever.

Now, suppose you create this corporation and a controversy should arise between it and persons within the country where it is proposed to run its road. The courts there would have jurisdiction of the cause of action and no other court as far as I know. Now, suppose this corporation were to bring suit, in my judgment a plea in abatement that this corporation is not a person created by the law of the country where the road runs, but by a foreign country, that this corporation is not recognized by the laws of that country, and that really it has no existence in point of law there would be held good.

So I am not able to see on what authority of the Constitution under any clause whatever we have this power.

Various cases have been enumerated by Mr. Justice Story in his commentaries on the Constitution, where power has been held to exist by implication. In every one of those cases the Supreme Court has gone to the clause giving the authority from which the incident follows. I know of but one single instance in the entire range of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States where that is not done, and that is in the last decision affirming the constitutionality of the greenback law, where it is conceded that there is no one power of the Constitution where this authority can be located, but out of various streams of power flowing into one common general stream there can be found enough to locate the power. That always appeared to me to be one of the wildest and most inconclusive decisions; and no wonder that it has been received as it has been.

It occurs to me that we ought to look well to what we are doing. The Senator from Massachusetts puts an amendment on requiring that $500,000 of stock shall be taken bona fide, and I believe the Secretary of the Interior is to determine upon that. Now, I remember very well that we have gotten ourselves into difficulty time and again by a sort of quasi-recognition of the existence of corporations by Congress. For instance, in the case of the New Orleans exposition we appointed commissioners, and they invited foreign governments to be represented, and it was thought foreign countries would have a right to suppose that the Government of the United States recognized that and indorsed it, and in point of fact we lost about a million and a half dollars by it.

I have just learned that the clause about the Secretary of the Interior has been stricken out. Certainly I know of no clause in the Constitution where this power can be properly lodged. Congress has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, the widest stretch of power we possess. Can Congress under that clause of the Constitution build a railroad entirely beyond the limits of the United States, and having built that railroad claim that that aids in the regulation of commerce when Congress has no power on earth over that railroad when built? The answer seems to me to be conclusive.

Whilst I have the greatest desire to aid in this great measure—for I regard it as such—I do not see how we can pass this bill. I admit that the United States Government has the right to purchase the right of way and get the jurisdiction over that right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. I have no doubt about that. The case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, in 1st Peters, settled the question conclusively that Congress has the right to acquire territory by the war-making power or the treaty-making power, and we have to-day the Territory of Alaska entirely disconnected with any territory belonging to the United States. If under the provision for the common defense we found it to our interest to purchase the right of way and to acquire jurisdiction of the right of way in that territory, then we could make an appropriation and build that railroad to be under the control and jurisdiction of the United States, and any cause of action arising on it would be triable in our own courts; but that is not the proposition here. We incorporate a company which does not do one thing effective within the limits of the United States, but is to build a railroad over which when built we have no control whatever. Therefore I can not see what authority we have for the passage of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the adoption of the substitute of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] as amended.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, as the bill now stands bonds may be issued bearing any rate of interest, 6, 10, or 20 per cent., and may be sold at 90 per cent of the par value or 50 per cent. I think in order to guard against anything of that kind my friend from Missouri will accept an amendment that I propose to come in on page 3, after line 43, of the substitute which he proposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert the following proviso on page 3, after line 43:

Provided, That the rate of interest on all bonds issued shall be fixed at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; and no bonds shall be sold or disposed of without the payment of not less than 90 per cent. of their face value.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that it is exceedingly unreasonable to say to a corporation which is to pursue its business in a foreign country, largely to depend on foreign capital, that there shall be arbitrarily fixed a rate of interest at which they shall issue all their bonds, especially that you shall compel them to do what we have said expressly the United States of America shall not do on its bonds. We have said that the bonds of the United States shall pay not more than 3 per cent. per annum. Why should this company be compelled to fix this arbitrary rate?

Mr. MORRILL. If this money is to be raised, it is to be raised in the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRILL. Unquestionably the expectation is that it will be raised nowhere else. I desire, therefore, that this corporation shall be a real one, a bona fide one, and one that will deceive nobody. It strikes me, therefore, that 6 per cent. interest, with the privilege of selling their bonds at 90 per cent. of the face, is sufficient latitude for the disposal of the bonds.

I have no disposition to hamper this company, and I hope it will be successful; but I do think that we ought to guard our people somewhat from subscriptions to these bonds that may be disposed of in all parts of our country, at any rate at a time when they may not be worth anything. I hope that time never will arrive, but I think it ought to be guarded against by some provision of this kind.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Vermont accept 8 per cent. instead of 6.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes; I have no objection to that. I modify the amendment so as to make the rate 8 per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. VEST. The bill will be defeated by this sort of amendments. The Senator from Vermont says all this money is to be raised in the United States. On the other hand, the larger portion of it in all probability will not be raised in the United States. It is not expected that the bonds will become a public loan and go around this country to Mr. Smith and Mr. Jones. We know that the character of this enterprise will not induce that sort of investment. The money put into this enterprise will come from capitalists who we know will scan with critical acumen every provision of the act, and not a dollar will be put in until it has passed through the hands of the most eminent legal counsel, and then will be put in on the responsibility of men whose whole lives have been devoted to this sort of investments of money. It is not true that this money is to be raised in this country. This is a most extraordinary provision fixing the rate of per cent. upon the bonds of the company for the company itself, and yet this Government does not give it one dollar. We are here spending three weeks in all sorts of constitutional discussions and in the most hypercritical amendments, as if this money was to come out of the Treasury of the United States directly.

Here is an enterprise that was rejected in the first place as utterly impracticable, the idea of elevating a ship for 600 or nearly 750 feet, and passing it 140 miles from ocean to ocean. It was said to be utterly impracticable, the dream of a visionary, of an engineering enthusiast, whilst admitting on all hands that the enterprise itself if successful, would achieve results of the most illimitable importance to this country and the commerce of the world. We are not investing a single dollar; and now a provision is put in that in no contingency, directly or indirectly, shall this Government be responsible for one cent, advertising to the whole world the fact that if they put their money in they put it on their own judgment. We are now a paternal Government and take possession of the judgment of all the people of the United States and say to them, "You are incapable of investing your own money, and we will take care that you are not robbed by these enterprising men."

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know the purpose and the object of acquiring the charter of this company from the Government of the United States when it is known that we can confer no right or power on this company to do the work, but that power and that right must come from a foreign government. Why is it now that an act of incorporation is sought for from the United States instead of from Mexico, where the corporation is to have its life and being? I should like to know that. What reason is there for it? There must be some.

Mr. VEST. For the simple reason which I suppose is patent to everybody that these gentlemen who are engaged in this enterprise are American citizens; that there is not one of them who does not desire, besides his own personal interest, the welfare and glory of our common country. That, it seems to me, is answer enough.

Mr. GEORGE. How would the Senator like if a lot of Mexican gentlemen and capitalists proposed to cut a canal across the peninsula of Florida, that they should get a charter from the Mexican Government instead of from our Government?

Mr. VEST. If they received an incorporation from that government, no intelligent or honest man could object to it. They are Mexican citizens; and where would they go for an incorporation except to their own government? When they sought a field of operations they might find it in the United States or England or Asia, or anywhere else; but the vitality of their legal existence must come from their own government. It is too plain, it seems to me, to be denied.

Mr. GEORGE. Is not the Senator perfectly aware that no corporation created by one government can exercise any function within any other country without the consent of the government in whose jurisdiction they operate?

Mr. VEST. I apprehend that; and any tyro in the law that would deny such a proposition ought to be put out of a lawyer's office. Who holds that we have any extra-territorial authority? We are not giving these people permission by force of any charter that we grant them to do anything in Mexico. When they go to Mexico they become subject to her laws, as every foreigner who comes to the United States becomes subject to our laws.

As I said the other day, the corporations that come here every day for bridge charters do not get their vitality from the United States, but they get it from the States; and when they come here to get leave to put up a bridge structure across a national stream under the jurisdiction of this Government, they get that power from the Congress of the United States, and no Legislature of a State can give it to them. Captain Eads could have gone to a State but for the fact that in the laws of all the States the amount of capital in the first place is circumscribed, and then in nearly all of them, I believe in every one I have examined, the incorporators are required to be citizens of that State. Here is a great national object, affecting the commerce of the whole world in regard to which the United States Government must act as an entirety, not by States, but as the Government of the whole Union under the commerce clause of the Constitution, which gives us the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

For these reasons they come here for this act of incorporation, and for none other.

Mr. SHERMAN (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has acceded to all those reasonable conditions and limitations which are necessary to protect the life of a corporation, to make it a real corporation, to guard its stockholders against an excessive issue of stock and an excessive issue of bonds. This bill now contains all the ordinary limitations that are imposed upon corporations created by the laws of the United States. I am not disposed to cripple these corporators, who are about to undertake a great enterprise like this, by any unreasonable limitations such as the one now proposed.

To provide, in the first place, for the sale of these bonds at 80 per cent. or 90 per cent. of their par value is an impeachment of the credit of the company. It is assumed or presumed that they will raise money upon bonds. These bonds will not all be sold for money. The great body of them in the ordinary course of business would not be sold for money at all. They would be sold in exchange for labor or commodities or in the payment of contractors. For instance, this great corporation when it comes to buy iron in large quantities will pay for it in bonds.

Now, to fix a minimum price upon these bonds, a limited price, would only be to embarrass the company in undertaking this enterprise. The truth is, if we intend to assist by giving corporate authority to an association of Americans and other citizens to build this great work, we ought to give them as wide a margin and as liberal a leeway as possible. They will have a great undertaking to execute. There will be times of deep depression in the course of such an enterprise; there always are. To say that they shall not use their bonds except at a certain price would be to cripple them and probably break them at a time when they must have the means even at a sacrifice to carry on the enterprise.

I sympathize a good deal therefore with the Senator from Missouri in his struggle over this bill. It seems to me now, since he has himself proposed all these essential conditions that are necessary to protect the people of the United States, limiting the amount of bonds and the amount of stock, and containing provisions which will guard the organization of this corporation by requiring the corporators to meet, and all those essential conditions that the Committee on Foreign Relations thought necessary to put into the Nicaragua Canal bill, he has gone far enough; but to say that these bonds shall be sold at par, or that the stock shall be subscribed and paid for at par before any work is done, or before any bonds can be issued, or to provide for the sale of bonds at not less than 80 or 90 per cent., will only hamper the enterprise. Suppose a time should come in the progress of the work when there may be a panic or a financial crisis; the company may have in its treasury these bonds, and it may not be able to pay its debts because it can not sell its bonds upon the terms imposed by this act of incorporation. There was a time when the State of Ohio was so crippled in her financial condition that she sold her bonds at 50 cents on the dollar in order to maintain the public credit of the State.

It has always been one of the proudest boasts of the people of that State that, although at one time when they were in debt and involved in their system of public improvements and their credit ran down, they actually did sell their bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest, at 50 cents on the dollar. Our Government sold its bonds in the midst of the civil war at 40 cents on the dollar in gold. Suppose there had been some rule established then by Congress that the Government should not make this sacrifice in order to carry on our war, what would have been the result of such a proposition as that? If this company is to be organized, give it all the powers of a corporation, the power to use their stock, and all their bonds, and all their credit, and all their means in order to maintain the enterprise and carry it to successful execution.

I therefore would not limit in any respect the price at which they should sell their securities. As a matter of course the owners of the stock have the deepest interest in obtaining the highest price for their securities, because their fortunes are involved in getting as much as possible for these bonds. The provision requiring that they must be sold at 80 cents on the dollar would probably induce bankers to demand at once at the commencement the bonds at 80 cents on the dollar. It might prevent the corporation we have chartered for a great purpose from getting more than 80 cents on the dollar for their bonds.

It seems to me that is not the way to deal with this corporation. If we are to grant the stockholders corporate powers to aid them in this enterprise in a foreign country, we ought to give them full and absolute power of disposition to the extent of the stock and bonds which we think sufficient to build the railway, and make no stipulation that may hereafter embarrass, curtail, bankrupt, or destroy them, with ample means in their hands to carry on their enterprise.

It appears to be the general sense of the Senate that we should create this corporation without any liability on the part of the Government. Having protected our own citizens and required the regular orderly mode of creating a corporation so that every man knows precisely how much stock he gets, then I would leave it to deal with the people at large and get money where they can, not only in this country but in foreign countries. The probability is that these securities will travel all over the world, just as the securities of all great corporations are sold all over the world.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question, as he is a man of experience. I ask whether the requiring in the present condition of the money market the corporation to put 8 per cent. as the rate of interest would not materially injure its credit?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly it would. A corporation that was expected in the outset to raise money at 8 per cent. would be considered a bankrupt corporation, because now no one would begin a great enterprise on the basis of a higher rate of interest than 4 or 5 per cent. Nearly all the great corporations of our country are now borrowing money at 4 per cent., and nearly all the bonds bearing more than 4 per cent. issued by any great corporation of this country are now sold above par. Take the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the other competing railroad companies, none of which have undertaken a work of greater magnitude than this. Suppose they in the beginning of their operations had been cabined and abridged in the use of their credit in times of necessity, they could not have executed the magnificent lines of railroads that now carry our vast internal commerce.

I am therefore willing to let these corporations have this act of incorporation; and I say Godspeed to Captain Eads, and everybody else who may aid in this enterprise. Do not, after granting them this naked power, which is a convenience to them, a means by which they can organize their company and sell their bonds in foreign markets, cripple them by paper restrictions which will limit their credit, impair their strength, and perhaps at a critical moment bankrupt the corporation and defeat the great and beneficent object they seek to accomplish.

It is sometimes asked, why not compel them to take a Mexican charter? The Senator from Mississippi makes the inquiry, why should the United States step in and help this enterprise? Does he not know that all the great corporations in Europe, every one of them, including the Bank of England, has power to deal in all the countries of the world? And it is necessary for a corporation like this undertaking a great enterprise in Mexico, not only to deal with Mexico but with all the commercial nations of the world, because these bonds will go everywhere wherever money is cheapest and most abundant. When the Senator says they ought to take a Mexican charter he only shows that he does not appreciate the enormous advantage, the enormous power which the Government of the United States exercises in the money markets of the world compared with that of Mexico. Mexico has gone through many serious embarrassments. She has become almost bankrupt at times. The advantages of an American incorporation when such an enterprise as this is to be undertaken are very great.

Take the Nicaragua Canal. Suppose that enterprise depended only on the act of the Government of Nicaragua, a country of but a few hundred thousand inhabitants, a country the value of whose property is not equal to that of any of the States of our Union. Does not any one see that a corporation authorized and organized by that government alone would have insufficient credit in the money markets of the world—no such credit as would justify an undertaking costing the sum of $100,000,000, a sum greater probably than the value of all the property in Nicaragua? Take even Mexico, while it is now in a flourishing condition, more hopeful than ever in all its history, and while it has a more stable government now than ever before, yet the strength and credit of this government compared with ours would not justify a corporation authorized only by a concession from it to undertake so great a work. They have less population, less extent of territory, less wealth, less pretensions to credit and stability. A corporation granted by Mexico would be somewhat weakened by the former financial history of Mexico in many important crises. Therefore business men would not invest their property in a corporation dependent alone on the power and will of Mexico, while on the other hand the United States now is recognized in all the world as a stable Government, a powerful Government, now of 60,000,000 people, perhaps the richest in the world.

Congress grants to its own citizens this corporate authority, and that corporation goes into the markets of the world with an established credit, first because it is authorized by the United States, which will protect the corporation in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it; next, because it is composed of American citizens of known and established wealth and credit. They subscribe money to these bonds and to this stock. That at once gives it a status and a place on the lists of all the commercial countries of the world. It is an American security, not a Mexican security. It therefore has great advantages.

But still, even in this corporation, backed by this corporate authority and by the supposed strength and wealth of our people and of these corporators, there may be times in its history when it will be extremely difficult for it to raise money upon its bonds or its stock. Would you then cripple it from using what it had at such rates as the law of necessity compelled? Certainly not. Therefore, I am perfectly willing to leave to these corporators the management of their own affairs, of their bonds and their stock, protecting them in their organization, limiting them in their powers if you please, but then leave them to dispose of the bonds and stock by their own selected agents in order to accomplish the purpose of the corporation, knowing that they are more deeply interested in success than anybody else.

If they should issue bonds and stock recklessly and without consideration, then they would lose all which is involved in this enterprise—the enterprise would fail. It is only by maintaining the credit of the organization, giving them full power to use all their means to carry this work into successful execution, that they may accomplish it. If they do accomplish it they will accomplish one of the great feats of modern times.

Therefore, for one, I will not vote for even so plausible a proposition as this, because you can not say—my friend from Vermont who is a cautious and careful man, just in all things, can not say—what time will bring forth; he can not say that an exigency may not arise when these men will be compelled to sacrifice their bonds in order to preserve their existence, carry on their work, and pay their debts; and he ought not to cripple them, and we ought not to cripple this corporation by a condition which in time of exigency would bankrupt them because they are not enabled by the terms of this charter to use the means at their command. I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I would by no means cripple this incorporation, and I do not intend to vote for anything that I think will cripple the people of this country.

Evidently this corporation is to be gilded by being incorporated by the Congress of the United States. If we can afford to gild them with our authority, we ought to give them something on which the public confidence may rest with entire security. The idea that Mexico has any capital to invest in this, or that any foreign country, our rivals, will invest in any project of ours of this sort, is about as wild as it would be to undertake to catch larks at noonday.

Mr. President, perhaps I accepted the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi too hastily. I will modify my amendment so that it shall read "not exceeding 8 per cent." in the rate of interest. The Senator from Ohio was mistaken in supposing that it was 80 per cent. of the face value of the bonds that I provided for in the event of a sale of bonds.

Even by the Senator from Ohio it is admitted that there may be times of depression when this company may be under the necessity of disposing of the bonds or stock at less than par value. I do not want to witness what the French people have witnessed—a general distribution of the bonds all over the country at any rate, put at such a vast discount that they will tempt ignorant people to subscribe for them.

I therefore think it is no more than just and proper that we should fix the rate at which they may dispose of the bonds so that it can not be at a greater discount than 10 per cent. discount from the face value. It strikes me that this will strengthen the incorporation. If I thought otherwise I should not introduce the amendment. I believe that it is a just and proper one, and I shall certainly abide by the vote of the Senate on it, and I shall ask a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has presented this subject in a new and rather startling way. He is either more unwary or franker than the advocates of the proposition who have spoken before, for he tells us plainly that as a Mexican corporation, as an enterprise depending upon the power, or the solvency, or the financial soundness of Mexico, it would be good for nothing and that it needs the sustaining and upholding hand of this great, rich people to make it good for anything. I am very glad that the Senator from Ohio with his keen insight into any measure involving large financial transactions and with the care that he invaribly bestows upon the interests of the United States on all subjects, has told us plainly what this means. He says that in order to float the obligations of this corporation, which it has been held heretofore is purely foreign in its liabilities, in its obligations, and in its work, it needs an incorporating act of the United States Congress so that it shall be considered, not a Mexican enterprise, but an American enterprise, and in this view, in which I fully coincide with him as to the results, which I for one thank him for shadowing forth here, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the United States shall in no respect whatever be responsible or liable for any debt or obligation of said company or for any of its transactions.

Mr. VEST. That is in already.

Mr. HALE. It is difficult to know just now, with the many amendments that have been offered, with the change in the text, whether this be in the substitute as proposed. If the Senator from Missouri can show me or can have read from the desk that this proposition in terms is in, that will answer my purpose; but it was not contained in the original proposition, nor in any amendment that I have heard read.

Mr. VEST. Let it be read from the substitute I have offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read when found.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to involve the United States in any pecuniary obligations whatever other than the payment of tolls as hereinbefore provided for.

Mr. HALE. I do not like that phraseology so well as mine, but it is near enough to it, so that it will cover the purpose, and I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say one word only in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I have no doubt that the Senator from Vermont is a man of excellent credit in his town and neighborhood. I am not a possessor of much property, but I think I have some credit in mine. If any Senator in this body, the Senator from Ohio, the occupant of the chair [Mr. DOLPH], the Senator from Vermont, or the Senator from California or anywhere else, should take his bond and go to the banks or careful people in his own city and put on to them, in this stage of the money market, a bond in which he promised to pay at a future time with interest at the rate of 8 per cent., the people would turn their backs on the bond and say "that is a confession that he is bankrupt." The Senator from Vermont never dreamed of putting that into the Nicaragua bill, and it is intended to give this thing a black eye and nothing else.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Massachusetts will understand that the amendment does not fix the rate at 8 per cent.; it may be 4 per cent.

Mr. HOAR. But as you offered it——

Mr. MORRILL. I accepted the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, and have said that it shall be not exceeding 8 per cent.

Mr. HOAR. As the Senator offered the amendment first he had it 6 per cent.—the current rate of interest being a little less than 3 for our bonds, almost down to 2—without any "not less." Then he put it not less than 8. Now he suggests this other change. The Senator will not say that it ever entered into his head to offer that as a proposition for amendment to the Nicaragua Canal bill.

Mr. MORRILL. The Nicaragua bill is not before us.

Mr. HOAR. I know; but if it had been the Senator will not say he ever thought of making such an amendment to that.

Mr. GEORGE. I will not detain the Senate long.

The Senator from Ohio did not understand the object of my asking the question about the necessity or propriety of having a charter from the United States. He admitted, as I expected he would admit, that it was necessary in order to give the company credit with which to raise money upon the mere fact that this corporation was chartered by the United States. If that be so, that being the sole object of it (and there can be no other), then is it not the duty of the Congress of the United States, when it grants the charter for the purpose of enabling this company to raise money, to make such provisions in reference to the raising of money as will be safe to the investors?

I cannot exactly understand the position taken by the Senator from Ohio, and also by the Senator from Massachusetts. On one part of this case, they come before us and say that if the company was to put out its bonds at 8 per cent., if the richest man in the Senate or the richest man in this country was to put out his bonds at 8 per cent., it would be a confession of bankruptcy and nobody would loan him any money. They say that the money ought to be obtained by this corporation at much less than 8 per cent.; and yet at the same time when they make this statement they complain that the maximum of 8 per cent. prescribed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is an undue restriction upon the power of the company to sell its bonds at any rate of interest it may see proper—50 per cent., or 50 per cent. discount. I can not understand how these two positions can stand together. They seem to me to be inconsistent and antagonistic.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to make another suggestion. Of course I know nothing about finance, and I speak with very great diffidence on any subject of that sort. The Senator from Ohio probably knows more about it, I will state candidly and frankly, than anybody in the Senate; we all acknowledge that. But I submit to him and to the Senate that it would not add to the credit of these bonds if the investors who bought them knew by the charter after having bought their bonds at a fair price, that similar bonds to any amount whatever could be put out on the market at any price and at any rate of interest, thereby destroying the value of their security. Is it not a very plain proposition? If a corporation came to you, Mr. President, and said "I have got so many bonds I want to sell at par, at 8 per cent. interest, or 6 per cent. interest," would it not be a consideration in your determining whether you would buy those bonds or not, to know that no other bonds could be issued by that corporation unless they got the same amount of money for the same nominal amount of bonds that you paid for them? It seems to me instead of being a restriction on the credit of the company it is a very great aid to it. It must be upon the faith and confidence that bonds will not be kited in the market at any rate of interest and at any rate of discount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, we are told that this corporation proposes to issue bonds; bonds that are to have their credit in Europe because they are issued here. What are these bonds? What credit are they to have in Europe? They are bonds upon property over which this country has no jurisdiction. They are bonds that European capitalists are supposed to invest in, but it is the money of the poor man that supports these securities, the accumulations of labor that are gathered together in the course of business by capitalists. They will say, "Here is a bond issued by a corporation of the United States, whose courts have no jurisdiction to enforce it in their territory, the property which is responsible being beyond their means of control, which they can not make good in any shape or in any form." This will not constitute a basis for credit. The credit of this corporation must depend on its business management, on the sound business principles on which it is based; and this will chiefly rest on the conditions and limitations which you create here. Investors in Europe or America will be unwilling to trust their money to a corporation which may issue an unlimited amount of bonds.

Why, Mr. President, that is impossible. That can give no security for them. The corporation is of necessity intra-territorial. The Senator from Missouri says a tyro in the law knows that, but yet this corporation is predicated upon the idea that it will have the credit of the courts of the United States and the process of the United States to hold the property of the corporation amenable for the bonds. That is all the bond is. Only a pledge of the property of the corporation, and this will not be subject to our power.

This corporation is intra-territorial. It can have nothing whatever but the money paid by the people of the United States or by people in Europe who may purchase the bonds and stock. That is all the property it can have subject to the power of this Government or the courts here. Therefore it is no more than any other corporation. It has no connection with the Mexican enterprise as a matter of law and can not have any. It is simply an act of incorporation enabling these persons to subscribe for stock, to have succession, to own property within the United States or elsewhere if other countries shall see fit to permit them, but it is here that they have jurisdiction over the property that may be acquired here.

Now what is the proposition? That we shall have no regard for the people of the United States and their interests who shall invest this money, that this corporation may issue $1,000,000,000 of bogus stock and never do anything whatever in the construction of the work, that the amount of indebtedness which they may be permitted to create on the people of this country who may be induced to put their labor in it shall not be secured. In other words, the Senate say "we care not for the people of the country, we care only for the rich, the capitalist, the managers, to protect them," and not the investors—the men who pay their money.

Mr. MAXEY. I would ask the Senator from Florida in connection with his argument to consider this suggestion:

Suppose this company were to give a mortgage, as is very common, upon the road, road-bed, and franchises, where and how does he propose to foreclose that mortgage?

Mr. CALL. This Government can have nothing to do with it; it is in a foreign country. Therefore I say that while I am entirely in favor of giving Captain Eads any and every encouragement, while I am willing to vote, and think the only proper way is to vote money out of the Treasury of the United States to conduct this work under the control and direction of the Government of the United States—while that is my preference and my idea and I am willing to vote for a corporation to enable them to collect money here, to issue bonds and stock and have the power of succession to manage their affairs, I am not willing to turn over the people of the United States to them without any protection. I am not willing to permit the corporation to issue stocks and bonds without limit and sell them without regard to the construction of the work or its cost, and I am surprised that such a proposition should be made after the trouble we have had in this country from this cause, and the serious dangers that now menace us from the power of taxation of the people given to corporations, without limiting and restraining them in their exercise of it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, a single word more. I confess that the prompting of this amendment was the practice of De Lesseps in relation to his canal. I understand that De Lesseps has flooded France with bonds. If this company is organized, a year after it begins to issue bonds the payment of interest will become due and it will have no other means of making payments of the accruing interest on the bonds than that pursued by De Lesseps, which was to issue new bonds at 75 cents on the dollar for the payment of the interest on the previous bonds. I do not desire to see that practice permitted by anything that we shall do here, and therefore I propose the amendment which I have offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], on which he called for the yeas and nays as the Chair understood.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir; I desire the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am generally paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. He is now paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR]. So I vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If the Senator from Maine were present, he would vote "yea" on this amendment, and "nay" against the bill finally.

Mr. MAXEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. COKE (when Mr. VOORHEES'S name was called). The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] on this question is paired with me. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BOWEN. My colleague [Mr. TELLER] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has transferred the pair between the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] and myself to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I therefore vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS—10.

Berry,	George,	Morrill,	Wilson of Iowa.
Call,	Jones of Arkansas,	Platt,
Edmunds,	McMillan,	Van Wyck,

NAYS—42.

Coke,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,	Wilson of Md.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] as amended.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say that while I am entirely glad and willing that anybody who wishes to try that experiment may. As I said on a former occasion, I am not able to see how this bill under this concession can possibly be constitutional, and I therefore ask for the yeas and nays on its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. Not knowing how he would vote I withhold my vote.

Mr. MAXEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]; otherwise I would vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If the Senator from Maine were here he would vote against the bill, and the Senator from South Carolina would vote for it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am informed that my pair has been transferred to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—46.

Allison,	Cullom,	Harrison,	Pugh,

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2929) to amend the act dividing the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and to divide the eastern and western districts thereof into divisions, establish district and circuit courts of the United States therein, and provide for the times and places for holding such courts, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 10) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 199) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SCOTT, Mr. LANHAM, and Mr. FELTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1494) granting an increase of pension to Stephen D. Smith;

A bill (S. 2982) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to permit the temporary occupation of streets by a railway for the purpose of transporting material to fill about the base of the Washington Monument;

A joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts to the city of Jackson, Mississippi.

NICARAGUA MARITIME CANAL.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Order of Business 1905, being the bill (S. 2636) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

JAMES W. GOODRICH.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to correct a mistake in a bill which has been returned to the two Houses by the President for that purpose. In authorizing the payment to a postmaster of certain moneys which he had been charged with in his accounts, of which his post-office was robbed, there is an error in the name of the town. I ask unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate passing that bill and the vote ordering it to a third reading be reconsidered, and that it may be corrected by striking out the word "Haverhill" and substituting the word "Amesbury."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary advises the Chair that the Senate is not in possession of the enrolled bill.

Mr. HOAR. The bill has been sent to the President, and sent back by him to the House, and sent by the House of Representatives to us. So I suppose we may reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator the action of the House?

Mr. HOAR. I have it in my hand——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has it been sent to the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. The bill was a House bill. It was passed by the Senate without amendment with this mistake in it, as it was originally introduced in the House. Upon the mistake being discovered the Senate passed a concurrent resolution requesting the President to return the bill to the House of Representatives. I consulted the Clerk of the House and the clerks here, and understood that to be the proper course. Thereupon the two Houses requested the President to return the bill to the House of Representatives, which he has done. The House of Representatives then has transmitted the bill to us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the Senator's motion?

Mr. HOAR. My request now is that the Senate give unanimous consent to reconsider the vote passing the bill to be enacted and the vote passing the bill to a third reading, and that it be amended by striking out the word "Haverhill" and inserting the word "Amesbury."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I ask that the message of the House sending the bill here be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the House will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Clerk of the House be directed to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 5652) for the relief of James W. Goodrich, and the message of the President accompanying the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the House acted, it being a House bill, in correcting the error?

Mr. HOAR. We must act first, because we passed the House bill. It is now returned to us by the House as a bill passed by the House; the Senate reconsiders its concurrence with that, and amends it, and sends it back amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is right. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the vote ordering this bill to a third reading and to its passage be reconsidered. If there be no objection, that reconsideration will be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. My request was for unanimous consent that the two votes passing the bill to be enacted and passing it to a third reading be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. HOAR. Now let the bill be read. It is but three or four lines.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOAR. I now move to amend by striking out the word "Haverhill" and inserting "Amesbury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

NORTH CAROLINA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to give way for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw his motion?

Mr. CAMERON. He does for the present.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed this morning, when I happened to be out of the Chamber, House bill 10658, Order of Business 2155.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the title?

Mr. RANSOM. It is the bill (H. R. 10658) to change the lines between the eastern and western judicial districts of North Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am in favor of reconsidering that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to reconsider the vote?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir. I move to reconsider the vote.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question now is on the passage of the bill, I suppose.

Mr. RANSOM. I want to move an amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator had better move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, and then an amendment will be in order.

Mr. RANSOM. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. Now, I move to strike out the word "and," in the third line, before the word "Orange," and after "Orange" to insert "Moore and Person." That adds two more counties to the eastern district.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Line 3, strike out "and," and after the word "Orange" insert the words "Moore and Person;" so as to read:

That the counties of Chatham, Durham, Orange, Moore, and Person, now constituting a part of the western judicial district of North Carolina, shall be, and are hereby, transferred to and made part of the eastern judicial district of North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is really a matter that deserves the serious attention of the Senate. When this bill was in the Committee on the Judiciary the only ground that was suggested for the change of these counties from one district of North Carolina to another was the fact, as stated, and the only fact stated, that the fees of the marshal and the district attorney and the clerk in the western district had gotten up to the maximum allowed by law and beyond it, and that they paid money into the Treasury, and that the state of business in the eastern district was so small that the marshal and the district attorney and the clerk there did not get as much as they would like to get, and this change in the lines of these districts was for the sole purpose, as stated to us, and the only purpose as stated to us, of putting more emoluments into the pockets of one set of officers and taking from the Treasury of the United States and possibly from other officers emoluments that they would otherwise get. I therefore opposed this bill in the Committee on the Judiciary, but it saw fit to recommend it, undoubtedly upon high grounds of public interest, &c., and without regard to the interests of suitors at all, but in order to put more money into the pockets of the officers in the eastern district and take from the Treasury some of that which the western officers now put in.

That was the whole of the case as it was stated to the Committee on the Judiciary, and therefore, as the bill is now open to amendment, and is amended for aught I care, I do not care how many more counties you put in in order to get the fees over and make it just as they like. I want to take the yeas and nays of this body on the question of whether that sort of legislation is what you like.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this amendment the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not on the amendment. The Senate may put all the counties in any district it pleases.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, on the third reading of the bill, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the amendment to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. On that question the yeas and nays were called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not have the pleasure of being before the Judiciary Committee when this bill was considered. I have simply this to say to the Senate, and I would not say it but for a suggestion from a friend, that if anybody will take the map and look at these counties and see where the business of the eastern district is done and where the business of the western district is done, he will be satisfied at once that these counties should be put within the eastern district. All the counties named in the bill are within 50 miles of the capital of the State, the point in the eastern district at which most of the business is administered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have to reply that it is not a long while ago since the question of the adjustment of the lines between these districts was before the Committee on the Judiciary, and according to what was then represented to us by the Senators and Representatives and other people of consequence in the State of North Carolina, this division was the right one, and there has not come to that committee from any judge or marshal or citizen any statement that the convenience of suitors requires that the lines of these districts should be changed. The only suggestion made by anybody was that it happened that the business in the western district of North Carolina was such that there was a surplus to put into the Treasury of the United States in the way of fees, and in the eastern district it was not that way, and therefore money was to be put over into the pockets of people in the eastern side and taken out of the Treasury that was now turned in by the people of the western side. That is the whole case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I do know how he would vote if he were here.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Blackburn,	Conger,	Harris,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Dolph,	Jones of Arkansas,	Spooner,
Brown,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Vance,
Call,	Farwell,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Cameron,	George,	Palmer,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Gibson,	Ransom,	Walthall,
Coke,	Gorman,	Saulsbury,	Whitthorne,
Colquitt,	Hampton,	Sawyer,	Williams.

NAYS—8.

Blair,	Frye,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Edmunds,	Harrison,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—36.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Payne,

Chace,	Hoar,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Teller,
Cheney,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Wilson of Md.

So the amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. VEST submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2929) to amend the act dividing the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and to divide the eastern and western districts thereof into divisions, establish district and circuit courts of the United States therein, and provide for the times and places for holding such courts, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

G. G. VEST,
WM. M. EVARTS,
JAMES F. WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES N. BURNES,
D. B. CULBERSON,
W. H. WADE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No further action by the Senate is required. The bill is passed, the House having receded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2992) to make Tampa, Fla., a port of entry.

Mr. CAMERON rose.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to indulge me, and let this bill be considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must insist on going on with the Nicaragua bill if we are to proceed with any legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to appeal to the Senator from Vermont. This bill is greatly needed and is of pressing public interest to Tampa. There is a line of steamers waiting there now, detained with freight, because of the absence of a port of entry. The bill has been recommended by the Committee on Commerce, and there is no kind of objection to it. I suppose it will pass without any discussion. It is necessary that it should be acted upon without delay, in order that it may go to the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2992) to make Tampa, Fla., a port of entry.

Mr. INGALLS. Does that displace the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the motion is agreed to, and the Senate adjourns pending the consideration of the bill, it would displace the unfinished business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It displaces the Nicaragua bill.

Mr. CALL. It will not take more than a moment to dispose of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 18, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 17, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had adopted resolutions expressive of the regret of that body at the death of the late Senator Pike.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 3286) to increase the naval establishment; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2646) granting to the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company the right to lay its track through the United States lock and dam property in the Great Kanawha Valley, State of West Virginia.

VETO MESSAGE—DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without my approval House bill No. 10203, entitled "An act to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seeds in the drought-stricken counties of Texas, and making an appropriation therefor."

It is represented that a long-continued and extensive drought has existed in certain portions of the State of Texas, resulting in a failure of crops and consequent distress and destitution.

Though there has been some difference in statements concerning the extent of the people's needs in the localities thus affected, there seems to be no doubt that there has existed a condition calling for relief; and I am willing to believe that, notwithstanding the aid already furnished, a donation of seed grain to the farmers located in this region to enable them to put in new crops would serve to avert a continuance or return of an unfortunate blight.

And yet I feel obliged to withhold my approval of the plan as proposed by this bill to indulge a benevolent and charitable sentiment through the appropriation of public funds for that purpose.

I can find no warrant for such an appropriation in the Constitution; and I do not believe that the power and duty of the General Government ought to be extended to the relief of individual suffering which is in no manner properly related to the public service or benefit. A prevalent tendency to disregard the limited mission of this power and duty should, I think, be steadfastly resisted, to the end that the lesson should be constantly enforced that, though the people support the Government, the Government should not support the people.

The friendliness and charity of our countrymen can always be relied upon to relieve their fellow-citizens in misfortune. This has been repeatedly and quite lately demonstrated. Federal aid in such cases encourages the expectation of paternal care on the part of the Government and weakens the sturdiness of our national character, while it prevents the indulgence among our people of that kindly sentiment and conduct which strengthens the bonds of a common brotherhood.

It is within my personal knowledge that individual aid has to some extent already been extended to the sufferers mentioned in this bill. The failure of the proposed appropriation of $10,000 additional to meet their remaining wants will not necessarily result in continued distress if the emergency is fully made known to the people of the country.

It is here suggested that the Commissioner of Agriculture is annually directed to expend a large sum of money for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of seeds and other things of this description, two-thirds of which are, upon the request of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, supplied to them for distribution among their constituents. The appropriation of the current year for this purpose is $100,000, and it will probably be no less in the appropriation for the ensuing year. I understand that a large quantity of grain is furnished for such distribution, and it is supposed that this free apportionment among their neighbors is a privilege which may be waived by our Senators and Representatives. If sufficient of them should request the Commissioner of Agriculture to send their shares of the grain thus allowed them to the suffering farmers of Texas they might be enabled to sow their crops, the constituents for whom in theory this grain is intended could well bear the temporary deprivation, and the donors would experience the satisfaction attending deeds of charity.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 16, 1887.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the bill and accompanying message be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. But before that motion is put I desire to say one word.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer is not debatable.

Mr. LANHAM. I am aware of that, but I crave the indulgence of the House for just a moment.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I introduced this bill I am unwilling to let this occasion pass without saying a word in vindication of the action of Congress in passing the measure. In the first place, it follows the precedents which have been heretofore established in 1875 and 1883, when bills of a similar character and almost in the same language were passed by Congress and became laws.

If the organization of the Bureau of Agriculture be constitutional; if agricultural seeds have been and are now being distributed through the same for the declared object of promoting agriculture, and such distribution has warrant in the Constitution; if the agricultural interests of this country are continental in their extent and character, and the vast majority of the people be dependent upon and sustained thereby; if the farm be the storehouse and granary from which the world is filled, and if the burdens of government fall more heavily upon the agricultural classes than all others, then I respectfully submit that the wants and necessities of agriculture ought to be considered as equal in rank and dignity to "the public service or benefit."

The encouragement of agriculture in a large part of the country—more than thirty counties—where by the act of God and through no fault of a people industrious and energetic the rain has been withheld and consequent want and suffering obtain, it does not seem to me would operate an irreparable lesion of the Constitution if that which the Government is accustomed to do generally were in a measure specially concentrated in the particular locality where the necessity is the greatest. This was not designed as an independent and disconnected appropriation of the public money, but, on the contrary, was considered incident as a part and parcel of legislative authority which meets annual recognition and approval. I place the proposition not upon the idea of a charitable donation but the advancement and conservation of agriculture, in keeping with existing usage and authorized practice of the Government. I now move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] moves that the bill and accompanying message be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let us dispose of it now.

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to move that we now vote on the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the House does not refer the bill it is before the House for disposal at this time. The question is on referring the bill and message to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HATCH. I think we should dispose of this matter now.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. LANHAM. I call for a division.

Mr. BURROWS. Is it not the practice to refer a veto message?

The SPEAKER. There is no settled practice as to that.

Mr. BURROWS. It has been the practice recently.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 74.

So (further count not being called for) the House refused to refer the bill and message.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill? Upon this question the Constitution requires the yeas and nays to be taken.

Mr. HATCH. I simply desire to state in reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], for the information of the House, that when this bill was reported it was not reported with the unanimous consent or approbation or indorsement of the Committee on Agriculture. It was reported by a majority vote of that committee.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I rise to a question of order. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is. The previous question has not been ordered.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I call for the previous question.

Mr. HATCH. I have the floor. As the House will remember, the bill was taken up by unanimous consent and passed the House, and I believe passed the Senate without a division. I simply desire to make this statement in justice to the committee that reported the bill. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. CLARDY. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. HATCH] whether he was with the minority or the majority in the committee?

Mr. HATCH. I was with the minority, and declined to vote for the bill.

Mr. CLARDY. But you made no objection to its coming before the House.

Mr. HATCH. No; I made no objection to its consideration by the House.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and there were—yeas 83, nays 159, not voting 76, as follows:

YEAS—83.

POLYGAMY.

Mr. HAMMOND. I now call the report of the committee of conference on Senate bill No. 10, the bill known as "the Mormon bill."

Mr. BELMONT. I raise the question of consideration against that bill, my purpose being to call up the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill after the morning hour.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], as a matter of privilege, calls for consideration the conference report on Senate bill No. 10, commonly known as "the Mormon bill." This is a matter privileged under the rules over all other business, being so highly privileged that such a report may be made even during the pendency of a motion to adjourn. Against this the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] raises the question of consideration. The question is, Will the House now consider the conference report called up by the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope that committees which have not heretofore been called will be accorded the morning hour.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The committees will be called after this privileged question is disposed of, unless prevented by the introduction of some other privileged question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the Chair cause the Clerk to read the title of the bill to which the conference report relates?

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 10) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of the conference report?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 103, noes 68.

Mr. HILL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 12 voting in favor thereof.

So the House decided to consider the conference report.

The report and accompanying statement were read, as follows:

The committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 10, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes,' approved March 22, 1882," respectfully report:

That, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses that the bill be amended as follows:

In place of the part of the bill proposed by the House of Representatives to be stricken out, and in place of the words proposed by the House of Representatives to be inserted, the following words be substituted, and that so amended the bill pass:

SECTION 1. That in any proceeding or examination before a grand jury, a judge, justice, or a United States commissioner, or a court, in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, the lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called, but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be; and such witness shall not be permitted to testify as to any statement or communication made by either husband or wife to each other, during the existence of the marriage relation, deemed confidential at common law.

SEC. 2. That in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, whether before a United States commissioner, justice, judge, a grand jury, or any court, an attachment for any witness may be issued by the court, judge, or commissioner, without a previous subpœna, compelling the immediate attendance of such witness, when it shall appear by oath or affirmation, to the commissioner, justice, judge, or court, as the case may be, that there is reasonable ground to believe that such witness will unlawfully fail to obey a subpœna issued and served in the usual course in such cases; and in such case the usual witness fee shall be paid to such witness so attached: Provided, That the person so attached may at any time secure his or her discharge from custody by executing a recognizance, with sufficient surety, conditioned for the appearance of such person at the proper time, as a witness in the cause or proceeding wherein the attachment may be issued.

SEC. 3. That whoever commits adultery shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years; and when the act is committed between a married woman and man who is unmarried, both parties to such act shall be deemed guilty of adultery; and when such act is committed between a married man and a woman who is unmarried, the man shall be deemed guilty of adultery.

SEC. 4. That if any person related to another person within and not including the fourth degree of consanguinity computed according to the rules of the civil law, shall marry or cohabit with, or have sexual intercourse with such other so related person, knowing her or him to be within said degree of relationship, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of incest, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than three years and not more than fifteen years.

SEC. 5. That if an unmarried man or woman commit fornication, each of them shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by fine not exceeding $100.

SEC. 6. That all laws of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah which provide that prosecutions for adultery can only be commenced on the complaint of the husband or wife are hereby disapproved and annulled; and all prosecutions for adultery may hereafter be instituted in the same way that prosecutions for other crimes are.

SEC. 7. That commissioners appointed by the supreme court and district courts in the Territory of Utah shall possess and may exercise all the powers and jurisdiction that are or may be possessed or exercised by justices of the peace in said Territory under the laws thereof, and the same powers conferred by law on commissioners appointed by circuit courts of the United States.

SEC. 8. That the marshal of said Territory of Utah, and his deputies, shall possess and may exercise all the powers in executing the laws of the United States or of said Territory possessed and exercised by sheriffs, constables, and their deputies as peace officers; and each of them shall cause all offenders against the law, in his view, to enter into recognizance to keep the peace and to appear at the next term of the court having jurisdiction of the case, and to commit to jail in case of failure to give such recognizance. They shall quell and suppress assaults and batteries, riots, routs, affrays, and insurrections.

SEC. 9. That every ceremony of marriage, or in the nature of a marriage ceremony, of any kind, in any of the Territories of the United States, whether either or both or more of the parties to such ceremony be lawfully competent to be the subject of such marriage or ceremony or not, shall be certified by a certificate stating the fact and nature of such ceremony, the full names of each of the parties concerned, and the full names of every officer, priest, and person, by whatever style or designation called or known, in any way taking part in the performance of such ceremony, which certificate shall be drawn up and signed by the parties to such ceremony and by every officer, priest, and person taking part in the performance of such ceremony, and shall be by the officer, priest, or other person solemnizing such marriage or ceremony filed in the office of the probate court, or, if there be none, in the office of the court having probate powers in the county or district in which such ceremony shall take place, for record, and shall be immediately recorded, and be at all times subject to inspection as other public records. Such certificate, or the record thereof, or a duly certified copy of such record, shall be prima facie evidence of the facts required by this act to be stated therein, in any proceeding, civil or criminal, in which the matter shall be drawn in question. Any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not longer than two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 10. That nothing in this act shall be held to prevent the proof of marriages, whether lawful or unlawful, by any evidence now legally admissible for that purpose.

SEC. 11. That the laws enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah which provide for or recognize the capacity of illegitimate children to inherit or to be entitled to any distributive share in the estate of the father of any such illegitimate child are hereby disapproved and annulled; and no illegitimate child shall hereafter be entitled to inherit from his or her father or to receive any distributive share in the estate of his or her father: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any illegitimate child born within twelve months after the passage of this act, nor to any child made legitimate by the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882.

SEC. 12. That the laws enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah conferring jurisdiction upon probate courts, or the judges thereof, or any of them, in said Territory, other than in respect of the estates of deceased persons, and in respect of the guardianship of the persons and property of infants, and in respect of the persons and property of persons not of sound mind, are hereby disapproved and annulled; and no probate court or judge of probate shall exercise any jurisdiction other than in respect of the matters aforesaid, except as a member of a county court; and every such jurisdiction so by force of this act withdrawn from the said probate courts or judges shall be had and exercised by the district courts of said Territory respectively.

SEC. 13. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to institute and prosecute proceedings to forfeit and escheat to the United States the property of corporations obtained or held in violation of section 3 of the act of Congress approved the 1st day of July, 1862, entitled "An act to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the Territories of the United States and other places, and disapproving and annulling certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah," or in violation of section 1890 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and all such property so forfeited and escheated to the United States shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds thereof applied to the use and benefit of the common schools in the Territory in which such property may be: Provided, That no building, or the grounds appurtenant thereto, which is held and occupied exclusively for purposes of the worship of God, or parsonage connected therewith, or burial ground, shall be forfeited.

SEC. 14. That in any proceeding for the enforcement of the provisions of law against corporations or associations acquiring or holding property in any Territory of the United States in excess of the amount limited by law, the court before which such proceeding may be instituted shall have power in a summary way to compel the production of all books, records, papers, and documents of or belonging to any trustee or person holding or controlling or managing property in which such corporation may have any right, title, or interest whatever.

SEC. 15. That all laws of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, or of the so-called government of the state of Deseret, creating, organizing, amending, or continuing the corporation or association called the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company are hereby disapproved and annulled; and the said corporation, in so far as it may now have, or pretend to have, any legal existence, is hereby dissolved; and it shall not be lawful for the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah to create, organize, or in any manner recognize any such corporation or association, or to pass any law for the purpose of or operating to accomplish the bringing of persons into the said Territory for any purpose whatsoever.

SEC. 16. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to cause such proceedings to be taken in the supreme court of the Territory of Utah as shall be proper to carry into effect the provisions of the preceding section, and pay the debts and to dispose of the property and assets of said corporation according to law. Said property and assets, in excess of the debts and the amount of any lawful claims established by the court against the same, shall escheat to the United States, and shall be taken, invested, and disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the benefit of common schools in said Territory.

SEC. 17. That the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, incorporating, continuing, or providing for the corporation known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and the ordinance of the so-called general assembly of the state of Deseret incorporating the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, so far as the same may now have legal force and validity, are hereby disapproved and annulled, and the said corporation, in so far as it may now have, or pretend to have, any legal existence, is hereby dissolved. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to cause such proceedings to be taken in the supreme court of the Territory of Utah as shall be proper to execute the foregoing provisions of this section and to wind up the affairs of said corporation conformably to law; and in such proceedings the court shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to make such decree or decrees as shall be proper to effectuate the transfer of the title to real property now held and used by said corporation for places of worship, and parsonages connected therewith, and burial grounds, and of the description mentioned in the proviso to section 13 of this act and in section 26 of this act, to the respective trustees mentioned in section 26 of this act; and for the purposes of this section said court shall have all the powers of a court of equity.

SEC. 18. (a) A widow shall be endowed of the third part of all the lands whereof her husband was seized of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage, unless she shall have lawfully released her right thereto.

(b) The widow of any alien who at the time of his death shall be entitled by law to hold any real estate, if she be an inhabitant of the Territory at the time of such death, shall be entitled to dower of such estate in the same manner as if such alien had been a native citizen.

(c) If a husband seized of an estate of inheritance in lands exchanges them for other lands, his widow shall not have dower of both, but shall make her election to be endowed of the lands given or of those taken in exchange; and if such election be not evinced by the commencement of proceedings to recover her dower of the lands given in exchange within one year after the death of her husband, she shall be deemed to have elected to take her dower of the lands received in exchange.

(d) When a person seized of an estate of inheritance in lands shall have executed a mortgage, or other conveyance in the nature of mortgage, of such estate, before marriage, his widow shall nevertheless be entitled to dower out of the lands mortgaged or so conveyed as against every person except the mortgagee or grantee in such conveyance and those claiming under him.

(e) Where a husband shall purchase lands during coverture, and shall at the same time execute a mortgage, or other conveyance in the nature of mortgage, of his estate in such lands to secure the payment of the purchase-money, his widow shall not be entitled to dower out of such lands, as against the mortgagee or grantee in such conveyance or those claiming under him, although she shall not have united in such mortgage; but she shall be entitled to her dower in such lands as against all other persons.

(f) Where in such case the mortgagee, or such grantee or those claiming under him shall, after the death of the husband of such widow, cause the land mortgaged or so conveyed to be sold, either under a power of sale contained in the mortgage or such conveyance, or by virtue of the decree of a court, if any surplus shall remain after payment of the moneys due on such mortgage or such conveyance, and the costs and charges of the sale, such widow shall nevertheless be entitled to the interest or income of the one-third part of such surplus for her life as her dower.

(g) A widow shall not be endowed of lands conveyed to her husband by way of mortgage unless he acquire an absolute estate therein during the marriage period.

(h) In case of divorce dissolving the marriage contract for the misconduct of the wife, she shall not be endowed.

SEC. 19. That hereafter the judge of probate in each county within the Territory of Utah provided for by the existing laws thereof shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and so much of the laws of said Territory as provide for the election of such judge by the Legislative Assembly are hereby disapproved and annulled.

SEC. 20. That it shall not be lawful for any female to vote at any election hereafter held in the Territory of Utah for any public purpose whatever, and no such vote shall be received or counted or given effect in any manner whatever; and any and every act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah providing for or allowing the registration or voting by females is hereby annulled.

SEC. 21. That all laws of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah which provide for numbering or identifying the votes of the electors at any election in said Territory are hereby disapproved and annulled; but the foregoing provision shall not preclude the lawful registration of voters, or any other provisions for securing fair elections which do not involve the disclosure of the candidates for whom any particular elector shall have voted.

SEC. 22. That the existing election districts and apportionments of representation concerning the members of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah are hereby abolished; and it shall be the duty of the governor, Territorial secretary, and the board of commissioners mentioned in section 9 of the act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," in said Territory, forthwith to redistrict said Territory, and apportion representation in the same in such manner as to provide, as nearly as may be, for an equal representation of the people (excepting Indians not taxed), being citizens of the United States, according to numbers, in said Legislative Assembly, and to the number of members of the council and house of representatives, respectively, as now established by law; and a record of the establishment of such new districts and the apportionment of representation thereto shall be made in the office of the secretary of said Territory, and such establishment and representation shall continue until Congress shall otherwise provide; and no persons other than citizens of the United States otherwise qualified shall be entitled to vote at any election in said Territory.

SEC. 23. That the provisions of section 9 of said act approved March 22, 1882, in regard to registration and election officers, and the registration of voters, and the conduct of elections, and the powers and duties of the board therein mentioned, shall continue and remain operative until the provisions and laws therein referred to, to be made and enacted by the Legislative Assembly of said Territory of Utah, shall have been made and enacted by said Assembly and shall have been approved by Congress.

SEC. 24. That every male person twenty-one years of age resident in the Territory of Utah shall, as a condition-precedent to his right to register or vote at any election in said Territory, take and subscribe an oath or affirmation, before the registration officer of his voting precinct, that he is over twenty-one years of age, and has resided in the Territory of Utah for six months then last passed and in the precinct for one month immediately preceding the date thereof, and that he is a native born (or naturalized, as the case may be) citizen of the United States, and further state in such oath or affirmation his full name, with his age, place of business, his status, whether single or married, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife, and that he will support the Constitution of the United States and will faithfully obey the laws thereof, and especially will obey the act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," and will also obey this act in respect of the crimes in said act defined and forbidden, and that he will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise, any other person to commit any of said crimes. Such registration officer is authorized to administer said oath or affirmation; and all such oaths or affirmations shall be by him delivered to the clerk of the probate court of the proper county, and shall be deemed public records therein. But if any election shall occur in said Territory before the next revision of the registration lists as required by law, the said oath or affirmation shall be administered by the presiding judge of the election precinct on or before the day of election. As a condition-precedent to the right to hold office in or under said Territory, the officer, before entering on the duties of his office, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation declaring his full name, with his age, place of business, his status, whether married or single, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife, and that he will support the Constitution of the United States and will faithfully obey the laws thereof, and especially will obey the act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," and will also obey this act in respect of the crimes in said act defined and forbidden, and that he will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise, any other person to commit any of said crimes; which oath or affirmation shall be recorded in the proper office and indorsed on the commission or certificate of appointment. All grand and petit jurors in said Territory shall take the same oath or affirmation, to be administered, in writing or orally, in the proper court. No person shall be entitled to vote in any election in said Territory, or be capable of jury service, or hold any office of trust or emolument in said Territory who shall not have taken the oath or affirmation aforesaid. No person who shall have been convicted of any crime under this act, or under the act of Congress aforesaid approved March 22, 1882, or who shall be a polygamist, or who shall associate or cohabit polygamously with persons of the other sex, shall be entitled to vote in any election in said Territory, or be capable of jury service, or to hold any office of trust or emolument in said Territory.

SEC. 25. That the office of Territorial superintendent of district schools created by the laws of Utah is hereby abolished; and it shall be the duty of the supreme court of said Territory to appoint a commissioner of schools, who shall possess and exercise all the powers and duties heretofore imposed by the laws of said Territory upon the Territorial superintendent of district schools, and who shall receive the same salary and compensation, which shall be paid out of the treasury of said Territory; and the laws of the Territory of Utah providing for the method of election and appointment of such Territorial superintendent of district schools are hereby suspended until the further action of Congress shall be had in respect thereto. The said superintendent shall have power to prohibit the use in any district school of any book of a sectarian character or otherwise unsuitable. Said superintendent shall collect and classify statistics and other information respecting the district and other schools in said Territory, showing their progress, the whole number of children of school age, the number who attend school in each year in the respective counties, the average length of time of their attendance, the number of teachers and the compensation paid to the same, the number of teachers who are Mormons, the number who are so-called gentiles, the number of children of Mormon parents and the number of children of so-called gentile parents, and their respective average attendance at school; all of which statistics and information shall be annually reported to Congress, through the governor of said Territory and the Department of the Interior.

SEC. 26. That all religious societies, sects, and congregations shall have the right to have and to hold, through trustees appointed by any court exercising probate powers in a Territory, only on the nomination of the authorities of such society, sect, or congregation, so much real property for the erection or use of houses of worship, and for such parsonages and burial grounds as shall be necessary for the convenience and use of the several congregations of such religious society, sect, or congregation.

SEC. 27. That all laws passed by the so-called state of Deseret and by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah for the organization of the militia thereof or for the creation of the Navoo Legion are hereby annulled and declared of no effect; and the militia of Utah shall be organized and subjected in all respects to the laws of the United States regulating the militia in the Territories: Provided, however, That all general officers of the militia shall be appointed by the governor of the Territory, by and with the advice and consent of the council thereof. The Legislative Assembly of Utah shall have power to pass laws for organizing the militia thereof, subject to the approval of Congress.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

DETAILED STATEMENT OF CONFEREES OF HOUSE.

The House conferees on the committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate bill 10, being an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882, beg leave to submit the following detailed statement, showing the effect of such amendments as have been agreed to, with conference report herewith submitted. The House struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and substituted its own bill, and on that vote the conference was had.

The bill as agreed upon by the conference committee differs somewhat in form from either the Senate or the House bills. It contains certain verbal changes which need not be explained. The material changes from the House bill are as follows:

In section 2, line 7, before the word "oath," the word "the," and in line 8 the words "of at least two credible persons in writing" have been stricken out, it being thought best to leave to the court the quantum of evidence necessary to show the unwillingness of a witness to appear. In that section we also left out in lines 15 and 16 the words "before any commissioner, judge, justice, or court of the United States," because as the witness was arrested for immediate attendance on the court, it was thought best that he should enter into recognizance before that court for his appearance.

To the ninth section of the House bill we added the provision of the Senate as to unlawful sexual intercourse between two married persons. This the House bill had not provided for.

Section 11 of the House bill was left out, because it was deemed unnecessary.

Section 13 of the House bill was left out, because, this being only an amendment to a former statute, section 13 was unnecessary.

Section 16 of the House bill has been amended by requiring the surplus of the property of the corporations therein mentioned, not provided for in the bill, or decreed to those entitled thereto by the courts, shall be used for school purposes in said Territory.

Section 17 of the House bill has been left out as unnecessary, the law now controlling writs of error from the Supreme Court in the cases of bigamy or polygamy or of any offense under the act March 22, 1882, is not affected by this act.

Section 18 of the House bill has been changed by leaving out to all religious societies, sects, or congregations so much real property for the erection or use of houses of worship, and for such parsonages as shall be necessary for their convenience and use, the title to be in trustees named by them.

Section 21 of House bill, annulling legislation as to water, timber, or herd rights, has been left out because the conference committee did not know the full possible effect of that section, and because it is believed that existing law furnishes an adequate remedy for any illegal act done in the premises.

In section 22, House bill, the conference committee in section 1, which defines the terms "lawful wife," believe it best to leave that matter to the courts. Sections 26 and 27 of the House bill were so amended as to strike out all the authority therein granted as to the appointment of officers in said Territory except that the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, is required to appoint a probate judge in each county.

N. J. HAMMOND.
E. B. TAYLOR.

Mr. HAMMOND (during the reading of the report). Mr. Speaker, with a view of obviating the necessity of reading this long bill, unanimous consent was given on the day before yesterday that the report, bill, and accompanying statement be printed in the RECORD. They were printed yesterday.

A MEMBER. No one read them.

Mr. HAMMOND. I think it might be well now that the House by unanimous consent dispense with the further reading of this report, inasmuch as the question will be upon agreeing to the substitute as a whole, and not upon any particular item of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). Is there objection to dispensing with the further reading of the report?

Mr. REAGAN. I have not had time to read the report as printed in the RECORD. I desire to hear it read.

The reading was resumed and concluded.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, it is the desire to get a vote upon this report within an hour, and, therefore, at the end of one hour I shall call the previous question. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, it is hardly worth while for me to try to fasten the attention of this House upon the wrongful invasion made upon the individual consciences of the people of Utah by the provisions of the measure now under consideration.

It may not be amiss to call the attention of this House to an instance of the intolerance of public clamor against the demands and rights of conscience. When Cromwell made his wicked invasion upon Ireland, during which he dispatched to John Bradshaw, president of the council of state, that at Tredah he refused quarter and knocked above two thousand people on the head, women and children; he sat down before the town of Ross, on the Barrow, and demanded the surrender of that place. The citizens of that devoted town, through Lucas Taaff, wrote him a dutiful letter, in which they said they were willing to surrender if their liberty of conscience were respected. But that "God-intoxicated" man [laughter] said: "As for that which you mention concerning liberty of conscience, I meddle not with any man's conscience; but if by liberty of conscience you mean liberty to exercise the mass, that will not be allowed where the Parliament of England have powers." [Laughter]. And unconsciously, Mr. Speaker, this House, which is always just [laughter], is to-day stimulated by a feeling akin to that. [Laughter.]

Let me subject this bill as reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to a strict and legal analysis. I beg gentlemen to hear me—to hear me not for my cause, but the cause of right and justice and conscience. Some one has said, Thank God, there is no tyranny of ideas. [Applause.]

The first section of this bill makes the wife a competent witness against the husband in the trial of any indictment in Utah for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, but it does not compel her to testify. In almost every State of this Union, and I speak subject to correction, although I have made a careful scrutiny into the subject-matter in which a wife is made a competent witness against her husband in any trial at law on the criminal side of the docket, it is provided in terms that the refusal of the wife to testify shall not be taken to the prejudice of the defendant, and the court shall in terms instruct the jury to make no inference of guilt from such refusal to the hurt or damage of the defendant.

No such terms are employed in this act, but such refusal on the part of the wife to testify may, under the terms of this act, be tortured by the prosecuting officer of the Government, and it may be urged as proof of guilt of the accused, or as a pregnant circumstance of suspicion.

The next section of the bill as it came from the committee invests the officers of the Territory with powers—and I have weighed the words—such as no judicial officer ever possessed at common law. Hear it:

That in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, whether before a United States commissioner, justice, judge, a grand jury, or any court—an attachment for any witness may be issued by the court, judge, or commissioner, without a previous subpœna, compelling the immediate attendance of such witness, when it shall appear—

Attention!—

How?

by oath or affirmation, to the commissioner, justice, judge, or court, as the case may be, that there is reasonable ground to believe that such witness will unlawfully fail to obey a subpœna issued and served in the usual course in such cases; and in such case the usual witness fee shall be paid to such witness so attached.

Here is the most offensive part of this section:

That the person so attached may at any time secure his or her discharge from custody by executing a recognizance, with sufficient surety, conditioned for the appearance of such person at the proper time as a witness in the cause or proceeding wherein the attachment may be issued.

In other words, the judge, the commissioner, the justice of the peace may issue the attachment for contempt in the first instance without other proof than the mere statement or the word of some splay-footed deputy or professional witness [laughter], and upon such statement a warrant of attachment goes out, and when the party is arrested it is not competent for him to give bond for his appearance to answer such attachment before a judge, if the commissioner issued the attachment, or before a justice of the peace if the judge issues the attachment, or before a judge if the justice of the peace issues the attachment. To make the slavery complete, the officer who issues the warrant of attachment and he alone can deliver a citizen from this "durance vile."

Educated after the old-fashioned methods of the fathers, and with reverence for the common law as the most splendid achievement of the human intellect in the way of judicature, and the liberty of the citizen as one of the three favorite estates of the law, I have come to regard the principle of this question as settled. I do not believe this House will give its sanction to this section in its present shape—a shape in which if a commissioner or justice of the peace issue the warrant of attachment for contempt, no judge in the Territory of Utah can take recognizance and deliver the citizen from his bonds. I address it to the conscience of this body, and I have great respect for the conscience of this House [laughter]; very great respect. [Renewed laughter.]

They say that in the heat of one of the monetary panics in the city of New York a few years ago a certain gentleman who was interested in the subsidence, and the quick subsidence, of the panic employed divers and sundry vehicular conveyances to drive up and down, hither and thither, through the crowd who were standing and surging along in the neighborhood of the financial establishment waiting to get their money. It was a good way to command silence.

In 1846 Congress passed this act, and I have no doubt that it is entirely familiar to the mind of the member from Georgia who has charge of this conference report:

Any judge of the United States on the application of a district attorney, and on being satisfied by proof that the testimony of any person is competent and will be necessary on the trial of any criminal proceeding in which the United States are parties or are interested, may compel such person to give recognizance, with or without sureties, at his discretion, to appear to testify therein; and for that purpose may issue a warrant against such person, under his hand, with or without seal, directed to the marshal or any other officer authorized to execute process in behalf of the United States, to arrest and bring before him such person. If the person so arrested neglects or refuses to give recognizance in the manner required the judge may issue a warrant of commitment against him, and the officer shall convey him to the prison mentioned therein.

Here in 1846 the Congress intrusted this extraordinary power of issuing a warrant of attachment against a recusant witness to the judge, and to the judge of the court alone; and not only that, sir, but they fixed about it all the safeguards in favor of the personal liberty of the citizen—that is, that due proof should be made of the recusancy of the witness before the warrant of attachment should issue, and that the power to issue such extraordinary process should be intrusted to the judge of the court alone.

It may be said that the Territorial courts are not courts of the United States within the meaning of the statutes applicable to the latter. That, as a proposition of law, is in general correct. But this act of 1846 was drawn after the decisions in 1 Peters, United States Supreme Court Reports, January term, 1828, and elsewhere, in which it was held that Territorial courts were not courts of the United States within the meaning of the statutes, and it was drawn with reference to this decision. And you will observe that the language of the act is guarded and aptly chosen to meet these decisions: "Any judge of the United States," whether in a Territory, or in a State of the Union, or in the District of Columbia.

So that there stands now upon the statute-books ample, complete, and plenary power in the courts to arrest a recusant witness and bring him before the court.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. That is if you can catch him.

Mr. BENNETT. You have to do that either way. The man will run as fast under one statute as the other, will he not?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Yes; but you catch him before he runs in the one case; in the other you give him full latitude.

Mr. BENNETT. Now my friend, I have great respect for you. I bow to you with the same deference that the Mussulman bows toward Mecca or the heathen to his god [laughter] on all matters of law and opinion. I look upon you as the impersonation of the law, and I say that in all candor. Now listen and mark the obvious misapprehension of the existing law by the member from Vermont [Mr. STEWART]. I read the law again at the risk of fatiguing the House by the repetition:

Any judge of the United States—

That is in any part of the United States—

on the application of a district attorney, and on being satisfied by proof that the testimony of any person is competent * * * may compel such person to give recognizance with or without surety.

That is to say, he may catch him right then and there. It is not necessary to bait him or to take him to a lick-log. [Laughter.] He may catch him instantly and of a heap.

The member from Vermont [Mr. STEWART] shakes me when he challenges any statement of law I may make. [Laughter.]

John Randolph said many years ago that one of the dangers to free government in this country lay in the fact that the people would surrender some precious principle of liberty under temporary excitement; their heads and hands would become fevered. Gentlemen know that the violations of law of the class aimed at in this bill occurring in the Territory of Utah will remedy themselves inevitably and unerringly under the existing law, which is just as severe as any in the codes of modern times. Society in Utah is undergoing certain processes which work changes for the better of themselves.

"Great ideas and reforms travel slowly, sometimes noiselessly, like the feet of the gods shod in wool."

Society there is flushing itself.

Lest I may be misapprehended in respect of the law as stated a while ago, I beg to say that this question, this proposition that the statutes of the United States do not in general apply to the courts of the Territories has been three times decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. This section 881, Revised Statutes, was drawn with express reference to the first decisions made in these cases.

The next section of this conference report is as absolutely void, when tried by any just judicial standard, as would be the mandate of the gentleman who presides over this House if he ordered a member to fall down and worship him. Give me your ears! [Renewed laughter.]

SEC. 8. That the marshal of said Territory of Utah, and his deputies, shall possess and may exercise all the powers in executing the laws of the United States or of said Territory possessed and exercised by sheriffs, constables, and their deputies as peace officers—and each of them shall cause all offenders against the law, in his view, to enter into recognizance to keep the peace.

I appeal to all gentlemen upon this floor who have presided in courts or administered justice, who have held the scales as between man and man, to give me their attention.

And each of them shall cause all offenders against the law, in his view, to enter into recognizance to keep the peace, and to appear at the next term of the court having jurisdiction of the case, and to commit to jail in case of failure to give such recognizance. They shall quell and suppress assaults and batteries, riots, routs, affrays, and insurrections.

At common law a sheriff could arrest any one who committed a breach of the peace "super visum," that is, in his sight; but his power extended no further than securing the safe custody of such offender until he could be brought before a judicial tribunal to have his case investigated.

The marshal of said Territory of Utah makes the arrest of any man in Utah who is guilty of a breach of the peace in his presence, and instead of securing the prisoner until a judicial tribunal can investigate and dispose of the case he thrusts him into jail, there to remain until the next term of the court having jurisdiction of the case, or until he gives recognizances to keep the peace. Dante says, in his celebrated work, there is an inscription over the front door of hell—and this House is interested in that [laughter]—"All hope abandon ye who enter here." The marshal and his deputies lay their beak and claw upon the citizen who has the misfortune to commit the slightest breach of the peace within their sight, and instead of carrying him before a judge or an officer with judicial functions they put him in the depths of the jail devoted to thieves, offenders, and malefactors of all sorts. I suspect, though I speak subject to correction in this, that the officers appointed by the General Government to administer the law in Utah are convened to convict and ordered to proceed. [Laughter.]

The section further provides—

They shall quell and suppress assaults and batteries, riots, routs, affrays, and insurrections.

These same gentlemen, clothed with the majesty of the United States statute, "uncrowned kings of the Territory"—

Marauding chiefs, whose sole delight
The midnight raid, the morning fight.

I have seen them, and my people have bled at heart from the outrages which were committed by them in our midst. They were for the most part ruthless, unsympathetic, the adversaries of the people among whom they plied their trade. Every man from the South who was there during the days "born of the eclipse of principle and rigged with curses dark" will remember the ominous tread of the marshal and his deputy. The State represented by the member from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], who leads this measure, for whom I have the greatest personal regard, a regard bordering on affection, has bled at the hands of these people.

There is no statute in the Territory of Utah which gives to any peace officer of said Territory power over the citizen as great or substantially like that given to the marshal of said Territory and his deputies by the terms of the eighth section of this bill. The section of the "compiled laws" of Utah, referred to by the member from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] as section 1072 thereof, was enacted February 18, 1852, and is part of an act entitled "An act for the regulation of attorneys." The said act contains several sections. The first one provides that any person may act as his own counsel. The second section provides that counsel shall not use improper language in courts, and may be fined or imprisoned. This section was repealed February 20, 1874; and the last section is as follows:

It shall be the duty of the executive officers of all courts in this Territory to arrest without process and put in safe-keeping all persons, whether counsel or other officers of courts or persons within the hearing of such courts, who shall in any way behave indecently or riotously, or use indecent, riotous, or exciting language, subject to the release or action of the court in which such arrest is made, and such executive officers may call for such assistance as may be necessary in making such arrest and for the safe-keeping of such person or persons so offending.

The committee say in their report:

Section 17 of the House bill has been left out as unnecessary; the law now controlling writs of error from the Supreme Court in the cases of bigamy or polygamy, or of any offense under the act March 22, 1882, is not affected by this act.

Now, let us see what that section provides and let us speak by the record. Section 17 of the House bill provides:

A writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to the supreme court of the said Territory shall lie in all criminal cases where the accused shall have been sentenced to capital punishment, or convicted of bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, or of any offense under the act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

That is section 17 of the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee of this House; and the conference committee say that a writ of error is completely provided for by the existing law.

I speak upon my responsibility as a lawyer—and it is a great responsibility. In the case of Cannon against the United States (116 Wallace, page 55) it was decided that sexual intercourse was not essential to make criminal cohabitation.

A writ of error in Snow's case (118 of United States Reports) was dismissed for want of jurisdiction by the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that a writ of error was not provided for in case of unlawful cohabitation. Yet the committee say that that section was left out because the writ of error was provided for in all cases under the act of 1882, known as the Edmunds act. These are the graver and more objectionable provisions of the report as it comes from the committee of conference. There is one other. Section 5 provides:

SEC. 5. That if an unmarried man or woman commit fornication, each of them shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by fine not exceeding $100.

That offense was committed at common law where "a man and woman not being married to each other lewdly and lasciviously bedded and cohabitated together," and that matter has been left to the determination of the local authorities in every Territory of this Union. Perhaps it may afford some degree of satisfaction to gentlemen here and hereafter to know that in this District of two hundred and odd thousand inhabitants such an offense is not recognized by the legal tribunal, but is still left to be corrected by the ecclesiastical courts alone.

Ah! bless my life, how unmindful we are of the wrongs and injuries and sufferings of other people a long way off! The policy of governments is no more shaped or determined by the humanities. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" to the average man in so far as he attempts to interweave that precious commandment into the policy of his government is a dead letter. This is a thrifty and a prosperous people, distinguished by all those attributes which make an industrious and upright community, and this great body, representing a Government as powerful in the affections of the people as any upon this planet, ought to leave the present stringent law to be tested by the great touchstone, time, which was recognized by the ancients as the discoverer of all things, before it lays its beak and claw more heavily on the citizens.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAMMOND. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN].

Mr. EDEN. Inasmuch as I supported the bill that was reported by the House Judiciary Committee, and do not approve of some of the provisions of this bill, I have sought the occasion for a very few remarks, and I do not know that I shall refer to any but the eighth section. As probably some gentlemen did not hear it read I will read it:

SEC. 8. That the marshal of said Territory of Utah, and his deputies, shall possess and may exercise all the powers in executing the laws of the United States or of said Territory possessed and exercised by sheriffs, constables, and their deputies as peace officers; and each of them shall cause all offenders against the law, in his view, to enter into recognizance to keep the peace and to appear at the next term of the court having jurisdiction of the case, and to commit to jail in case of failure to give such recognizance. They shall quell and suppress assaults and batteries, riots, routs, affrays, and insurrections.

The bill as it passed the House contained a clause in this section that gave to marshals and their deputies the power of arrest for offenses committed in their view, but provided that the marshal or his deputy making the arrest should take the offender before a court for examination. This section makes the marshal, or any deputy of the marshal, judge and jury to determine whether a person has committed an offense in the Territory of Utah, and clothes him with the power, without any investigation whatever, to commit that person to jail, where he must remain until his case is investigated by the grand jury or brought before the proper court for final trial.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that in order to deal with this crime of polygamy (which we all wish to see suppressed) it is necessary to give the marshals and their deputies such power as is here given to trample upon the rights of the people of the Territory of Utah or of any other Territory; and I wish to call attention to the fact, and to repeat it, that this section is not the same as the bill which was reported by the Judiciary Committee and passed by the House. There was no objection to that bill, because the officer making the arrest had to take the prisoner before an examining court and give him a hearing before he could be committed to jail or required to give bail. It is not necessary to discuss that proposition now.

I simply want to call the attention of the House to it, so that when gentlemen vote for this bill they may know that they are setting a precedent in the Territory of Utah which may be used in a way that we do not desire to see it used in the future. The second section, to which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] called attention, has not the same safeguard thrown about it which the bill had that was reported to the House by the Judiciary Committee and passed by the House. That is the section that gives the power to justices, judges, &c., to cause witnesses to be arrested for contempt who are not in contempt. The bill, as it passed the House, required an affidavit to be made by two persons before the court should be authorized to issue an attachment for a witness who had not been subpœnaed.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, since this bill passed by so overwhelming a majority that only eight stood up on the call for the yeas and nays, and since, in conference, it had been stripped of several of its harshest provisions, I supposed that it ought to be submitted to the House without debate. But, in deference to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] (who before occupied the floor by the grace of the House for nearly two hours in opposition to the bill), I determined to allow him thirty minutes to speak against it, and that speech compels from me a few minutes of reply. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] have both attacked section 2 of this bill because the conferees agreed to strike out the words "by two witnesses." That is the only objection made to the section by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN].

In every other court an attachment issues when it is made to appear to the court that a party is in contempt, and no law prescribes the quantum of evidence that the judge shall have; but, because in some cases it was impossible to induce witnesses to come voluntarily and impossible to carry out the law of the land in some instances without making witnesses give recognizance in advance for their appearance, the Committee on the Judiciary reported section 2, declaring that the judge might issue in the beginning an attachment for the arrest of a witness provided he was satisfied by the oath of two persons that the witness would not otherwise appear. Now, it certainly makes very little difference whether we say that or say that it shall be made to appear by oath or affirmation.

If the witnesses are such wicked persons as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] suggests, there is no security in acting upon the oath of two any more than upon the oath of one. At last the whole question, in these courts as in every other court, must be submitted to the judgment of the judge, and if he be satisfied by evidence under oath he must act. I think the fundamental error—I say it with deference to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT]—the fundamental error in his attack is in the presumption that courts will do wrong and that witnesses will swear to lies. I submit that no legislative body can legislate upon any other presumption than the legal presumption that all officers will do their duty and all witnesses will swear to the truth.

One other comment is made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] upon that section, namely, that as reported originally in the House bill the recognizance for the appearance of an arrested witness might be given before any other magistrate or other officer, but as it now stands he must go before the magistrate ordering his arrest. The gentleman fails to notice the point that this applies only in cases where it is necessary to compel the "immediate attendance" of a witness and the court is satisfied by proof under oath or affirmation that he will not come. Then an attachment may be issued to compel his "immediate attendance." When he comes, there is the court; the court tells him when he will be needed again; the court takes his recognizance. Suppose, on the other hand, he should be allowed to stop at a magistrate's office and give bond for his appearance, how will the magistrate know how to take the bond? When is the witness to appear? How will the court know that a bond has been given in proper terms? The whole purpose is that if a witness is needed immediately he shall be brought immediately before the court, and then, if the cause is continued or laid over for a day, the court will take his recognizance for his appearance when required.

While I am replying to both these gentlemen I may remark they both took exception also to section 8, which allows the marshals and deputy marshals of the United States to exercise the same rights that sheriffs, constables, and their deputies exercise as police officers within the Territories. Now, that has been the law under the Territorial code since 1876, how much longer I do not know. But this section gives to marshals and deputy marshals of the United States the powers which section 1072 of the code of Utah gives to every peace officer in that Territory as to arrest and detention in certain cases without process.

It is true that that law has not been enacted by the Congress of the United States; but all the Territorial laws of the United States are passed subject to the approval of Congress, and Congress may at any moment annul any one of them. Therefore, by silence, at least since 1876, Congress has unanimously approved that section of the laws of Utah.

Besides, sir, what are these arrests there? They are arrests for crimes of a grave character committed in the "view" or presence of the officer. No right existing under any other law is taken away. The gentleman from North Carolina spoke as though this were the only law—he virtually said that when a man enters prison upon the arrest of a marshal because he has been guilty of insurrection, or riot, or affray, he is like one in hell, never to return. What is the fact? The right of habeas corpus is undisturbed; all the other statutes for the protection of liberty are in full force. This simply declares that United States marshals and deputies may exercise the like right that has been exercised in that Territory by its own officers year after year without objection on the part of anybody—a right under laws passed by the people of that Territory themselves for the preservation of the good order and decency of society.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the gentleman——

Mr. HAMMOND. I beg pardon. I have given away all but twenty-five minutes of my time, and I can not yield.

Mr. BENNETT. May I humbly ask a question?

Mr. HAMMOND. I can not yield.

Mr. BENNETT. I will state——

Mr. HAMMOND. I can not yield.

Mr. BENNETT. I do not find such a provision as the gentleman mentions in the law.

Mr. HAMMOND. The other section objected to was, both in the House bill and the Senate bill, the same except as pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN]. I have shown reasons for the change. It was proper to omit the language referred to.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] rather objected to the fact that we declared section 17 of the House bill no longer necessary in our estimation, and that it did not repeal the existing law as to appeals from the Territorial court to the Supreme Court of the United States. The gentleman said that is not correct; and by way of proving his decision cited the decision of the Supreme Court as to illegal cohabitation between the sexes. We admit that in the House bill we did undertake to give in reference to that offense the same right of appeal as was given in regard to the other two crimes under the act of 1882; but while some conferees elsewhere insisted that we ought to strike out the whole matter of appeal, we simply said, "No; we will not ask for any greater right of appeal than now exists; we will leave the laws as to appeal where they now are." That is the effect of leaving out section 17 of House bill. Was it unreasonable for the House conferees to yield in that particular? Let me submit a few reasons to satisfy the judgment of gentlemen of the House, as I think they ought to do, because they satisfied ours.

All other crimes are tried in the Territorial courts and in the district courts of the United States in the States without the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. Why should the Mormon have his crimes dignified—adorned, if you please—with the grand right of appeal to the Supreme Court, when every other man, in the case of every other crime, however grave, must submit to the finding of the court below? Was this case as to the right of appeal ever different? It was so as to the Mormon in the beginning, because this country was so tender of doing anything contrary to any man's religion, so tender of appearing to prosecute, and at the same time persecute, a weak people, that Congress determined the penalty for these crimes should not be enforced against those people until they had had authority and privilege and time to exercise the right of appeal. But after the Supreme Court had determined the constitutional question, when these crimes had been passed upon and the law laid down, the conferees thought it not unreasonable to say that the Mormons should have no privilege over anybody else in futuro more than the law already gave them.

Those are the only objections which have been made to this bill on this floor to-day. I admit there are things in it which do not meet my hearty concurrence. All legislation upon grave matters like this, affecting not only the criminal laws but the policy of the country, must necessarily be, in large measure, a matter of agreement and concord. We must yield something and others must yield something in order to come to agreement. The House passed a bill to take all the property of these great corporations mentioned in the bill and submit the whole matter to a court, allowing the court to divide up the property among those who might establish their claims, but making no disposition of the residuum. That being complained of as a harsh measure against the Church of the Latter-Day Saints, this agreed bill says that the property shall first be distributed by giving to each church, each special congregation, each special sect, all the property that is necessary or convenient for its public worship, for burial grounds, and for parsons' residences. In other words, it gives to every Mormon church and congregation exactly the property rights that are given to the gentiles, of whatever denomination, in that Territory or in the States.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask this one question? Is the right of appeal touching those property rights preserved now as it was originally in the bill?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly, under the general law. If a man's property is of value sufficient he can go to the Supreme Court, just as you or I can go if our property rights are up to the amount giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction. Where the amount is too small suitors have to stop below, as you and I stop below.

The Senate bill provided that the President of the United States should appoint fourteen persons to act with thirteen commissioners of the church allotted to govern the church corporation property as if the majority of stockholders were on the United States side. That has been abandoned by the Senate conferees. It has been said we declare that the court shall vest this church property in each congregation in trustees named by the congregation. But they hold their property just like trustees of your church or my church will hold theirs; just so much as is necessary and convenient for the purposes which I have named. I submit that, as other congregations have no more, the Mormons ought not to have any more.

Mr. DIBBLE. Is the surplus distributed among the corporators?

Mr. HAMMOND. It is provided that if there be a residuum after the trustees have taken their rights, and if there be a residuum which can not find any other place to vest than in the pocket of proper claimants it should go into the general school fund of the Territory.

These are the main features of the bill. But I deem it proper to make one other remark lest gentlemen might be misled by what has been published. It went out through the press dispatches that we made in this bill a test oath which required men to make oath that they did not believe in polygamy before they could register or vote.

There is nothing of the kind in the bill. The act of 1882 made it a condition-precedent to the right to register and vote that a certain state of things exist. Under that commissioners made a condition-precedent the taking of an oath prescribed by them. The Supreme Court decided those oaths not to be constitutional because the commission had no right to prescribe them, but that the statutory qualifications were conditions-precedent to the right to vote. The conferees agreed that it was better to put in the statute what the oath should be, and this bill requires that it shall be taken only as a condition-precedent to the right of voting. He shall take the oath that he comes within the rule laid down by the act of 1882, just as in our statutes a man can not vote unless he is of a certain age, unless he lived in a county a certain time, unless he is a citizen of the United States, &c., and the managers of the State elections may demand of him to make oath to these qualifications before he registers or votes.

We thought it safe that the statute should prescribe the form of that oath.

It is due to truth and candor to say the oath in this bill does have an additional feature which is not in the act of 1882. That feature is that a person taking the oath must swear that he has not aided or abetted in the commission of any of the peculiar crimes under consideration. It may not be wise. But if one can become a voter who avoids the commission of those crimes merely, the policy of exclusion would be evaded by allowing him to become an office-holder as well as a voter, notwithstanding he was aiding and abetting others to violate the laws.

I care not to reply to what has been said about the "reconstruction laws" and test oaths in the past, or to what else was done after the war. No man can draw anything so strongly denunciatory in reference to that character of legislation which will not call forth from me a hearty amen. But I do not think there is any parallelism between the two cases.

Nor do I think I need reply to the suggestion of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] when he said no "temporary" power or "temporary" excitement should cause us to do violence to our consciences or to our duty as to these people. I do not know what he calls "temporary." This was a crying evil prior to 1862. The official imprimatur was put on the statutes in that year with a view to break up polygamy. It has been followed ever since. Additional steps have been taken. This additional step is taken because the sense of the American people is against that practice; because the civilization of this age is against that practice. When the Mormons desire that Congress shall cease to legislate, let them cease violating the law of the land and the civilization of the century.

I now demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask my friend from Georgia, as he is a scientific lawyer, to correct the statement he made a while ago.

Mr. HAMMOND. I declined to yield to the gentleman for that purpose and I decline again.

Mr. BENNETT. There is no such law in Utah, Mr. Speaker.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 27.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 202, nays 40, not voting 76; as follows:

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] does not wish to resume the consideration of the consular and diplomatic bill I desire to report the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5556) to define and punish the offense of setting fire to and burning woods, grass, or forests on lands belonging to the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 10995) to prevent unauthorized persons from wearing badges, buttons, decorations, or devices indicating enlistment or commission and muster into the military or naval service of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask that that bill go upon the House Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BELMONT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion——

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, the consular and diplomatic bill has occupied three or four days, and I think it is time that the House should proceed to some other business.

The SPEAKER. These motions are not debatable. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 116, noes 27.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 127, noes 53.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the House, if it be in order——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. CRAIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIN. My point is that if the House will take up the letter-carrier's bill I will call the previous question upon it and will make no speech on my side. [Laughter and renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and they were refused—only 16 members voting in favor thereof.

The motion of Mr. BELMONT was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the bill (H. R. 10396) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, in proceeding to the consideration of this bill I desire to ask consent that we take it up at the point reached when the bill was last under consideration and substitute what I hold in my hand, the provisions of this substitute being in accordance with the rulings of the Chair. The attempt at reclassification which had been made being subject to a point of order, this has been deemed the speediest and most satisfactory way to reach a conclusion upon the bill, and I trust that no objection will be made.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the substitute which the gentleman desires to submit conforms to existing law and that the increases of salary proposed in the bill originally reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs have all been stricken out. I hope, therefore, that this substitute will now be taken up and considered.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the substitute is to conform to the rulings of the Chair on points of order. The substitute covers only that portion of the bill which has not yet been read.

Mr. MCCREARY. Let the substitute be read.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I desire to inquire whether this leaves the bill in the same parliamentary position as before?

Mr. BELMONT. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call attention to the fact that when the committee last rose a point of order was pending with reference to the consul at Callao.

Mr. MCCREARY. I made a point of order upon the provision with reference to the consul at Pernambuco. I understand this matter is embraced in the substitute, and I will withdraw the point of order for the present.

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; that comes in under class 3.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the point or order was upon the provision for the consul at Callao, in line 201.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman from Kentucky made a point of order upon Pernambuco, which point he now withdraws. That was the last point of order.

Mr. MCCREARY. I withdraw it, because a provision on that subject is embraced in the substitute.

Mr. BELMONT. Reference to the RECORD will show that the last point of order was, as I have stated, upon the provision for the consul at Pernambuco.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood from the Clerk that the last line read was with reference to the consul at Callao, and that there was a point of order made upon that; but upon the statement of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Kentucky the Chair will consider that as a misunderstanding and will regard the point of order as withdrawn.

Mr. BELMONT. I now ask consent that this proposed substitute be read, with the view that it shall take the place of the remainder of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following:

When the paragraph relating to allowance for clerks at consulates was read,

Mr. McCREARY said: In order to conform to existing law that appropriation ought to be $50,320 instead of $56,400.

Mr. BELMONT. The point of order, of course, does not apply to the allowance for clerks. I do not understand that it is necessary to make a reduction in that particular, because the law does not fix the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only decide the question of order when it is raised. As the Chair understands, this proposed substitute is being now read with the view of asking consent that it may be offered in lieu of the remaining portion of the original bill.

Mr. McCREARY. I supposed the substitution had been agreed to; and therefore I desired to make a point of order on this as new legislation.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask the ruling of the Chair upon the point. I will only say that the allowance for clerks is in a lump sum, and varies from year to year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement. This substitute is now being read merely with the view of asking unanimous consent that it be offered in lieu of the remainder of the bill. Perhaps it would facilitate matters to reserve points of order on the substitute until the Committee of the Whole shall determine whether it will permit the consideration of this substitute at all.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading, during which,

Mr. McCREARY and Mr. HOLMAN desired to reserve points of order on paragraphs as read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this substitute is now being read merely for information, and all points of order are reserved.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the proposed substitute.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask, by unanimous consent, this be substituted——

Mr. HOLMAN. Subject to points of order?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Class third, at $3,000 per annum——

Mr. BELMONT. It is not necessary to read the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The substitute goes to what line?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it is by unanimous consent offered as a whole, subject to points of order.

Mr. BELMONT. Unanimous consent has been granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand what the gentleman said.

Mr. BELMONT. I understand unanimous consent has been given for substitution, subject to points of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Down to what point has he made the bill to correspond to the bill of last year?

Mr. BELMONT. Down to the point of allowance for consular clerks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the Revised Statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Call attention to line 401.

Mr. BELMONT. We have agreed to a substitute for part of the original bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have the original bill.

Mr. BELMONT. From line 394 the lines are as in the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us understand that.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask down to that point the bill be considered as read. It has been read once. I move to dispense with the reading of the bill down to that point.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no understanding except as to points of order.

Mr. CLEMENTS. It is to be understood no points of order can be made back of that.

The CHAIRMAN. No; that portion of the bill has been passed.

Mr. BELMONT. That is all right.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is as follows. The act of 1879 contains the following provision:

For allowance for clerks at consulates, $42,600

Then there is an enumeration of the clerks to be employed at Havana, Liverpool, and other points, and what their salaries shall be. The paragraph closes as follows:

Provided, That the total sum expended in any one year shall not exceed the amounts herein appropriated.

Thus, the Chair will perceive by the language here, this is intended to be a permanent law; that the total sum expended in any one year shall not exceed the sum herein appropriated. The statutes fix each consulate at which a clerk may be employed, and it also fixes the salaries, amounting in the aggregate to $42,600. It concludes with the language I have already read, "that the total sum expended in any one year shall not exceed the sum of $42,600." I make the point of order, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that by existing law the number of consular clerks is specifically fixed, and the salaries also are fixed, and that the aggregate of these salaries can not exceed $42,600. I will only add there is a large increase in the number of consular clerks in this bill.

Mr. BELMONT. I only desire to say that this has always been held in the nature of a contingent fund. But I do not care to pursue the argument after the ruling on the question of salaries. I ask for a decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BELMONT. I move to strike out the appropriation in the bill and insert $42,600.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. McCREARY. I make the point of order on Havana.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from New York will listen for a moment. The point of order necessarily strikes out the language contained in this bill and substitutes therefor the language of the act of 1879, which gives in detail the consular clerks to be employed. It substitutes that for the language of the bill down to line 434.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment has been offered by the gentleman from New York and agreed to.

Mr. BELMONT. In view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, I withdraw my amendment. I think we can get along better by substituting the language of the act of 1879.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been agreed to, and without objection that can not be done.

Mr. McCREARY. The House has stricken out the sum of $56,400 originally placed in the bill and has inserted the amount fixed by the permanent law—that is to say, $42,600. Now, in order to make the bill conform to the action of the committee, we should strike out "$2,000" for Havana, and insert "$1,600," and strike out "$2,000" for Shanghai——

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend will observe that these differences run all through the section.

Mr. McCREARY. There are only two other changes to make, Antwerp and Ecuador.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are several to make; Milan and Aix la Chapelle, for instance; and the best way will be simply to insert in place of this the old law, which is specific in regard to all of these places.

Mr. BELMONT. The suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana is the most practical method, it seems to me, of correcting this section, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. That makes it perfectly clear. It simply substitutes the permanent law for the bill down to line 434.

Mr. McCREARY. It amounts to the same, for if it is understood that the $42,600 of former appropriations is to be the sum provided by this bill for all of these clerks; it is understood that it is to be in accordance with the old law. But I have no objection to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. BELMONT. The only way is to follow the wording of the old law.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the amendment which naturally follows from the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The conversation on the floor between gentlemen does not enlighten the clerks at the desk as to what is required to perfect the bill. Gentlemen will please submit their amendments in writing.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to ask unanimous consent, in order to make this section conform to the old law, that all after the words "forty-two thousand six hundred," to be inserted in lines 402 and 403, be stricken out, and the balance of the statute as appears in the act of 1879 be substituted. That will designate the particular places where the clerks are to be employed, the compensation they are to receive, and the language will be in accordance with the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please reduce the amendment to writing, as the clerks have not been able to get the suggestion as stated on the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk what I understand to be the language to come in here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has sent an amendment to the desk, and the Chair will cause the one amendment to be reported before entertaining another.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the same amendment the gentleman referred to. I have the language of the statute before me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk does not get the amendment from the mere statement of it on the floor, and of course the record can not be kept right at the desk unless the amendments are sent up in their regular order to be acted upon.

The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowance for clerks at consulates, $42,600, as follows:

For the consul-general at Havana and the consul at Liverpool, each a sum not exceeding the rate of $3,000 for any one year; and to the consuls-general at London, Paris, and Shanghai, each a sum not exceeding the rate of $2,000 for any one year; to the consuls-general at Berlin, Vienna, Frankfort, and Montreal, and to the consuls at Hamburg, Bremen, Leipsic, Lyons, Manchester, Hong-Kong, Ottawa, Belfast, Birmingham, Bradford, Chemnitz, Sheffield, Sonneberg, Dresden, Havre, Marseilles, Rio de Janeiro, Nuremberg, Leith, Singapore, Stuttgart, Mannheim, and Tunstall, each a sum not exceeding $1,500 for any one year: Provided, That the total sum expended in any one year shall not exceed the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is proposed to be in lieu of the language of the bill; and I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Georgia. The gentlemen will see that that covers the whole bill from line 401 down to 434, so it ought to be offered as a substitute for those provisions of the bill.

Mr. CLEMENTS. That was my intention in offering it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to raise the point of order on this language, page 19:

Interpreters to be employed at consulates in China and Japan, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $15,000.

It ought to be $12,000. That is an increase of $3,000, and I make the point of order against it.

Mr. BELMONT. The increase is of the same nature as those heretofore referred to. These funds have been generally considered as contingent funds, and under the ruling I have no objection to its being stricken out if the Chair thinks it out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will please refer the Chair to the statute to which he refers.

Mr. McCREARY. Perhaps the shortest way to reach the reduction will be to make a motion that "fifteen" be stricken out and "twelve" inserted, so it will read "twelve thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. REED. I object. I think we ought either to have a statute or a vote.

Mr. BELMONT. I think we ought to have a ruling on the point of order. I have no doubt that a vote of the House would sustain the increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. That concludes the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, from the reading of the substitute I was not able to gather whether the language embodied in the bill with reference to the consolidation of clerks had been stricken out.

Mr. BELMONT. It is not in the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order that there may be no misapprehension in regard to this let me say that I have reference to the following language:

That section 3, chapter 287, of the Supplement to the Revised Statutes be amended as follows: After the words "lower grade," in the fifth line, insert "or consolidate any two clerkships of the lower grade."

I wish to ascertain whether that language is or is not in the substitute.

Mr. BELMONT. I have already said that that is not in the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further questions of order, the question is now on agreeing to the substitute which has been read.

The substitute was agreed to.

Mr. BELMONT. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10396) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

Mr. BELMONT. I move the previous question on the amendments and ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. REED. What are the amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk had better report them.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not understand that any one has asked for the reading of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] inquired what the amendments were.

Mr. REED. I think it would be well either to have them read or that some explanation be given that we may know what the bill in its present form means.

Mr. BELMONT. The explanation is that the amendment in the nature of a substitute to conform to the ruling of the Chair has been adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can only make a statement by unanimous consent.

Several members called for the regular order.

The Clerk proceeded to read the substitute.

Mr. REED (interrupting the reading). Is this a substitute for the whole bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is a substitute for only a part of it.

Mr. BELMONT. If I may be permitted to give an explanation——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it be in order to ask a question it should be in order to answer it.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. REED. I am sorry the Democratic side does not want the bill explained.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the substitute. Before the reading was concluded,

Mr. REED withdrew the request for the reading.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not the question will be taken on the amendments in gross.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole were adopted; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. I want to say a word as to that. I have no desire to inflict upon the House the reading of these amendments. But I desire to call attention to the fact that by reason of the points of order which have been made there have been very many consuls and others deprived in this bill of their salaries. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BELMONT. They have had their salaries reduced.

Mr. REED. And, as I understand, deprived of them in some instances.

Mr. BELMONT. No; in no instance has any one been deprived of a salary.

Mr. REED. I understand points of order were made with regard to some salaries, and that those points of order struck out the paragraphs which gave those salaries, and nothing has been substituted for them.

Mr. BELMONT. They were substituted for in every case. But the gentleman from Maine is correct in saying that there have been reductions, reductions under the points of order. The House has now bound itself by rules such that either a change in the rules is absolutely necessary or else it will be incumbent upon the Senate to constantly correct the failure to make the proper appropriations in the House, which is hardly fair to the Senate, besides being a surrender to the Senate of the regulation of amounts in appropriation bills.

Mr. MILLS. But I ask the gentleman, do you not appropriate according to existing law?

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say to the gentleman from Maine that, so far as I understand this bill now, it makes exactly the same appropriations for consular and diplomatic service as regards salaries as were made by the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. REED. I do not understand it so. There are reductions that go back to seventeen hundred and something.

Mr. RANDALL. If that be so I was not present when that was done.

Mr. REED. And I object to the Senate being saddled with the making of these necesssry appropriations. It has been the custom, I am aware, and it is a custom I have adverted to several times, and I want to call attention to it again, so that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], for instance, may not forget it.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, I shall not forget it.

Mr. BELMONT. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations. I am instructed to report back the sundry civil appropriation bill with Senate amendments and the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations with regard thereto. And I ask that the amendments may be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to consider the amendments in the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. I think we had better go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from New York that there is really no division in the committee, practically, as to these amendments.

Mr. HISCOCK. The difference is that in the House the previous question may be called. There is no intention of obstructing the amendments, but I think the bill should go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no wish to call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10072) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows: They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 39, 154, 158, 172, 189, 193, 205, 206, 207, 208, 212, 218, 219, 220, 221, 229, 232, 255, 256, and 257. They recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 155, 156, 157, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 190, 191, 192, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 209, 210, 211, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 230, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 258, 259, 260, 261, and 262.

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 55, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For post-office, custom-house, and court-house at Wilmington, N. C.: For purchase of site and commencing the erection of building, $50,000.

"For court-house and post-office at Jefferson, Tex.: For purchase of site and commencing the erection of building, $25,000.

"For post-office at Houston, Tex.: For purchase of site and commencing the erection of building, $25,000."

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 58, with an amendment as follows: On page 9 of the bill, after line 2, insert the following:

"Lighting the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor: For building for engines and boilers, $10,000; incandescent-light plant, $2,500; dynamos, lamps, and lens for torch, $4,000; removing present machinery to new building, additional houses for side lamps, putting grounds in order, fencing, and incidentals, $3,000; in all, $19,500."

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 179, with an amendment as follows: After the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following:

"Elevator for the House wing of the Capitol: For the construction of an elevator, for the use of the public, in the House wing of the Capitol, to be located at the south end of the western corridor, and to run from the basement to the upper story, $12,000; and the Architect is directed to have the same completed for use by December 1, 1887."

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 231, with an amendment as follows: After the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to ascertain and report to Congress, at its next session, whether the graves of any soldiers, Union or confederate, who were killed in battle or who died in prison or hospital are not embraced in any national, city, town, or village cemetery or are unprotected by inclosures or unmarked by headstones, and, if there be any such graves, what amount of money would be necessary to properly fence and permanently mark the same."

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am ready to answer any question which any gentleman may desire to put touching these appropriations.

Mr. REED. I understand from the reading that the committee concur in but four of the Senate amendments with amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. REED. Will the chairman of the committee be good enough to tell us how many of the Senate amendments are concurred in?

Mr. RANDALL. Four with amendments, and twenty-two, I think, without amendments. The balance we non-concur in, but in a majority of cases the controversy is as to the amount of money to be appropriated.

Mr. REED. How many of the Senate amendments are there that are not concurred in?

Mr. RANDALL. Two hundred and thirty-six.

Mr. REED. Two hundred and thirty-six that are not concurred in, twenty-two that are concurred in, and four that are concurred in with amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes. In some instances the difference is radical; in others the controversy is merely as to the amount.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman tell us what are the matters of radical controversy?

Mr. RANDALL. There is the Coast Survey, the Seamen's Retreat at New York, which involves the purchase of property costing over $250,000, and the Yellowstone Park.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. What is the controversy in reference to the Yellowstone Park?

Mr. RANDALL. It is as to whether the park shall continue as now, under the control of the military, or whether we shall go back to the former practice and have it under civil control.

Mr. REED. What are the nature of the difficulties as to the Coast Survey?

Mr. RANDALL. The same exactly as existed between the two Houses last year when the House receded.

Mr. REED. It is a question of the extent of the application of the services of the Coast Survey, is it?

Mr. RANDALL. It is a question as to the number of employés, and also as to the amounts to be expended in the Coast Survey service.

Mr. REED. The House having cut down what was granted last year.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee first, and the House subsequently, have agreed to exactly the same appropriations as those of last year, but they are varied in some degree as to the service, by reason of the completion of work which was provided for last year, and the commencement this year of work not entered upon before.

Mr. REED. What is the difference of amount involved?

Mr. RANDALL. I will have to wait to have that figured out.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. While the Clerk is making that calculation I will ask the chairman of the committee whether there is any controversy over the Geological Survey.

Mr. RANDALL. There is controversy over the Geological Survey upon the question of compelling the estimates to be itemized in the future. The Senate have added language which the Committee on Appropriations fear will not meet the object the House had in view in inserting the paragraph heretofore inserted.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. May I be permitted a question?

Mr. RANDALL. I am now able to state, in reply to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that the difference in the Coast Survey is $135,000, as I learn from the clerk of the committee, who has computed it.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will there be any controversy over a Senate amendment where the appropriation only reaches the amount of the previous limit?

Mr. RANDALL. We have in no instance, I think, unless it be in the case of Houston, made any appropriation in this bill in excess of the limit. The Senate did, I think, in one instance, perhaps two, raise the limit of appropriation for a public building; and in that we have non-concurred.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Where they have not raised the limit there is no controversy?

Mr. RANDALL. There is in some instances; but that is a matter which is to be adjusted between the two Houses after conference and upon further information from the Supervising Architect. I know what the gentleman refers to—the public building at Williamsport. We have non-concurred as to that; but there is no doubt it will be satisfactorily adjusted.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, the reading of this report does not convey much information to the House as to the character of the amendments. I shall have to insist that the amendments be read.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the Clerk read.

The first amendment was read, as follows:

On page 1, after line 5, insert:

"For court-house at Aberdeen, Miss.: For heating apparatus complete, $5,000."

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to make a statement which will cover all these cases as to the heating apparatus of public buildings. There are two branches to the controversy. The estimates from the Supervising Architect on these matters did not come to the House before the 20th of December last, and as this bill was passed in the House on the 19th of that month the estimates had not been examined or even received by the committee at that time, the bill having been passed, as will be observed, at a much earlier day in the session than usual.

The second point in controversy, as to the heating apparatus of these public buildings, is in regard to the amounts to be appropriated. We want to have further examination in order to ascertain exactly the amount necessary in each case. Therefore we have recommended non-currence in the Senate amendments as to the heating apparatus in these various public buildings.

Mr. REED. Have not these amendments been referred to the committee for the express purpose of having them make an examination and report to the House?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; and we recommend non-concurrence because we think that in almost every case the work can be done for less money than the Senate has proposed.

Mr. REED. Is that the case with regard to the amendment now under consideration?

Mr. RANDALL. We think it is.

Mr. REED. Then why not non-concur with an amendment fixing the amount which the committee deem proper?

Mr. RANDALL. Because we prefer to leave that question to a conference between the two Houses.

Mr. REED. And take it away from the House?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; not take it away from the House, because the House can reject the conference report if it does not like it.

Mr. REED. Ought we not to have the benefit of the committee's opinion as to the amount which should be granted, for instance, in this particular case?

Mr. RANDALL. We think there should be a less sum appropriated than the Senate has proposed; as to how much less we are not positive, because we want to hear from the Senate the reasons which induced them to make the amount $5,000, while we think it ought to be only three or four thousand dollars.

Mr. REED. If the committee think it ought to be "three or four thousand dollars" we ought to have the benefit of the opinion of our committee on that subject.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman and the House have our recommendation. Mr. Chairman, I move non-concurrence in this amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

On page 1, after line 5, insert:

"For post-office and court-house at Augusta, Me.: For heating apparatus complete, $8,560."

Mr. RANDALL. I move non-concurrence.

Mr. REED. This is a matter in reference to which, perhaps, I have some reason to ask why this amendment should be non-concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL. For the reason that the sum proposed is, we think, larger than is necessary for the object in view.

Mr. REED. What sum does the committee think sufficient?

Mr. RANDALL. We think a much less sum will be sufficient; but we prefer not to name a definite sum until we know the reasons which prompted the Senate in fixing the amount so high.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania, before he asks for a vote on this question, will give us some of the reasons for the belief on the part of the committee that this amount is too high. What is the report of the Architect?

Mr. RANDALL. I will make a statement as to all these matters. Outside of the recent estimate to which I have heretofore referred we have had many estimates from the Department in relation to heating apparatus for public buildings. A careful examination has induced us to believe that, without damage to the public interests, a much less sum may be appropriated in these cases than the Architect has recommended. As to these matters, therefore, which did not come under the consideration of the committee originally before the passage of the bill in the House, we are guided by the same rule on which we acted in regard to cases that we thoroughly investigated.

Mr. REED. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will give the House some reasons why he considers the amount too large.

Mr. RANDALL. I was willing——

Mr. REED. We are to vote on it, and we ought to have something to guide us beside these generalizations.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a vote.

Mr. REED. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the first question to be put.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 79.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The third amendment was read, as follows:

For purchase of ground on which to erect a public building in Camden, N. J., $40,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. REED. That is to be concurred in. I hope the gentleman will give us a reason for it.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a law for it; that is the reason.

Mr. REED. What is the law?

Mr. RANDALL. It authorizes the construction of a public building at Camden, N. J.

Mr. REED. Is there a law for appropriating $40,000 for the purchase of that ground?

Mr. RANDALL. No, there is not.

Mr. REED. Why is it then the sum here for Camden, N. J., is so large while the amount for Augusta, Me., is so small?

Mr. RANDALL. Because we are advised by gentlemen from New Jersey who represent the city of Camden that amount is necessary for the purchase of a site.

Mr. REED. This then is under the advice of gentlemen from New Jersey.

Mr. RANDALL. I so understand.

Mr. REED. Was the advice of the gentleman who represents Augusta asked?

Mr. RANDALL. He did not come to us.

Mr. REED. Then the advice is taken only of those who go to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; the industrious always fare the best. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. When it is asked here on the floor there seems to be a difference then?

Mr. BURROWS. Ask, and thou shalt receive. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. But when it is asked on the floor it is not given.

Mr. RANDALL. We have done by the bill the best we could.

Mr. REED. But does not the gentleman intend to give us any reason?

Mr. RANDALL. I gave you a reason and a fact, both.

The amendment was concurred in.

The fourth amendment was read, as follows:

For custom-house at Charleston, S. C.: For taking down stone and brick work on east and west porticos, restoring broken balustrade and other broken stone-work, and rebuilding the same, including the replacing of slating, $11,500; for other exterior repairs, $500; in all, $12,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The fifth amendment was read, as follows:

For custom-house and post-office at Chicago, Ill.: For furnishing and putting in place iron tie-rods to strengthen the building, $35,000; for balance for repairing stone-work, $35,000; for ventilation of building, $9,000; and for necessary painting to interior of building, $5,000; in all, $84,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I move to concur, and I wait for information.

Mr. RANDALL. Last year they asked for $94,000 and received $50,000. This year in addition they asked $167,400, and the Senate has only given $84,000 and has designated how that money shall be expended. Under that there is provided about $84,000, but the question is as to some other items.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves non-concurrence in the appropriation of $84,000 when he says there is not the slighest controversy.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a controversy, because, as we have heard, certainly every one of the members from Illinois think $84,000 ought to be increased.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether his intention is to endeavor to get it increased?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know. I am not bound to say what my intentions are. I can say my judgment is the amount will not be less than $84,000.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The only difference between this amendment and the one which we have passed and in which concurrence was moved is that is to restore a building partially torn down and this is to prevent a building from falling down.

Mr. RANDALL. There were reasons which must strike everybody in view of what has occurred at Charleston, S. C., why we should give that appropriation.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to say, for the first part of the appropriation provided in this amendment, I know it is an imperative necessity, and it ought not to escape the attention of the conference committee, if it goes to conference.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no desire to delay the House. I move to non-concur.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to say in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that I feel confident myself the amount appropriated by the Senate is inadequate to make the building as secure as necessary and also to improve its sanitary and other conditions. But I have been content to allow the question to go to the committee of conference in the hope that the amount would be increased rather than diminished.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to ask, as a parliamentary inquiry, whether it is possible, where the Senate has made an amendment to the bill inserting $84,000, to increase that amount in conference?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then I withdraw the motion.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The sixth amendment was read, as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Clarksburg, W. Va.: For heating apparatus complete, $5,940.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RANDALL. If there be no objection I suggest that the Clerk read right along with the amendments.

Mr. REED. He is reading right along. But the gentleman from West Virginia wants to address the House.

Mr. RANDALL. And when we reach an amendment where the recommendation of the committee is objected to that then the reading be suspended until that question is considered. Otherwise, where objection is not made or a separate voted emanded, it shall be considered that the recommendations of the committee are acceded to.

Mr. REED. It is understood that the Clerk will read the recommendations of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that to be part of the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and unless objection be made that request will be considered as agreed to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOFF. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but I want to ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this particular item. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if the amount appropriated in this amendment of the Senate is not exactly the amount recommended by the Treasury Department for this purpose?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOFF. Then why do the committee recommend non-concurrence in the amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. Because we think the Department has recommended too much.

Mr. REED. Do they recommend too much in this case?

Mr. RANDALL. The committee think so.

Mr. REED. Does the Committee on Appropriations inform the House that too much has been requested in this case?

Mr. RANDALL. I have already answered that question.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Pennsylvania undoubtedly thinks he has answered it.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought I had. The gentleman from West Virginia asked the question and I answered it.

Mr. REED. It does not strike me that way.

Mr. RANDALL. I would not strike the gentleman under any circumstances.

Mr. REED. You do frequently. [Laughter.]

What I want to know is whether the committee have any information to give to the House tending to show that this amount is excessive.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee have experience that the recommendations of the Department in these particulars have in times past been excessive; and further by experience have discovered that where they reduced the amount the work has been done for the amount given.

Mr. REED. Then the gentleman's objection is not derived from information as to this particular case, but is a general proposition. Is that your idea?

Mr. RANDALL. That is your idea.

Mr. REED. Well, is it yours?

Mr. RANDALL. I can not say that it is. I think we are well advised about everything we have done in this bill.

Mr. REED. But the House wants to be advised. We have to vote upon it; and if the chairman of the committee says that he can not give us the information, who, then, will inform us?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman knows that the House can reverse the action of the committee if they see proper.

Mr. REED. But they may not want to reverse it if they have the information on which the committee acted. It is important that they should have the information in order to enable them to act. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania can either give or refuse the information. I am asking him for the facts upon which the committee bases its recommendation, and he refuses to give them; and I call attention to the fact that he refuses us the information.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not uneasy about refusing it.

Mr. REED. No; not the least in the world. With your large majority back of you you are uneasy about nothing.

Mr. RANDALL. Nor do I get worried or uneasy about such mannerisms as the gentleman assumes.

Mr. REED. The object I have is to discover what the facts are on which to base our action; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in response to direct inquiries, has repeatedly refused information, either because he has not the information or will not give it.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, the facts are these: that this report comes practically with the unanimous vote of the committee.

Mr. REED. But the House wants to know it all the same.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course; and we have examined and have determined not to recommend the amount; and I have told you over and over again the reasons. We think the amount placed in the bill by the Senate is too large. I do not see how a more specific answer could be given.

Mr. REED. But what is the reason in this particular instance?

Mr. RANDALL. The same as in all of these instances; there are plenty of them.

Mr. REED. But what is the reason in this instance? We have to pass on each amendment.

A MEMBER. Find out.

Mr. REED. I am trying to find out.

Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. RANDALL. I refer the gentleman to my colleague on the committee on that side of the House.

Mr. CANNON. While I am one of the minority members of the committee, I am not a member of the subcommittee which prepared this bill. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], not now in his seat, is a member of that subcommittee. What investigation the subcommittee gave touching these items I know not. So far as the full committee is concerned, if any investigation was made by it I am not aware. I apprehend the fact to be that the committee has not made the inquiry, and certainly, so far as I am concerned, I have made no inquiry, nor has any been made in my hearing specifically as to how much ought to be given to finish this building. Whether other members of the committee have made that inquiry I can not say.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, I want to say a word to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. If I remember aright there is not any estimate for some of these appropriations at all. They have been arbitrarily inserted by the Senate, and we have non-concurred in them.

Mr. GOFF. I desire to state that in this particular instance, this building being in process of construction, the amount of money necessary has been ascertained by an agent of the Department sent for that purpose, or rather authorized and directed by the Architect for that purpose; and his report is approved by the Architect and confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and it is requested that this specific amount be appropriated. Now, why should it not be done?

Mr. RANDALL. The estimate about this post-office has never been received by either House, so far as I know.

Mr. GOFF. It has been received by the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate, and I understood the chairman of the House committee to say a moment ago it had been received there.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not certain about that; but I know that there are some appropriations that have been put in here arbitrarily.

Mr. GOFF. This is not one of them. It is only a matter of $6,000. I move to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The question being taken, the Chairman stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. GOFF. I call for a division.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 67.

Mr. GOFF. No quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman make the point of no quorum?

Mr. REED. We may as well have a vote; if we can not get any information we can vote. Perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be better up in his lesson to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. By whom was the point of no quorum made?

The CHAIRMAN. By the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to inconvenience any of the members of the House, and I move that the committee rise.

Mr. REED. Very well; if we can not get information we may go.

Mr. RANDALL. You will have time to find it out.

Mr. REED. I was in hopes of finding it out through the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but after an experience of years I am afraid I shall give up that hope.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman had better give up.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10072) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect of that Department, asking that a deficiency appropriation of $1,000 be made for plans of public buildings for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and that an additional appropriation of $4,000 be made for plans of public buildings for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, instead of $2,500, as in the estimates already submitted; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

State of Maine—Resolves in relation to our trade relations with the Dominion of Canada.

That whereas the Dominion Government has placed such interpretation upon existing treaties, and has recently enacted legislation in support of the same, as greatly abridge the just rights and privileges of American fishermen in Canadian waters, and said interpretation and legislation having received the sanction of the Imperial Government; and

Whereas the course pursued by the officials of the Dominion of Canada during the past year, in their treatment of American fishing vessels entering within its jurisdiction, has been in direct violation of the principles of comity and good neighborhood that ought to exist in respect to nations having friendly commercial intercourse each with the other; and

Whereas the protection of our fishing industry is of paramount importance to the people of Maine: Therefore,

Resolved, That if the Canadian Government shall continue the same vindictive and aggressive line of policy that has marked her course for the year last past, the Legislature of Maine, now in session, favors the enactment of such laws, and the adoption of such rules and regulations, on the part of our Government, and the strict enforcement of the same as shall place their fishermen coming within the jurisdiction of the United States under the same interdictions as regards rights and privileges of harbor, the purchase of supplies and bait, and trade and traffic of whatever sort or character, as our fishermen are subjected to by the established rules and regulations and recently enacted laws of the Dominion Government, and that for the further protection of our fishing industry an increased duty be levied upon the fish which Canada sends to the United States, to such extent, if need be, as to practically exclude her fishermen from the advantages of our markets.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be forwarded to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and by them laid before their respective bodies.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I shall not object to the Senator submitting remarks if he desires to do so.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is his purpose, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Minnesota will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SABIN. Mr. President, the privileges sought to be conferred by the bill now under consideration are in perfect harmony with the policy which has long obtained in national legislation, and the propriety of granting them under proper restrictions can not be questioned.

Surrounded, as the various Indian reservations are, on all sides by vast communities of our own people, they are naturally found barring the way of commerce along many of its most natural and advantageous routes.

These commercial routes may be utilized under judicious regulations without serious impairment of the beneficial use of the reservations by the beneficiaries—the Indian wards of the nation.

The previous policy of the Government in matters of this kind would be satisfied by such restrictions as are calculated to protect the Indian from any undue encroachment upon his rights, but in my judgment the time has arrived when Congress should have a care not only for the Indian but the white man, whose property is and must be of equal concern to the nation.

No road will ever be run through any reservation under the authority of this proposed law except for the purpose of reaching communities of our own citizens, and with them establishing the relation of common carriers.

Heretofore it has been the policy of Congress to encourage the establishment of railway communications by munificent grants of public domain and loan of credit, without pausing long to inquire what, if any, restraints were required to secure for the future a faithful employment of the vast privileges and wealth so conferred upon the recipients of its bounty.

National necessities, arising out of an imperiled Union, and vast natural barriers, which deterred the employment of private capital were found, and to this day are esteemed to have been of sufficient magnitude to warrant Congress in adopting that broad public policy which has resulted in binding together the Union with trans-continental lines of railway, at whatever cost.

But to-day we are brought face to face with questions that have heretofore been held in abeyance—questions arising out of the authority of Congress to regulate commerce between the several States. In my opinion the extraordinary situation of the nation which justified our previous policy no longer exists, and further grants of privileges to corporations as common carriers should be considered in the light of their relations to these new questions now pressing upon the attention of Congress.

The authority sought to be conferred by this bill will, in the nature of things, be chiefly available to corporations organized under the laws of the States and Territories, and consequently any regulation by Congress of their use of these privileges must be sought by means of conditions imposed upon the exercise of the grant, rather than by direct legislation seeking to affect their chartered rights under State laws.

The amendment which I propose is as follows:

Provided, That no railway shall be constructed within or through any Indian reservation or other lands mentioned in this act until the estimated actual cost of its construction and equipment for successful operation, in cash, shall have been first submitted to any interstate-commerce commission created by Congress, or in case no such commission exists, then to the Secretary of the Interior, and by said commission or secretary approved, as a fair and reasonable sum required therefor; and if any railway corporation entering upon said lands and thereon constructing and equipping for operation a railway shall pay or promise to pay for such construction or equipment a sum, either in cash or other property at its cash value, or in its capital stock or bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness, at their par value, an amount in excess of the cost so estimated and approved, or in excess of such further sum as may be approved by said commission or secretary as necessary to be expended in good faith for said construction and equipment for successful operation, then the right of said corporation, its successors and assigns, and all others claiming by, through, or under them or either of them under this act shall cease and determine without any further act or ceremony whatever, and all rights, privileges, and property of said corporations within said lands or reservations, from whatever source obtained, shall become forfeited to the United States, and the circuit or district court of the United States for the judicial district in which said lands or any of them may lie shall have jurisdiction on complaint of the United States to award the possession of said lands so occupied, and the said rights, privileges, and property to the United States, and to oust the said corporations, their successors and assigns, and all others claiming by, through, or under them therefrom.

It will be observed that the whole scope of the proposed amendment is to prevent a fictitious capitalization of roads availing themselves of this law as far as can be done in an enactment of this character.

The same reasons which justify Congress in imposing these conditions upon this proposed grant justify similar restrictions upon all other portions of every road; but inasmuch as Congress may not in the exercise of its authority, especially in this bill, reach other roads, there seems to be no reason why the attitude of Congress upon this question should not be made known by this or some other proper amendment.

What, then, are the reasons that justify this amendment? Or, in other words, why should Congress interfere, wherever its authority can be exercised, to prevent a corporation, being a common carrier, from issuing any amount of stock or bonds its owners may desire?

The answer is found in the experience our people have had in the railroad transportation.

The owners of the road have a right to impose such charges as will bring to them a fair return on their investment. The stock and bonds form the basis for this estimate, and if inflated the criterion of what is a reasonable rate for transportation is destroyed.

According to a recent writer the capital ostensibly invested in railroads in the United States on January 1, 1884, was about $8,400,000,000, at the rate of $60,000 per mile (Hadley R., Trans., chapter 1, page 259).

These estimates accord with the conclusion of other investigations. Substantially one-half of this vast amount is fictitious.

Authorities agree that $30,000 per mile, or less, will cover the average cost of all the railroads in the country, including equipment.

The system of Granger roads in the Northwest has, according to my information, been built at a cost of not over $15,000 per mile.

The Manitoba Road is expending its bonds for the construction of new roads at the rate of $15,000 per mile of single track, although it is capitalized on a basis of from $35,000 to $40,000 per mile. Its net earnings per mile in 1884 were $3,228.78, paying nearly 10 per cent. on its total capitalization, and over 20 per cent. on its actual cost.

The net earnings per mile of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul road for the same year were $2,010.75, enabling it to pay all interest on its $100,000,000 bonded indebtedness at rates at from 5 to 7 per cent., and also declare a dividend of 7 per cent. on all its common and preferred stock, amounting to about $48,000,000; making its aggregate earnings for 1884, according to Poor's Manual, $9,611,369.85 on a capitalization of $150,000,000, or a real value of less than half that sum.

The various reorganizations of the Northern Pacific has enlarged its capitalization to the sum of $150,000,000 on an aggregate mileage of 2,546 miles, or about $60,000 per mile.

The great stretches of country through which its mileages extend and which furnishes no local traffic, has reduced its net receipts per mile to the sum of $2,546.84 for the year 1884.

No sufficient data are within my reach to justify decided opinion as to the actual cost of this road. Considering the mountainous ranges it has surmounted it may be safely assumed that the relative cost to capitalization is somewhat greater than in the Granger roads. In the case of this road it is not probable that the net earnings for 1884 of about 4 per cent. on its total stock and bonded indebtedness represents more than 7 per cent. of its actual cost.

Mr. Hudson estimates that of the $126,000,000 of the Wabash system one-half is water, and that $19,000,000 of the $46,000,000 of the Chicago and Northwestern road is fictitious.

The same writer estimates the actual cash investments in trans-Mississippi roads to be less than one-third of the actual capitalization.

Passing to the leading trunk lines of the East the figures are equally startling, but so well known that I do not feel warranted in rehearsing them in detail.

Mr. Hudson estimates that of a total capitalization of $1,466,000,000 of fifteen leading lines east of the Mississippi $596,000,000 is water—capitalization created out of nothing. If his estimate had been confined to those main trunk lines over which the commerce of the West passes to Eastern and foreign markets, the ratio of fiction to reality would doubtless surpass the trans-Mississippi's.

Without pausing to make further survey of the arithmetic of this problem we may safely conclude that the privileges to be granted by this bill will be made for extending into new fields similar methods of railway management, and thereby bring under this iniquitous dominion those vast regions in the West yet to be furnished with railway facilities.

Is it not the duty of Congress to exert its utmost to save the people from this bondage?

The consequences of this excessive capitalization of railway enterprises are varied and of the most vital importance to the poople.

The necessity for paying a fair return on the aggregate capital stock and bonded indebtedness of a railway requires the levying of rates based on the necessities of the corporations rather than upon the real value of the property employed and the services performed, and fictitious capitalization is thus made the basis of regulating tariffs.

The man who honestly puts his money into a road gets, as a rule, little or no return therefor, without his neighbor, the holder of the watered stock or fictitious capitalization, gets an equal sum. Moreover, exorbitant returns from actual investments breeds competing lines, and the traffic which one road could handle is divided among two or more.

To support these two competitors the traffic is charged, ostensibly, "with what it will bear," but in reality what it will not bear; this results in a consequent reduction of business which must still be divided among the various competitors, thus leading to the pernicious practice of rate cutting, and finally partitioning of business, and re-establishment of excessive rates—for in such a contest a road honestly capitalized can always win against an adversary with a fictitious capital, until the latter, thereby driven into insolvency, runs wild, and becomes in its turn a fatal foe to the honest road.

This is well illustrated by the overcapitalization of the Buffalo and West Shore, whereby it was so weakened that a few months of war waged against it by the New York Central sent it into bankruptcy.

This plethory of railway facilities, itself the result of excessive capitalization, naturally leads to the combined railway operation known as the "railway pool," by which competing roads make an arbitrary division among themselves of either the business or the proceeds of the business.

This pooling agreement, as I am given to understand, is but a modern formation of those numberless gambling contracts which is uniformly declared to be illegal, and to enforce which the parties are left to their resources. But, independent of its illegality, its consequences are disastrous to the public interests and sufficient of themselves to spur every competent authority to the most energetic efforts to remove its chief cause, namely, the fictitious capitalization of railway property.

A railway pool has a tendency to deprive the public of the benefits of improvements in railway service beneficial to the public, although the roads themselves may lessen the expense of their business by adopting improved methods as they become known; but improvements of mere convenience to the public, not lessening he cost of railway service, need not be adopted by a road that is assured of its share of the business—thus mean and insufficient accommodations for the public are the natural consequences.

The concerted action of members of the pool may practically destroy all the advantages of enterprise, in developing new methods of business, as is well illustrated in the dressed meat traffic, where a rate 70 per cent. higher than the live-stock rate was imposed for the double purpose of using old cattle cars and perpetuating the burden of transporting waste material.

A pool once established enables managers of roads to "bear" the stock market through secret cutting rates by which railway wars are instituted and the market value of their stocks greatly impaired, to the loss of innocent holders.

The natural advantages of a given road, the benefits of which should be shared by the community tributary to and supporting it are, by pooling agreements, deflected to other communities and roads less favorably situated, and thus not only the patrons of the road but the value of its stock, and possibly its bonds, are sacrificed to competing lines.

The history of railroad business furnishes instances where stockholders have successfully appealed to the courts for protection against a diversion of the earnings of their road to other corporations less favorably situated, by virtue of pooling agreements.

Uniformity in the course of trade is at the mercy of pooling roads, as was well illustrated some years since when the rate of 15 cents on wheat from Chicago was, on the institution of the original trunk line pool, raised to 45 cents.

When it is remembered, also, that pooling contracts affect only traffic at competitive points, leaving local non-competitive traffic to be burdened at the mercy of each road as occasion may require, to enable it to make up losses incurred elsewhere, including sacrifices on its legitimate business at competitive points, the resulting discrimination between persons and places is astounding.

Railway officials and others have defined the purpose of pooling agreements to be the suppression of railway wars and the securing of uniform rates, but its history shows the object to be suppression of competition for competitive traffic and the maintenance of arbitrary rates.

Such agreements are brought into being by railway wars among roads that must maintain unjust rates to support fictitious capitalization, and it often happens that large shippers, to relieve themselves from extortionate charges, direct their entire shipments over the line of some one member of a pool, thus exciting the suspicion of the other members, who in turn resort to secret rate cutting for protection, thus gradually involving themselves in renewed controversy.

These considerations are not new, nor do I urge them as novel propositions, but as recognized facts pertinent to the consideration of the amendment under discussion.

It is not too much to say that if the railroads of the country were not compelled to realize out of their business sufficient to pay a reasonable return on more than the property actually invested in their business, Congress would not be called upon to consider the present interstate-commerce bill—the long and short haul—and pooling questions would not be the pressing vital questions of public concern they are found to be.

If it be urged that this amendment will deter the construction of new roads in the West, I have to say that there is an abundance of capital ready to seek an honest investment wherever a road can be supported by the business naturally tributary thereto; and such capital is much more likely to seek investment when it is secure of all its legitimate returns than when its rights are exposed to destruction of the manipulation of scheming railway projectors, whose only expectation is to exchange their experience for others' money.

This amendment indeed falls far short of accomplishing all that in my judgment is desired but it furnishes an opportunity for the Senate to array itself against the most radical railway management, and give the people some assurance that this branch of the National Legislature sympathizes with their wrongs, and is ready as opportunity may offer to protect them against further encroachments from arbitrary and grasping corporate management.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, with the amendment, will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS I rise to a privileged question, to submit a conference report, but as it will take some time to read it, if there is further ordinary morning business I will yield to that.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (S. 3322) granting a pension to Jane E. Letts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 3323) granting a pension to Patrick Flaherty; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 3324) extending the land laws of the United States over the lands formerly included in the Arredondo grant, and to confirm titles to lands therein; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CALL. I move that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. The Arredondo grant is an old private-land claim.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Vermont is perhaps mistaken, though I do not care anything about the reference. The Arredondo grant disappeared on the issuance of scrip, under a decision of the Supreme Court, and never had a location and a place practically. The lands covered by it became public lands under the decision of the Supreme Court, as I said, by reason of the scrip issue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The point is to pay the old Arredondo claimants on account of their private-land claims.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not understand that to be the case. They have already had their certificates. I suppose the bill has reference to land embraced within the limits of the former Arredondo grant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that is correct the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands, but I thought it was a revival or survival of the fittest in providing for the old claimants some further relief. How is it, I ask the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Kansas is right in his statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the bill ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 3325) for the relief of Henrietta V. Minnix; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GIBSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3326) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. Anna Holmes Bernard, of the parish of East Baton Rouge, Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STANFORD introduced a bill (S. 3327) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. SAWYER (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. DOLPH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, authorized to sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the recess of Congress at such places in the United States as they may deem proper; and that they be, and they are hereby, authorized to inquire into the laws and regulations governing the expenditure of moneys appropriated for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and the supervision and auditing of the accounts for such expenditure, and the manner in which such expenditures are made, and the accounts therefor audited, and the character, importance, and condition of the works in progress for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and all matters connected with the subject of the improvement of the water ways of the country, with power to administer oaths and take testimony, to employ a stenographer and a clerk, and to appoint a sergeant-at-arms from the messengers of the Senate; and that the actual necessary expenses of the said committee, properly incurred in the execution of this resolution, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate in the usual manner, upon the order of the chairman of the committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10396) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (H. R. 2646) granting to the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company the right to lay its track through United States lock and dam property in the Great Kanawha Valley, State of West Virginia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida rise to morning business?

Mr. CALL. I ask for the consideration of the resolution offered by me yesterday, which went over under the rule on objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order, there being a conference report pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have a conference report to submit, and it is important that it shall be disposed of to-day. At the suggestion of my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] I yield for the purpose of allowing the Chair to lay before the Senate the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, in order that it may be printed and referred.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10396) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

POLYGAMY AND AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now submit the report from the conference committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 10, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes,' approved March 22, 1882," respectfully report:

That, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses that the bill be amended as follows:

In place of the part of the bill proposed by the House of Representatives to be stricken out, and in place of the words proposed by the House of Representatives to be inserted, the following words be substituted, and that so amended, the bill pass:

SEC. 1. That in any proceeding or examination before a grand jury, a judge, justice, or a United States commissioner, or a court, in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, the lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called, but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be; and such witness shall not be permitted to testify as to any statement or communication made by either husband or wife to each other, during the existence of the marriage relation, deemed confidential at common law.

SEC. 2. That in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, whether before a United States commissioner, justice, judge, a grand jury, or any court, an attachment for any witness may be issued by the court, judge, or commissioner, without a previous subpœna, compelling the immediate attendance of such witness, when it shall appear by oath or affirmation, to the commissioner, justice, judge, or court, as the case may be, that there is reasonable ground to believe that such witness will unlawfully fail to obey a subpœna issued and served in the usual course in such cases; and in such case the usual witness-fee shall be paid to such witness so attached: Provided, That the person so attached may at any time secure his or her discharge from custody by executing a recognizance, with sufficient surety, conditioned for the appearance of such person at the proper time, as a witness in the cause or proceeding wherein the attachment may be issued.

SEC. 3. That whoever commits adultery shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years; and when the act is committed between a married woman and a man who is unmarried, both parties to such act shall be deemed guilty of adultery; and when such act is committed between a married man and a woman who is unmarried, the man shall be deemed guilty of adultery.

SEC. 4. That if any person related to another person within and not including the fourth degree of consanguinity computed according to the rules of the civil law, shall marry or cohabit with, or have sexual intercourse with such other so related person, knowing her or him to be within said degree of relationship, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of incest, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than three years and not more than fifteen years.

SEC. 5. That if an unmarried man or woman commit fornication, each of them shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by fine not exceeding $100.

SEC. 6. That all laws of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah which provide that prosecutions for adultery can only be commenced on the complaint of the husband or wife are hereby disapproved and annulled; and all prosecutions for adultery may hereafter be instituted in the same way that prosecutions for other crimes are.

SEC. 7. That commissioners appointed by the supreme court and district courts in the Territory of Utah shall possess and may exercise all the powers and jurisdiction that are or may be possessed or exercised by justices of the peace in said Territory under the laws thereof, and the same powers conferred by law on commissioners appointed by circuit courts of the United States.

SEC. 8. That the marshal of said Territory of Utah, and his deputies, shall possess and may exercise all the powers in executing the laws of the United States or of said Territory possessed and exercised by sheriffs, constables, and their deputies as peace officers; and each of them shall cause all offenders against the law, in his view, to enter into recognizance to keep the peace and to appear at the next term of the court having jurisdiction of the case, and to commit to jail in case of failure to give such recognizance. They shall quell and suppress assaults and batteries, riots, routs, affrays, and insurrections.

SEC. 9. That every ceremony of marriage, or in the nature of a marriage ceremony, of any kind, in any of the Territories of the United States, whether either or both or more of the parties to such ceremony be lawfully competent to be the subjects of such marriage or ceremony or not, shall be certified by a certificate stating the fact and nature of such ceremony, the full names of each of the parties concerned, and the full name of every officer, priest, and person, by whatever style or designation called or known, in any way taking part in the performance of such ceremony, which certificate shall be drawn up and signed by the parties to such ceremony and by every officer, priest, and person taking part in the performance of such ceremony, and shall be by the officer, priest, or other person solemnizing such marriage or ceremony filed in the office of the probate court, or, if there be none, in the office of the court having probate powers in the county or district in which such ceremony shall take place, for record, and shall be immediately recorded, and be at all times subject to inspection, as other public records. Such certificate, or the record thereof, or a duly certified copy of such record, shall be prima facie evidence of the facts required by this act to be stated therein, in any proceeding, civil or criminal, in which the matter shall be drawn in question. Any person who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not longer than two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 10. That nothing in this act shall be held to prevent the proof of marriages, whether lawful or unlawful, by any evidence now legally admissible for that purpose.

SEC. 11. That the laws enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah which provide for or recognize the capacity of illegitimate children to inherit or to be entitled to any distributive share in the estate of the father of any such illegitimate child are hereby disapproved and annulled; and no illegitimate child shall hereafter be entitled to inherit from his or her father or to receive any distributive share in the estate of his or her father: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any illegitimate child born within twelve months after the passage of this act, nor to any child made legitimate by the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882.

SEC. 12. That the laws enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah conferring jurisdiction upon probate courts, or the judges thereof, or any of them, in said Territory, other than in respect of the estates of deceased persons, and in respect of the guardianship of the persons and property of infants, and in respect of the persons and property of persons not of sound mind, are hereby disapproved and annulled; and no probate court or judge of probate shall exercise any jurisdiction, other than in respect of the matters aforesaid, except as a member of a county court; and every such jurisdiction so by force of this act withdrawn from the said probate courts or judges shall be had and exercised by the district courts of said Territory respectively.

SEC. 13. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to institute and prosecute proceedings to forfeit and escheat to the United States the property of corporations obtained or held in violation of section 3 of the act of Congress approved the 1st day of July, 1862, entitled "An act to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the Territories of the United States and other places, and disapproving and annulling certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah," or in violation of section 1890 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and all such property so forfeited and escheated to the United States shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds thereof applied to the use and benefit of the common schools in the Territory in which such property may be: Provided, That no building or the grounds appurtenant thereto, which is held and occupied exclusively for purposes of the worship of God, or parsonage connected therewith, or burial ground, shall be forfeited.

SEC. 14. That in any proceeding for the enforcement of the provisions of law against corporations or associations acquiring or holding property in any Territory of the United States in excess of the amount limited by law, the court before which such proceeding may be instituted shall have power in a summary way to compel the production of all books, records, papers, and documents of or belonging to any trustee or person holding or controlling or managing property in which such corporation may have any right, title, or interest whatever.

SEC. 15. That all laws of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, or of the so-called government of the state of Deseret, creating, organizing, amending, or continuing the corporation or association called the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company are hereby disapproved and annulled; and the said corporation, in so far as it may now have, or pretend to have, any legal existence, is hereby dissolved; and it shall not be lawful for the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah to create, organize, or in any manner recognize any such corporation or association, or to pass any law for the purpose of or operating to accomplish the bringing of persons into the said Territory for any purpose whatsoever.

SEC. 16. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to cause such proceedings to be taken in the supreme court of the Territory of Utah as shall be proper to carry into effect the provisions of the preceding section, and pay the debts and to dispose of the property and assets of said corporation according to law. Said property and assets, in excess of the debts and the amount of any lawful claims established by the court against the same, shall escheat to the United States, and shall be taken, invested, and disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the benefit of common schools in said Territory.

SEC. 17. That the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah incorporating, continuing, or providing for the corporation known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and the ordinance of the so-called general assembly of the state of Deseret incorporating the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, so far as the same may now have legal force and validity, are hereby disapproved and annulled, and the said corporation, in so far as it may now have, or pretend to have, any legal existence, is hereby dissolved. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to cause such proceedings to be taken in the supreme court of the Territory of Utah as shall be proper to execute the foregoing provisions of this section and to wind up the affairs of said corporation conformably to law; and in such proceedings the court shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to make such decree or decrees as shall be proper to effectuate the transfer of the title to real property now held and used by said corporation for places of worship, and parsonages connected therewith, and burial grounds, and of the description mentioned in the proviso to section 13 of this act and in section 26 of this act, to the respective trustees mentioned in section 26 of this act; and for the purposes of this section said court shall have all the powers of a court of equity.

SEC. 18. (a) A widow shall be endowed of the third part of all the lands whereof her husband was seized of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage, unless she shall have lawfully released her right thereto.

(b) The widow of any alien who at the time of his death shall be entitled by law to hold any real estate, if she be an inhabitant of the Territory at the time of such death, shall be entitled to dower of such estate in the same manner as if such alien had been a native citizen.

(c) If a husband seized of an estate of inheritance in lands exchanges them for other lands, his widow shall not have dower of both, but shall make her election to be endowed of the lands given or of those taken in exchange; and if such election be not evinced by the commencement of proceedings to recover her dower of the lands given in exchange within one year after the death of her husband, she shall be deemed to have elected to take her dower of the lands received in exchange.

(d) When a person seized of an estate of inheritance in lands shall have executed a mortgage, or other conveyance in the nature of mortgage, of such estate, before marriage, his widow shall nevertheless be entitled to dower out of the lands mortgaged or so conveyed, as against every person except the mortgagee or grantee in such conveyance and those claiming under him.

(e) Where a husband shall purchase lands during coverture, and shall at the same time execute a mortgage, or other conveyance in the nature of mortgage, of his estate in such lands to secure the payment of the purchase-money, his widow shall not be entitled to dower out of such lands, as against the mortgagee or grantee in such conveyance or those claiming under him, although she shall not have united in such mortgage; but she shall be entitled to her dower in such lands as against all other persons.

(f) Where in such case the mortgagee, or such grantee or those claiming under him, shall, after the death of the husband of such widow, cause the land mortgaged or so conveyed to be sold, either under a power of sale contained in the mortgage or such conveyance or by virtue of the decree of a court, if any surplus shall remain after payment of the moneys due on such mortgage or such conveyance, and the costs and charges of the sale, such widow shall nevertheless be entitled to the interest or income of the one-third part of such surplus for her life, as her dower.

(g) A widow shall not be endowed of lands conveyed to her husband by way of mortgage unless he acquire an absolute estate therein during the marriage period.

(h) In case of divorce dissolving the marriage contract for the misconduct of the wife, she shall not be endowed.

SEC. 19. That hereafter the judge of probate in each county within the Territory of Utah provided for by the existing laws thereof shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and so much of the laws of said Territory as provide for the election of such judge by the Legislative Assembly are hereby disapproved and annulled.

SEC. 20. That it shall not be lawful for any female to vote at any election hereafter held in the Territory of Utah for any public purpose whatever, and no such vote shall be received or counted or given effect in any manner whatever; and any and every act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah providing for or allowing the registration or voting by females is hereby annulled.

SEC. 21. That all laws of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah which provide for numbering or identifying the votes of the electors at any election in said Territory are hereby disapproved and annulled; but the foregoing provision shall not preclude the lawful registration of voters, or any other provisions for securing fair elections which do not involve the disclosure of the candidates for whom any particular elector shall have voted.

SEC. 22. That the existing election districts and apportionments of representation concerning the members of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah are hereby abolished; and it shall be the duty of the governor, Territorial secretary, and the board of commissioners mentioned in section 9 of the act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," in said Territory, forthwith to redistrict said Territory, and apportion representation in the same in such manner as to provide as nearly as may be for an equal representation of the people (excepting Indians not taxed), being citizens of the United States, according to numbers, in said Legislative Assembly, and to the number of members of the council and house of representatives, respectively, as now established by law; and a record of the establishment of such new districts and the apportionment of representation thereto shall be made in the office of the secretary of said Territory, and such establishment and representation shall continue until Congress shall otherwise provide; and no persons other than citizens of the United States otherwise qualified shall be entitled to vote at any election in said Territory.

SEC. 23. That the provisions of section 9 of said act approved March 22, 1882, in regard to registration and election officers, and the registration of voters, and the conduct of elections, and the powers and duties of the board therein mentioned, shall continue and remain operative until the provisions and laws therein referred to be made and enacted by the Legislative Assembly of said Territory of Utah shall have been made and enacted by said Assembly and shall have been approved by Congress.

SEC. 24. That every male person twenty-one years of age, resident in the Territory of Utah shall, as a condition precedent to his right to register or vote at any election in said Territory, take and subscribe an oath or affirmation, before the registration officer of his voting precinct, that he is over twenty-one years of age, and has resided in the Territory of Utah for six months then last passed and in the precinct for one month immediately preceding the date thereof, and that he is a native-born (or naturalized, as the case may be) citizen of the United States, and further state in such oath or affirmation his full name, with his age, place of business, his status, whether single or married, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife, and that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and will faithfully obey the laws thereof, and especially will obey the act of Congress, approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," and will also obey this act in respect of the crimes in said act defined and forbidden, and that he will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise, any other person to commit any of said crimes. Such registration officer is authorized to administer said oath or affirmation; and all such oaths or affirmations shall be by him delivered to the clerk of the probate court of the proper county, and shall be deemed public records therein. But if any election shall occur in said Territory before the next revision of the registration lists as required by law, the said oath or affirmation shall be administered by the presiding judge of the election precinct on or before the day of election. As a condition precedent to the right to hold office in or under said Territory, the officer, before entering on the duties of his office, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation declaring his full name, with his age, place of business, his status, whether married or single, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife, and that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and will faithfully obey the laws thereof, and especially will obey the act of Congress, approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," and will also obey this act in respect of the crimes in said act defined and forbidden, and that he will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise, any other person to commit any of said crimes; which oath or affirmation shall be recorded in the proper office and indorsed on the commission or certificate of appointment. All grand and petit jurors in said Territory shall take the same oath or affirmation, to be administered, in writing or orally, in the proper court. No person shall be entitled to vote in any election in said Territory, or be capable of jury service, or hold any office of trust or emolument in said Territory, who shall not have taken the oath or affirmation aforesaid. No person who shall have been convicted of any crime under this act, or under the act of Congress aforesaid, approved March 22, 1882, or who shall be a polygamist, or who shall associate or cohabit polygamously with persons of the other sex, shall be entitled to vote in any election in said Territory, or be capable of jury service, or to hold any office of trust or emolument in said Territory.

SEC. 25. That the office of Territorial superintendent of district schools created by the laws of Utah is hereby abolished; and it shall be the duty of the supreme court of said Territory to appoint a commissioner of schools, who shall possess and exercise all the powers and duties heretofore imposed by the laws of said Territory upon the Territorial superintendent of district schools, and who shall receive the same salary and compensation, which shall be paid out of the treasury of said Territory; and the laws of the Territory of Utah providing for the method of election and appointment of such Territorial superintendent of district schools are hereby suspended until the further action of Congress shall be had in respect thereto. The said superintendent shall have power to prohibit the use in any district school of any book of a sectarian character or otherwise unsuitable. Said superintendent shall collect and classify statistics and other information respecting the district and other schools in said Territory, showing their progress, the whole number of children of school age, the number who attend school in each year in the respective counties, the average length of time of their attendance, the number of teachers and the compensation paid to the same, the number of teachers who are Mormons, the number who are so-called gentiles, the number of children of Mormon parents and the number of children of so-called gentile parents, and their respective average attendance at school; all of which statistics and information shall be annually reported to Congress through the governor of said Territory and the Department of the Interior.

SEC. 26. That all religious societies, sects, and congregations shall have the right to have and to hold, through trustees appointed by any court exercising probate powers in a Territory, only on the nomination of the authorities of such society, sect, or congregation, so much real property for the erection or use of houses of worship, and for such parsonages and burial grounds as shall be necessary for the convenience and use of the several congregations of such religious society, sect, or congregation.

SEC. 27. That all laws passed by the so-called state of Deseret and by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah for the organization of the militia thereof or for the creation of the Nauvoo Legion are hereby annulled and declared of no effect; and the militia of Utah shall be organized and subjected in all respects to the laws of the United States regulating the militia in the Territories: Provided, however, That all general officers of the militia shall be appointed by the governor of the Territory, by and with the advice and consent of the council thereof. The Legislative Assembly of Utah shall have power to pass laws for organizing the militia thereof, subject to the approval of Congress.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. VEST. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who has the bill in charge. I see in the fourth section:

> If any person related to another person within and not including the fourth degree of consanguinity, computed according to the rules of the civil law, shall marry or cohabit with, or have sexual intercourse with such other so related person, knowing her or him to be within said degree of relationship, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of incest, &c.

What is that degree of relationship under the civil law?

Mr. EDMUNDS. First cousin; and that section, like almost all of them in fact, is in the precise form it passed the Senate.

Mr. VEST. That excludes the consanguinity of first cousins?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not include, but excludes them.

Mr. VEST. It excludes them?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, as a matter of course this bill will become a law, but I can not vote for it. I am well aware what the public sentiment of the country is, but that makes no sort of impression on me with my convictions as a legislator, nor will any amount of criticism on my action. I can not vote for this bill, because in my judgment it violates the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the United States and the rights of property. Two of the provisions of this bill provide that proceedings shall be had to annul corporations existing in the Territory of Utah. One of them is the Immigration Society, so-called, and the other is the Mormon Church.

I do not propose to discuss that question. The point to which I direct attention now, and on which I base my action, is that the portion of these sections affecting these corporations provides for settling up the business of the corporations after they are declared not to exist any longer, and for paying what is left into the Treasury of the United States, to be applied to the common-school fund of the Territory. As a lawyer I can not vote for any such enactment as that. My understanding of the rule that governs the dissolution of corporations, of these artificial personages created under statute, is that after the chancellor shall have settled up the business of the corporation, then the funds shall be paid back to the persons who contributed them for the purposes of the corporation. The assets, after paying the debts, which as a matter of course are to be paid first, are to be paid back to the persons who contributed or to their heirs or representatives. Under this bill this amount of money, after paying the debts of these corporations, is paid into the Treasury of the United States, and then to be applied to common-school purposes in the Territory.

What right has the Government of the United States to declare these funds to be escheated and to apply them to common-school purposes any more than it would have to apply them to works of internal improvement? It is naked, simple, bold confiscation, and nothing else. It is taking the money subscribed, I care not for what purpose, by individuals, and applying it in the discretion of Congress to an object which was not contemplated by the corporators. We might just as well in any of the Territories, after settling up the debts of any de facto corporation, take the money that is left after paying the debts and say it shall go to the improvement of the roads in the Territory; or, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] suggests, why could not that be done in reference to any other ecclesiastical corporation in this country?

It is no answer to tell me that this is the Mormon Church, and that this great vice or crime of polygamy is in existence there. This bigotry may go to the extent of saying that the Baptist Church, or the Presbyterian Church, or the Catholic Church is amenable to just such legislation. I recollect very well in this country when a storm was raised which threatened to destroy the Roman Catholic Church with all its rights of property, and it was preached even from the pulpit and proclaimed from the hustings that that church, in all its strength and breadth of doctrine and diffusion, was opposed to a republican form of government, that it should be abolished, and it was openly proclaimed that its property ought to be confiscated to the Treasury of the United States just as is done under this proposed law with the property of the Mormon Church.

All history shows that the tendency of this legislation is in one single direction, and one alone. It is to destroy liberty of conscience, and in this case to destroy the rights of property without any due process of law at all, in my judgment.

But, Mr. President, there is another feature of this bill—I shall not undertake to cover it section by section—that I can not support. It is the test oath put to voters in that Territory and to persons who are elected to office. I know something about test oaths. I went through an era of proscription and disfranchisement on account of them, and I do not propose to support any such legislation.

If these Mormons are the fanatics that they are proclaimed to be; if they are now in rebellion secretly, if not openly, against the Government of the United States on account of polygamy, or on account of any religious tenet or belief, there is not one of them that will not commit perjury in order to vote and in order to carry out his treasonable purpose against the Government. If they are what they are denounced to be, these test oaths will do no good; they will merely add perjury to their other crimes.

But the whole spirit of this test-oath legislation is wrong; it is contrary to the principles and spirit of our republican institutions; and whenever the time comes in the Territories or States of this Union that test oaths are necessary to preserve republican institutions, then republicanism is at an end, and our institutions and everything will tumble to their destruction.

But I am only giving reasons why I shall not vote for this bill, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I second the demand for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is due to my friend from Missouri that I should say a single word in answer to what he has stated.

In the first place, he is mistaken as to what the bill as agreed upon by the managers of the conference and as it passed the Senate is in regard to property. As applied to the church there, the only provision is section 13 of the original Senate bill and section 13 of the rearranged bill reported by the managers in the same words, which provides for the forfeiture to the United States of property acquired in violation of preceding acts of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. On what page?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is page 38 of the print that I have. That is just as it passed the Senate, and it does not undertake to do anything except to forfeit to the United States, as we forfeit other property, that of distillers and other people who violate the laws of the United States by force of a pre-existent law. That is all.

Then as to this church, so tender was the Senate before and so tender are the conferees now to guard this church against forfeiting property that it has acquired for church purposes, burial-grounds, and parsonages, in the face of a prohibitory act of Congress, that it is said this forfeiture shall not touch that. What more can be asked by the Mormon Church or its friends than that, I should be glad to know, in the way of tenderness?

Now we turn to the Immigrant Fund Society. My friend says that after paying the debts of the corporation the United States seizes the property and turns it over to the common schools of the Territory. I think my distinguished friend is clearly mistaken. On page 40, section 16, is the clause to which he alludes, which provides that proceedings shall be taken to wind up the affairs of this corporation, to "pay the debts and to dispose of the property and assets of said corporation according to law. Said property and assets, in excess of the debts and the amount of any lawful claims established by the court against the same, shall escheat to the United States."

That is to say, after the last debt has been paid, after the last stockholder has been found, after the last donor or contributor has been hunted up who can show that on the principles of equity and law he is entitled to recall his fund after he has got it, the residue only shall be turned over to the use of the common schools. That is derelict property for which no lawful or equitable claimant can be found, and the statement of it is enough to answer the objection.

Now, as to test oaths. The Constitution of the United States, when it was first formed, had test oaths carefully incorporated in it, and every one of us has been obliged to take that test oath to this day before he could take part in governing the people of the United States. The President of the United States, and every other officer of the United States, and every officer of a State is compelled by that Constitution, and always has been, to take a test oath which in substance and effect is exactly like this one that the House of Representatives has incorporated in this bill, and that is that they will support and obey and uphold and defend the Constitution and the laws of the United States. So we are not without good precedents for that, and that is all that this oath requires.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Vermont; not to remove any difficulty in my own mind, but one which I understand has prevailed pretty extensively.

Does this bill anywhere, as the Senator from Vermont understands it, either in prescribing an oath or in prescribing a qualification or a disqualification for office or the exercise of any civil right, attack a mere opinion, separated from any criminal act or any purpose to do or abet any criminal act?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not in the slightest degree; not in any respect. The most astute and ingenious sophist can not find anywhere in this section about oaths any hint of such a thing. It was carefully excluded just as the former law excluded it.

Mr. HOAR. A remonstrance has been addressed to me against this action, based upon a belief which I supposed to be entirely erroneous, but I think it is proper that the public uneasiness in that respect should be removed by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That remonstrance was addressed to a great many of us before the remonstrants knew what the provision was. They thought it was one thing while we intended it to be and made it quite another thing.

Mr. VEST. I shall not waste any time in debating the proposition that there is no distinction between our oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the oath incorporated in this bill.

The President of the United States and each member of Congress swears to support the Constitution of the United States; but who ever heard before that that was a test oath? A test oath, as we understand it, and as it must be understood, is one that tests the conscience of the party as to a particular act or belief, and unless he can swear that he has not done a certain thing, and that he will not do a certain thing, he can not stand that test, and he is excluded from voting or from office.

Now to draw any parallel between the ordinary official oath taken by the officers of the United States and that in these sections is simply, in my judgment, absurd. Here is a long oath; look at the provision:

No person who shall have been convicted of any crime under this act, or under the act of Congress aforesaid, approved March 22, 1882, or who shall be a polygamist, or who shall associate or cohabit polygamously with persons of the other sex, shall be entitled to vote in any election in said Territory, or be capable of jury service, or to hold any office of trust or emolument in said Territory.

As to the oath, it is required—

That every male person twenty-one years of age resident in the Territory of Utah shall, as a condition precedent to his right to register or vote at any election in said Territory, take and subscribe an oath or affirmation, before the registration officer of his voting precinct, that he is over twenty-one years of age, and has resided in the Territory of Utah for six months then last passed and in the precinct for one month immediately preceding the date thereof, and that he is a native-born (or naturalized, as the case may be) citizen of the United States, and further state in such oath or affirmation his full name, with his age, place of business, his status, whether single or married, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife, and that he will support the Constitution of the United States and will faithfully obey the laws thereof, and especially will obey the act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," and will also obey this act in respect of the crimes in said act defined and forbidden, and that he will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise, any other person to commit any of said crimes. Such registration officer is authorized to administer said oath or affirmation; and all such oaths or affirmations shall be by him delivered to the clerk of the probate court of the proper county, and shall be deemed public records therein. But if any election shall occur in said Territory before the next revision of the registration lists as required by law, the said oath or affirmation shall be administered by the presiding judge of the election precinct on or before the day of election. As a condition precedent to the right to hold office in or under said Territory, the officer, before entering on the duties of his office, shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation declaring his full name, with his age, place of business, his status, whether married or single, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife, and that he will support the Constitution of the United States and will faithfully obey the laws thereof, and especially will obey the act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," and will also obey this act in respect of the crimes in said act defined and forbidden, and that he will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise, any other person to commit any of said crimes; which oath or affirmation shall be recorded in the proper office and indorsed on the commission or certificate of appointment. All grand and petit jurors in said Territory shall take the same oath or affirmation, to be administered, in writing or orally, in the proper court. No person shall be entitled to vote in any election in said Territory, or be capable of jury service, or hold any office of trust or emolument in said Territory who shall not have taken the oath or affirmation aforesaid.

It is idle to put this upon the same footing with the ordinary official oath of the country. It is a special test oath in its spirit and intendment, and it is nothing but a test oath within the ordinary meaning of that term.

The Senator from Vermont says I am mistaken in regard to the provisions of the bill. That is not wonderful. I have been engaged, like other Senators, very assiduously in these last days of the session, and this conference report, I believe, was printed this morning for the first time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was printed in the RECORD three or four days ago.

Mr. VEST. I am not able to read the RECORD; I have not seen this report till a short time ago. This bill came to me in print for the first time this morning, and I have been glancing over it and attempting to follow the Secretary as he read it, but I do not think I am mistaken as to the provision of which I spoke.

The Senator from Vermont says that the property of the immigration society is to be disposed of according to law after paying its debts, &c.; that that means that the general equitable rule shall prevail, which pays back the money or present originally made to the parties who originally invested money in the corporation as stockholders, and that is the meaning of the term "according to law;" and then, after paying all persons who come forward and make claim, if any amount shall be left, what is done with it? It is taken and placed in the custody of the United States and applied to the specific purpose of common school education in the Territory of Utah.

I would like the Senator from Vermont to point me in the laws administering upon the estates of corporations when they are wound up one single analogy to this legislation anywhere. Who ever heard before of a chancellor, after he had paid the debts of a corporation, after he had paid all the corporators or stockholders who could be found, then undertaking to say what should be done with the surplus, applying it to common school education or to improvement purposes or to any other purposes? Why, sir, if it does not belong to that corporation or to the parties who paid their money into it, then that court would be not a court of equitable jurisdiction, but a court to commit outrages upon individual and personal rights. Here, for instance, after paying the debts of the corporation there are ten or twenty thousand dollars left. What would the law do with it? I am certain that my friend from Vermont would say that any chancellor would put that money in the hands of the stockholders pro rata according to their rights as proved before him. But here, by this bill, this money is taken without any sort of claim under heaven except pure, naked power, diverted from the objects of the original corporation, put into the Treasury of the United States and disposed of as Congress may see proper. I can not vote for the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the instincts of my nature are such that as one of the conferees upon this bill I was led to act with the greatest deliberation in every particular in which I supposed that its terms might in any way whatever trench upon the liberty of conscience and the absolute and unrestrained freedom of personal belief.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or opinion.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes; as the Senator from Vermont suggests, or of opinion; because, claiming for myself the widest liberty to question, to doubt, or to believe as my reason and my impulses direct, I should be the last to refuse that same right to any other person or any other sect, no matter where it might be or what its claims might be for consideration either by Congress or by contrast with the tenets or doctrines of any other organization.

I understand that the provision of the Constitution which the Senator from Missouri considers to be in some way or other infringed by the terms of this bill is that which is found in the following language:

> But no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

It is unnecessary for me to say that I have as much respect for the sincere convictions of a Mormon as I have for those of an Episcopalian, a Catholic, a Congregationalist, a Baptist, or a Methodist. All religious belief honestly entertained is respectable. It may be erroneous; my judgment may disapprove and condemn it; but any religious faith is entitled to respect if honestly entertained. It is not the Mormon religion with which we are dealing in this measure, but the practice of polygamy, which is one of the doctrines of a portion of that church; and if I supposed or believed, or if I could be made to perceive now, that there was anywhere in the text of this bill latent even, concealed, any purpose or intent to interfere with the religious belief of even the humblest member if the Mormon Church, any attempt to interfere with opinions entertained upon religious questions, I would disavow it; I would retract so far as I might my concurrence with the conference report. But I do not so understand it.

It is not my belief that by any of the provisions of the oath which these people are required to take they are in any manner compelled to abandon their religious opinions concerning any doctrine on which individuals in the Christian world disagree; and I should be glad if the Senator from Missouri, with whom I sympathize in many of the views he has expressed, would point out to the Senate wherein the oath that is prescribed in this bill imposes any religious test which would be obnoxious or inimical to the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred.

Sir, test oaths are not so uncommon as the Senator from Missouri would have us suppose. As the Senator from Vermont has said, no man can enter on the discharge of the high duties he performs here without taking a test oath; an oath that attests the fealty of him who takes it to the Constitution and the laws of his country. No man can be admitted to citizenship, having been a foreigner, unless he takes a test oath, and by that test oath renounces the political allegiance that has hitherto controlled him, and declares that he will thereafter bear himself as a faithful and loyal citizen of this Republic, bear true and loyal allegiance to the Constitution and the laws of the country of which he is hereafter to be a citizen.

Therefore I do not think the report of the conference committee is open to the objections which the Senator from Missouri has offered, and if in any line or syllable it imposes any religious test as a preliminary qualification for exercising political rights, for voting, for serving upon juries, or for discharging the duties of any civil office, I am opposed to it.

Now, one word further about the escheat of the surplus property of these corporations. We have dissolved the corporation known as the Mormon Church or the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and none of its property has been forfeited. I was opposed to any attempt to forfeit it. In the bill that came from the House of Representatives there was a provision to limit the holdings in real estate of these churches, both in the quantity of land they should occupy and the value of the houses of worship in which they should conduct religious exercises. I was opposed to it, and as the bill now stands all the churches organized under that corporation hold whatever of real estate they have hitherto acquired and are entitled to retain whatever structures for religious worship have been erected thereon. Neither is there any limitation imposed in this bill upon subsequent acquisition for religious purposes.

But, sir, with regard to the perpetual immigration fund the condition is somewhat different. As the Senator from Vermont has said, both these corporations were organized in violation of previous statutes of the United States. Therefore they are outside the protection of law, and we might properly have gone much further in dealing with their assets. But we have provided in winding up these corporations the courts shall administer their estates upon the broadest and most liberal principles of equity; that all just claims and demands outstanding shall be satisfied, and as to the residue, not required for the payment of debts, nor for the satisfaction of outstanding liabilities, for which no owner can be found who can call for a segregation of his contribution to that fund, that this remainder shall escheat to the United States, and be devoted under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior to the beneficent purpose of supporting the common schools in that Territory.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri objects and says this residue should be distributed to those from whose contributions it has been accumulated. So far as any individual contribution is concerned that right is established already by the bill. But with regard to those minute contributions, those that have been dropped, it may be, into the plate which is passed around in the assembly or the congregation, private charities, the widow's mite, things given in secret by those who did not let their right hand know what the left hand did, what is to be said about them? How can the Senator from Missouri allege that this bill is amenable to the objection that he has made when we provide that all these recognizable outstanding claims shall be satisfied, and that only with regard to this undistinguishable residue, made up of those contributions whose origin can not be ascertained, contributions such as I have described, it shall not remain as a fund to be held by the clerk of the court, the subject of trouble and expense hereafter for masters in chancery to deal with, subject to peculation, diminution, and loss, but be taken, as this bill provides, and devoted to that purpose which everybody admits to be sacred—the education of the young in the Territory.

I therefore think, Mr. President, that the bill as amended by the House and agreed to in conference is more liberal, humane, just, and generous in its provisions than the measure as passed originally by the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. If it will not disturb the Senator just there, I should like to call his attention to page 46, line 12, and ask him to explain what is the meaning of the expression:

> His status, whether single or married, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife.

What does that language mean—"status?" Social, political?

Mr. INGALLS. It means his status as defined by the following phrase, his social status.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As to marriage.

Mr. INGALLS. His status whether single or married. Of course the whole paragraph is to be taken together, and the status, as I understand it and as I believe the courts would interpret it, is the status that is defined by the language in the following clause.

Mr. BUTLER. "His status, whether single or married, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife." It seems to me that is pretty broad language. I do not see how a man could explain what "status" would mean under that provision.

Mr. INGALLS. It seems to me there can be no ambiguity about it. Under the ordinary laws of construction and interpretation that would be construed in connection with the context, and as I understand the word "status" applies to his relation as affected by his marriage, his social status, which I believe to have been the understanding of those who agreed to the bill in its present shape.

Mr. BUTLER. Is he to be the judge of his own social status? The very difficulty the Senator has in explaining it shows the ambiguity of it. I confess I do not understand the bearing of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CALL. I can not let the report be adopted without expressing my disapproval, and the reasons for that disapproval.

This bill, in my opinion, is an anomaly on the statute-book of this country. It is the second step towards the establishment of religious persecution and intolerance. It is but a thin disguise for the acute lawyers who have prepared this bill to assert that it is no violation of the Constitution of the United States or of the principles of civil liberty or religious tolerance upon which this Government is founded.

Mr. President, every law has a policy, has a spirit. It is not to be determined by the letter of the law as it is sought to be justified here, and that is the very first thing a student of the law learns; and it is strange that in the Senate of the United States the very original and first principles of the profession in the interpretation of law which have been handed down for hundreds of years should be boldly violated and the Senate should declare to the professional opinion of the world that the cardinal principles of the profession have no force or effect. Why, sir, the great commentator upon law, when he teaches the student of the laws of England the manner of interpretation, cites the instance of the law in Venice, which said that he who lets blood in the streets of Venice shall be punished with death, and the example of the man who, falling in the streets with sudden illness, had his blood let by a surgeon, violating the letter of the law; but the commentator declares that the law was not violated, because its spirit must determine its interpretation. It was not violated, because the spirit and the purpose of the law was to prevent the unlawful shedding of blood.

The acute sophists who have written this bill do no credit to the intelligence of the age or the faculty of reason when they declare in this bill that it is not violative of the Constitution, that it is not a law "respecting an establishment of religion," that it is not an intolerant proscription of religion, that it is not an unjust denial and discrimination between different citizens in their political rights, because the language of the bill carefully avoids the open statement of any or all these things.

If the effect of a law—if its object and effect—accomplishes these results, then it is equally liable to the inhibition of the organic law, and of an honest and wise public policy, as if it reached these results by the use of plain and direct language.

Now, take this act presented to the Senate, and I venture to assert that before any tribunal, impartial and rational, it can not be justified in any single provision. What shall we say of a law that undertakes to punish acts which a particular religion or sect of men worshiping God are prone to commit, violations of the law which may, as this bill assumes, be the result of their religious belief, and that imposes penalties not demanded by the universal good of the people, but because they are committed by that particular sect of men, and imposes penalties in excess of those that are imposed for the rest of the community for the purpose of affecting that form of religious belief, with the effect by accumulated penalties of forcing that people to abandon that form of religious belief. Suppose you select some one act which your law makes a crime, which is prevalent among that people, but not peculiar to them, but which with them is a religious belief, and you impose on that act committed by them extraordinary penalties. You make the methods of trial partial, oppressive, and cruel. You make the processes of summons and arrest revoltingly harsh and arbitrary. You confiscate their church property. You interfere between parents and their children in their education, and yet you ask honorable men to believe that you think this is not legislating against a particular form of religion.

Is that lawful? Can you extinguish by such legislation as that a form of religious belief, and yet put up the alleged plea that the letter of the law is complied with, that the Constitution is not violated? We punish all men alike, but we accumulate on that particular sect and the offenses they choose to commit penalty after penalty for the purpose of affecting that form of religious belief. Why, Mr. President, the subterfuge is unworthy of reasonable men, and can have no place in logic or in reason. "The letter of the law killeth, but the spirit maketh alive," said a great lawyer and an inspired man many centuries since, and from that day to this the intelligence of every age has sanctioned it—that to carry out the spirit and purpose of the law is to kill it, and to carry into effect its letter is to keep it alive. That when the letter of the law defeats its spirit and purpose you sustain the law by defeating its spirit and purpose and adhering to the letter. Who believes this, Mr. President? No intelligent person. Yet the Senate Committee on the Judiciary so declare, and this bill so declares.

Take this bill, which is the re-establishment of the inquisition of old, which is religious persecution, which is a law respecting their establishment of religion, because these men have a form of belief and a practice which we disapprove. It is as much the establishment of a particular religion by law as if it declared it in particular terms. In in its first provision the bill provides that—

The lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called, but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be; and such witness shall not be permitted to testify as to any statement or communication made by either husband or wife to each other, during the existence of the marriage relation, deemed confidential at common law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida will pause. It is the duty of the Chair at 2 o'clock to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2636) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is my duty to insist upon the privileged question that is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair having performed his duty, he is of opinion that the conference report is a privileged question.

Mr. HARRIS. It clearly has the right of way, I should think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be laid aside informally, with a view to proceed with the conference report.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to call up the river and harbor bill, in pursuance of the notice which I gave two days ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can not get it until we finish this business. You can move it after we have finished the conference report.

Mr. MCMILLAN. At the conclusion of the consideration of the conference report I shall ask that the river and harbor bill be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota can not take the floor from the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I shall seek the floor for the purpose of having the unfinished business laid aside when this matter is disposed of, so as to take up the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report on Senate bill No. 10 is before the Senate.

Mr. CALL. The provision of the bill which I have read is entirely harmless and is properly guarded; there can be no objection to it; but take that, the most innocent one in the bill, what is the object of this provision in the bill, it being an act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes in reference to bigamy? The object of the provision is as much as if it were in direct terms directed against the Mormon Church, the Mormon religion, not the practice of polygamy, not unlawful intercourse between the sexes everywhere this country has jurisdiction, but the spirit, the purpose, the effect of this legislation is to destroy the Mormon form of religious belief. Who can deny it? Can we, by a form of words, suppress the truth? Can we enact the grave farce here that we are by a particular form of words seeking to do one thing and not another when the real object we have in view and the necessary effect of an enactment is evidently to affect the Mormon Church, the Mormon people, the Mormon religion? Can we avoid the truth that this will be a "law respecting an establishment of religion," when its object and effect is to "affect this establishment of religion" by declaring that it is a law relating to bigamy or polygamy, and that it is not "respecting a religious establishment," but can a law relate to and affect a particular offense.

We find another provision in the second section that any person may be attached, taken into possession, arrested and deprived of his liberty upon the suggestion under oath of anybody that he believes that such person will not obey the process of the court. Who will undertake to say that this is a provision justified by the course of legal experience in this country by the practice of the courts? Admit, if you please, which I do not, that it is not a violation of the right to personal liberty guaranteed in the Constitution, the right to be free except under due and proper process of law, admit for argument's sake that it is process of law, what is the purpose, the effect, the spirit of this legislation, but to affect the Mormon people, the Mormon religion, and to say that they can not be trusted to obey the law; that they, differing from other sects and other people, must be punished in a particular way? If we should disguise the fact and enact a falsehood known to every one here to be false, is it any the less a falsehood because you disguise and suppress it by the form of language which you use?

This provision is intended to suppress the Mormon religion, the Mormon people. Will you tell the people of this country that you will dare by any form of words to make a law the effect of which shall be that the Methodist, or the Baptist, or Presbyterian, or Episcopal, or Catholic people of this country shall be subject to arrest and imprisonment without hearing or trial on the affidavit of any person that they believe they will not obey the process of the court, because they are Methodists, or Baptists, or Catholics; that they are not to be trusted because of their faith, their form of religion? But yet that is what this section of this law declares as plainly as if it did so in direct terms. That is the effect and the purpose of this law, although the truth is sought to be evaded and suppressed by the language used. This and all other sections of the bill are framed on the theory that language, words, are only intended to deceive, and the faculty of reason is only right when it avoids the truth.

Again, when we come to the third section, we find:

That whoever commits adultery shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years; and when the act is committed between a married woman and a man who is unmarried, both parties to such act shall be deemed guilty of adultery; and when such act is committed between a married man and a woman who is unmarried, the man shall be deemed guilty of adultery.

Mr. President, why this unusual punishment? Why these specifications? Every one knows. Why disguise the fact? We have had petitions, and arguments, and discussions here time and again that this form of religious belief, Mormonism, is unfriendly to the Republic; that it is treason, and that it should be suppressed, and this law is to be passed in pursuance of a public clamor of that character. Again:

SEC. 5. That if an unmarried man or woman commit fornication, each of them shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by fine not exceeding $100.

Why this discrimination? Shall it be said that it is for respect to the marriage relation that this discrimination between the unmarried and married person and this smaller punishment is affixed, that it does not relate to Mormon practices and to polygamy? The bill is a bill to amend an act to suppress polygamy, and what polygamy? Not polygamy everywhere, adulterous relations everywhere, but in the Territory of Utah, among the Mormon people, where that form of polygamy exists which they profess to believe, and which they practice to some extent; that form of religious belief that maintains that the patriarchs were religious, that the old testament religion was a religion, that David and Solomon and many others, notwithstanding their polygamy, were religious men, and that the practice of it did not place them beyond the pale of human sympathy and of the divine forbearance.

Let us go further, and we find in the eighth section that it applies to the Territory of Utah, and provides:

That the marshal of said territory of Utah, and his deputies, shall possess and may exercise all the powers in executing the laws of the United States or of said Territory, possessed and exercised by sheriffs, constables, and their deputies as peace officers; and each of them shall cause all offenders against the law, in his view, to enter into recognizance to keep the peace and to appear at the next term of the court having jurisdiction of the case, and to commit to jail in case of failure to give such recognizance. They shall quell and suppress assaults and batteries, riots, routs, affrays, and insurrections.

Without process of law, without inquisition by any tribunal, without any kind of complaint, the marshal may seize and arrest any one, this section seeking to vitalize and protect him with an old and obsolete custom of law made for arbitrary governments and kingly power. These marshals have the power to arrest any man without cause, upon their own motion; to quell anything that they may see fit to interpret as a riot or a tumult; to use any degree of violence; in short, to slay and murder an unoffending and submissive people at will.

I have seen printed and circulated among Senators a sworn statement of a brutal murder committed by these marshals and these deputies under such a provision as this, which incites them to violence upon these people. Wrong they may be, but unoffending, industrious people in many respects; and they have made a distinguished success in that most important matter of the comfortable subsistence of the poor people whom they have carried into their once desert country, which they have made by their labor to blossom like a rose.

I am not the advocate of polygamy or improper relations between the sexes, but I am not afraid to condemn the spirit of persecution which will gloss over the faults of our own civilization, and from that spirit of fanatical cruelty which has shed so much blood and inflicted so many tortures make victims of better men and better women than many of those whom our harsh and cruel laws have forced into worse practices.

I condemn their polygamy, but I believe that the religion of Christ and not that cruel persecution which subverts it and applies tyranny and the terrors of the law to the suppression of religious belief is the proper remedy for it. I take no part in this revival of the fires of religious persecution. Suppose the Mormons have been themselves bigoted, vindictive, cruel, and bloodthirsty, as is charged by their enemies, of which I know nothing, is that a reason why we should imitate them, and go back from the religious tolerance and freedom of modern times to the superstitions and the intolerance which sought to impress forms of religious opinion, not by the persuasion of argument and reason but by the arm of the law, by the sword, the halter, the dungeon, and the torture? But, to the disgrace of our times, this is the character of the bill which the Senate will pass.

Then, again, we have a provision here in relation to the ceremony of marriage, all directed to the practices of that peculiar sect, to that form of religious belief; and then, not stopping there, the bill proceeds to visit its terrors upon the unfortunate children who are brought into the world by divine providence without any of the faults of their mothers or their fathers imputed to them. The poor innocent child the Senator from Vermont in his Christian charity finds a place to persecute and oppress in this bill.

Sir, in my judgment it is a disgrace to civilization as it is a reproach to the religion of Christ, a barbarism condemned by every principle of humanity and justice, a cruelty without excuse or palliation. A man and a woman join themselves together in a union approved by their church and their religion, by the permission and under the divine economies which the King of Kings has ordained, and which the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and the House, and all others whose fanatical judgment arraigns the divine order, can not unmake. Children are born to them. They have their right and title to a part in this world suited to their faculties and capacities, and neither the devisers of this bill nor all mankind can deprive them of that right; but this law seeks to visit on their innocent heads disgrace and beggary, want and starvation, because their parents innocently, as they thought, and with the sanction of the divine providence brought them into the world. Mr. President, this is a shocking and cruel barbarity, an insult to the religion of Christ, and a disgrace to the civilization of the age.

SEC. 11. That the laws enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah which provide for or recognize the capacity of illegitimate children to inherit or to be entitled to any distributive share in the estate of the father of any such illegitimate child are hereby disapproved and annulled; and no illegitimate child shall hereafter be entitled to inherit from his or her father or to receive any distributive share in the estate of his or her father: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any illegitimate child born within twelve months after the passage of this act, nor to any child made legitimate by the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882.

What Christianity and what civilization can justify this harsh and cruel provision? What has the poor child done that the Senator from Vermont should deprive it of subsistence, of the means of going through the world with credit to himself or herself? Why should it be persecuted with the terrors of this law because the father and mother believed improperly; believed, if you please, barbarously, that a certain form of relation between the sexes was legitimate and of divine permission; believed a doctrine, if you please, pernicious to society, that by proper means, by free discussion, by the moral suasion of the religion of Christ, should be eradicated and exterminated? What if they did, shall the poor child be the victim?

Mr. President, the Spanish inquisition, which was not the fault of the church but of the ambitious men who sought to use its spiritual powers for their political ends, was not more cruel when it burned those who did not accept its doctrines and its theories as of divine origin than is this provision of the bill, taking the poor illegitimate children whom Almighty God has permitted to come into this world, in fault, if you please, of their ancesters, but without fault of themselves, and branding them and depriving them of all subsistence and help and comfort.

What should the father of an illegitimate child do in the theory of this bill? Abandon his offspring and commit a thousand times fouler crime by abandoning his parental feelings and leaving the offspring that he has begotten to starvation and misery; that is the wicked and cruel command of this bill; that is the morality it enjoins. Let the child born of innocent purposes and under a form of religious belief be an outcast from human sympathy because we deny the right of the Divine Ruler of the Universe to establish an order of nature which allows children to enter the world otherwise than as we think proper, and notwithstanding the fault of their parents endows them with the faculties which command success.

The Divine Law-giver said, "Let little children come unto me," and He blessed them, and His followers have established charities for them, and even the "foundlings" have their guardians and their friends in the gentle hearts of Christian men and women. But the insane fanaticism of this bill seeks to place a curse and a stigma on them and deprive them of their natural protectors and of natural love and affection.

Sir, the bill is barbarous and inhuman in every light. Be as strong an anti-polygamist as you please, you can not be a follower of the divine religion of Christ and maintain a doctrine, a principle, a provision of law that has this effect. It is an insult to Christ's precepts and religion, and a deadly assault on all the beautiful charities and humanities that have grown up under it. As false to human nature and the conditions of life as it is to the divine economy that governs the world. I visited some years since the foundation of a beautiful charity of the Roman Catholic Church in Montreal, the Sisterhood of the Grey Nuns, I believe is the name, where all the foundlings of Canada are received, educated, and cared for and started in life. What a contrast with this law!

Shall we be told that the laws of society have thus harshly discriminated against illegitimate children for the public good? It was a barbarous provision that the woman, the victim of society and of your laws, should be punished only because excluded by law and custom from the employments of business, in order to support life in herself and those dependent on her. She had become the victim of the passions, the faults, and the wrong doing of men. Although in this very act she had, under the divine economy, contributed to the world a never-ending and divinely-endowed intelligence, the highest form of creation known to this world, an unmerciful cruelty that a son of New England, in "The Scarlet Letter," had so exposed to the censure of the civilized and humane judgment of the Christian world, that it was not to have been thought that a son of New England would advocate the re-enactment in the laws of the present time. It is a far greater wrong that you should punish the innocent child, who under the divine economies of life has been permitted to come into the world, and who may be the equal of the Senator from Vermont or any one else, who may be a great power for all the higher and better interests of the world, because Almighty God, who judges not as man judges, does not give a patent to any particular people, nor to an outwardly decorous and careful observance in life to own the best things of the world.

Such a poor child has a title and a right to make a man of himself, but this bill denies it. This bill says the father must be guilty of a worse crime than the indiscretion and the wrong, and for what? To destroy the Mormon religion. He must abandon his offspring. He must abandon the woman who has trusted his manhood and his fidelity to his promises. He must purchase immunity from punishment and political right and public office by leaving them to sorrow, starvation, and misery.

Mr. President, no language can express the wickedness and moral enormity of this bill. It requires a man to become a fiend in human form in order to be a citizen of the United States.

Mr. President, I have read of a wiser lawmaker than the Senate Committee on the Judiciary; of a divine lawgiver who, when a person taken in the commission of this offense was brought before him for a sentence, wrote upon the ground, "Let him who is without sin amongst you cast the first stone;" and the listening multitude, convicted in their consciences, departed without casting a stone at the poor creature; a Divine lawmaker whose sentence was, "Hath no man condemned thee? Then do I not condemn thee. Go and sin no more."

I understand that to be the law of Christ and the Christian religion, and not this harsh method of punishment. For one I accept it as the efficacious method, discussion, free opinion, the ministers of Christ, the spiritual power of the church, and not the terrors of an arbitrary and cruel law disregarding His divine maxim. These are the great agents for the extermination of Mormonism or any other form of improper religious belief, not "laws respecting an establishment of religion," however artful and cunning their phraseology to conceal their real purpose and effect.

Then we come to what? To the escheat of the property of this corporation under the plea that it is in violation of a statute of the United States. Was it intended to prevent the Catholic Church, the Protestant Church, the Episcopal Church, the great society of Methodists and Baptists—with their evangelization, with their active and patriotic work—was it intended to limit and prevent them from accumulating the means to accomplish their great work? We know, for the bill declares it is to extirpate that form of religious belief which belongs to the Mormons, that religious belief which prompts, as we think, to pernicous practices. We undertake to declare that the Mormon religion is a criminal religion; that it teaches practices that are pernicious to society; that it believes doctrines contrary to the theory of the Christion religion; that its acceptance of the habits and customs of the old patriarchal days is a sin of the worst character against society. Admit, as I do, all these propositions, it none the less establishes the force of the observation that this is an attack upon the Mormon religion because of these alleged practices.

The Constitution of the United States provides that property in any person, natural or artificial, it makes no difference, shall not be taken away from him without just compensation. It is intended to provide that it shall not be taken except for public purposes for public necessities. What is the escheat of this corporation? Defend it as you may by the technical letter of the law, that it is a corporation in violation of an antecedent act of Congress, that its property is accumulated in violation of the law—admit that to be true, and that Congress may by virtue of its sovereign power forfeit it, is it the custom of the Congress of the United States to forfeit the property of persons or of corporations when they are not needed for the public use?

We know it is not. Is it within the letter of the law that you may even confiscate the property of this corporation? I gravely doubt whether it is in the power of Congress to affix that penalty upon any corporation for any violation of law. It may dissolve the corporation, it may terminate its natural life if it fails to answer any purpose of public utility, but it can not appropriate the property of the individuals who compose a corporation without judicial process, of appropriation and condemnation for the public use, without any necessity for use for the public good, and without compensation to the owners of it. It would seem as if there could be no doubt upon that subject.

Then we come to the provision that no person shall exercise political privileges without taking an oath. Let us see what that oath is. We are told that it is a test oath, and that it is a test oath just as the oath to support the Constitution of the United States is a test oath; just as the oath to forswear allegiance to a foreign government is a test oath. The proposition can not be maintained. There is no ground of reason upon which you can place the two propositions. The one is contradictory to the other. Now, let us see what that oath is:

SEC. 24. That every male person twenty-one years of age resident in the Territory of Utah shall, as a condition-precedent to his right to register or vote at any election in said Territory, take and subscribe an oath or affirmation, before the registration officer of his voting precinct, that he is over twenty-one years of age, and has resided in the Territory of Utah for six months then last passed and in the precinct for one month immediately preceding the date thereof, and that he is a native-born (or naturalized, as the case may be), citizen of the United States, and further state in such oath or affirmation his full name, with his age, place of business, "his status, whether single or married, and, if married, the name of his lawful wife"— and that he will support the Constitution of the United States and will faithfully obey the laws thereof, and especially will obey the act of Congress approved March 22, 1882, entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," and will also obey this act in respect of the crimes in said act defined and forbidden, and that he will not, directly or indirectly, aid or abet, counsel or advise, any other person to commit any of said crimes. Such registration officer is authorized to administer said oath or affirmation; and all such oaths or affirmations shall be by him delivered to the clerk of the probate court of the proper county, and shall be deemed public records therein.

Why is that provided? Was there ever such a qualification prescribed for voting before?—

There is no religious test in that oath except in this, that the oath is designed to affect the Mormon religion. The oath has the effect of affecting the Mormon religion; not the Catholic religion, the Protestant religion, the Episcopal, Methodist, or Baptist, but, as is intended, its purpose and effect is upon the Mormon religion. You say that to the man who believes the Mormon faith, that polygamy is true, that polygamy is a divine institution, and the effect of this act is to prevent him from voting; but it is a test, and a religious test—and is both intended to have and does have this effect, namely, to exclude Mormons from the suffrage and from holding office.

Has anybody ever heard of such an oath as a test for holding office? Are Senators required to come here as the Pharisee and swear, "I thank thee, Lord, I am not like other men, nor like this publican and sinner, but I am pure and holy?" Is it the test for office or the suffrage that a man has not violated the law? When the Constitution of the United States requires an oath to support and defend the Constitution and its principles does it mean that a man shall swear that he has never violated the law, or that he never will violate the law in any respect, nor aid, abet, or encourage any one who does?

Mr. President, that is not the oath prescribed for the Constitution of the United States. It requires no oath of personal holiness; it requires no oath that a man has never sinned; it does not command that he shall say, "I am the Pharisee who is better than other men, and you the publican and sinner who confess your sins with humility, are the bad man who can exercise no public privileges." Who ever heard of that? What place is there in this oath for repentance and faith—for the rehabilitation of the fallen man and woman? No, sir; it is an attack upon the religion of Christ, a fanatical attack upon it; and every preacher and every Christian in this country should frown upon it with indignation.

The oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States is an oath to defend against any violation of its organic principles—to defend against "laws respecting an establishment of religion;" against laws discriminating against the equality of political right; against the deprival of political right except under conviction for crime; to defend against partial trials by prejudiced juries and judges; against cruel and unusual punishments; against disqualifications from holding office except under conviction for crime. The test oath required of the Mormon under the bill before he can either vote or hold office is that he will not defend against these things; that he will support and maintain and obey laws respecting an establishment of religion, and taking property without compensation, and depriving of personal liberty without proof or trial, and requiring an oath of future personal purity as we understand it, and relations with only one woman as the qualifications for suffrage; an oath of obedience to a law the purpose, spirit, and effect of which is the subversion of the Mormon religion, which he believes, professes, and practices. And yet we are told that these oaths are the same.

Establish this bill as the law, and the principles of this legislation and the religion of Christ is no longer the controlling and dominating influence of the country and the pervading spirit of its laws. The iron rule of persecution and fanaticism will have been substituted instead of the benign influence of the preachers of Christ and the principles of the Christian religion.

Sir, I would not give the beneficial effects of a single Baptist, or Methodist minister, or Protestant, or Catholic priest, one single good man of any denomination, and his example and his preaching for a thousand years of such legislation as this bill contains. You can not subvert the religion of Jesus Christ by such legislation as this, much as you may seek to do it, much as you may attack it in the artful and indirect methods of this bill.

You talk about a test oath. Who does not know that when you are required to swear to support and defend the Constitution, it is its principles of civil liberty, its form of government, its popular principles as the basis of the government; it does not mean that the man shall swear he has never committed sin, or that he will never violate the law; that he is personally pure, or that he will continue to be so.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to correct him there?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. There is nothing in the oath which relates to past conduct. The oath is wholly promissory, relating to the future conduct of the parties, and there is nothing of expurgation in the oath as supposed by the Senator. The man does not swear he has not done so and so, but he swears he will not do so and so.

Mr. CALL. I believe the Senator is correct on that point, but how does that help him? A man comes up and swears, "I will always be good; I will never violate the law; I am a holy man; I am not subject to temptations as other men are. Behold me, the good and pure man." I do not know anywhere in the religion of Christ where any such person as that is presented. I understand that men are creatures subject to temptation, and that the divine power of the gospel is to rehabilitate them, and that does not require of any man to take an oath that he never will sin, that he never will violate the law. If he does, it is a piece of arrant hypocrisy. He can not do it.

It is the divine power that will prevent him from doing it and not his own self-will in declaring that he will not. He may say he will try not to do it, but you make him swear that he will not. What is that done for? It is to catch him; it is to hound him with some corrupt, barbarous, vile creature of the law, who for the purpose of money-making will blackmail the man and catch him in his oath. It is to disqualify him for the suffrage or for holding office. Why? Not because of any hostility to this particular man, but to affect the Mormon establishment of religion.

Can any one doubt or deny this? Is not the conclusion a clear and a necessary one?

But then we go on a little further. We find here a provision that no woman shall vote in the Territory of Utah. Twenty Senators voted here the other day, who will vote for this bill, to submit an amendment of the Constitution to the people of the United States as to whether there should be discrimination against women in reference to their right to vote. Many of those Senators have already delivered speeches on this floor in favor of granting the right of suffrage to women. Why deny it to women in Utah? What is the object of that provision in the bill?

The women of Utah are Mormons; the women of Utah believe that the divine economy of the Old Testament is still in force. They have been deluded; they have been brought from a life of poverty, shame, and horrible beastly suffering by these deluded people into this new world, and have been furnished homes and subsistence and education; and while they are far below the moral and religious standard of our Christian belief and our Christian churches, they believe that that is better than a life of shame and beastly suffering in the Old World. They believe that the Divine Providence has permitted this; and that is to be the reason why Mormons, worshiping God falsely as Mohammedans do, the bill says they shall not vote. It does not say it in words, and the Senator from Massachusetts asks the question, which is a subterfuge, what part of the bill attacks opinion?

Every line and every word in it attack the right to free opinion, the right of belief, by accumulating penalties upon penalties for practices which are made violations of the law, and which are peculiar to those people and the outgrowth of their religious system. It is a bill to suppress a form of religious belief, a bill to make a law respecting an establishment of religion, and to destroy that establishment of religion by pains and penalties and disfranchisements and confiscation of property. Every word, sentence, and line in it proclaim this to be the truth.

Mr. President, I know very well that we have commenced the era of religious persecution. This bill will bear its fruits. Violence between the professors of different creeds will be the result of this intolerant legislation. The persecutions of the Old World were commenced precisely in this way. It has been the great and powerful effort of wise men in all ages to prescribe a rule of religious tolerance, the religious tolerance which the Divine Master, Christ himself, taught; to let freedom of opinion and discussion prevail, and punish only the offenses against the law, not cruelly to prescribe laws, but to make laws regulating the practice of men and of women equally applicable to all religions, and to all people of all sects and all places, based upon some universal ideas of right and wrong, and not accumulating penalties in particular localities as against particular religionists for the faults which they may be supposed to be guilty of.

Mr. President, I shall vote against agreeing to the conference report.

I have no sympathy with the social relations, the polygamous features of the Mormon Church. The freedom and independence and adaptation to the arts and professions of life which our monogamous system gives to women, their emancipation from the barbarous restraints and inequality which the customs and laws of former times imposed upon them constitute the joy and brightness of our civilization; but much as I regret the polygamous principle and teaching of the Mormon religion, I dislike fanaticism and hypocrisy and cruelty more.

I can see that the order of nature and Providence which has permitted this form of belief and practice to exist is not unaccompanied by some good results. I can recognize the fact that a great industrial community has arisen in Utah; that they have made a garden where once there was a sterile desert; that hundreds of thousands of human beings are there earning a comfortable subsistence; that railroads and all the inventions of modern comfort and improvement are to be found there; that some of the worst vices of our social system have been eradicated or avoided; that the social evil has been successfully prevented, if all accounts are true.

I can recognize the fact that the States can easily prevent the spread of Mormonism and the proselyting of our people by them. I can see that if the Government will station an armed force through the Mormon territory and afford protection to all women and children who desire to abandon the Mormon practices and the polygamous life, if the Government will furnish them subsistence and will uphold the hands of the Christian women, ministers, and priests who are seeking to establish industrial homes to receive, support, and educate these women and children, and with these measures leave them to the ordinary laws which are made for the public generally, the principles of our religion and our civilization will find a way to assert their power over them and withdraw them from the hurtful belief and practices of their strange religion.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I should be very glad if the Senator from Vermont would explain some of the provisions of the bill. Like the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], I have had very little time to consider it, and there are some things in it which I can not support. I should be very glad indeed to vote for any measure which would result in exterminating the evil and crime of polygamy, not only in Utah Territory, but in every other part of the United States; but in doing that I can not violate what I believe to be the best principles of the Constitution of the United States; and I think the bill does violate those principles.

I can quite well appreciate and sympathize with the difficulties which the committees of both Houses of Congress have had to encounter in dealing with this question. I am satisfied that they have been very grave, and that they have struggled with them to the very best of their ability; but it does seem to me that the provisions of this measure which have been pointed out by the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Florida are so clearly a violation of the principles of the Constitution regarding private and personal right of religious opinion and of the rights of property that I can not sustain it.

There are very summary measures authorized to be instituted by the Attorney-General of the United States for the purpose of disposing of certain corporations described in the bill. For instance, there is an emigration society specified. There is nothing upon the face of the act itself which indicates that that is a Mormon institution. The bill goes to the extent of absolutely prohibiting the Territorial Legislature of Utah at any time from granting authority to anybody, whether Christian, Mormon, or otherwise, from organizing an emigration society in that Territory. I see by section 1850 of the Revised Statutes that—

All laws passed by the Legislative Assembly and governor of any Territory, except in the Territories of Colorado, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming, shall be submitted to Congress, and, if disapproved, shall be null and of no effect.

That law was passed in 1850, and Congress has approved either in fact or constructively every act passed by the Territorial Legislature of Utah which this measure seeks to annul and disapprove. We have acquiesced in it for thirty-six years, and now we come in and in this summary manner take charge of the property of those institutions, declare that a certain proportion shall escheat to the Government, all that is ascertained after paying the debts and winding up the affairs of the corporation according to law. We take that property and summarily cause it to escheat to the Government, in utter disregard, as I submit, of the rights of the corporators, if there are any corporators. My friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] says there are none.

Mr. MORGAN. There are no stockholders.

Mr. BUTLER. How did it come into existence if there were no corporators?

Mr. MORGAN. Like any other church.

Mr. BUTLER. Nothing is said about the church in the provision relating to this Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company. The bill says:

SEC. 15. That all laws of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, or of the so-called government of the state of Deseret, creating, organizing, amending, or continuing the corporation or association called the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company are hereby disapproved and annulled; and the said corporation, in so far as it may now have, or pretend to have, any legal existence, is hereby dissolved.

Then the provision goes on:

And it shall not be lawful for the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah to create, organize, or in any manner recognize any such corporation or association, or to pass any law for the purpose of or operating to accomplish the bringing of persons into the said Territory for any purpose whatsoever.

I submit that under such a provision of law, if adopted by Congress, you, Mr. President, and the Senator from Alabama, or myself, or any other citizen of this country, would be absolutely prohibited from going into that Territory and organizing an emigration society.

I would very much prefer, if it were practicable—and I do not see why it is not practicable—that the Territorial government of the Territory of Utah should be abolished entirely, root and branch, and that we should govern it as we are governing the District of Columbia, by three commissioners or five commissioners. As extreme and as extraordinary as that method would be of getting rid of the evil of polygamy, I would infinitely prefer it to the bill which we are now considering in this conference report. I can see no reason why the Judiciary Committee of this body and of the other House might not have framed a bill abolishing entirely the Territorial government of Utah, substituting a government by a commission such as we have in the District of Columbia. There can be no question about the jurisdiction of Congress over the Territory; and it seems to me some measure of that kind might be framed which would be effectual in accomplishing the purpose which both committees of Congress unquestionably have in view, and which Congress itself has, of ridding the country of the crime and evil of polygamy and at the same time not doing violence to the principles of the Constitution of the country and to what I consider the dearest rights of the American citizen.

For these reasons, sir, while I disclaim all sympathy with or toleration, if you choose, for the institution of polygamy in any form, I can not support the conference report intended to get rid of it in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have given sometimes somewhat reluctantly my assent to the policy of this bill and to most of its provisions; but I regard, for reasons which I have already stated, the abolition of the right of suffrage by women as not merely unjustifiable but as tyrannical. I think the Senators who have had the conduct of this bill have taken an advantage which they had no right to take to strike out something they did not like, although twenty-four Senators in this body have recently recorded their opinion in its favor, by the use of the power which the public disapprobation of polygamy put into their hands for an entirely different purpose. I voted against the bill for that reason before, and I shall vote against this conference report, which is in fact a bill not merely dealing with the matters in dispute, but the original bill in a new draught, for the same reason.

The other provisions of the bill, as being the policy which the best judgment of the Senate has been able to agree on for the extirpation of this foul blot on our civilization, I expect to support when I have an opportunity to deal with them separately, although some of them march clear up to the boundary line which divides reasonable police legislation aimed at crime and evil from legislation which interferes with the great principles and safeguards of personal liberty. I am not prepared to go quite so far in that line.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, if this bill were consistent with itself, and if, in depriving women of the right of suffrage for the ostensible purpose of striking at the crime of polygamy, it proceeded further to disfranchise men who are far more to blame for the crime than are the women, I would find no fault with a provision depriving guilty persons of both sexes of suffrage in the Territory, in order that this great public evil, this infringement upon a violation of the fundamental conditions of our civilization, might be extirpated.

I had an objection to the former bill very serious in my own mind in addition to the provision violative of the right of suffrage, which is one that should be exercised, as I think, without reference to distinction of sex, and that was the power conferred by the bill to violate the ordinary common-law principle by compelling the real wife to testify against the husband without her consent. That has been obviated in the present bill, and, as it will pass under any circumstances, having made my protest against the bill as in violation of the fundamental right of suffrage, I think I shall not vote at all.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I have the same objection to the bill as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. My sentiments on the question of woman suffrage are well known. If I could vote on the question of the disfranchisement of women in Utah separately I should vote against it; but under the circumstances, as the bill will pass, I am disposed to vote for the bill and not to record myself against the provisions of the bill which I think are proper and right for the sake of a sentiment, or for the purpose of emphasizing my opinions in regard to one point on which the majority is against me.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). On this question and all others I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who is absent.

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I suppose if he were here he would vote for this report. I should vote against it.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 13; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had receded from its amendment to the bill (S. 1458) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan at Bay City, in said district.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. RANSOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10666) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

WASHINGTON TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer a resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is it morning business?

Mr. BUTLER. It is simply a resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient for the Senate to consider without further delay House bill 6966, to change the time of meeting of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10419, being the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the bill (S. 2636) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua is the unfinished business. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the bill be postponed.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let it he laid aside informally.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that he ask unanimous consent.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent to lay aside informally the pending business and take up the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside and that the river and harbor bill be taken up. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I consent to that on account of the fact that the judgment of gentlemen about the order of business has been such as to give appropriation bills the right of way against everything but conference reports. Therefore I am bound to yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to give way to enable me to make a request of the Senate that will take but a minute or two, but it is of some importance to me.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will hear the request, of course.

COURTS AT MISSISSIPPI CITY.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, yesterday when we reached on the Calendar the bill (H. R. 10040) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Mississippi City, Miss., it was objected to by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], and went over from the Calendar under Rule VIII to the Calendar under Rule IX. I have consulted with the Senator from Kansas, on whose objection that action was predicated, and I also have consulted with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and I learn from them that neither one of them will oppose the request I now make that the bill be restored to the Calendar under Rule VIII, where it formerly was. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to by him be restored to the position on the Calendar occupied by it yesterday. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10419) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I suppose the first or formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and we can proceed with the consideration of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. I think we had better go through with the bill in the ordinary way.

Mr. HALE and Mr. HOAR. The regular process.

Mr. INGALLS. We have had no opportunity of looking at it yet. I ask that it may go through the next process. I wish to accommodate the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maine in my terminology.

Mr. HOAR. I wanted to prevent my honorable friend from masquerading; that was all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks that the reading of the bill be proceeded with without interruption by amendments. The reading will proceed.

Mr. FRYE. Is there any necessity for reading the House bill? The bill reported by the Committee on Commerce is an amendment to the House bill, a substitute for it, and it is not necessary, I take it, to read all the items that are stricken out, which is the whole bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state for the information of the Senator from Kansas and of the Senate that a print of the bill as it came from the House, with the specific changes made by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, has been laid upon the desk of each Senator, and that can be referred to as the reading proceeds, if the Senator from Kansas will consent to waive the first reading and let us proceed to the consideration of the bill. However, let the proceeding go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill as reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the order of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair instructs the Secretary to proceed with the reading of the bill as reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Kansas does not desire, when this report from the Committee on Commerce is practically a motion to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert new matter, that the whole bill shall be read through and that then each item shall be read through again, the place of which is to be taken by the report of the committee?

Mr. INGALLS. I am entirely willing that the bill should be read as reported from the Committee on Commerce. I do not ask for the reading of the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand the Senator from Kansas, but he simply desired that the bill be read as agreed to by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it understood that the amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce shall be acted upon on this first reading?

Mr. INGALLS. It is all one amendment, as I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. If I understand it was one amendment by the committee, but the committee has subsequently amended its original report. Is that true?

Mr. McMILLAN. The committee have a very few amendments to submit as we proceed.

Mr. INGALLS. But as the bill now stands is it not one entire amendment?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir. There may be some amendments to be proposed by the committee as we proceed with the reading of the amendment reported, if the Senate has no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. One thing further. This being one amendment, it will be necessary, as I understand, if I may be permitted to masquerade a little further in this matter, to object to each paragraph as we proceed, or else it will be regarded as agreed to; and I wish to save all points of order upon every appropriation if it may be necessary to ask for information.

Mr. HALE. If it is one amendment, as it is, to be technical no rights are lost by not objecting until the entire amendment is read. It is but one amendment. The substitute offered by the committee is a single amendment to the original bill brought here from the House. I understand that all rights of objection or of moving amendments are reserved until the reading of the bill is completed. We have not got to object as we go along.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill as reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The Secretary began to read the bill.

TERMS OF COURT AT TEXARKANA.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9116) to provide for holding terms of United States courts at Texarkana, Ark., and for other purposes.

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to allow me to make a conference report?

Mr. McMILLAN. I prefer that we proceed with the reading of the river and harbor bill until we get through with it.

Mr. BERRY. It is simply a conference report.

Mr. HARRIS. That is a privileged question.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let us get on with the river and harbor bill.

Mr. COKE. Does the Senator decline to yield to a conference report?

Mr. McMILLAN. For the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks a Senator has a right to interrupt the reading to present a conference report.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that under the rules a Senator has a right to take another Senator off his feet who is making a speech, to make a conference report. The question whether the Senate will consider it after it is received is another matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the opinion of the present occupant of the chair that a Senator has a right to submit a conference report at any time.

Mr. COKE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9116) to provide for the holding terms of United States courts at Texarkana, Ark., and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

"That terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern judicial district for the State of Arkansas shall be held twice in each year at the city of Texarkana, in said eastern judicial district, commencing on the second Mondays in January and July, to be known as the Texarkana division of said district.

"SEC. 2. That all process, civil and criminal, against persons residing in the counties of Columbia, Howard, Hempstead, La Fayette, Little River, Miller, Nevada, Ouachita, Pike, and Sevier shall be made returnable to said courts, respectively, at said city of Texarkana: Provided, That all crimes and offenses heretofore committed within the division created by this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

"SEC. 3. That the clerk of the courts for said district shall appoint a deputy for the said division, who shall keep an office open at all times in the city of Texarkana, and shall there keep the records, files, and documents pertaining to the courts authorized by this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES F. WILSON,
RICHARD COKE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

D. B. CULBERSON,
JNO. H. ROGERS,
L. B. CASWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

The report was concurred in.

Where said works are done by contract such contract shall be made after sufficient public advertisement for proposals, in such manner and form as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and such contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidders, accompanied by such securities as the Secretary of War shall require, conditioned for the faithful prosecution and completion of the work according to such contract, and for the prompt payment of all liabilities incurred in the prosecution thereof for labor and material.

SEC. 5. For examinations, surveys, and contingencies, and for incidental repairs, for which there is no special appropriation, for rivers and harbors, $100,000: Provided, That no survey shall be made of any harbors or rivers until the Chief of Engineers shall have directed a preliminary examination of the same by the local engineer in charge of the district, or an engineer detailed for the purpose; and such local or detailed engineer shall report to said Chief of Engineers whether, in his opinion, said harbor or river is worthy of improvement, and shall state in such report fully and particularly the facts and reasons on which he bases such opinion, including the present and prospective demands of commerce; and it shall be the duty of the Chief of Engineers to direct the making of such survey if, in his opinion, the harbor or river proposed to be surveyed be worthy of improvement by the General Government; and he shall report to the Secretary of War the facts, and what public necessity or convenience may be subserved thereby, together with the full reports of the local engineer. Said reports of preliminary examinations and surveys shall be made to the House of Representatives, and are hereby ordered to be printed when so made.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer some amendments to the amendment just read. In line 211 of the reported amendment "improving of entrance to Galveston Harbor, Texas," I move, after the word "hundred," to insert "and twenty-five;" so as to read "$225,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 211 of the committee's amendment, after the word "hundred," it is proposed to insert "and twenty-five;" so as to make the item read:

Improving of entrance to Galveston Harbor, Texas: Continuing improvement, $225,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 223, "for improving harbor at Cleveland, Ohio," I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty."

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is that? Have we gone through the amendment reported by the committee in print?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All that has been read is one single amendment in the nature of a substitute, and now the committee are proposing amendments to the amendment. This amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 223 of the committee's amendment it is proposed to strike out "twenty-five," before "thousand," and insert "fifty;" so as to make the item read:

Improving harbor at Cleveland, Ohio, on the last plan projected, $50,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 280 I move to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the item read:

Improving and repairing harbor of refuge at Sand Beach, Mich.: Continuing improvement, $50,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 392, "improving Pawtucket River, Rhode Island," after the word "twenty" I move to add "five;" so as to make the amount of the appropriation $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 392 of the committee's amendment it is proposed to insert the word "five" after the word "twenty;" so as to read:

Improving Pawtucket River, Rhode Island: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the committee recommend any reduction?

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. After line 793, I move to insert:

Improving Saint Joseph River, Michigan, from its mouth to Berrien Spring, $2,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there an estimate for that?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. After the word "improvement," in line 1091, I move to strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert "two hundred;" so as to make the item read:

Improving the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois River to the mouth of the Ohio River, including the completion of the work at Alton, and, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, the protection of the Illinois shore opposite the mouth of the Missouri River: Continuing improvement, $200,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained and why we are to protect the Illinois shore.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is all embraced in the recommendation of the board of engineers.

Mr. CULLOM. I can give some information on that subject. Where the Mississippi River runs between those two States, on the Missouri side the shore is rocky pretty much all the way. On the Illinois side it is alluvial soil, and it is constantly going into the river, so that it needs protection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who owns the land along there?

Mr. CULLOM. It is owned by various people.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the point of this is to protect the property of private land owners from its being eaten up by this river.

Mr. CULLOM. This is just what has been done every year for fifty years or more I expect. It is not so much for the protection of the property as it is to protect and secure the channel in some particular place. In this river at those places where the soil is alluvial and where the river is bending, crooked, the channel would not remain in the same location a year at a time scarcely anywhere along there. The purpose is to protect the river and not the holders of land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont has made a very important statement to the Senate, and I should like to have him state the authority on which he makes it. He states that this is not to protect the channel of the river, but to protect private owners of land. If the Senator makes the statement on authority we are entitled to know it. Of course we do not want to do such a thing, and I should like to have him state his knowledge on that subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not happen to make that statement, in the first place, and in the next place, whatever statement I did make I made on my own authority, which is sufficient authority for me.

The statement that I made was before the explanation of the Senator from Illinois, that this appeared to be really—I am not using my language, but the substance of it—for the protection of the Illinois shore opposite the mouth of the Missouri River. Then I made an inquiry about that point, and said that it appeared then to be for the protection of these land-owners who owned the land. After that the Senator from Illinois said it was to protect the river against the land, and not the land against the river. Whether that meant that the land was likely to overcome the river, and that the river needed to be protected from the incursions of the land, was not very clearly stated.

But, speaking seriously, it really comes back, as my friend from Massachusetts must know, and does know, to the question whether, on the idea that it is for the interest of navigation to keep channels in particular places, the whole of the shores (wherever they are exposed from want of rocky margins) of the river system of the United States are to be kept from being encroached upon by the floods and the water and the eating up of rivers. If you apply it to the Illinois River or the Missouri River or the Mississippi River or any other river you must fairly on principle apply it to all.

Of course I would admit, taking the delta of the Mississippi, where there are a dozen mouths, that in order to get water enough in one place to carry a ship, if it is necessary to stop some of the others, it would be a perfectly proper exertion of power. When it comes to the fact, as I am informed and believe it to be the fact, that in the great mass of the instances of the changing of the line of a stream by the erosion of its banks, a powerful stream like the Mississippi, the expenditure is not for navigation so much as it is to prevent the destruction of private property along its shores, and that is a sort of thing I do not like to vote for.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont made the unqualified assertion, in the first place, that this was to protect private property on the banks. It seemed to me, of course, that it would be a great wrong for the committee to come in here and ask to have an appropriation made for that purpose—that the committee had either been very reckless or were endeavoring to mislead the Senate. Now he says that he said it on his own knowledge, and no other; that he said it before he had made any inquiry of the Senator from Illinois; and that is a specimen of the style in which members deal with this river and harbor bill—wild, unqualified, reckless assertions, founded on nothing and made before inquiry.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to my friend from Massachuseets for his opinion about my assertion, and it is as good for him as my opinion for myself, and no better. The assertion that I made was almost a literal repetition of the very language of this amendment of the committee, "the protection of the Illinois shore opposite the mouth of the Missouri River"—not the protection of the river, the keeping of its channel within bounds so that ships could pass upon it, but it is to protect the shore; and my expression therefore was almost a literal repetition of the very language of the bill; and that is what I believe it is still.

Mr. CULLOM. While the language is as the Senator from Vermont states, I take it that he and every other Senator knows or believes that the purpose of the appropriation is to protect the channel of the river so that steamboats and their officers going up and down that river may know from one day to another where the channel of the river is. I happen to know myself that there are places between Saint Louis and Cairo on the Illinois side of the river, and there may be one or two on the other side, where it is absolutely necessary that the Government should give protection to the channel in order to keep the river anywhere within the bounds of where it is now.

The improvement is not, as has been said, for the purpose of protecting the men who own the land or of protecting the land from invasion, as the Senator from Vermont indicates that my language in the first instance conveyed; but it is for the purpose of protecting the channel of the river with a view to the protection of the commerce that goes up and down it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I also, in accordance with the amendment already made——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment to the amendment has not yet been acted on. The question is on agreeing to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I now move to change the amount in line 1102 so as to correspond with the amendment just made. It is a proviso, and refers to the amount appropriated in the first clause of the item.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

The SECRETARY. In line 1102 it is proposed to strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert "two hundred;" so as to read:

Provided, That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may use not to exceed $25,000 of said sum of $200,000 to correct the current of the river and improve the channel at Saint Louis.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is to conform the amount named in the proviso to the amount of the appropriation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Now I refer back to line 352, and move to strike out the words "by the corporate authorities of Duluth," after "established;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Duluth, Minn.: Continuing improvements, $50,000; of which sum one-half is to be used in deepening and enlarging the basin between Minnesota and Rice's Points, and the other half is to be used in dredging and deepening the channel on the west side of Rice's Point, and from thence to Grassy Point, on the north side of Saint Louis Bay, along such dock-line as may be established, with the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Now, in section 2, which provides merely for surveys, after line 29, I move to insert:

West Neck River, Princess Anne County, Virginia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 45 of the same section I move to strike out the words "River, in," and insert "Run, at Covington," so as to read:

Resurvey and re-estimate of the cost of procuring the sites and constructing ice-harbors at the mouth of Willow Run, at Covington, Ky.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In the same line I move to strike out "Crawford" and insert "Crawfish;" so as to read "Crawfish Creek." This is a mere matter of the correction of a name.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. At the end of line 84 of section 2 I move to insert:

With a view to making a 20-foot channel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is for a survey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it; but where is the place and what is the idea?

Mr. MCMILLAN. As I propose to amend it the clause will read:

To procure a straight channel between Bar Point light-house and Bois Blanc Island, at the mouth of the Detroit River, with a view to making a 20-foot channel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How is it now?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is merely providing that the Chief of Engineers shall direct a survey of this locality with a view to making an improvement in the stream.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not seem to read so in the paragraph. It is "to procure a straight channel."

Mr. MCMILLAN. The first clause of section 2 will explain:

That the Secretary of War is hereby directed, at his discretion, to cause examinations, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No objection.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 86 of section 2 I move to strike out "Waymouth River" and insert what I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Monatiquot and Weymouth, Fore River.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator passes from that section I should like to call his attention to one line. In line 51 the description is:

Charles River, from Boston to Watertown, Mass.

That would do very well for the old Boston, and I suppose that is what it means; but Boston now includes Brighton. I think it would be better to say, "Charles River, from its mouth to Watertown, Mass."

That is what is meant, I suppose.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The clause is now in the language of the House bill. We made no change.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that that amendment be made so as to make the item read:

Charles River, from its mouth to Watertown, Mass.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Striking out "Boston?"

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 51 of section 2 I move to amend by striking out "Boston" and inserting "its mouth;" so as to read:

Charles River, from its mouth to Watertown, Mass.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. After line 71 of the same section I move to insert:

Bayou Teche and Bayou Vermillion, Louisiana.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move to strike out lines 80 and 81 of section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The lines proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 80 and 81 of section 2, as follows:

Saint Joseph River, Michigan, from its mouth to Berrien Springs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. These are all the committee amendments.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move to amend, on page 69, line 696, by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "fifty." I hope there will be no objection to this amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. What is the Senator's motion?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move to strike out "twenty-five," in line 696, on page 69, and insert "fifty."

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senate Committee on Commerce increased that item as it is contained in the House bill $25,000. The improvement of the Arkansas River was formerly conducted in three separate reaches, and separate appropriations were made for each division. The Engineer Corps have now adopted a plan by which the whole river within the points mentioned constitutes one improvement, and the House of Representatives appropriated $100,000 for it. We increased that amount $25,000, and the committee all thought that was as much of an increase as should be made. Of course the improvement now can be conducted without interruption. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. What has been stated by the chairman of the committee is true, but there are some other facts also true in this connection.

The House of Representatives recommended an appropriation of $100,000 for that reach of the Arkansas River extending from Wichita, Kans., to Fort Gibson. There was no appropriation and no estimate made for the river from Fort Gibson to Little Rock, a very much longer line than the one for which the estimate was made.

After that estimate was sent into the House of Representatives the Engineer Department submitted an additional estimate for that reach of the river not estimated for at first. They estimated that it would require $1,300,000 to improve the river, and said that $200,000 could be made available in the ensuing fiscal year for which this bill provides.

I believe the practice of the committee has been to give 25 per cent. of what has been asked for as a rule. The major part of this river which is now put together and all to be treated as one, was not estimated for in the House of Representatives, and there was no appropriation made for it at all. The truth is it would be a reasonable appropriation to double this sum in consideration of the fact that the whole length of river provided for in the Senate amendment is more than double what was provided for in the House bill. This comes clearly within the rule of the committee; and I confess I am somewhat astonished that a member of the Committee on Commerce should object to the reasonable appropriation of $150,000 for this immense line of river.

I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment I have offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In addition to the amount appropriated, there is $75,000 of the former appropriation still unexpended.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 18; not a quorum voting.

Mr. BERRY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Just as the vote was being submitted to the Senate the chairman of the committee stated that there was an appropriation which had been previously made, and which could be used in connection with this. He did not make the additional statement that that was for a part of the river that has not come into this discussion at all.

As the river has been heretofore treated there have been three reaches, one from Wichita to Fort Gibson, one from Fort Gibson to Little Rock, and another from Little Rock to the mouth. Estimates have been made and the river has been worked on from Little Rock to the mouth. For that $100,000 was formerly appropriated, and $76,000 of that remains unexpended, and of course will be available. At this session of Congress the engineers estimated $250,000 for the reach from Wichita to Fort Gibson. One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for that by the House of Representatives in this bill, but there was not a dollar appropriated by the House of Representatives for more than half the river extending from Fort Gibson to Little Rock. Now we ask that the bill be amended in such a way as to include all three of these reaches in one work, to be estimated for and controlled together. If $100,000 was a reasonable appropriation from Wichita to Fort Gibson, a quarter of a million dollars would be a reasonable appropriation for the river from Fort Gibson to Little Rock, and we ask only an addition of $50,000 where the Engineer Department estimated that $200,000 could be made available.

There is a misapprehension, it seems to me, on the part of gentlemen who refuse us this appropriation of $50,000 only for about half the river, whereas $176,000 is for the other half. It is an improper distribution of the money if the river were to be treated separately, but it is all put together. We ask for only the sum of $150,000 in this bill for the improvement of three times as much of the river as the House provided $100,000 for in the original bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator from Arkansas to the provision in this item of appropriation itself. The provision is:

And all moneys now to the credit of different sections of the Arkansas River, other than appropriations for the operating of snag-boats, shall be available for use under this head; and in future the engineer in charge of this work and the Secretary of War shall make report upon the progress and needs of this work under this head, instead of reporting upon disconnected projects, as heretofore.

This applies all the appropriations made upon the various stretches of this river to the improvement under this plan, and in addition to the amount on hand we have appropriated here $125,000. An increase of $25,000 over the appropriation made by the other House is certainly as much as can be fairly asked in this instance. I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee will bear in mind that since the appropriation was made by the House of Representatives of $100,000 an estimate has been made by the proper engineer officers for $1,300,000, and the committee have only allowed $125,000 of that $1,300,000.

The distance from Wichita to the mouth of the Arkansas River is about 1,000 miles in round numbers, and yet for rivers of less importance five times this appropriation has been allowed in the bill and not one word of complaint made by the committee.

There is no river in this country outside of the Mississippi River that is more important than the Arkansas River from its source to its mouth, and the committee of that additional estimate of $1,300,000 have only allowed us $125,000. We simply ask that they give us $50,000 for the middle reach where $100,000 had been given for the upper reach from Wichita to Fort Gibson. We think it is just and fair; we think it modest; we think it far less than many other rivers of less importance receive.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. From the statement in the report of the engineers appended to the report of the committee it appears that the amount which is estimated as necessary for the completion of this project is $1,696,900. That is for the completion of the project; but the amount that can be profitably expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, is $250,000. This is the expenditure for this year.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like the chairman of the committee to state, which he ought in fairness to do, that that $250,000 was not an estimate made for the whole river but for only a section of it.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope the Senate will grant this small increase asked by the Senator from Arkansas. This river affects the great wheat-growing part of the West. By reason of the passage of the interstate commerce bill our great water ways assume a very great importance as compared with what has been done heretofore with regard to transportation in that section of the country; and it would be, I think, an unwise expenditure of public money to put a small sum upon this important stream and deny to it that which would put it to some extent in a navigable condition. I therefore hope that this amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present.

Mr. BERRY. I will take the responsibility of saying that the Senator from Delaware would vote for this amendment if he were here.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Beck,	Cullom,	Jones of Arkansas,	Plumb,
Berry,	Dawes,	McPherson,	Pugh,

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend in section 1, line 179, on page 48, by striking out the word "one" and inserting "four," and after the word "dollars," in line 180, by inserting:

To be made immediately available on the approval of this act.

The Senate with great unanimity a short time ago passed a bill appropriating $300,000 for the improvement of Charleston Harbor, and it went to the House of Representatives. I have assurances, which I think can be relied on, that there is no possible chance of that bill passing the House, and as this amendment of mine will make the bill now before the Senate substantially as that bill was, I trust the Senate will adopt it without hesitation.

Mr. DOLPH. It is impossible to hear what is being said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please come to order. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 179, before the word "hundred," it is proposed to strike out "one" and insert "four," and after the word "dollars," in line 180, to insert "to be made immediately available on the approval of this act;" so as to make the item read:

Improving harbor at Charleston, including Sullivan's Island, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $450,000, to be made immediately available on the approval of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You do not need that clause. This is not a fiscal-year appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. There is no limitation of time as to money under this act.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I withdraw that part of the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to have the Senator from South Carolina restate what he said in regard to the bill which has already passed the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I stated that I had assurances, which I thought could be confidently relied on, that there is no possible chance of that bill going through the other branch of Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. What was it?

Mr. BUTLER. The special bill we passed appropriating $300,000 for this improvement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You intend this to take the place of that appropriation?

Mr. BUTLER. Practically.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And not to duplicate it?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course not. If this amendment prevails of course I shall ask the Representative from that district not to insist on the passage of that bill.

Mr. FRYE. This matter was considered by the Committee on Commerce. If that bill which passed the Senate had also passed the House and become a law the committee would not have appropriated anything for Charleston Harbor in this bill. That bill was for $300,000. It seemed to be the judgment of the committee that $300,000 was enough, even under the adverse circumstances Charleston is laboring under, and it was agreed in committee that no objection would be made on the floor of the Senate to an amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina which should not increase this item beyond $300,000; and, therefore, I am obliged to move an amendment to the Senator's amendment——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will permit me a moment. My reason for moving to strike out "one" and insert "four" was this: The Senate having passed a bill appropriating $300,000, and the House having incorporated in the river and harbor bill $150,000, I assumed that the two Houses would be willing to give $400,000; consequently I moved the amendment which I have offered and which is now pending. I of course shall make no opposition to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, but I should very much——

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator had better change it himself, as it is not in order for the Senator from Maine to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from South Carolina had better accept the suggestion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BUTLER. I accept that, then.

Mr. MCMILLAN. With the understanding that if that bill passes the other House, this appropriation is not to remain.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the amendment will be to strike out "one" and insert "three"——

Mr. HARRISON. Allow me a moment. I suggest, to avoid the duplication of appropriations, that if this amendment now proposed is adopted the Senator ask the recall of the other bill from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUTLER. I will do that, of course. The amendment will be now in line 179 to strike out "one" and insert "three," and in line 180 to strike out "and fifty;" so as to make the item read:

Improving harbor at Charleston, including Sullivan's Island, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $300,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, one word further. I offered an amendment that this appropriation be made available immediately on the passage of this act. I am assured by Senators who are more familiar with this bill than I am that it can be made available without any such provision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. If the Senator will read the title and enacting clause and opening phrase of the act he will see that it is not or any fiscal year. It is a subject to which attention will be called by and by before this bill passes, in view of the accumulation of millions upon millions of these appropriations not yet expended.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I shall not insist on the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We appropriated last August $18,000,000, probably not more than 25 per cent. of which has yet been expended, so that there are fourteen or fifteen million now available for all these works except the Green River purchase and the Portage Lake purchase and two or three other things that are rather business enterprises than improvements in public works, still ready to go on for a full year yet if this bill should not pass at all.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know what the order will be, but I should like to pass such an order as will recall the bill for $300,000 from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent at this time to move to recall from the House of Representatives the bill referred to by him. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. HARRISON. On page 50, line 244, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty," and in line 245, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "three;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Michigan City, Ind.: Continuing improvement, $50,000; of which sum $3,500 are to be used on the inner harbor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON. This is an appropriation for Michigan City Harbor. It is the only lake harbor in Indiana and is one of some consequence and importance to our people. It furnishes the entrance of a very large lumber trade.

It will be noticed by an examination of the report of the committee that the estimate of the engineer for the expenditure this year is $250,000, and yet the committee have given us but $30,000. I find on examining some of the items of appropriation near this one that the appropriations approximate something like one-quarter of the estimates, whereas in this case it is about one-eighth.

The work to be done here is the construction of some piers and breakwaters. Every one knows that unless the appropriation is sufficient to have some part of the work put into such shape as to be preserved, the expenditure of these driblets from year to year increases very much the ultimate cost of the work. The smaller appropriation is for completing the dredging of the harbor, the estimate for which was $3,125, which the engineer says will complete it.

The appropriations for our State are very small in the bill. We are making a very limited demand for any aid, and it seems to me that it would be wise policy to increase the appropriation $20,000 so that the engineer may have something like a quarter of the amount asked for in order to progress with the work.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The estimate made by the local engineer is as the Senator from Indiana has stated it. The Chief of Engineers, however, puts the estimates for the amount that can be profitably expended during the fiscal year at $150,000. This appropriation remains as it came from the other House. No amendment was offered. The attention of the committee was not called to the matter nor was any necessity for an increase suggested.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true, and grew partly out of the fact that while the committee was considering the bill, necessarily under some pressure, I was kindly advised by the chairman that I could be heard, but it happened that at that time I was so engaged that I could not appear before the committee, and that evening I think the bill was reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I notice among many other very interesting operations in this bill, aside from the ordinary appropriations of money for rivers that have been heard of, that the other House has provided, on page 39, that Officers having charge of works for the improvement of rivers and harbors, with the approval of the Secretary of War, may cause proceedings to be instituted, in the name of the United States, in any court having jurisdiction of such proceedings, for the acquirement by condemnation of any land or material needed to enable them to prosecute such works; such proceedings to be prosecuted in accordance with the laws relating to suits for the condemnation of property of the States wherein the proceedings may be instituted.

That is all well enough except "material;" it should not be in the House bill. But when you come to the Senate amendment, which reproduces all that, there is this added, which, so far as I know, is somewhat unique, and I should say rather dangerous; so I am going to take the opinion of the Senate, or call its attention to the subject, and then let the friends of the bill do what they have the power to do, and my duty will have been done.

Provided, however, That when the owner of such land or material shall fix a price for the same which in the opinion of the Secretary of War shall be reasonable, he may purchase the same at such price without further delay.

That puts it in the power of the Secretary of War by private contract and arrangement to spend the whole of the money that is necessary to be used for the purpose of obtaining property, not only land locations for these public works, if there be any private property in land to be bought for public works, but to buy every stick of timber, every rod of stone, and every other species of material, in his private discretion, at a private price, agreed upon with a private proprietor. It overthrows the whole system, so far as I understand it, of the purchase of supplies of any other kind for the use of the Government, for wherever that is provided for there is always the provision, a standing one, that they shall be bought after due advertisement, and bought of the lowest bidder, except in some case of extreme emergency where the proper officer is authorized to purchase enough to meet that extreme emergency in open market. I rather think it is a duty to move to strike out the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 92, line 9, after the word "instituted," strike out down to and including the word "delay," in line 12, as follows:

Provided, however, That when the owner of such land or material shall fix a price for the same which in the opinion of the Secretary of War shall be reasonable, he may purchase the same at such price without further delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. KENNA. I have no disposition to antagonize the Senator from Vermont. As far as I understand that provision, it was inserted by the committee and reported, because in a large number of instances there have been unseemly and unnecessary delays in the prosecution of public works for want of some sort of authority somewhere to proceed in a way that would be recognized as reasonable and proper in almost any relation which the Government may bear to its own enterprises or to the people. I know of one or two instances in my own State where for several months delay was necessary in order to invoke the action of Congress about something in regard to which there was no possibility of a difference or difficulty in Congress.

I have no particular interest in this clause, and I only make that suggestion because I believe that to have been the sentiment of those who engrafted the provision in the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. In answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont, I will state that section 4 provides that—

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to apply the money herein appropriated for improvements, other than surveys and estimates, in carrying on the various works, by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government. Where said works are done by contract, such contract shall be made after sufficient public advertisement for proposals, in such manner and form as the Secretary of War shall prescribe.

That is the usual provision, I think, that has been placed in all river and harbor bills since I have been in the Senate. When the work is carried on by the Secretary of War without contract—suppose for instance, he requires stone for a jetty—I think it is the custom now for him to purchase the stone at private contract.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. DOLPH. Works are being carried on to my certain knowledge of that character, where the stone is purchased from quarries and is not furnished to the work by contract. Suppose that an owner of a quarry, the only quarry within any reasonable distance of the work, refuses to sell the material at a reasonable rate, then, I think, the Secretary of War ought to have authority to go into the courts and condemn so much of the property as is necessary for the public use, and when he has done that, having the advantage to compel a favorable contract, I think we ought to permit him, and throw the responsibility upon him of purchasing the material at a reasonable rate. If he should recommend in any individual case to Congress that he have authority to purchase the material, we would act on his judgment, and authorize him to make the contract.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to suggest that the section as it now stands without some modification would seem to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase, for instance, all the stone needed for the great breakwater at Sandy Bay, a work which is to cost several million dollars, by private contract of one contractor, when there are a vast number of quarries which would be glad to compete with each other. It seems to me there ought to be some modification.

Mr. KENNA. We can not hear on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. HOAR. I said that the bill as it stands, if I understand it, would authorize the Secretary of War to purchase of one man all the stone which was necessary for a breakwater, for instance, the great harbor of refuge which is to be constructed at Sandy Bay, off Cape Ann, Mass., a work which is to cost several millions. This would authorize the Secretary of War to contract for all that granite from one quarry, when undoubtedly there are a great many who would be very glad to compete. It seems to me that if we are in any case to require advertisement and competition in Government contracts, that case everybody would agree is one.

Certainly there ought to be some modification in the line of the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, where the Government wants some rights upon land between high and low water mark, where the property exists. Whether the Secretary of War ought to be compelled to condemn that and wait for the report of a jury, is another question; but it sems to me, certainly so far as material is concerned, so far as the stone is concerned, this amendment ought to be made.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is due, perhaps, to myself and the Senate to say that the committee were not unanimous in regard to this section. For myself, I think the entire section should be stricken from the bill. I do not believe that the Secretary of War should have general authority to enter into any of the tribunals of this country for the purpose of condemning the private property of the citizen when it comes in the way of an improvement which is authorized by Congress. Generally it has been the custom of Congress, whenever an improvement directed by them required the taking of private property, to insert a specific authority to the Secretary of War to do so, and that is done in some cases in this bill.

This section confers general authority on the Secretary of War in any case where in the construction of an improvement which may be generally directed in the bill in his opinion it becomes necessary to take private property to go into court and condemn it. I think Congress should authorize specifically this condemnation of property. The rights of the citizen are too sacred to be disposed of in this general way. For that reason I was opposed to this section and thought it ought to be stricken out altogether, but of course in reporting the bill I obeyed the direction of the committee.

Mr. KENNA. There are two considerations which are suggested by the observations which have been made on this section. The Senator from Minnesota who has just addressed the Senate seems to object to the idea of conferring on the Secretary of War power to proceed——

Mr. MCMILLAN. Generally.

Mr. KENNA. Without specific authority from Congress in the particular case, as I understand him, and he seems to insist that there should be a sort of reservation in Congress in every particular case throughout the country, involved as it necessarily is involved in the vast system of improvements of rivers and harbors all over the country, Congress to act in each particular instance.

It is a fact familiar to all of us that there has been no instance in which the War Department, charged with the prosecution of these works, improving the rivers and harbors of the country, has asked for the power which this section confers generally, where Congress has not responded. We do not confer on the War Department the power to proceed indiscriminately to condemn this or that piece of property or this or that material. We simply confer by this section the power to proceed to condemnation without further action of Congress in cases in which Congress has provided that he may so proceed.

It seems to me that when we determine that a river shall be improved, and that certain proprietory rights shall be vested in the United States which may be essential to that improvement, we ought not to necessitate delay such as may be incident to an appeal to Congress for specific action in the particular case, which we have never declined to confer in any case.

I can not see that the section as it stands, broadly as it is drawn, can do any harm in that direction. We only confer on the War Department power to proceed in condemnation or by agreement to carry out precisely the behest of Congress.

Mr. CONGER. I think there is no danger in the adoption of this proposition, though we have laws upon our statute-book which make it not only unlawful but criminal for any officer to incur any expense or make any obligation for the United States without the authority of law. If there has been an appropriation for an improvement which would embrace this class of property to be condemned under the authority of law, the money could be used for that purpose in the discretion of the Secretary of War. If there has been no appropriation the Secretary of War would violate not only his duty but he would violate several provisions of the statutes which make it punishable for an officer to incur any obligation or to make any obligation against the United States or to expend any money that is not appropriated.

I do not see any particular danger in this section of the bill. I know many cases where a work has had to be delayed for a whole year by the unexpected claim of ownership of a point of land or a little portion of land that it was made necessary for the Government to own before a lock could be built, or before a river could be improved, or before a wing-dam could be fastened to the shore.

I think under the general law, in regard to the expenditure of money by an officer or incurring an obligation for the United States to anybody without authority of law, he would have power under this section if the money had been appropriated for it; but the law is equally specific that he is forbidden to incur an obligation or to expend any money without authority of law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I move to perfect the proviso before it is stricken out by striking out the words "or material," in line 10.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My amendment is in the second degree. It is an amendment to an amendment already.

Mr. HOAR. If it is in the fiftieth degree and perfecting the thing proposed to be stricken out, I have a right to move it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think so.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is unduly excited. I do think so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks by the practice of the Senate it might be considered as a motion to perfect the text and not as an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right; I do not care anything about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, after the word "land," at the end of line 9, it is proposed to strike out "or material;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That when the owner of such land shall fix a price for the same which in the opinion of the Secretary of War shall be reasonable, he may purchase the same at such price without further delay.

The amendment of Mr. HOAR was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on striking out the proviso as amended.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose, though it is not strictly in order now, that the words "or material" should be stricken out in line 4 of the third section.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I do not think those words should be stricken out. That is a different matter entirely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better stick to the pending question, and get a vote on striking out the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I hope this section will not be stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not propose to strike out the section, but only the proviso.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proviso proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "instituted," in section 3, line 9, it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, however, That when the owner of such land shall fix a price for the same which in the opinion of the Secretary of War shall be reasonable, he may purchase the same at such price without further delay.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I was under a misapprehension as to the character of the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont. I thought he proposed to strike out the whole of the third section. I understand, however, he proposes simply to strike out the proviso. I do not think the proviso ought to be stricken out, at least so far as it relates to the purchasing of land. The word "material" has been stricken out of the proviso, I understand. It seems to me that the Secretary of War ought to have the power in a case which in his judgment is regarded as a reasonable bid, if a reasonable offer is made from a person owning land that is required for an improvement, to purchase the land without going through the delay of proceedings for condemnation.

It is placing considerable power in the hands of the Secretary of War, but we have to trust somebody, and I think we may trust the Secretary of War in a matter of that kind. The delay, as we all know, of the proceeding in court to condemn property is considerable, extending over months very frequently, and it may have the effect to throw an important improvement over for a year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on the question of agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to strike out the proviso reported by the Committee on Commerce as amended on motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Sherman,
Cameron,	Evarts,	McMillan,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cheney,	Hale,	Morrill,
Cullom,	Harrison,	Platt,

Camden,	Gray,	Sewell,
Chace,	Jones of Florida,	Spooner,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. In section 3, line 4, after the word "land," I move to strike out the words "or material;" so as to make the section read:

The Secretary of War may cause proceedings to be instituted, in the name of the United States, in any court having jurisdiction of such proceedings, for the acquirement by condemnation of any land needed to enable him to prosecute such works for the improvements of rivers and harbors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE. I do not know of any legislation heretofore that has authorized the Government by process of condemnation, which is sometimes severe and hard, to acquire anything besides land. I do not think it has ever gone beyond that. Some hardship has arisen, as I know and probably every Senator knows, where the condemnation statutes have been put in force to acquire land alone; but if the vast additional power to acquire material, which would embrace every kind of personal property needed to be used in these improvements, be given to the Government, then it seems to me greater hardship might occur. It would involve everything needed for these works—gravel, stone, timber, and I do not know but the machinery necessary, if the Government did the work. If the Government did the work itself, I do not know why they might not condemn a tug or a dredge boat, or any piece of property of that kind, or tons of iron, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] suggests, or whatever might be needed.

We ought to pause and think twice before we go any further in that direction, in my judgment. The law is ample now. The Secretary of War, or whoever may be the officer of the Government intrusted with these public works, has the power to issue proposals for bids upon advertisement. He has the competition and the market, and an opportunity to get for the Government a good contract; but this provision enables him to strike at any man's personal property that is needed, and the decision as to what is needed must rest in the department executing the law, and take it without that process of competition and bidding. Therefore, I hope these words "or material" will be stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator sits down I want to ask him to accept an amendment to his amendment, to strike out the word "material" and insert the word "earth." In the legislation of my own State and of his State, I am very sure, and all the States pretty much, the builders of railroads are authorized to go out of the location to get a gravel bank or something of that sort necessary for the construction of the work. In these river and harbor improvements, which are often done of course on the seashore, where there may not be a great deal of suitable material, there may be a gravel-bed which the owner would hold at an enormous price if the Government had no right to get it except by contract and he had no competition.

Mr. DOLPH. Make it "stone."

Mr. HARRIS. We hear nothing of the private conference that is going on on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator from Maine is quite right, but I suggest that he modify his amendment by striking out the word "material" and inserting the word "earth."

Mr. CONGER. I think it would make it more explicit to say "the earth." [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. If the word "earth" were used, without the definite article suggested by the Senator from Michigan, I do not think many cases would arise of hardship and grievance, and, therefore, I will modify my amendment, and will move to strike out "material" and insert the word "earth."

Mr. DOLPH. The section as it now stands, including "material," only includes it for the purpose of condemnation. When the Secretary of War under this section shall proceed to condemn material, he must report his proceedings to Congress for the necessary appropriation. In all the laws for the condemnation of property that I have ever examined or been familiar with, the party after having brought his suit and submitted to the jury what the value of the material is, may still abandon his proceeding and not take the property if the jury has assessed the damages too large.

Let me suppose a case. Suppose that in the improvement at Sandy Hook bar there is a man who has a stone quarry of common stone near the place where the work is being carried on which intrinsically is not very valuable, say 50 cents a ton. Suppose there is not another quarry within a hundred miles of that place where the stone can be procured.

If you compel the Secretary of War to advertise for material, then the gentleman owning the stone quarry very near the work has the advantage of his position, and you allow him to blackmail the Government and get his own price for the material.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator from Oregon himself think that if a man has taken just such a piece of land or stone as he describes, has developed it, has brought it into shape as a quarry, and is making it his business to furnish granite or stone for the market, he ought to be protected in that, and that the Government ought not to have the right to condemn it?

Mr. DOLPH. No——

Mr. HALE. Then why will it not apply to the iron mine, or the copper mine, or anything else that is native to the earth and that has to be produced by human skill and industry?

Mr. DOLPH. I will answer the Senator's question if he will permit me. In the first place, we do not use copper and iron for the purpose of making great jetties like those we would make at Sandy Hook bar and at the mouth of the Columbia River; we use brush and timber and stone. We do not want gravel, and we do not want earth; we want stone; but when you come to what iron you want and what machinery you want, you may procure it by advertisement, because it is a marketable commodity, and when it is advertised for there are hundreds of people in the United States who can supply it. Now let us take the case of a man who has a stone quarry. The Senator asks ought he not to have the advantage of the position of his quarry? Certainly; but ought he to say to the Government, "Because it will cost you a dollar a ton to bring it a hundred miles, therefore I will charge you a dollar a ton, notwithstanding it may not be worth more than 25 cents in the quarry?" I say no; what it will cost the Government to bring it a hundred miles from some other quarry ought not to be the price to be fixed upon, and if the Secretary of War can not agree with the man who owns the quarry, he ought to be allowed to go into court and let a jury decide between them, and not be at the mercy of the man who owns the quarry as to the price he shall pay, but go into court and let that be decided.

That is all that is proposed here. With the word "material" stricken out of the proviso, it would only allow the Secretary of War in such a case, if a man had a convenient quarry and the stone could be procured from that quarry at much less cost by the Government than from a quarry at a distance, if the man who owned the quarry near the work was disposed to take advantage of the necessity of the Government and insist on the price that it would cost the Government to bring it from the further quarry, to go into court and let the court say, through the medium of a jury, how much the Government shall pay for the material, and not be at the mercy of the owner of the quarry. That is all there is in this.

As I said, under all the laws I have ever known, if the jury said it was worth 25 cents a ton, or if a piece of land was worth a thousand dollars, if the Government did not choose to buy at that price it could still back out, and refuse to pay the money, and go to the other quarry.

This power of condemnation ought to be, in the hands of the Secretary of War, a leverage to guard against imposition in the purchase of material of this kind. I think it is sufficiently understood why it should not apply to iron, engines, and tools. They are marketable commodities, something that can be obtained at any time by advertisement; but stone can not always be obtained in all parts of the country. I think this is a very proper provision, and the word "material" should not be stricken out.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope not.

Mr. HARRIS. We can finish the bill in a little while.

Mr. PLUMB. I think a little reflection will be of advantage to the Senate in the matter of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 19, at 12 o'clock m.

KANAWHA AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 2646) granting to the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company the right to lay its track through the United States lock and dam property in the Great Kanawha valley, State of West Virginia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the Senate amendment, after the word "shall," insert the following: "If the Secretary of War in his discretion require it;" and the Senate agree to the same.

TIMOTHY E. TARSNEY,
CHARLES F. CRISP,
CHARLES O'NEILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

O. D. CONGER,
J. E. KENNA,
W. MILLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The explanatory statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House in the conference upon the disagreeing votes of the Senate and House of Representatives upon H. R. 2646 present the following statement in explanation of the conference report:

The bill as passed by the House granted to the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company the privilege to lay its track over certain property owned by the United States in the Kanawha Valley. The Senate passed the bill with an amendment providing that said railroad company should be required to pay rent for the property, if in the discretion of the Secretary of War it was deemed advisable. The effect of the action of the conference committee is to require said Kanawha and Ohio Railroad Company to pay rent for the Government property occupied by its track, if it should be required so to do by the Secretary of War.

TIMOTHY E. TARSNEY.
CHARLES F. CRISP.

Mr. TARSNEY. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. ROGERS. I send to the desk a conference report, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1458) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan at Bay City, in said district, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

JOHN H. ROGERS,
A. A. RANNEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

JAMES F. WILSON,
JOHN J. INGALLS,
J. Z. GEORGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following explanatory statement of the House conferees was read:

In compliance with the second paragraph of Rule XXIX of the rules and practice of the House of Representatives the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives make the following statement in relation to the action of the conference on Senate bill 1458:

The House amended said bill by striking out the words "Bay City," in line 3 of said bill, and inserted in lieu thereof the words "East Saginaw." The conferees on the part of the House of Representatives recommend that the House recede from that amendment, the effect of which is to leave the Senate bill as it originally came from the Senate.

JOHN H. ROGERS,
A. A. RANNEY.

FEBRUARY 16, 1887.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, by arrangement with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS], who did not sign the conference report, I have agreed to yield to him fifteen minutes for the discussion of this matter, after which fifteen minutes will be occupied in favor of the report, when the previous question will be called. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. I yield my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY].

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for the courtesy extended to me in yielding me this brief time in order that I may present to the House my reasons for asking that the report of the majority of our conferees be non-concurred in.

It will be remembered that on the 14th of last month this bill as it came from the Senate was brought before the House, and by four decisive votes declared that the United States court, to be located in the Saginaw Valley, in the State of Michigan, should be located in the city of East Saginaw and not at Bay City, the place designated in the Senate bill. Let me cite the facts in regard to the action of the House, for I shall not attempt to argue this case again: First, when the bill came before the House I had no right to offer an amendment, but the House voted down the motion for the previous question and gave me the opportunity. Again, on a vote upon a division, the House sustained me in supporting that amendment. The yeas and nays were called upon the amendment on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], and the House, by a yea-and-nay vote, substituted East Saginaw for Bay City. And then, when the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR], a member of the Judiciary Committee, moved to recommit the bill to that committee, the House by another decisive vote declared that it should not be recommitted. Thus the House said that this court should be located in the Saginaw Valley and in the city of East Saginaw.

Following that came the appointment of conferees. I had assumed, in my youth and simplicity and my ignorance of the rules of this House, that when upon an important measure of this kind the House had declared its pleasure it was the duty of the conferees appointed by the Speaker to carry out in conference the express will of the House as it appeared in the record. Indeed, sir, such was the information given to me by some of the best parliamentarians on this floor. I consulted officers of this House in relation to the matter. I discovered that it was my privilege and my right to recommend to the Speaker of the House the names of conferees who would support the action of the House. I did it; and upon my recommendation—perhaps not upon it alone—but I did recommend the names of two gentlemen to act upon that committee of conference. One of them [Mr. COLLINS] sits here at this moment dissenting from the action of his colleagues. The other—and I hope he is here, for I want him to listen to what I say—had led me to believe, assured me, that he was in favor of my city; and I, sir, in reliance upon the assurance from that gentleman, whose name is now appended to that report, went to you, Mr. Speaker, and solicited his appointment upon that conference. Much to my surprise, when that conference had met, I found that, instead of the gentleman doing as I supposed he had agreed to do—aye, as he did agree to do—he refused, and did not agree with the action of this House.

Mr. REED. Who is the patriot?

Mr. TARSNEY. You ask "who the patriot is." He is the distinguished (?) gentleman from Massachusetts, Judge RANNEY, if you want to know "who the patriot is."

I stand here now in open and manly opposition to that conference report, and say to this House that if I am to be here the victim of misplaced confidence, well and good; but it is not I alone, it is that great constituency that sent me here that will be the sufferers by the mistake that I have made.

I am not here to argue this case over again, for the facts are before this House. The commercial importance of our city, its superior advantages over the other, are too well known to members of the House to require repetition at my hands. I assume, Mr. Speaker, that the people of our own State know more about the wants and interests of its commercial business than gentlemen residing a thousand miles away. I hold in my hand a communication received by me a few moments ago from the representative of my city in the State Legislature. I send this dispatch to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LANSING, MICH., February 18, 1887.

Hon. T. E. TARSNEY:

Bill giving United States exclusive jurisdiction over site for United States court, &c., at East Saginaw has passed house by strong unanimous vote, and given immediate effect.

WM. S. LINTON.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, only yesterday the Legislature of my State, having in view the interests of that great Commonwealth, by an almost unanimous vote in its house of representatives, declared upon this question. They granted and passed, as I say, by a unanimous vote, a bill guaranteeing to the Government of the United States the exclusive jurisdiction over such territory as may hereafter be selected for the site of this court in the city of East Saginaw. This was done in accordance with the terms of the bill.

I offer this simply as one of the reasons for urging that the conference report be non-concurred in; and I ask this House, in its spirit of fairness, in its spirit of decency, to enter its protest against such conduct as has been displayed in connection with this matter.

Mr. Speaker, whatever time I may have remaining I desire to reserve for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY].

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY], in his zeal upon this subject, seems to have forgotten himself. He seems to suppose that a gentleman appointed upon a conference committee of this House is appointed there for no other purpose than to do his bidding. As for myself, sir, when I am appointed upon a conference committee I go in to do my duty, as I understand it, acting under my obligations to this House; and I do not feel bound to follow the behests of any gentleman when his wishes conflict. Even if he did, as he says, suggest and procure my appointment, I owe my allegiance to the House of Representatives and to my own conviction of duty, and not to the gentleman from Michigan.

He, in his remarks here to-day, only illustrates what he did on the floor of the House when this bill was up for consideration. He moved to amend the bill by substituting "East Saginaw" for "Bay City," in one line and one section of the bill, and left the bill with Bay City in all the rest of it as it read originally. It was just about as incongruous and senseless in its construction after he had secured his amendment of it as his remarks are here and now. [Laughter.] He does not seem to know whether he stands on his head or his heels, and it does not make much difference, by the way, for half the time he is on one and half the time on the other, and works equally well in either position. [Laughter.]

When this bill first came from the committee and was before the House for action, it is true that I was inclined to believe that the court should be held at East Saginaw instead of Bay City, and I so expressed myself to several gentlemen; but I felt bound to, and did, upon mature consideration, follow my committee in my vote, as they had decided otherwise. I was put on this conference committee with my position in that regard being well known, having taken pains myself to make it known, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] having leave to communicate it to the Speaker, and of which leave, as I am informed, he availed himself. When I was appointed and went upon the committee I went there fully impressed with the duty imposed upon me, and determined to do that duty as best I could, and not as the personal servant of any one gentleman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how did this matter stand before the conference committee? In the first section of the Senate bill Bay City was named as the place at which the court was to be held, and the provision in the other sections as to the marshal, district attorney, the records, &c., juries and the summoning of them, and the renting of rooms and fitting up of the same, all conformed and applied to Bay City. The gentleman from Michigan secured an amendment to the first section alone to the effect that the court should be held at East Saginaw, leaving the rest of the bill as it was. [Laughter.] The court at East Saginaw, and the court-house, the marshal and district attorney, and the juries, &c., at Bay City! [Renewed laughter.] The bill as amended came before the conference committee with the House and Senate agreeing on Bay City for everything except as to the place of holding court. As amended in the House the court was to be held at East Saginaw and everything else was to be at Bay City. That was the form in which the gentleman from Michigan had got the bill through the House. [Laughter.]

The House and Senate agreed upon Bay City as to a part, and that was fixed, and the conference committee had but one duty, and that was to settle the disagreement as to where the court should be held. [Great laughter.] For one, as I understand the rules of the House and parliamentary law, the conference committee had only to settle the point of disagreement between the two Houses. Now, the two Houses disagreed only as to the place where the court should be held. They had agreed as to all the rest of it, and fixed upon Bay City as to that. It occurred to a majority of the committee, therefore, that the best way to settle the disagreement was for the House to recede and have the court held where the court-house, the witnesses, the officers, and jurors were to be. [Great laughter.] In other words, I repeat, the House and the Senate had agreed as to the rest, and there was no difference upon that part of the bill. The disagreement was solely as to the place of holding the court, and for one I preferred to obey the rules and the parliamentary law rather than to follow any erroneous understanding which the gentleman from Michigan might have had when he contrived, as he says, to get me appointed on the committee, thinking I would serve his purpose. I went on the committee not to serve him, not to be false to my duty to the House, but rather to be true to, and act in accordance with, the dictates of my judgment, and I concluded to leave the bill with some sense in it, however little the gentleman from Michigan might have.

Mr. TARSNEY. I like a good thing—if I do not get too much of it. Now, let me call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of gentlemen of this House to the situation. The words "Bay City" appeared in that bill, according to my recollection, seven times. The vital point in the bill was the appearance of the words "Bay City," where they designated the place where the court should be held. These are the words that the House struck out, substituting for them "East Saginaw;" and I supposed gentlemen would yield to the merely formal amendments and allow the correction to be made in other parts of the bill.

When the bill went to the conference committee those eminent (?) parliamentarians might have done this, if I am correctly informed. If they had desired to carry out the will and wishes of the House, although by the strict rule of the House they were confined to a consideration of the disagreeing vote on the one amendment, they might immediately have come back to this House, their coconferees of the other body returning to the Senate, and asked a further conference on the bill and amendments. Why did you not do it? You have professed all the time to be in favor of locating this court in East Saginaw. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROGERS. I now yield five minutes, or as much of that time as he desires, to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FISHER], the representative from Bay City.

Mr. FISHER. I regret very much the imbroglio and the words which have occurred between the gentleman from my own State [Mr. TARSNEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY]. This conference report now presents to the House a bill which has been several times reported with a unanimously favorable report by the Committee on the Judiciary. This measure was first introduced in the Forty-first Congress and was fully considered before the Judiciary Committee of the House at that time, and after a long and strong contest between these two cities before that committee the decision was given in favor of Bay City. Again in the Forty-fourth Congress the same measure passed. In the Forty-eighth it received a favorable report from the Committee on the Judiciary. In the Forty-ninth it received a favorable report, and never in any one instance has there been a minority report in favor of East Saginaw.

All the object that my colleague [Mr. TARSNEY] desires to accomplish here is merely the defeat of this measure. The adoption of this report will locate the court at Bay City, and the gentleman admits that his own people, his own constituency, will be benefited by the court being established in that locality.

Much has been said about the railroad communication and the relative commercial importance of the two cities. So far as the population is concerned, Mr. Speaker, there is but very little difference. At the last census, taken in 1884, the difference was in favor of Bay City by something less than 1,000. In the matter of railroad communication the two cities are on an equal footing. The same roads that go to East Saginaw go to Bay City. At the present time the time-table gives an early train between the two cities, leaving some time between 5 and 6 o'clock in the morning, and an hourly train from that time until 9 or 10 o'clock in the evening. Therefore, so far as railroad communication is concerned, it is equal as regards the two cities.

But the main point in this matter is that we are at the head of deep water. Bay City is the entrée port of the Saginaw River, and it is there the marine and admiralty business will be best accommodated, and the necessity for a district court grows out of the needs of the admiralty business.

Mr. BLOUNT. May I interrupt the gentleman by inquiring what he has to say about the action of the Legislature?

Mr. FISHER. I was not aware there was any action of the Legislature till I learned it this morning.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Do the resolutions of the Legislature indicate any place that they prefer for the location of the court?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know. I have not seen them.

Now, I ask, Mr. Speaker, that this measure be considered upon its merits. And I ask that, with six unanimous reports of six different Judiciary Committees of this House in favor of this measure, this report of the conference committee be adopted on its merits and that the question shall not be decided on any sentimentality.

Mr. COLLINS. I do not believe the House ought to be asked to decide a question of this importance to that community in the eastern part of Michigan upon the mere quibble of attorneys or parliamentarians or upon any balancing of the intellectual qualities of my colleague [Mr. RANNEY] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY]. It may be true that the gentleman from Michigan has not as much sense as the gentleman from Massachusetts; and it may be possible that the gentleman from Massachusetts has not as much principle as the gentleman from Michigan. But that is nothing to this House.

The point made by the gentleman from Michigan against my colleague was not that he had gone on the conference committee agreeing to do the bidding of the gentleman from Michigan, but that he went on the committee pretending to be for East Saginaw and immediately abandoned that position in favor of Bay City. If I could "tell the secrets of my prison-house" I should be very strongly inclined to agree with the gentleman from Michigan. But it is not proper, I suppose, according to strict parliamentary usage that we should tell all that takes place in committee.

Let us come down to the question that this House is called upon to decide—to the merits, as the other gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FISHER] says; that is, whether the public convenience will best be served by establishing and holding a term of the United States court at East Saginaw or at Bay City.

The other branch of this Congress, without any deliberation or any discussion, decided originally that the court should be at Bay City. After a full and free discussion this House solemnly decided that the court should be held at East Saginaw as the place on the whole best calculated to serve the suitors, the witnesses, the jurors, and the interests of the public generally.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And did it on a yea-and-nay vote, too.

Mr. COLLINS. They did it on a yea-and-nay vote, and they emphasized it by another vote; and yet, because the mere omission to insert "East Saginaw" everywhere that "Bay City" occurs in the bill happened in this House, my colleague [Mr. RANNEY], with a spirit and an insulting manner, which I might say at another time and under other circumstances was worthy of a pettifogger, says the gentleman from Michigan did not know what he was talking about. Mr. Speaker, the railroad center, the center of population, and the center of business for the future is East Saginaw, and not Bay City, and I ask this House to adhere to its judgment deliberately and solemnly given the other day, and to insist that that judgment shall stand.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the attack just made upon my colleague upon the conference committee [Mr. RANNEY] I think he ought to have an opportunity to respond, and I now yield him three minutes.

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my esteemed friend [Mr. COLLINS] has felt it his duty to come to the relief or the re-enforcement of the gentleman from Michigan. I wish to say to him that I never have pretended anything. I have stated what is the fact to him and to others, namely, that when this matter was heard before the Judiciary Committee it was heard before a subcommittee of which I was not a member. What little I heard of it, however, inclined me to believe that the court should be held at East Saginaw; but inasmuch as I did not serve on the subcommittee and was not present in the whole committee when they passed upon the question I had not fully examined it, and, therefore, I deferred to the judgment of the majority, and when the bill came up in this House I voted with the committee against the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] and in favor of Bay City. If there was a yea-and-nay vote, as I think there was, my vote is on record, and as I vote I generally conclude. Therefore if gentlemen supposed that they had got a member on the conference committee who was going back on his vote or on the committee, or if any gentleman says that I ever pretended I would do that, he is grossly mistaken.

Mr. TARSNEY. If the gentleman says that he did not make me believe that he was going to do it——

Mr. RANNEY. It is impossible, Mr. Chairman, for me to say what the gentleman has been made to believe. I should hate to be accountable by word or act for any belief he may entertain or for any opinion he may have formed if his opinions generally are as hastily formed and as imprudently uttered as they have been on this floor to-day. I have had but one conviction in this matter; and I say again to this House that I was put upon the conference committee not by any solicitation of mine, but after I had distinctly told the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] who now arraigns me that I did not wish to go upon that committee and that I ought not to go upon it. I told that to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] likewise, and he asked me if he should so state to the Speaker, and I told him that I wished he would. Yet I was put upon the committee, and, having been put upon it, I say again that I did my duty, placed the House in a position of decency, and left the bill as it should be left and as alone it could be left, if it was to be congruous, by voting to recede from the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I embrace the first moment to express my regret that any sort of ill-feeling should have sprung up out of this matter, but at the same time I congratulate myself that, as I understand what has been said, there has been no sort of reflection upon my consistency in this matter. It is due to myself, and I think it is due to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY], that I should say that, at his request, I did communicate to the Speaker of the House his belief that he ought not to be placed upon the committee of conference. Why he was put upon that committee the Speaker of course best understands, and I have no doubt that it was done in direct conformity with the established practice of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the reason upon which the Judiciary Committee of the House and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate both base their report in favor of Bay City? I said upon a former occasion, and permit me now to repeat it as distinctly as I can, that there are three great classes of business to be attended to by this court. The first is the prosecution of criminal cases against persons who trespass upon the public lands. The second is the business connected with the commercial interests of that part of the Saginaw Valley. The court established at either of these towns would be able to attend, with perfect facility, to both of these classes of public business.

But the class of business of paramount consideration and which, as I think, I may state exercised a controlling influence upon the judgment of the Judiciary Committee in both Houses was the admiralty business. Bay City is practically upon a great arm of the sea—almost upon the coast of the sea—only 3 miles from the sea. At that place every ship, whether from foreign countries or from domestic ports, can go. The numerous entries and the vast tonnage of all that great lake are tributary to Bay City. The admiralty business belongs to Bay City, because the ships can always get there; and it is the last port from which a writ from the Federal court in the admiralty interest can be served. It is upon this ground mainly that the judgment of the committees of both Houses of Congress has been invoked in favor of Bay City.

Between these two cities, only 13 miles apart, the river becomes narrow and the tonnage receipts and entry reports show that a large number of vessels never reach Saginaw at all.

Mr. TARSNEY. The gentleman forgets that every vessel which goes to Bay City can reach Saginaw.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope my friend will not interrupt me. I state, Mr. Speaker, not what I know personally, but I state the result of the proof before the Judiciary Committee; and I had the honor to be a member of the subcommittee. That is my conviction, sitting as a juror to determine between these two points.

Now between these two cities, at one of which I say a large portion of the entries are not made, there is railroad communication every hour in the day, there being one road on each side of the river; so that there can be half hourly communication between these two points throughout the twenty-four hours. Hence, so far as concerns every interest except the admiralty business, either city would subserve all proper purposes, if the court were located at it. But as to the admiralty business, the highest interests of the Government are concerned; and as a business proposition the duty of Congress is to locate this court at Bay City, where this business can be done cheaply and properly.

That much, Mr. Speaker, I say with the utmost good feeling for the whole State of Michigan and with the warmest personal regard for both these gentlemen who represent the conflicting districts. And when I have said this much as the solemn judgment of every member except one of the Judiciary Committee of this House, it does occur to me that unless some better reasons than those which have been heretofore assigned can be given this difficulty ought to be settled here and now in favor of the city where the admiralty business can be transacted.

One other observation, Mr. Speaker, and I am done. East Saginaw is not a county seat at all; Bay City is. The population of these two cities is about the same. Each of them is important in respect to both commercial and manufacturing interests; but the growth of Bay City over Saginaw in the last three decades is marked and distinctive, showing, as I believe, from the census reports as quoted in the debates on this subject, that Bay City is to be the future metropolis of the Saginaw Valley.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is speaking of percentage of growth, not present population.

Mr. ROGERS. I mean percentage of growth. The population of the two cities is now about the same, Bay City having a majority of probably about 300. In 1860 the population of Bay City was only 700. At that time the population of East Saginaw was 3,000. In 1884 the population of Bay City was 29,415 and that of East Saginaw 29,100. This shows the rapid increase in favor of Bay City over East Saginaw, so far as population and commercial importance are concerned.

One other observation. Bay City is, perhaps, the largest salt-producing city in the world, supplying, practically, the American continent with her salt. Large quantities of this product go by sea, and by railroad communication when reached, from Bay City to all parts of the country.

Mr. Speaker, having said this much, I invoke the solemn judgment of the House—not upon the personal controversies between the gentlemen representing the two districts, or between the gentlemen representing the East Saginaw district [Mr. TARSNEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY]—but I invoke the solemn judgment of the House upon the action of the Judiciary Committee and of the conference committee, the latter of which has done the only thing which, under parliamentary law, it had the power and the right to do.

I now demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The question having been put on agreeing to the report of the conference committee,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. TARSNEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered—64 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 126, nays 116, not voting 76; as follows:

So the conference report was adopted.

Mr. EDEN. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object.

The reading of the names was concluded.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. MAYBURY desires to pair with me. He is unable to be here. I withdraw my vote and pair with him.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I desire to record my vote.

The SPEAKER. How?

Mr. PETTIBONE. In the negative.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's vote is not recorded.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I was in the Hall and did not hear my name called, although I was listening.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman vote?

Mr. PETTIBONE. I vote no.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was in my seat and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman again.

Mr. DINGLEY. I vote "yea."

The pairs were then announced, as follows:

Until further notice:

Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. DAVENPORT.

For this day:

Mr. TUCKER with Mr. PARKER.

Mr. LOVERING with Mr. EVANS.

Mr. CROXTON with Mr. PHELPS.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.

Mr. BLAND with Mr. NEGLEY.

Mr. WELLBORN with Mr. GUENTHER.

On this vote:

Mr. STEWART, of Texas, with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. WISE with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. HISCOCK.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to test the sense of the House between private and public business.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Allow me to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. From what committee?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am authorized to report two bills from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Pension appropriation bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield for that purpose.

INVALID PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10397) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, and move non-concurrence and ask for a conference.

Mr. SPRINGER. Read the Senate amendments.

Mr. STEELE. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I should like to have the bill read or a statement made explaining the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can state in a moment the grounds of difference between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out "15," and insert "20;" so it will read:
"For rents, $20,000."
Page 2, line 9, after "Treasury," insert "where practicable;" so it will read:
"And the Secretary of the Treasury, where practicable, shall cause suitable rooms," &c.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The House made an appropriation of $15,000 for rents for pension agents. The Senate increased the amount to $20,000. The committee recommend non-concurrence so the matter may be fully investigated in order to see whether the amount voted by the House is not sufficient.

The Committee on Appropriations also recommend non-concurrence in some language placed in the bill by the Senate. The bill as it went from the House required pension agents to establish their offices in public buildings in the cities where public buildings are located. The House bill in this regard was peremptory. The Senate inserted the words "where practicable," leaving it discretionary. In that amendment the committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Why not concur in the Senate amendments?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Because we think it is best the matter should be referred to a conference committee. I move non-concurrence and a conference be asked with the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN WAR PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Appropriations, also reported a bill (H. R. 11202) making appropriations to pay pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SIMMONS W. HARDEN.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I call up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden, which was returned by the President with his veto.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we had better go on with the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether the House will, on reconsideration, agree to pass the bill notwithstanding the objections of the President. On this the Constitution requires a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. How much time have I?

Mr. SPRINGER. The point of consideration is raised.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I stated it as soon as the Chair put the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Is the question of consideration raised?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. With what bills?

Mr. RANDALL. With the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman has the right to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What I desire to know is whether the appropriation bill will come up if this is voted down?

Mr. SPRINGER. This is private-bill day.

The SPEAKER. If the House dispenses with private business today it will then proceed with the public business as on other days.

The question is, Will the House now proceed to consider the bill and message?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 81.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to take a vote directly without debate on the pension bill. It will take the same length of time as would be taken up by this roll-call, and then we can proceed without delay with the public business.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Without debate?

Mr. SPRINGER. The report of the committee can be read, but no debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that by unanimous consent there be a vote taken directly on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Without debate?

Mr. RANDALL. Without debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BURROWS. It is understood that the report is to be read.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. That is the understanding.

Mr. BURROWS. And the veto message?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the vote be taken now directly upon the question of passing the bill over the veto, the reading of the report to precede the vote?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I now ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. WOLFORD. Would it be in order to have the veto message read?

The SPEAKER. It will be read.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the veto message of the President of the United States on the bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden, submit the following report:

The objections of the President are set forth in his message (Executive Document No. 252), which is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I hereby return, without approval, bill No. 1406, which originated in the House of Representatives, and is entitled "An act granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden."

The claimant mentioned in this bill enlisted as a private December 30, 1863, and was discharged May 17, 1865.

He filed an application for pension in 1866, in which he alleged that he was injured in the left side by a fall from a wagon while in the service.

In 1880 he filed another application, in which he claimed that he was afflicted with an enlargement of the lungs and heart from overexertion at a review. His record in the Army makes no mention of either of these troubles, but does show that he had at some time during his service dyspepsia and intermittent fever.

The fact that fourteen years elapsed after he claimed to have been injured by a fall from a wagon before he discovered that enlargement of the lungs and heart was his real difficulty is calculated to at least raise a doubt as to the validity of his claim.

The evidence as to his condition at the time of enlistment, as well as since, seems quite contradictory and unsatisfactory. The committee to which the bill was referred report that "the only question in the case is as to his condition at time of enlistment, and the evidence is so flatly contradictory on that point that it is impossible to decide that question."

Notwithstanding this declaration it is proposed to allow him a pension of $16 a month, though he has survived all his ailments long enough to reach the age of seventy-two years.

I think, upon the case presented, the action of the Pension Bureau overruling his claim should not be reversed.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 28, 1886.

It appears from the papers submitted to your committee that Simmons W. Harden enlisted in Company L, First Iowa Cavalry, December 30, 1863, and was discharged May 17, 1865. On the 23d day of July, 1866, he filed an application for a pension, alleging "that on the 25th day of March, 1864, while dipping water from the Mississippi River for the use of the company he was standing on the spoke of the wagon wheel and fell on his right side on the tire of the wheel. It was a cold day—as fast as water was spilled on the wheels it froze, causing him to slip. He was so disabled that he was sent to the post hospital at Davenport, March 30, 1864, where he remained eleven days. He was then sent to his company and detailed as cook, which duty he performed until he was discharged, with the exception of the time from March 1, 1865, to May 16, 1865, during which time he was in Overton hospital, Memphis, receiving treatment for this injury." Subsequently, in June, 1880, he filed a supplemental declaration, alleging that at Little Rock, Ark., on the 24th day of June, 1864, his company was dismounted and marched on double quick two miles, causing him to become overheated, and resulting in enlargement of the heart, producing organic heart trouble, pain and palpitation of the heart, fullness in the cardiac region, excessive and great nervousness, and frequent unconsciousness.

The following is a complete summary of the evidence on file in the case:

Dr. D. C. Hastings testifies that he was personally acquainted with claimant from 1855 till enlistment, and that he was during all that time free from disease.

A. D. Hastings testifies that he knew claimant for the seven years prior to enlistment, and that he was sound.

E. A. Harden testifies to prior acquaintance with claimant, and to his soundness at enlistment.

W. H. Keeling testifies that he became acquainted with him in 1861, and in the winter of 1861 and 1862 he employed him to take recruits from Quasqueton to Dubuque when the railroads were blocked with snow, and from the nature of the service knows that he must have been a stout, healthy man. He met him again in 1863, and saw nothing to lead him to suppose he was not a sound man.

David Swartz and Felix Kitch testify as to his soundness at time of enlistment, and that on March 25, 1864, while standing on the hub of the wheel of a wagon, while getting water for his company, he fell, striking on the top of the wheel, causing severe injury; also that at Little Rock, Ark., June 24, 1864, he became overcome with heat from marching two miles on double quick, injuring him so as to unfit him for duty, and rendering it necessary to send him to the hospital. Subsequently, in answer to an office letter, this witness says he knows positively that claimant was so overcome with heat that he fell in a fit, and was thereafter unfit for duty; that he, witness, and another comrade caught him as he fell; that afterwards he complained of his lungs, was unable to wear a belt, and was detailed as cook. C. S. Newell, another comrade, testifies to claimant's being overcome with heat as claimed.

George M. Minkler testifies that in December, 1863, we enlisted together, in the First Iowa Cavalry; had known him for several years, and his health was good, and he could do any kind of manual labor. I never knew him to suffer from sickness until the 24th of June, 1864. At that time we were marching from Fort Cotton to the arsenal grounds, 2 miles east of the fort, at Little Rock, and when we formed into line he was suddenly taken sick and almost fainted. David Swartiel and I caught him in our arms and had to hold him up. We requested him to go to hospital, and, if I remember right, we accompanied him to the hospital. I thought at the time that he had a sunstroke. He was on the sick list a long time, and was cupped and blistered several times. From that time he was never fit to do a soldier's duty. He could not ride on horseback nor wear a belt. He was detailed to do light work, cooking for the mess, &c.

R. W. Bodell testifies that he went with claimant to enlist; that both were stripped naked and passed as sound, which he believes they both were at that time.

William Miller, another comrade, testifies that he knew claimant intimately from 1856, living within 40 rods of him, and boarding for a long time at his house; knew him to perform all kinds of hard labor; the country was new at that time, and he did a great amount of chopping and logging; knew him to be sick in service; visited him in hospital in Memphis; would not be positive what he was treated for, but think it was some kind of heart disease.

J. M. Simerol, lieutenant of the company, testifies as to the incurrence of sunstroke, and his subsequent unfitness for general duty; that he remained with the company and did such light duty as he was able to do until March 1, 1865, when he was sent to hospital, and remained until May 17, when he was discharged.

A. G. Hastings testifies that claimant was an able-bodied man at time of enlistment, and that since his discharge he has been unable to perform manual labor, and that he is now wholly disabled from earning his support.

Dr. D. C. Hastings testifies to treatment for heart disease from soon after discharge until 1867.

Dr. E. M. Wilson testifies that he is well acquainted with claimant, and that he has suffered with heart disease ever since discharge.

Emily Summers and Emerson Harding testify that claimant was absolutely free from any heart disease at time of enlistment and has been affected ever since discharge with that disability.

Thomas Lore testifies that claimant has been unable to perform any manual labor since 1870.

H. B. Grable testifies that he has known claimant since 1872, and that he has been unable to perform any manual labor.

A. G. Hastings, E. A. Harden, Felix Kilet, and G. G. Newell testify that claimant has been unable to do any manual labor since discharge on account of heart disease. The examining surgeon at Independence, Iowa, reported June 30, 1867, that he is three-fourths disabled from heart disease.

The examining surgeon at Falls City, Nebr., reported September, 1881, that he was one-half disabled from same disability. A subsequent examination at Pawnee recommended a third of a third-grade pension for same cause. The adverse testimony is as follows:

E. W. Hastings testifies that claimant was troubled in breathing when overworked before he enlisted.

H. G. Chamberlain testifies that he had heard that claimant had heart disease before enlistment, but that his memory is not clear in the matter.

A. P. Bunhus testifies that claimant was sound at enlistment, and he did not hear him complain of heart disease until 1867.

W. F. Wallace testifies that he did not consider him fit for service at enlistment, and that he never performed much duty. (Special examiner says this witness is unreliable.)

Hugh Henry testifies that claimant complained before enlistment of his heart fluttering when he overworked; that he had seen him frequently when he would be short of breath after getting excited.

The special examiner in the case reports that he is reliably informed that Dr. Hasting's reputation is not good.

The special examiner closes his report as follows: "From the evidence before me, and the impressions I have formed of the honesty and reliability of the claimant and his witnesses, I am of the opinion that the claim is meritorious."

From the evidence submitted it would seem to be clearly proven that this man, nearly fifty years of age when he enlisted, was at that time able to do all kinds of hard manual labor; that he received an injury and a sunstroke in the service, and was ever after unable to labor for his subsistence; that the disability has continued ever since, and that he is now, at the age of seventy-two years, destitute and dependent on friends for support. That he was suffering at discharge, and has suffered ever since, from heart disease is well established. It would seem that a pension can only be denied him on the theory that the disease existed at the time of enlistment.

The act of March 3, 1885, provides "that all applicants for pensions shall be presumed to have had no disability at the time of enlistment, but such presumption may be rebutted." This, in the judgment of your committee, has not been done. Only three witnesses testify on this point, and they say that when overworked or excited he was short of breath. How many members of this body could work earnestly at hard manual labor for an hour without being affected in the same way? Nearly a dozen witnesses testify positively that he was not only able, but did perform the most arduous labor prior to enlistment. When the Government accepted this man its chosen agent stripped him, and giving him a thorough examination pronounced him sound. After seventeen months of service they discharged him, broken down and unable to earn a livelihood, and now, after waiting twenty years, he is denied the pittance which would enable him to eke out a scanty subsistence upon the petty evidence that when he overworked or got excited he seemed troubled with shortness of breath. It is contemptible for a rich and powerful Government to interpose such a trivial plea to avoid the payment of a small pension to a man who cheerfully offered his life in its defense.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, the President's veto to the contrary notwithstanding.

[H. R. 1406, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

An act granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Simmons W. Harden, late a private in Company L, First Regiment of Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $16 per month.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. The House will remark [cries of "Regular order!"] that this is reported by a unanimous committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood there was to be no debate.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I only wish it to be understood that both sides concur in this. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. The understanding was that the report should be read, but no debate.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I am not going to debate it; I only want to say that both sides concur in this report.

Mr. BURROWS. I suppose it will be in order to ask for the reading of the views of the minority?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. There is no minority report.

Mr. BURROWS. This, then, is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Yes, sir; it is unanimous.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is there anything further you want to get into the RECORD? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. I demand the regular order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Debate is not in order.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Was there not some understanding or consent unanimously given that there should be no debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is trying to get order on the floor so as to state the question.

The question is, Shall the bill be passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding; and on this the Constitution requires that the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 98, not voting 79; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. BAKER. I also desire to present a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore). The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will state his question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I call up the message from the President returning without his approval the bill (H. R. 5394) granting a pension to Sally Ann Bradley. I desire its immediate consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not insist upon that. There was at least a fair understanding, as I thought, that if the vote was allowed to be taken directly on the pension bill, which has just been disposed of, an opportunity would be given to me to move to dispense with private business to-day so that the House might proceed with the consideration of the amendments to the sundry civil bill. I further want to impress upon the mind of the gentleman from Ohio, whom I know to be always reasonable, that the bill I desire to reach should be disposed of at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no knowledge that there was any arrangement by which I was precluded from calling up this bill. I do not want to inject this bill into the proceedings of the House so as to disturb the progress of business; but I object to the refusal of the House to consider a bill which I regard as being all one way on its merits. Now, with the understanding, so far as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is concerned, that it is agreed that at the proper time I may have the consideration of this bill I will withdraw the demand at this time. But I want to say now that I will inject this bill constantly hereafter into the proceedings of the House until it is treated respectfully and has a hearing.

Mr. RANDALL. As the gentleman is aware, I have nothing to do with the consideration of pension bills. That belongs to a committee of which I am not a member.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I repeat that I had no knowledge of any arrangement by which but one of these pension bills was to be called up for consideration to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not say there was any absolute binding agreement, but I think that was the understanding.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am willing that the sense of the House shall be tested as to what shall be done next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his proposition?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to present a privileged resolution, and after it is read I will ask unanimous consent that the last portion of the resolution be immediately considered. It relates to the bills reported by the Committee on the Territories, and proposes to fix a day for the hearing of the three bills now on the Calendar for the admission of Dakota, Washington, and Montana.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to reach the consideration of the amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill. I object.

Mr. BAKER. Under the rules the resolution I present must go to the Committee on Rules if the House refuses to adopt the last resolution, which requires the committee to report back the resolution in two days.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that that will be objected to.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from New York has the right to have the resolution read for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has entertained the proposition. The gentleman has the right to present a resolution for a change of the rules for reference to the Committee on Rules after one day's notice. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States, on the 5th day of February, 1886, passed the act entitled "An act to provide for the admission of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln," the favorable report upon which was submitted by Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on the Territories, January 11, 1886; and

Whereas the Democratic majority of the Committee on the Territories of the House, through Mr. SPRINGER, submitted on the 25th day of May, 1886, a report adverse to said Senate bill, in which it is claimed that said Territory does not possess the area, the population, nor the legal right to be admitted into the Union other than as one State, and concluding with the further statement "your committee are therefore of the opinion that the people of the southern half of Dakota are not entitled to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and therefore recommend that the Senate bill admitting the proposed State into the Union and organizing a Territorial government for the northern half of that Territory should not pass;" and

Whereas the Republican minority of said committee united in a report dissenting from the conclusions of the majority, and advised the immediate admission of Dakota into the Union under the aforesaid Senate bill, which said minority report concludes with the following words: "We believe it is the constitutional right of the State of Dakota to be admitted under the bill which has come to this House from the Senate"——

Mr. HAMMOND (interrupting the reading). I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. I want to know whether a speech like that can be read under the privilege of introducing a resolution for a change of the rules? I object to the reading.

Mr. BAKER. What the Clerk is now reading is the preamble.

Mr. SPRINGER. If debate is to be permitted I should have the privilege of being heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no debate. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk continued to read, as follows:

"It will be observed that the majority report has not one suggestion of relief for that great and growing State, only flat rejection, denial of the right of citizenship and representation on the floor of Congress, refusal of the constitutional right to have guaranteed under them a republican form of government to the end that the 'Union' may be made more perfect, justice established, domestic tranquility insured, the common defense provided for, the general welfare promoted, and the blessings of liberty secured to them and their posterity in accordance with the corner-stone upon which our fathers builded the Federal Constitution in 1787. The undersigned, in conclusion, respectfully but earnestly urge the passage of the Senate bill 967 for the reasons stated, and that the State of Dakota be immediately admitted into the Union;" and

Whereas the population of the State of Dakota is upward of 263,465, and of the proposed Territory of Lincoln upward of 152,199, as appears by the census taken in the summer of 1885; while the area of the State is 77,000 square miles, and of the proposed new Territory is about 73,000 square miles, and at the present time the population of said State and proposed Territory is believed to have nearly doubled since the census of 1885.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the further reading. It can only be allowed by a vote of the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make the point of order that that is not a resolution for an amendment to the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the further reading.

Mr. HISCOCK. It will be over in a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This resolution is not introduced for present consideration, and no vote of the House can be taken on the resolution at this time. It is simply introduced——

Mr. REED. One word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to complete his statement.

Mr. REED. If the Chair is to render a decision I want to be heard before that decision is given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not rendering a decision; he is simply making an explanation. The resolution is introduced to the House as a notice—one day's notice of reference to the Committee on Rules to-morrow.

Mr. REED. If it is a notice to the House the resolution ought to be read. There can not be any doubt about that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is not notice to the House. It is a speech shoved in here under pretense of a matter of privilege. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Then I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one point of order now pending. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] on his point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. My point is that it is a violation of the rule just read to have the reading of that paper continue after I have objected, unless the House so orders.

Mr. REED. But this is an entirely different thing. This is a notice to the House, and of course it must be read to the House. How otherwise can the House have notice?

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the matter embraced in the proposition shows upon its face that it is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I raise the point of order and ask the Chair to decide it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] pending, and the Chair will now put the question to the House, under the rule which has just been read, Shall the further reading of the resolution be continued?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the point of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] comes too late, after the reading has been entered upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule permits it at any time. The Chair overrules that point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HISCOCK. This was offered as a privileged resolution, and it was accepted as such, and the reading entered upon; now I submit that the point of order of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] comes altogether too late, when the resolution has been nearly completed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cause the rule to be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard for a moment.

Mr. HISCOCK. That rule refers to the time when the reading begins.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is the point I made.

Mr. RANDALL. This forces another matter upon the House under the guise of a privileged question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] what he desires and what we desire is to save time and to get at his appropriation bills. We do not care to have them fail and an extra session forced upon the country. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. STEELE. I make the point of order that this is a resolution——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one point of order already pending. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], and will now put the question to the House.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise the point of order that this paper is a matter purely of privilege; that it states in the preamble matters of record referring to the records; that the last resolution is one of instructions to the committee, requiring them to report within two days; and that, for these reasons, we are entitled to have the paper read in order that the privileged resolution may be properly presented to the mind of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has nothing to do with the contents of the paper.

Mr. RANDALL. Under the plausible statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] that he rose to a question of privilege, there has been injected into the proceedings here that which appears not to be a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not for the Chair to decide. The question now before the House is, Shall the resolutions be read further?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 92, noes 113.

Mr. BAKER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 123, not voting 83; as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 112, the nays 123. The question is determined in the negative; and the paper of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] will lie over under the rule.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to ask a question for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to know whether the resolutions by themselves may be read and referred to the Committee on Rules or whether they should all lie over and be acted on to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The paper will lie over one day under the rule, to come up to-morrow for reference to the Committee on Rules.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to dispense with the morning hour for reports of a private nature from committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that those gentlemen who have reports may hand them to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] accept that modification of his motion?

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that proposition, provided the privilege be limited to reports of a private nature.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the morning hour for reports from committees will be dispensed with and leave will be granted to file with the Clerk, during the day, reports of a private nature.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Under the leave granted, the following reports were filed:

RUFUS LOWE AND C. M. LOFTIN.

Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11157) for the relief of Rufus Lowe and C. M. Loftin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH FORT RILEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CUTCHEON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10831) to authorize the Kansas Valley Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad through the Fort Riley Military Reservation, in Kansas, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AMOS SHIREY.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6268) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Amos Shirey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. HETTIE K. PAINTER.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2834) granting a pension to Mrs. Hettie K. Painter; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

L. V. HOLLYFIELD.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back adversely the bill (S. 376) granting a pension to L. V. Hollyfield; which was laid on the table, the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 3523) for the relief of Sarah E. Starling;
A bill (H. R. 4105) granting a pension to James V. Bodine;
A bill (H. R. 734) granting a pension to Oxley Johnson;
A bill (H. R. 7527) granting a pension to Aaron Sternes;
A bill (H. R. 677) granting a pension to Annie M. Broderick;
A bill (H. R. 7325) for the relief of Henry W. Goodnight;
A bill (H. R. 6633) for the relief of Philip Kincheloe;
A bill (H. R. 676) granting a pension to T. N. McClure; and
A bill (H. R. 3526) for the relief of Catharine Mehan.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL HIGH SCHOOL, VIRGINIA.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported the bill (H. R. 2580) for the relief of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary and High School in Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT TEXARKANA, ARK.

Mr. CULBERSON. I send to the desk a conference report. There will be no debate upon it. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9116) to provide for holding terms of United States courts at Texarkana, Ark., and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert:

"That terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern judicial district of the State of Arkansas shall be held twice each year at the city of Texarkana, in said eastern judicial district, commencing on the second Monday in January and July, to be known as the Texarkana division of said district.

"SEC. 2. That all process, civil and criminal, against persons residing in the counties of Columbia, Howard, Hempstead, Lafayette, Little River, Miller, Nevada, Ouachita, Pike, and Sevier shall be made returnable to said courts respectively at said city of Texarkana: Provided, That all crimes and offenses heretofore committed within the division created by this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

"SEC. 3. That the clerk of the courts for said district shall appoint a deputy for the said division, who shall keep an office open at all times in the city of Texarkana, and shall there keep the records, files, and documents pertaining to the courts authorized by this act."

And the Senate agree to the same.

D. B. CULBERSON,
JOHN H. ROGERS,
L. B. CASWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.
JAMES F. WILSON,
RICHARD COKE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The explanatory statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

Detailed statement to accompany House bill 9116, being a bill to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Texarkana, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9116) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Texarkana, Ark., and for other purposes, submit that the effect of the recommendation and action agreed upon by the conference committee and herewith reported will be to pass the bill as it originally passed the House with the following formal amendment:

"Provided, That all crimes and offenses heretofore committed within the division created by this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed."

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the previous question on agreeing to the report.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move——

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I desire to make a report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A conference report?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. It is a report which I desire to present under the agreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will hand it to the Clerk.

Mr. SAYERS. On behalf of the minority of the Committee on Naval Affairs I ask leave to file a minority report on the bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] proposes to report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection leave will be granted.

Mr. RANDALL. It is understood that this privilege of filing reports is limited to reports of a private nature. I object to reports on public business.

Mr. GEDDES. I ask unanimous consent to present a report. It is a public bill and is important.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the floor to submit a motion. The Chair can not recognize any gentleman unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania yields the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to dispense with private business for the rest of the day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday there be a recess at 5 o'clock until 7½ o'clock, the evening session to be devoted exclusively to bills on the Private Calendar to which there may be no objection. If this be agreed to we can waive the consideration of private business to-day.

Mr. DUNHAM. What are you going to do with the pension bills to-night?

Mr. SPRINGER. This has nothing to do with that.

Mr. HALL. I trust that the House will not dispense with the consideration of the Private Calendar to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is not debatable.

Mr. HALL. I ask unanimous consent to call the attention of the House for one moment to the condition of the Private Calendar.

Mr. DUNHAM. We all understand that pretty well on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL] asks unanimous consent to make a statement for a moment. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HALL. I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the legislation of the House itself upon the Private Calendar has received no consideration. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask whether it is in order to submit a report of a public character?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I object to the presentation of the report which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] asked to submit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That report has not been introduced.

Mr. RANDALL. I objected to public business being reported.

Mr. HALL. I was granted unanimous consent to make a statement for one minute, and I claim that the demand for the regular order will not take from me that right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, nearly every Friday and Friday evening have been, on motion of somebody, devoted to Senate bills almost exclusively, and but one day has been devoted to bills which originated in this House. I think it is due to this House that it should not abandon the purpose for which the Committee on Claims was created or the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, but that the business for which they were set apart should be respected so far as to agree to their consideration on the days which have been designated therefor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to inquire whether, under the order made awhile ago, it is in order for any gentleman to submit a report of a public nature?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not be at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] has offered a report of that character, and I object to its being received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not aware of any report of such a character as the gentleman has stated. If any has been offered it can not be received.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that it shall not go of record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not go of record, objection being made.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me inquire whether it does not require a two-thirds vote to dispense with the private business, this being Friday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been decided over and over again that a motion to dispense with the private business for this day, not involving any change of the rules of the House, does not require a two-thirds vote.

The question was put on Mr. RANDALL'S motion, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a division of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 85.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska, and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does it not require a two-thirds vote to dispense with the private business for this day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been repeatedly decided that it does not. The Chair has already decided the question.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 91, noes 87.

So Mr. RANDALL'S motion was agreed to; and private business was dispensed with for to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The private business for to-day is dispensed with.

Mr. HALL. I rise for the purpose of asking by unanimous consent—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, and it is insisted upon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to further consider the amendments of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10072) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

It was unanimously agreed yesterday before the adjournment that as each amendment was reached the amendment and the recommendation of the committee should be read and the recommendation of the committee should be considered as agreed to unless objection was made.

The Clerk read the sixth amendment, as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Clarksburg, W. Va.: For heating apparatus complete, $5,940.

The CHAIRMAN. The recommendation of the committee is to non-concur.

Mr. GOFF. I objected yesterday to non-concurrence and moved the amendment be concurred in.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GOFF. I move to concur in the Senate amendment. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether in his remarks yesterday preceding the rising of the committee he did not intimate he was in doubt whether or not this specific appropriation had been recommended by the Department?

Mr. RANDALL. In the early part of the discussion I said in general terms I believed these general items were embraced in an estimate sent in subsequent to the passage of the bill by the House. Afterward I had cause to inquire, and now doubt whether this estimate came to the House. I am quite certain it had not up to the passage of the bill come to the Committee on Appropriations of this House.

Mr. GOFF. Still the gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. RANDALL. I think I do.

Mr. GOFF. I ask whether or not, subsequent to the passage of the sundry civil appropriation bill by the House, the Secretary of the Treasury did not recommend this specific appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. RANDALL. So far as my knowledge enables me to answer, the Secretary of the Treasury has never submitted any estimate to this House as required by the law and by the rules of the House. The Supervising Architect, I am advised, did write a letter addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GOFF. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1887.

The honorable the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith copy of a letter from the Supervising Architect of this Department recommending an appropriation of $34,500 for the extension of the post-office, &c., building at Newark, N. J., and calling attention to the necessity for appropriations for heating apparatus in certain public buildings at the cities therein mentioned.

Respectfully yours,

D. MANNING.

Now the exhibit that accompanies the letter is as follows:

JANUARY 7, 1887.

To the Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY—

But I do not know whether it is necessary to read it, as it relates to a number of recommendations. I only refer to it as conclusive of the statement I made awhile ago of this recommendation having been submitted.

Mr. RANDALL. Is yours in it?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. What reference was made in the House of that letter?

Mr. GOFF. It is not, of course, my business what reference the House chooses to make of it, but there is the communication.

Mr. RANDALL. It is important, for this reason, to know whether it was sent to the Committee on Appropriations or to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with a view to extending the limit.

Mr. GOFF. I have no knowledge of the fact, but my understanding is that it went, of course, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think so; but the indorsement will tell.

Mr. GOFF. A copy of the letter went also to the Senate, and was there referred by the Presiding Officer to the Committee on Appropriations of that body.

Mr. RANDALL. But the indorsement will show what was done with it in the House.

Mr. GOFF. I have not the original paper.

Mr. RANDALL. The RECORD of the 8th of January will show.

Mr. GOFF. Let me read from this communication:

I have to state that the following special appropriations for heating apparatus should be made for the public buildings hereinafter mentioned, no provision having been made in the original estimates of the cost of the buildings for the heating apparatus: Augusta, Me., $8,500; Clarksburg, W. Va., $6,000; Leavenworth, Kans., $12,000; Peoria, Ill., $13,000; Terre Haute, Ind., $10,000.

Very respectfully, &c.,

M. E. BELL, Supervising Architect.

Now, the exhibit accompanying the letter of the Secretary, in accordance with the law in such cases made and provided, did reach the House, and I am informed was appropriately referred.

It also reached the Senate, and was there referred to and considered by the Committee on Appropriations, who make the recommendation embodied in this amendment to the bill.

Now, I wish to state that this estimate was reached in the manner usual in all such questions: the cubic feet of space was ascertained, and a calculation of 2 cents per cubic foot gives us this amount recommended in this estimate of the Supervising Architect.

The Supervising Architect has been, I claim, unusually particular, for in all of these cases, and here is a long list of these buildings, he has had the area calculated and has ascertained the exact number of cubic feet, and then has made the calculation according to the rule existing among all architects; and I submit it is not economy, it is not reform to refuse to make an appropriation for the heating or the completion of these buildings belonging to the Government or to pare them down for the mere purpose of securing a cheaper article. If the Government of the United States is to complete the buildings they should be completed in a first-class manner, and we ought, here in the House, to place such confidence in the Supervising Architect and in the Secretary of the Treasury as to accept his recommendations, more especially when we ascertain that he has given us in detail and in full minutiæ all the items upon which the estimates are based. Therefore I insist, Mr. Chairman, upon my motion to concur.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I am now able to say that the paper to which the gentleman from West Virginia refers, and of which he has read a copy, went to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and not to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GOFF. That may be so in the House, but not in the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, it confirms me in the position I took, that this communication did not go to the Committee on Appropriations of the House, according to the best of my recollection. The facts now show my memory to have been correct.

The ground upon which I ask a non-concurrence is a belief on the part of a majority of the committee that this work can be done for a less sum than the amount indicated by the Senate. That is the ground on which we ask that it shall go into a conference.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I wish to say a word. I desire to say that I was not present on yesterday when this matter came up in regard to Augusta; but I presume the gentleman knows that in a climate 44 degrees north of the equator a heating apparatus is necessary; and I did not suppose it was necessary to inform him of that fact.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not say it was not necessary; but the gentleman who represented the district to the best of my recollection never spoke to me on the subject.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is absolutely true, because I did not deem it necessary. But the gentleman must know that a heating apparatus is required for that building.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, we are going to give the heating apparatus to Augusta.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is all right if you do so.

Mr. GOFF. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question relative to the remark he made a moment ago that the recommendations of the Secretary were excessive. I ask the gentleman if we are to understand by that that we can not rely upon the estimates made by the Supervising Architect and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman wants a direct answer touching that from me as an individual I will give it very quickly.

Mr. GOFF. Let me complete my statement. They have given us in detail the reasons why they suggest this amount. Now, then, if we are to complete the building according to the estimate of the Department, according to the recommendation of the Secretary, we ought to vote these amounts. And that is not only applicable to this specific matter that I am speaking of but it embraces more than twenty other public buildings throughout this nation, including a great number of the States. Other gentlemen are interested in this matter. The whole country is interested in completing these buildings at an early day and in a proper manner; and I insist when the Senate has had the manliness and the independence to do the fair thing and the proper thing we here should treat them in a fair and a proper manner and not endeavor to pare down these appropriations and by any such false claim to economy or skin-deep reform repudiate their action.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from West Virginia has asked me a question which I propose as an individual to answer. I say that experience has shown me that the estimates of the Supervising Architect should not control me in my action as a member of this House in the appropriation of money.

I have heard a great deal about this matter of economy. It is a twice-told story. Every time any one wants to impress an exhibition of zeal on his constituents or on his State or upon the country he comes here and seeks to reflect upon the Committee on Appropriations. Now, I am ready as one of that committee to bear all such criticisms and still to continue in the path marked out by the committee. I ask this House, therefore, to confirm the action of the Committee on Appropriations in these particulars. It is true that there are twenty-six public buildings as to which the committee recommends non-concurrence in these amendments; but it is not the purpose of the Committee on Appropriations or of any of its members to exclude from the public buildings in question the necessary heating apparatus. Still it is the purpose of the committee to exercise their judgment in conference against excessive appropriations in this connection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia to concur.

The question being taken,

The CHAIRMAN stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 94.

Mr. GOFF. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 103.

So the motion of Mr. GOFF was not agreed to.

The seventh amendment was read and non-concurred in.

The eighth amendment was read, as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Concord, N. H.: For approaches and heating apparatus complete: Strike out "$15,000" and insert "$21,236."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, what is the proposition of the committee with regard to that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, when this matter was before the House a few weeks ago, when the original bill was under discussion, I took occasion to call the attention of the House to the fact that the committee had allowed a much less amount than had been recommended by the Supervising Architect and the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, sir, it may be that the amount recommended would be a proper amount for the latitude of Philadelphia, but I wish this House to understand that at Concord, N. H., we live in a cold climate, and I do not want the Democratic postmaster there, the Democratic collector of internal revenue, the Democratic judge and marshal of the United States court, to be frozen to death because of any mistaken idea of economy on the part of the Committee on Appropriations. [Laughter.]

I make this suggestion, Mr. Chairman, not as a partisan, but as a humanitarian; and, with the view of getting a sufficient amount of money appropriated to put proper heating apparatus in that building, I now move to concur in the recommendation of the Senate. And, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say further that I have no doubt that a heating apparatus can be put into the building for the amount recommended by the House Committee on Appropriations, but, in my judgment, when we are constructing these public buildings and putting heating apparatus in them it is real economy to provide apparatus that will do the work properly instead of taking inferior apparatus that will be insufficient for the purpose for which it is designed. Therefore I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I have only to say, Mr. Chairman, that when the question was before the House on a former occasion the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] made, in substance, the same motion that he makes now, and it was voted down, and I hope it will be voted down again.

The vote was taken on the motion of Mr. GALLINGER to concur in the Senate amendment, and it was rejected—ayes 85, noes 97.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, there are twenty-one other amendments of like character as the one just voted upon, and if the House will consent I would like to have them disposed of by a single vote. They are all for heating apparatus and for approaches to public buildings. If I can have the consent which I ask I will indicate the amendments by their numbers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] asks unanimous consent that the amendments to which he refers be disposed of by one vote. Is there objection?

Mr. BAYNE. Do those amendments refer to heating apparatus?

Mr. RANDALL. Heating apparatus and approaches to public buildings.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I send the numbers of the amendments to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read the numbers, as follows:

Nos. 9, 10, 15, 16, 19, 20, 23, 27, 30, 31, 33, 34, 38, 41, 42, 46, 48, 49, 50, 51, and 52.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the recommendation of the committee as to these amendments?

Mr. RANDALL. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] what is the object of refusing to concur in the amendment (No. 34) appropriating $12,340 for the court-house at Peoria, Ill.? The Government is under very heavy expense there both for the internal-revenue office and for the post-office.

Mr. RANDALL. That is like the other cases, and due provision will be made for a heating apparatus.

Mr. GOFF. He wants to get a cheaper one.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, that is cheap talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOFF. Yes; there is a good deal of cheap talk here.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to the fact that the estimate in this case is based upon a regular calculation, and I remind him that they require a good deal of heat out in that cold country.

Mr. RANDALL. That case is exactly like other cases in the bill, and a sufficient amount will be agreed upon in the conference.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, amendment No. 9 is a similar case, an appropriation of $11,000 for heating apparatus for the Federal building at Council Bluffs. On the 17th of December last the Secretary of the Treasury recommended this appropriation. Yesterday, on learning that the Committee on Appropriations of this House had concluded to recommended non-concurrence in the Senate amendment, I sent a dispatch from here to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, asking him if an appropriation of less than $11,000 would not answer for that building, and I have received a reply to that dispatch, which I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. RANDALL. I have always supposed, Mr. Chairman, that the heating apparatus of a building was part of the building itself, but the decision has been——

Mr. LYMAN. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. LYMAN. I have sent to the desk a dispatch to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 17, 1887.

To Hon. J. LYMAN:

It is estimated that an appropriation of not less than $11,000 should be made to permit action upon proposals to be invited for supply of a suitable steam-heating apparatus for Federal building at Council Bluffs, Iowa.

THOS. D. FISTER,
Assistant Auditor.

Mr. LYMAN. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought it had been agreed that the vote be taken in gross on the amendments indicated. If so, it will not be possible to take a vote on any item separately.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to remind the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] that by unanimous request it was agreed that a vote be taken on these twenty-one amendments in gross.

Mr. LYMAN. I have no objection to that. I move that all the Senate amendments be concurred in.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I think one word ought to be said with reference to the position of, I may say, a majority of the members of the Committee on Appropriations with reference to this class of items, numbering, I believe, some twenty-three or twenty-four. It was distinctly understood, I believe, that these appropriations for heating apparatus ought to be made. As to that there was no question; but there was some question as to the amounts proper to be appropriated in the different cases. If the committee had recommended concurrence in each of these items, and the House had adopted that recommendation, the matter would have been settled without further question or consideration. On the other hand, if the House should adopt the recommendation of the committee for non-concurrence, there will be an opportunity for a committee of conference to investigate, if they think proper, each case, to ascertain whether there have been any errors, and whether there is an opportunity in any instance to reduce the amount. There was no question, I believe, in the minds of the committee with regard to the necessity of appropriations for heating apparatus; but it was thought by some that there might possibly be a question as to the amount to be appropriated, and in deference to this opinion of some members of the committee our recommendation was made.

Mr. GOFF. Upon that point, the difference in the committee as to the amount to be appropriated, I would like to know whether there was any evidence of any character or any communication from any department other than the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury giving the estimates of the Supervising Architect?

Mr. LONG. I know of no other evidence except such as came in that way.

Mr. GOFF. Then I do not see why there need be any difficulty about the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] that the House concur in the various amendments which have been indicated.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 72, noes 96.

So the amendments were non-concurred in.

The eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and twenty-first amendments were read; and, no separate vote being called for, the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations in favor of non-concurrence was agreed to.

The twenty-second amendment was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"For construction of public building at La Crosse, Wis., in addition to the $100,000 heretofore appropriated for the purpose, $50,000."

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Do I understand that the Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair understands.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this particular item, not, however, with any expectation of changing the action proposed, as I see it can not be done. [Laughter.] The city of La Crosse has over 24,000 inhabitants. It has no public building. The Supervising Architect says that the sum of $100,000 heretofore appropriated for the erection of a public building in that city is insufficient for the purchase of the ground and the construction of the building. Hence he declines to proceed in this matter until there is a larger appropriation. The gross postal receipts in that city are annually over $28,000; the net receipts over $20,000. There is a land office there, with a register, receiver, and clerk. The place is also a port of entry. There are many public offices there connected with business of the Government; yet there is no public building of any kind. A public building is needed—more needed than in many cases in which ample appropriations have already been made. A special bill providing for an increased appropriation for the public building at that city has passed the Senate and has been for some time in this House on the Calendar; but I have had no opportunity to bring it to the attention of the House. The appropriation for this purpose has, therefore, been put in this bill. It is certainly a very wise and just appropriation, and one which is greatly needed.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not here to controvert any of the statements of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS]. But we find that the law has in this case fixed a limit of $100,000, and the rules do not permit us on a general appropriation bill to make any appropriation in excess of the amount authorized by law. That is the reason we have recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, thirty-fifth, and thirty-sixth amendments were read; and, no separate vote being demanded, the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations in favor of non-concurrence was agreed to.

The thirty-seventh amendment was read, as follows:

In the appropriation for court-house and post-office at Pittsburgh, Pa., strike out "fifty" and insert "two hundred;" so as to make the paragraph read:

"For court-house and post-office at Pittsburgh, Pa.: For continuation of building, $200,000."

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, from the nature of many of the amendments and from the motion of the chairman of the committee to non-concur I infer that the committee will not refuse to consider proper appropriations in cases of this kind.

Mr. RANDALL. The only question in this case was how much should be given; and the point involved, as the gentleman knows, is as to the character and extent of the existing contracts.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not wish to make opposition to the action of the Committee on Appropriations, but I do desire to state that the appropriation already made for this building has been wholly earned and is in excess of appropriation to the extent of $40,000; so that unless $200,000 is apppropriated they will not have sufficient money for the next fiscal year. That is the opinion of the local architect and also of the Supervising Architect.

I simply desire to press upon the committee without delaying the progress of this bill that it will be necessary to give the full amount of the estimate, or nearly that amount, to carry on the operations during the next fiscal year on that building.

Mr. RANDALL. Some contracts have been made which seem to bind the Government to the extent stated by the gentleman, but the Committee on Appropriations desire to examine the matter fully and carefully. Of course I do not think there is any purpose on the part of the committee not to give on that building what is required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888.

Mr. BAYNE. Was not evidence given by the Supervising Architect before the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; and, speaking for myself, it was not satisfactory, although I fear it is bound by the existing condition of things.

Mr. BAYNE. That evidence I understand shows there is on hand $143,000, and that about $180,000 is earned or contracted for.

Mr. RANDALL. That is my recollection, but I would not like to say absolutely it is so.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The thirty-ninth amendment was read, as follows:

In line 143, after the word "limit," insert "including heating apparatus and approaches;" so it will read:

"For post-office at Troy, N.Y.: For completion of building under present limit, including heating apparatus and approaches, $100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL. While I have not the authority of the committee to report any amendment to the Senate amendment, yet I have seen one or two of the members of the committee, and I think when it comes to be read and understood the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House concur in amendment 39, with an amendment as follows: On page 8 of the bill, in line 23, after the word "Louisana," insert the words "at Chico Pass, and to mark the navigable channel along Grand Lake, Louisiana."

Mr. RANDALL. It is to establish two lights.

Mr. GAY. It may be five.

Mr. LONG. How will the bill then read? It appears you have not quite the right place.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the only place where I could put it, as it would not do to put it where there is non-concurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr. RANDALL'S amendment to the amendment was concurred in; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The fortieth amendment was non-concurred in.

The forty-first and forty-second amendments were non-concurred in.

The forty-third amendment was read, as follows:

For the building known as the old custom-house building at Saint Louis, Mo.: For necessary repairs and alterations, $80,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the interior of this building gave way last year when under repair. The restoration involves considerable expense, and it is intended in repairing it to provide sufficient room to accommodate those branches of the service which at present are occupying rented buildings at an annual cost to the Government of nearly $16,000. The assay office is now located in the building, and the commercial interests of Saint Louis require a branch post-office in this building.

Mr. RANDALL. There will be no trouble about that amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That being the understanding, I will not ask for a vote of concurrence, and will not further detain the committee.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The forty-fourth, forty-fifth, forty-sixth, forty-seventh, forty-eighth, forty-ninth, fiftieth, fifty-first, and fifty-second amendments were non-concurred in.

The fifty-third amendment was read, as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Williamsport, Pa.: For completion of building under present limit, including heating apparatus and approaches, $125,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. This case comes under the rule laid down by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] when we were at No. 3. This appropriation was left out by the House committee at the time the bill was reported to the House, because at that time the lands were not condemned. Since that time the land has been condemned; but there is no proposition here to appropriate beyond the limit already authorized.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? Has the site been condemned?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The site has been condemned since the action of the House upon it when it was up for consideration before; and I understood the gentleman at that time to say that that was the only objection against making the appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. It was at that time. I would like to ask also whether the dedication has been made by the Legislature?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It has been.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no doubt if the gentleman will allow this to go into conference it will be taken care of.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. With that assurance I am willing to let it go.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The fifty-fourth amendment was non-concurred in.

The fifty-fifth amendment was read, as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Fort Scott, Kans.: For completion of building under present limit, $40,000.

The committee recommend concurrence, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For post-office, custom-house, and court-house at Wilmington, N. C.: For purchase of site and commencing the erection of building, $50,000.

"For court-house and post-office at Jefferson, Tex.: For purchase of site and commencing the erection of building, $25,000.

"For post-office at Houston, Tex.: For purchase of site and commencing the erection of building, $25,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The fifty-sixth and fifty-seventh amendments were non-concurred in.

The fifty-eighth amendment was read, as follows:

Bureau of Engraving and Printing and quartermaster's corral, Washington, D. C.: For the construction of new sewers to connect with the city sewer, for the proper drainage of the buildings of said bureau and the Quartermaster's Department, in square 232 in said city, $2,443.30, the work to be done under the direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia; and the provision of the sundry civil act of August 4, 1886, appropriating $1,200 for a new sewer for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is hereby repealed.

The committee recommend concurrence, with an amendment as follows:

Lighting the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor: For building for engines and boilers, $10,000; incandescent-light plant, $2,500; dynamos, lamps, and lens for torch, $4,000; removing present machinery to new building, additional houses for side lamps, putting grounds in order, fencing, and incidentals, $3,000; in all, $19,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Amendments numbered 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, and 74 were non-concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL. Amendments numbered 75 to and including 151 relate to the Coast Survey. The committee recommend non-concurrence in all of them; and I ask unanimous consent that a single vote be taken upon these amendments.

Mr. BURROWS. For the present I will have to object to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not suppose it is in order in the committee, but I would like to test the sense of the House as to whether they would not allow us to sit a little later, say until 6 o'clock, on this bill, and then dispense with the evening session.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the proposition?

Mr. RANDALL. That the House shall sit, say, until 6 o'clock.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And then take the recess for the evening session?

Mr. RANDALL. No. If we sit until 6 o'clock a good many of us would not feel like coming back.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But some of us would.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I could not agree to dispense with the evening session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to state that such an order could not be made under any circumstances in the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I was aware of that, but I thought I would test the sense of the committee upon the proposition.

Mr. BURROWS. I have looked over the bill and noticed the amendments to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania referred in his request a moment ago. I therefore withdraw my objection.

So (there being no further objection) amendments numbered 75 to 151, inclusive, were non-concurred in.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether a formal vote on non-concurrence will be taken as prejudicing these items in conference?

Mr. RANDALL. The House practically has always had to give this up; but I hope it will have more effect in the future than in the past in resisting such appropriations.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But my query is this: The motion is to nonconcur; now, whether that motion, being formally agreed to, will operate to the prejudice of these items in the conference?

Mr. RANDALL. Undoubtedly not. The Senate in all human probability will insist, and it will be a question as between the conferees.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Some ought to be agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. No doubt some will be agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. With the understanding that this does not prejudice the matters in conference, I make no objection.

Amendment numbered 152 was non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 153 was non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 154 was concurred in.

Amendments numbered 155, 156, and 157 were non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 158 was concurred in.

Amendments numbered 159 and 160 were non-concurred in.

Amendment numbered 161 was read, as follows:

Insert after the twelve hundred and forty-sixth line of the bill, as follows: "And the President is further authorized to use of the same unexpended balance a sum not exceeding $10,000 for the purpose of investigating the merits of the method practiced in Mexico and Brazil for preventing yellow fever by inoculation."

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to concur in that amendment.

This amendment explicitly authorizes the President to use a sum not exceeding $10,000 for investigating the method of inoculation for the prevention of yellow fever. Now, the paragraph which passed the House, and which is the existing law——

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order upon the amendment if it is to be discussed here on a motion to concur.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman not listen for a moment——

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to reserve my right.

Mr. DAVIS. I was about to say that this amendment was proposed to the paragraph when the bill was first considered by the House and was ruled out of order as new legislation. Coming to us in the form of a Senate amendment, I assume that it is properly before the House, and that the point of order can not now be sustained. The original paragraph gives the President power to expend the appropriation only in the event of a threatened or actual epidemic of cholera or yellow fever. This language can not be construed as giving the President power to prosecute this investigation in the absence of a threatened or actual epidemic of either of these diseases. It would certainly be at the best a strained and an unusual interpretation which would confer such authority. It can not be expected that the President will exercise doubtful powers, and it must be evident to the House that he will not order the investigation unless the amendment, which explicitly authorizes him to do so, be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to move to concur.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that will not be done. The law as it now exists, I am inclined to think, gives this discretion already to the President of the United States such as is provided for by the operation of the Senate amendment. If it does not already give that discretion, then the amendment would have been, if offered in the House, subject to a point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is too strict in the construction he gives to the part of the paragraph which precedes the amendment. I may as well read it in order that its effect may be seen.

The President of the United States is hereby authorized, in case of threatened or actual epidemic of cholera or yellow fever, to use the unexpended balance of the sum appropriated therefor by the act approved August 4, 1886, in aid of State and local boards or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same and for maintaining quarantine and maritime inspections at points of danger.

That has a particular object. The amendment is for an entirely different purpose. It reads as follows:

And the President is further authorized to use of the same unexpended balance a sum not exceeding $10,000 for the purpose of investigating the merits of the method practiced in Mexico and Brazil for preventing yellow fever by inoculation.

This, you see, does not depend upon any existing or threatened epidemic, but is for an independent investigation into a theory which has attracted a great deal of attention. The Committee on Commerce reported to the House a bill to authorize the President to appoint persons and appropriate money for the purposes of securing an investigation of this theory of preventing yellow fever by inoculation. We have not been able to secure the consideration of that bill by the House. An effort was made to get an amendment on this bill in the House, but it was ruled out of order, properly, of course, as new matter. The amendment has now been put on this bill in the Senate, and it is for a totally different purpose from that of the first part of the section referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as will be seen by the reading.

We had at one time during this session the subject learnedly discussed on this floor, but not as extensively discussed as the importance of the subject deserved. I have neither the information nor the disposition to go into a discussion of the merits of this theory of preventing yellow fever by inoculation. But some of the most learned physicians of Mexico and Brazil, the United States and France, believe that yellow fever, like small-pox, can be mitigated and its evils prevented by inoculation. Now, here is a proposition to expend not exceeding $10,000 of an unexpended balance appropriated for a kindred purpose, to enable the President to have an investigation of this subject made. The appropriation is not sufficient, in my judgment, in amount, but it may enable the President to obtain very important information on this subject.

Any one who has ever lived in the region where the desolation of yellow fever was witnessed, who has seen whole families swept out of existence, fathers and mothers taken from their children, children taken from their parents, cities and towns almost destroyed by that terrible epidemic, can not but feel that if its ravages can be mitigated or prevented, no greater blessing could be conferred upon humanity.

In addition to the miseries and loss of life produced by this disease, the injury it has inflicted on the commerce of this country by the diverting of trade, by the establishment of quarantine, is almost beyond calculation. The whole country from Norfolk to the Rio Grande, and from San Francisco south is especially subject to its ravages.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. I should like a few moments more.

Mr. ROGERS was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. REAGAN.

Mr. REAGAN. Not only that, but its ravages have been experienced in the city of New York and in the city of Boston. The expenditure proposed is small. The proposition rests upon a theory which has the support of some of the most learned scientists and physicians of Mexico, of Brazil, of the United States, and of France. It seems to me that humanity itself appeals to this House to allow this small sum to be expended in order to ascertain whether that theory can be practically carried out, so as to mitigate or prevent the ravages of yellow fever.

I trust the House will concur in the amendment of the Senate, as it is not probable that at this period of the session we can get up the House bill and have it acted upon as a separate measure.

Mr. RANDALL. When this was up before I said that the impression on my mind was that the law already gave the President discretion to the extent that it would be given by the insertion of this amendment. It will be remembered that the amendment was ruled out in the House on a point of order. The Senate has now inserted it again, but the Committee on Appropriations are bound by the action of the House. If this amendment goes into the bill it will be a change of existing law, and that is the principal ground upon which the committee have recommended non-concurrence. I am entirely content myself to see this work undertaken, because I believe that if we can prevent the spread of yellow fever it is most desirable that it should be done.

Mr. REAGAN. There is no point of order made upon the amendment and no point of order can be made upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no point of order made upon it now, but there was a point made upon it when it was originally offered as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. If the gentleman has no other reason than that I hope that he will withdraw his objection to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not made any point against it.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] a question. He says that he has refrained from pushing the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce which makes substantially the same provision as this amendment. Now, I wish to ask him if it is not true that it is sought to put legislation touching this matter into this appropriation bill so as to avoid the danger of a veto of a separate bill on the ground that it would be an instance of the "support of the people by the Government?"

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I clearly understand the gentleman's question. This provision is sought to be put here to enable the President to have the theory to which I have referred investigated. I do not know what connection it has with a veto or with the absence of a veto.

Mr. CANNON. If it was in a separate bill the President could veto it.

Mr. REAGAN. Of course; but certainly there is no purpose on my part to seek to control the President's veto power. I am simply seeking to obtain a provision for what seems to be a matter of great importance in the interest of humanity. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The motion of Mr. DAVIS to concur in the Senate amendment was greed to.

Amendments numbered 162, 163, and 164 were read; and, no separate vote being demanded, the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations in favor of non-concurrence was agreed to.

Amendment numbered 165 was read, as follows:

(165) French spoliation claims: To enable the Secretary of State to complete the search now being made in France for records and other documents affecting the rights or claims of American citizens under the act of Congress approved January 20, 1885, entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to July 31, 1801," and to make a similar search in Spain or elsewhere, and to procure such records and documents as already have been found and that may hereafter be found, or certified copies or abstracts thereof, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, and to be immediately available.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to concur in that amendment, but I am perfectly willing to withdraw the motion if a reason is given for non-concurring. The amount proposed to be appropriated is only $5,000, and the object is very important.

Mr. RANDALL. I can only say that there is no law authorizing any such expenditure. Furthermore, the Government of the United States has already sent a gentleman to the countries named, I think—certainly to France—Mr. Broadhead, a former member of this House, who, as the committee are advised, made diligent search in the direction indicated in the amendment. In addition to that we have our regular diplomatic and consular officers, and this seemed to the committee like a proposition to send somebody else abroad to go over the same ground already trodden by Mr. Broadhead.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then I infer that the objection of the committee is not to the amount, but to the purpose of this appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that is so.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, we have already passed a bill giving these French spoliation claimants the right to go to the Court of Claims. The long time that has elapsed since the claims originated of course casts a cloud over the evidence, and in many cases the claimants find it very difficult to trace the facts upon which their claims were founded. Considering the long delay that has taken place in settling these claims, I think it is eminently proper that the Government should aid the claimants in getting access to public records in other countries. I know of the search that was made by Mr. Broadhead. I believe that search was authorized by the House of Representatives, and, from the wording of this amendment, I infer that it is designed to carry out the same purpose. Now, why the Committee on Appropriations should say that this work, already partially performed, shall not be completed, I am unable to see. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says that there is no law for this. Why should there be? The appeal to the existence or non-existence of a statute might be a good appeal under the rules of the House, but I think we ought to consider this matter on its merits as it comes from the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to vote upon it on its merits.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Well, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. ADAMS to concur in the amendment; and there were—ayes 17, noes 87.

So the motion was rejected, and the amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 166 to 171 (in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence), amendment numbered 172 (in which the committee recommended concurrence), and amendments numbered 173 to 178 (in which the committee recommended non-concurrence) were read; and, no separate vote being demanded, the recommendation of the committee was agreed to.

Amendment numbered 179 was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"Elevator for Senate wing of the Capitol: For the construction of an elevator in the south end of the eastern corridor of the Senate wing of the Capitol, $15,000; and the Architect of the Capitol is directed to have the same completed for use by December 1, 1887."

The Committee on Appropriations recommended that the Senate amendment be concurred in, with the following amendment:

After the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following:

"Elevator for the House wing of the Capitol: For the construction of an elevator for the use of the public in the House wing of the Capitol, to be located at the south end of the western corridor, and to run from the basement to the upper story, $12,000; and the Architect is directed to have the same completed for use by December 1, 1887.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations was agreed to, and the amendment of the Senate as amended was concurred in.

Amendment No. 180, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence, was read and non-concurred in.

Amendment 181 was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"That all the public lands in the Territory of Wyoming lying in the counties of Johnson and Crook, in said Territory, shall constitute a new land district, to be called the Buffalo district.

"That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or during the recess thereof and until the next session after such appointment, a register and a receiver for said district, who shall be required to reside in the town of Buffalo, Wyo., until such time as the President may, in his discretion, remove the site of said land office from said town; and they shall be subject to the same laws and be entitled to the same compensation as is or may hereafter be provided by law in relation to the existing land offices and officers in said Territory."

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in this matter the Senate has forgotten one of its rules, this evidently being legislation upon an appropriation bill. I hope the committee representing the House will insist on non-concurrence and will inform that honorable body, the Senate, that we have adopted a rule which prohibits legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman how far the rules of the House govern the action of the Senate.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, we want to govern our own action by them.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendments numbered 182 to 188 (in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence), amendment numbered 189 (in which the committee recommended concurrence), amendments numbered 190 to 192 (in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence), amendment numbered 193 (in which the committee recommended concurrence), amendments numbered 194 to 196 (in which the committee recommended non-concurrence), were severally read; and, no separate vote being demanded, the recommendations of the committee were agreed to.

Amendment No. 197 was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"Education in Alaska: For the education of the children of school age in the Territory of Alaska, without reference to race, $25,000."

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. McCOMAS. I move to concur in this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. If there is to be debate on this question I move that the committee rise.

Mr. McCOMAS. I do not expect to occupy much time, but I have no objection to yielding with the understanding that I shall be entitled to the floor when this question again comes up.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL, that the committee rise, was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10072) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 9642) to provide for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 2929) to amend the act dividing the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and to divide the eastern and western districts thereof into divisions, establish district and circuit courts of the United States therein, and provide for the times and places for holding such courts, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, no; this is the night for pension business.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to press the motion to adjourn I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House adjourn; and on this question the gentleman from Kansas calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to detain the House by a yea-and-nay vote. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDEN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business——

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock for the purpose of transacting business at the evening session under the standing order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask unanimous consent for a session on Thursday evening next for the consideration of private bills.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past 7 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 18, 1887.

I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, Jr.,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, requested the return of bills of the following titles, namely:

A bill (S. 2944) making appropriations for the jetties in Charleston Harbor; and

A bill (S. 3107) granting a pension to Catharine F. Ellsworth.

The message also announced the adoption by the Senate of the conference reports on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on bills of the following titles, namely:

A bill (S. 10) to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 9116) to provide for holding terms of United States courts at Texarkana, Ark., and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7596) to enable foreign executors and administrators to sue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WINANS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar under the special order of the House; and the Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed to-night in the manner of the preceding Friday evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that members present may be recognized to call up such bills upon the Calendar under the special order as they may designate. Is there objection?

Mr. WINANS. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better have the regular order. If it should happen that all the pension bills on our Private Calendar could not receive the consideration of this Congress it certainly ought not to be those which are first in order on the Calendar and have been there a long time. It is a good rule and a just one that "first come first served," and I think no one can object to that principle in connection with this business. And we ought to remember, sir, that all favoritism is at the expense of some presumably deserving person. I hope we may have the regular order of proceeding this evening and that we may proceed without further delay.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would not consent to make this order—that members present may call up the bills they designate subject to one objection?

Mr. WINANS. I prefer the regular order.

Mr. LONG. I want to suggest to the gentleman that his objection would be well founded if we had not been proceeding heretofore for some time in this manner. Many of us have been here night after night waiting our turn; and it is the natural order of procedure to permit gentlemen to call up bills in this way. It is a hardship upon some of us who have been here constantly every night not to be able to reach bills or a bill in which we may feel a special interest.

Mr. WINANS. For the very reason the gentleman suggests I think we ought to proceed in the regular order. Many deserving persons are at the head of the list, and have been set aside evening after evening, and I shall insist upon proceeding in the regular order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I believe I have never undertaken to interfere in any way with the special rule providing for these sessions; but considering that this is near the end of the session, and also the further fact that the bills are well known on their merits to those persons who are present, I think it would be no injustice to any claimant upon the Calendar whose bill is not called up if the friends of these other claimants in this House who have attended regularly these Friday night sessions in the interest of their bills should have the privilege of specifying those they wish taken up for consideration.

Therefore I say it is unfair to the members of this House who have attended every night during the last session and this clear through, whether they had bills on the Calendar or not, to set them aside by simply one objector calling for the regular order; and I hope this House when in session will proceed as on last Friday, which was certainly satisfactory and successful in doing justice to all of the bills brought up.

Mr. PETERS. There is still another suggestion. A large number of these bills on the Calendar of the House are House bills, and the probability is that they will not be reached in the Senate even if they are passed here. But each member calling up such bills as he chooses can select the Senate bills, and that will pass them so far as Congress is concerned, and then they can be sent to the President.

Mr. DOCKERY. There is yet another suggestion. A number of bills at the head of the Calendar have been objected to and simply allowed to retain their places.

Mr. MATSON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BRADY. I have a unanimous request to submit: That the members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and of the Committee on Pensions present be allowed to call up bills by unanimous consent, one bill each, that they have reported. I think it but fair that these two committees should be accorded that privilege.

Mr. FELTON. I object to the members of the committees having privileges over other members.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that although debate is not in order, gentlemen have been indulged in these suggestions with a view if possible of making some satisfactory arrangement; but the gentleman from Michigan demands the regular order, which cuts off all requests for unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] supplements that demand by also calling for the regular order, which is the consideration of the first bill upon the Calendar.

Mr. ROWELL. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that when a bill is reached upon the Calendar, if nobody calls it up, it shall be considered as passed over informally?

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon the demand for the regular order, but will yield for a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MATSON. I will hear the request. I understood that the gentleman proposed to call up bills out of their regular order, and if objected to by one or more members, any bill so called up shall then be laid aside, its consideration being prevented by such objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. That was my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WINANS] objected to that proposition when it was presented formerly.

Mr. WINANS. I prefer to have the regular order. I hope it will be allowed for this evening, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4712) to place the name of Jacob S. Biddle on the pension-roll.

Mr. SWOPE. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2030) granting a pension to Miss Margaret Stafford Worth.

Mr. LONG. I ask that that bill be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JAMES MONOHAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4678) restoring to the pension-roll the name of James Monohan, minor child of Richard Monohan, deceased, late a private in Company A, One hundred and eighty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of James Monohan, minor child of Richard Monohan, deceased, late a private in Company A, One hundred and eighty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and to pay said child, or to his guardian, the remaining pension that he would have received had his name not been stricken from the roll.

Mr. WISE. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4678) granting a pension to James Monohan, respectfully report:

James Monohan is the son of Richard Monohan, who enlisted in Company

A, One hundred and eighty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers January 16, 1864; was discharged August 15, 1865, and died June 12, 1871.

Pension was allowed this claimant, but his name was dropped from the rolls on the ground that the death cause of the soldier was not due to his service. We quote the following evidence in reference to that point:

Dr. Pfeiffer, late assistant surgeon One hundred and eighty-sixth Regiment, testifies:

"The soldier was attended by him at various times during the latter part of 1864 for rheumatism, intermittent fever, and incipient consumption. It is supposed that camp and guard duty had a severe effect on his somewhat weak constitution and finally developed consumption, of which he died."

D. S. Bossler, late lieutenant Company A, testifies:

"About March, 1864, at Camp Provost, Philadelphia, the soldier, from exposure on guard duty in stormy weather, contracted a fever and other diseases, and was unfitted for active duty. He also had cold and inflammation of the eyes. About January, 1865, he was relieved from duty and detailed as regimental tailor by reason of his weak and broken-down constitution."

Dr. Robert Burns testifies:

"He saw the soldier two or three times in May, 1871, in a very reduced state, beyond the reach of medical improvement, also at his house June 1, 1871, visited him three times until his death. Disease was pulmonary consumption induced by lingering illness contracted in service; that he died June 12, 1871, of said disease. While under his treatment he was in a hopeless state, suffering from destroying oppressions and unable to take any nourishment; that while he was in the army he had intermittent fever, followed by pneumonia, from which time his constitution was broken down. He was well acquainted with soldier for twenty years prior to death, and saw him often after his discharge, and soldier never regained his former health. His physical powers seemed to be broken up. Notwithstanding this he continued to work to keep a home for his child and a sister. He was a temperate and worthy man, and the benevolence of the Government would be well bestowed on his son. He saw soldier occasionally from the date of his discharge to date of death, and during all of the time he was in a sure decline with consumption of the lungs. He had a cough and expectoration, and gradual loss of flesh and strength from discharge to death."

Your committee have examined this case with great care and have been unable to see why the name of James Monohan was dropped from the pension-roll. In their opinion the father, Richard Monohan, died of disease contracted in the service. The evidence seems to them entirely satisfactory as to this point, and they therefore recommend with unanimity and very heartily the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1902) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann E. Lamburg.

Mr. SWOPE. I ask that that bill be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that when a bill is read, unless some member asks for its consideration, it be passed over informally.

Mr. WINANS. I object.

JOSEPH POTTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6162) granting a pension to Joseph Potter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Potter, of Rahway, N. J., late a corporal in Captain Martin's Battery of New Jersey Volunteers.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 6, after the word "Joseph," insert the letter "M," and amend the title so as to read:

"A bill granting a pension to Joseph M. Potter."

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6162) granting a pension to Joseph Potter, submit the following report:

The claimant claims pension for rheumatism contracted in July, 1863, after the battle of Gettysburg, Pa., on the march from Gettysburg to Warrenton, Va. The claim was submitted by the examiner in the Pension Office for admission for chronic rheumatism, but rejected by the reviewer on the ground that the alleged rheumatism existed prior to enlistment.

The claimant testifies that about three years prior to enlistment he had an attack of rheumatism which lasted for a short time only, and he was sound at enlistment.

Dr. Warren C. Westlake testifies that claimant was in good, sound physical health and free from chronic rheumatism at the time of enlistment.

U. M. Osborn, postmaster at Rahway, N. J., testifies that for a year or more prior to enlistment he was intimately acquainted with claimant, and that at that time he was in good, sound physical health, and never knew of his being afflicted with rheumatism until his return from the army.

Dunham R. Parker, William A. Hall, Alfred E. Jewell, Joseph W. Martin, James E. Tier, John H. Lufberry, all neighbors and intimately acquainted with claimant for two years or more prior to enlistment, testify separately that during this period he was in good, sound physical health, and of their own knowledge was free from rheumatism. Capt. Thomas B. Bunting, late of Company K, Sixth New York Battery, and Capt. Walter M. Bramhall, of the same battery, each testify that at enlistment and up until the time claimant contracted his rheumatism, as alleged, he was in good, sound physical health.

The witnesses who testify as to claimant's soundness at enlistment and for two years prior thereto, are represented to be the most reliable men in the neighborhood in which he lives, some of them even testifying that they never knew claimant to have suffered from rheumatism until after his discharge from service, and there is no testimony on file showing anything to the contrary except the honest and frank admission by the claimant that he did have a slight attack of what he thought was rheumatism some three years or more prior to his enlistment.

Captain Martin again testifies that on the march from Gettysburg to Warrenton, Va., as stated, in consequence of exposure, and becoming wet by rain and from sleeping on the ground, the claimant contracted rheumatism and became lame and stiff and unable to do duty, being compelled to go to hospital. The records show treatment in hospital.

Dr. Westlake testifies that since discharge claimant has been suffering, and still is suffering, from chronic rheumatism, being thereby rendered unable to perform manual labor, except of a very light character, and sometimes he is totally unable to do any labor whatever. Claimant is a temperate man, his disease not being aggravated nor prolonged by intemperance or other bad habits.

Dr. John J. Daly testifies that he has known claimant ten years, and has been his family physician for four years; have knowledge of his having rheumatism, and of late the disease has been very severe in its character; the larger and smaller joints are thickened, enlarged, and distorted. I have reason to believe his disease was contracted in the line of duty from statements made by my preceptor, Dr. Samuel Abernethy, now dead, who knew him prior to enlistment. The testimony of several neighbors shows that claimant has suffered continually since discharge from rheumatism, and unable to perform but little light work.

The claimant has been examined twice, and both boards of surgeons rate his disability total.

From the positive evidence of soundness at the time of enlistment, and from the fact that the examiner submitted this case for admission, your committee feel it is a meritorious one, and that if the claimant suffered from a slight attack of rheumatism over three years prior to enlistment, yet at that time he was a sound man, and therefore recommend the bill pass, after amending the title, and in line 6, after the word "Joseph," inserting the letter "M.," so that it shall read "Joseph M. Potter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GILES WRIGHT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8828) granting a pension to Giles Wright.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Giles Wright, late of Company M, Third Regiment New Jersey Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8828) granting a pension to Giles Wright, submit the following report:

Giles Wright, the claimant, late a member of Company M, Third New Jersey Cavalry, in his declaration for pension alleges disability from injuries to head and hip and otherwise, received on or about November 16, 1864, at Sandy Hook, Md., by a horse falling upon him while taking him from the stable. The Pension Office rejected the claim on the ground that there is no record of the alleged injuries. The claimant is shown to have been a sound man at enlistment.

Jonathan Stires, a comrade, testifies that he saw Wright, the claimant, a very short time after he was injured at the time alleged. He was there for a short time after claimant received his injuries and then went to the regiment, and did not see claimant again until after his discharge.

John Dougherty, another comrade, testifies that he saw the claimant at the time of receiving his injuries at the time alleged, and knows that he was injured so that he was not able to do any duty from that time until discharge.

The claimant states that after his injury he was treated by Dr. John Reed, at Knoxville, Md., a citizen physician, whose testimony he can not obtain.

The records of the regiment do not appear to be on file in the office of the Surgeon-General.

The claimant on his return from the service was ill from the effects of his injuries, and has been since discharge a constant sufferer and very largely incapacitated for work, at times being laid up for a considerable length of time, and unable to do any manual labor whatever. He was treated for the first six months after discharge by Dr. Edward Hawk, now dead, and afterward by Dr. Studiford, also now deceased, without any favorable results.

The examining surgeon rates his disability total, third grade, at $18 per month. He reports the claimant 5 feet 4½ inches high, weighing 120 pounds; light complexion; age, 44 years; pulse, 76; respiration, 18. He says he finds he has an indentation of the skull about a quarter of an inch in depth, extending from the puncture of the lambdoidal suture and sagittal suture, along the latter about 2 inches. He finds deformity of the left hip, causing him to turn his foot inward, and closes by saying that the claimant is badly crippled, walking very lame, and often has attacks of vertigo.

Your committee are of the opinion that claimant's disabilities were incurred in the service, and recommend that the bill pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER P. HOFFMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6823) granting a pension to Peter P. Hoffman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Peter P. Hoffman, late a private in Company H, Second Regiment New Jersey Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6823) granting a pension to Peter P. Hoffman, submit the following report:

The claimant was a member of Company H, Second New Jersey Cavalry, and claims disability resulting from sickness with pleurisy in side at Natchez, Miss., in February, 1865.

The claim was submitted for admission by the examiner in the Pension Office June 30, 1885, and July 6, 1885, rejected by the legal reviewer on the ground that there is no record of alleged rheumatism from pleurisy.

The Surgeon-General reports the records of the division and corps to which this regiment was attached at the date in question are not on file.

Dr. J. S. Lindaberry and several others testify that claimant lived near by them prior to enlistment into service, and was at that time a sound man, free from rheumatism.

Dr. W. C. Alpaugh also testifies he was at that time a sound man.

Peter K. Walker and Daniel Groendyke, two comrades, testify that about December 15, 1864, at Memphis, Tenn., claimant contracted camp diarrhea and rheumatism, and in February following was sick with pleurisy at Natchez, Miss., and unable to do duty for four weeks.

Dr. J. Lindaberry testifies that he treated claimant in the latter part of 1865 for chronic muscular rheumatism; that he has been better and worse at times, and unfitted for continuous labor. He is a temperate man, and a member of the Methodist Church.

Dr. W. C. Alpaugh testifies to treating the claimant since the spring of 1883, for chronic rheumatism and chronic diarrhea, which completely disqualify him for work—manual labor. When he works for an hour or two he suffers intensely with sciatica and lumbago. He must be careful what he eats, else he suffers from diarrhea, which is certainly chronic in character.

Dr. H. H. Miller testifies that May 24, 1884, he was summoned to see claimant, and found, on examination, he was suffering to an alarming extent with pleurisy, and that he treated him daily for two weeks, when he recovered.

The testimony of neighbors show conclusively that claimant has suffered from rheumatism and diarrhea since his discharge from service to such an extent as not to be able to perform continuous labor, and frequently laid up from his disabilities for a considerable part of his time.

The board of surgeons rate his disability for rheumatism total; for pleurisy one-quarter, and for chronic diarrhea one-half, or one and three-quarters total in all.

Your committee, believing this a meritorious case, recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARD, of Indiana. The report in this case, which has just been read, contains a remarkable statement made in the interest of the soldier which is calculated to cast suspicion on the claim. It is said, "He is a temperate man and a member of the Methodist Church." It would have been quite different if it had been said he was a temperate man and a Hard-Shell Baptist. I think it is a doubtful case, but I will offer no objection.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE E. PRATT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1326) granting a pension to Caroline E. Pratt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline E. Pratt, widow of the late James A. Pratt, of the Fifty-third Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1326, beg leave to submit the following report:

That they have examined Senate bill 1326 and the evidence pertaining to the same; that they adopt Senate report thereon, which report is in words and figures as follows:

"The husband of the petitioner was James A. Pratt, major of the Fifty-third Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers. It is in evidence that he was a sound man before he entered the service; that about December 1, 1862, while in the line of his duty he took cold, from which chronic laryngitis ensued, and which resulted in his death. The application for pension was disallowed on the ground that the throat affection was cancerous. On this point Dr. McCallister, who attended the patient in hospital at Boston, Mass., testifies that he treated him from his discharge in September, 1863, until he entered the hospital in 1870, for inflammation of the throat, and that the officer's death resulted directly from this disease, contracted as aforesaid. He testifies that he is informed that objection is made to granting a pension on the ground that death resulted from cancer. Affiant treated him for more than three years, and made frequent examinations of the throat, and, in his opinion, it was the beginning of a severe case of laryngitis, and if there was a cancerous formation it was caused by the inflammation of the throat, which accompanied and was the result of the cold contracted in the service.

"There is voluminous and corroborative testimony of accredited physicians on this subject, convincing to the committee that the officer died of disease contracted in the service as claimed.

"The bill is therefore reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass."

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the same.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NANCY C. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1170) granting a pension to Nancy C. Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy C. Smith, widow of Jeptha N. Smith.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) was read, as follows:

That they have examined Senate bill No. 1170, and the evidence pertaining thereto; that they hereby adopt Senate report thereon, which report is in words and figures as follows:

"The applicant in this case claims that her husband, Jeptha V. Smith, was a soldier in the war of 1812; that he first served in Capt. Benjamin Henry's company, Georgia militia, and subsequently in James Merriwether's company, and that he was honorably discharged. There is no record testimony in support of the claim; but Nathan H. Phillips, who was a member of Henry's company, and to whom a pension was granted, testifies that he distinctly remembers Jeptha V. Smith as a member of Captain Henry's company, and that at a later period he served in the company of Captain Thomas, and that he was regularly discharged in February or March, 1815. The affiant swears positively to his intimate acquaintance with Jeptha V. Smith, and that he was the husband of the applicant.

"Jordan Smith, a member of Captain Thomas's company, and a pensioner under act of February 14, 1871, testifies that Jeptha V. Smith was a member of same company with affiant, and served the full term, which was about four months.

"William Hightower, a soldier in the Georgia militia, and a pensioner, testifies that he was well acquainted with Jeptha V. Smith, husband of Nancy C. Smith; that claimant's husband was in the service; that they did not belong to the same regiment, but that he frequently saw him, and that he belonged to a musket regiment.

"The parol testimony is not specific as to dates, nor is there any proof that the soldier was mustered in or mustered out, but the recollection of these three is positive and corroborative as to the fact that the husband of the claimant was their comrade in arms in the war of 1812. The application is rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions in consequence of the absence of record testimony. It is apparent that the muster-rolls of that period are defective, and the committee do not feel justified in ignoring the competent proof of the associates of the husband of the claimant. The claimant is very aged and needy.

"In view of these facts we recommend the passage of the bill."

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. PETERS. I would like to inquire how this case comes from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It is the case of a pension for the widow of a soldier of the war of 1812.

Mr. WINANS. I will state, in answer to the gentleman from Kansas, that the bill having been referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, our committee had jurisdiction of it. The Committee on Invalid Pensions accordingly inquired into the facts and reported the bill favorably.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN DUFFY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1930) granting a pension to John Duffy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Duffy, late of Company L, First Ohio Light Artillery.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) was read, as follows:

That they have examined Senate bill 1930, and the evidence in relation thereto; that they hereby adopt Senate report thereon, which report is in words and figures as follows:

"The petitioner made application for a pension for injury to right foot and result of measles, the 30th of June, 1880, and was rejected on the ground that the disability of the foot existed before enlistment, and that the measles produced no permanent injury.

"The hospital surgeon, who examined him for discharge, says:

"'The right foot is entirely disabled by ancient injury, and should call for severe censure on recruiting officer.'

"He enlisted in Ohio Light Artillery in October, 1861, and was discharged in August, 1862.

"The examining surgeon reports serious and permanent injury to right foot, which he rates at one-fourth disability. He does not think there exists any other ratable injury. There is evidence showing that the man was sound before he enlisted, and there are witnesses who testify to seeing the accident by which the foot was hurt.

"Your committee, without attempting to account for the contradictory statements of the medical men, are satisfied that the man was disabled in the service, and should have a pension rated upon his inability to labor.

"This bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

The committee therefore recommend the passage of said bill.

Mr. WISE. I must object to that bill. Judging from the report I think the weight of the testimony is decidedly against the applicant.

Mr. NEECE. I do not know very much about the case myself, but upon an examination of the evidence our committee were of opinion that the claim ought to pass.

Mr. WISE. I must object to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. WISE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. We are not proceeding under unanimous consent. The bill must take the regular course.

Mr. NEECE. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HALL. Let us vote upon it now.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY PARROTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7952) granting a pension to Mary Parrott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary Parrott, dependent mother of Charles A. Parrott, late a private in Company C, Twelfth Massachusetts Volunteer Militia, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

Mary Parrott is the mother of Charles A. Parrott, late private in Company C, Twelfth Massachusetts Volunteers. He was killed in action at Fredericksburg, Va., December 13, 1862.

She applied for a pension as dependent mother, June 22, 1880, which was rejected February 8, 1884, on the ground "that it does not appear from the evidence on file that the claimant was dependent on the soldier at date of his death, and she has declared her inability to furnish further evidence showing the fact."

The evidence of employers show that claimant's husband was unable from his earnings to furnish her an adequate support, and the letters of the soldier filed in the case show that he sent his mother money to aid in the support of the family.

Edward T. Babier, of Lynn, Mass., testifies:

"Claimant's husband was in my employ from 1858 to 1862, inclusive; paid him for his services as leather cutter the sum of $4 per week when so employed, which was nearly all the time aforementioned. He was not an able-bodied man, and that was the reason his wages were so small, which were insufficient for the support of his family."

William B. Cushing, July 12, 1883, testifies:

"Claimant's husband has been employed by me for the past thirteen years. During this time his physical ability has been such that his average wages have not been over $3.50 per week. Other men will earn from $12 to $15 per week. Claimant has been compelled to work in my employ to help support himself."

There are eight letters of soldier to his mother filed with the papers in the claim, in each one of which he sends inclosed various sums of money varying from $10 to $20, or notifies her of money sent for her use, and asks if it has been received.

The mother is old and poor, and the husband, though still living, is unable through his infirmities to furnish her a support. They have no property in the world, except an undivided half of an old house in which they live, and which was inherited by claimant in 1874, and it merely furnishes a roof over their heads.

Your committee are of opinion that the question of partial dependence at the time of soldier's death is sufficiently shown by soldier's letters, in which he incloses substantial aid, and also by the evidence of credible witnesses as to the inability of claimant's husband to properly maintain her at that time. They therefore believe that for the loss of her son, the natural support and prop of her old age, the Government should afford her the aid asked for in the bill in her few remaining days.

They therefore report back the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY CORBETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9213) granting a pension to Mary Corbett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Corbett, widow of Alfred Corbett, late a private in Company F, Fifteenth Maine Volunteers

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

Mary J. Corbett is the widow of Alfred Corbett, late member of Company F, Fifteenth Maine Volunteers. He was pensioned for effects of intermittent fever and chills by certificate 75055, but his pension being reduced to $4 per month, the expense and loss of time in traveling quite a distance to collect it he thought fully balanced the time and expense lost in its collection, so he was dropped from the roll by reason of allowing the pension to remain unclaimed three years, and he never applied to be reinstated, although his disabilities increased with advancing years, being always troubled with dizzy spells, which he always said came from a sunstroke in the army. He was a carpenter by trade and pursued that occupation ever after his return, as the evidence shows, except when obliged to lay by from time to time by reason of his disabilities.

While at work upon a building he was suddenly seized with one of his dizzy spells and fell, incurring injuries which resulted in his death. His widow filed a declaration for pension, alleging "that the dizziness which caused the soldier to fall was the result of his exposure while in the Army." Her claim was rejected because of "no medical evidence of continuance of disability for which pensioned and widow's inability to furnish same."

The evidence in the case all goes to show that soldier was a sound man at enlistment; that he was discharged and pensioned for disabilities which ever after affected him, one of the phases of which was vertigo.

The only medical evidence of existence of vertigo is that of Dr. Charles Jordan, of Wakefield, Mass., who testifies:

"That he has been the soldier's family physician for the last ten years (since 1873).

"Soldier's trouble was giddiness, supposed to have been caused by sunstroke while in the Army; that soldier was killed by a falling building (frame); and the soldier stated after he received the fall which caused his death that "he was dizzy, which caused him to fall."

As to incurrence of disability, James N. Whitmore, major of the Fifteenth Maine Regiment, testifies:

"On or about June 20, 1865, said Corbett was detailed to superintend the running of a ferry on the Wacamen River, near Georgetown, S. C. It being a hand ferry and worked by boat and lines, it necessitated much exposure night and day, the duties being no less arduous night than day, the frequently swift currents of the river requiring excessive physical effort and constant exposure to sun and wet and the miasma from the swamps of the rice district; that soldier here contracted a congestion of the brain, which ever after rendered him unfit for military duty, and in opinion of affiant he has never recovered from its effect, which disability was contracted in line of duty."

It is abundantly shown by affidavits of men with whom he worked, as well as by neighbors and friends, that he continuously suffered from dizziness; especially was this so if he looked up suddenly, a vertigo immediately ensued, as was the case at the time of the fall which resulted in his death. His service in the Army was fifteen days short of four years. In that time he did good service, as did also his two sons. His widow is old and poor.

Your committee are of the opinion that her inability to furnish medical evidence of continuance should not operate as a bar to her claim, when the fact of continuance is well established by the evidence of employers and neighbors. They therefore report back the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY A. MYKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 158) granting a pension to Mary A. Mykins, reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

WALTER A. DONALDSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1459) granting an increase of pension to Walter A. Donaldson, reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

RICHARD FOREMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9248) to increase the pension of Richard Foreman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Richard Foreman, late a private in Company D of the One hundred and fifty-first Regiment New York Volunteers, a pension at the rate of —— dollars per month, instead of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

That it appears from the papers in the Pension Office that Richard Foreman, the claimant, enlisted in Company D, One hundred and fifty-first Regiment New York Volunteers, August 27, 1862, and was discharged September 11, 1865; that he applied for a pension in the year 1865; he applied for a pension on the ground that on the 9th day of July, 1864, he "received the following wound by a shell, which completely severed the leg about 2 inches below the knee joint;" that he was taken to hospital at Frederick City, Md., and was transferred thence to Central Park Hospital December 21, 1864, and from thence to David's Island, August 12, 1865.

He was also wounded in the left hand and had a fracture of the third finger of the right hand.

That he was granted a pension for the loss of a leg, which has been increased by the general laws, so that he is now receiving a pension at the rate of $24 per month.

There is no evidence either from the office of the Adjutant-General or Surgeon-General as to the wounds in the hand or finger, although it appears from the affidavit of the claimant that he was thus wounded. For these wounds in the hands he had made an application for increase of pension, which was rejected on the ground that there was no record evidence of their existence.

The claimant is receiving the rate of pension allowed by the act increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or leg, approved March 3, 1883, namely, $24 per month.

The claimant asks that his pension be increased to the same amount it would be if the amputation were above the knee, for the reason that the disability under which he is suffering is equal to an amputation above the knee.

The examining board, composed of three members, April 15, 1885, made the following report:

There is but 2 inches of tibia left. In consequence it is impossible to fit an artificial limb to leg below knee without too great pressure on bony points.

The limb would be much better for adjustment of an artificial leg if it had been amputated above the knee. The parts where bearing of artificial leg comes are red and tender.

The claimant states under oath that his leg is in such condition that he can not wear an artificial leg, and that his health is such that he can not submit to another amputation.

The committee therefore think that the claimant is entitled to as high rate of pension as he would receive if the leg were amputated above the knee, and therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking therefrom all after the word "volunteers," in the sixth line, and adding thereto the words "and to pay him a pension at and after the same rate as though his leg were amputated above the knee," and that the bill as amended do pass.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment striking out, at the end of the bill, the words, "a pension at the rate of —— dollars per month instead of the pension he is now receiving," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and to pay him a pension at and after the same rate as though his leg was amputated above the knee."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of some gentleman on the Pensions Committee what the regular rate of pension is for such a disability?

Mr. WINANS. I think it is $45.

Mr. WOLFORD. In certain cases it may be $45; but generally it is $36.

Mr. WISE. Is this soldier receiving the same pension as other soldiers similarly disabled?

Mr. WINANS. He is.

Mr. WISE. Then I object to this increase.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The testimony shows that this case is an unusual one.

Mr. WISE. I withdraw the objection.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY TARBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6656) for the relief of Mary Tarbell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Tarbell, widow of William H. Tarbell, late a lieutenant of Company D, Seventy-sixth Regiment of New York Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $18 per month, to date from January 5, 1874, the day of the death of said William H. Tarbell.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

That the claimant, Mary Tarbell, is the widow of William H. Tarbell, late a lieutenant in Company D, Seventy-sixth New York Volunteers.

The soldier enlisted as a private in said company September 14, 1861, was wounded at the battle of Gettysburg, was discharged September 5, 1864, and died January 5, 1874.

In his certificate of discharge, of date of September 5, 1864, the nature and extent of his wound and cause of discharge are stated as follows:

"Incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of a gunshot fracture of left thigh, with 2½ inches shortening of limb and thigh, and impaired power and motion."

For this disability he was pensioned, and in December, 1866, when examined for an increase of pension, Dr. Gazlay, the examining surgeon of the office, in his certificate states as follows:

"A ball had entered the left thigh, about 5 inches above the knee, producing a comminuted fracture of the femur. A number of pieces of bone have been removed; the wound is still discharging; the bone between the fracture and knee considerably enlarged; shortened about 2 inches; partial anchylosis of knee-joint. The shortening of limb and stiffness of knee are permanent, and on account of the extensive disease of bone I think it is doubtful whether he can be cured without amputation."

His last examination was in September, 1873, and the examining surgeon in his certificate states as follows:

"Tarbell was pensioned for a gunshot wound through the left thigh, fracturing the bone, and has continued to discharge from the wound until this time. The disability is permanent in its present form.

The soldier being a poor man, in January, 1874, went out into the woods with his brother-in-law to cut and draw home their winter's supply of wood, and was killed by the falling of a tree they were cutting down.

A bill was introduced into the last Congress in her favor. The bill passed the House, but failed to pass the Senate.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, in their report, make a full statement of the manner of his death, and this report is hereby made a part of our report:

"It appears that William H. Tarbell was first sergeant (commissioned lieutenant) of Company D, Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, and while engaged in the battle of Gettysburg, July 1, 1863, received a gunshot wound by a rifle ball in the upper part of the left thigh, fracturing the bone very badly, from which he never (only partially) recovered, leaving the bone weak, with 4 inches shortening; with continued necrosis of bone, and exhausting purulent discharges; with a sinus extending from the seat of the wound to the knee; with knee-joint stiff, leaving him with great disability. He was drawing at the date of his death a pension of $18 per month. He was killed on the 5th day of January, 1874, while at work in the forest cutting wood for his family's use, under circumstances which render it morally certain that his death resulted from wounds received in the service, when without such wounds he would have escaped unharmed.

"The widow made her application for pension, but it was denied, presumably on the ground that his death did not result from said wounds. Cause of rection not stated. Her petition is signed by a large number of citizens of McGrawville, N. Y.

"The evidence in the case is strong and direct.

"H. C. Hendrick, late surgeon of the One hundred and fifty-seventh New York Volunteers, testifies:

"'That he was well acquainted with Tarbell from the summer of 1865 to the time of his death; that he was said Tarbell's surgical adviser, and had full knowledge of the extent of his disabilities, resulting from a wound said to have been received at the battle of Gettysburg, in July, 1863, by a rifle ball, causing an extensive fracture at the upper third of the left thigh; that in healing the bone was shortened four or more inches; that the leg was weak; that he had constant necrosis of the bone; that there were extensive discharges of pus from various points of the diseased thigh; that there was one sinus from near the seat of the wound, discharging under the knee; that so extensive were the purulent discharges that said Tarbell was ordinarily under the necessity of changing the dressing upon his limb several times a day; also, that the knee was stiff, result of contraction of tendons and changes of tissues; that he was very lame; that said Tarbell could not step backward; often spoken of by himself that to move in a rear direction he must first turn himself around and move with a forward step; that he could not leap or jump, only with one foot, alighting on the same; that these disabilities existed at the time of his death; that the extent of the disease of the bone was such, and the consequent disability, that Tarbell had meditated having the leg amputated, and had several times consulted deponent in relation thereto; further, that in the situation in which Tarbell was placed at the time of the accident, as described by Waldo V. Shearer, who was with him, and precisely similarly situated, and who, with the full use of his limbs and with the utmost effort, barely escaped uninjured, it is the opinion of deponent that Tarbell, with his disabilities, could not have possibly extricated himself, and that in this view his death was the result of his wounds, received in the army.'

"Waldo V. Shearer, the witness alluded to in the foregoing affidavit, swears:

"'That he was with Tarbell on the day of his death in the woods cutting timber; that they were felling a large, tall tree, and in falling the body of the tree split upward a distance of about 19 feet, forming a high spur-stump, upon which the falling tree poised itself and shot backward like an arrow with great velocity, striking said Tarbell, bearing him to the ground and crushing his head, and killing him instantly. That when said tree began to fall, deponent and said Tarbell went back to the rear of the tree to a supposed place of safety, a distance of 30 feet, and were there standing side by side at the moment the danger was discovered. That deponent having the full use of his bodily powers did, only with great effort, succeed in extricating himself from his perilous situation and escaped unharmed. Tarbell did not, and could not do so, on account of his extreme lameness, but made due effort to escape by the same means and in the same direction as deponent.

"'Deponent says he had been with Tarbell daily for a month previous to his death, laboring in the same woods, and that they rode to and from the forest on account of Tarbell's lameness; that Tarbell was very lame from his wound, and that the leg was made shorter than the other, and weak, and the knee stiff; that it discharged very copiously every day, and that Tarbell always carried in his pockets extra dressings for his leg; that the discharge was so copious that he had often to dress his limb while in the woods, and that he usually dressed the wound three or four times in twenty-four hours; Tarbell could not walk backward, or leap, or jump only upon one foot, and having a full knowledge of the situation and Tarbell's lameness, does not think it possible for him to have escaped unharmed.'

"These affidavits point directly and conclusively to the fact that Tarbell was seriously disabled by wounds received in the service. Had he had perfect use of his limbs, as did his companion, Shearer, he would have probably escaped, but his powers of locomotion being restricted by his wounds, he became the victim of the accident. The committee have no doubt that his wound was the indirect cause of death, and that the widow should be pensioned. It is therefore recommended that the bill do pass."

The soldier is shown to have been a man of good character, of temperate habits, and a careful, cautious man.

The claimant is shown to be a poor, worthy Christian woman. Her claim for a pension was rejected at the office because the falling of the tree was not due to the disability for which the soldier was pensioned.

Your committee have no doubt but that the soldier's disability rendered him unable to protect himself by escaping from the falling tree, and thereby contributed to his death; and we therefore recommend that the bill do pass, after being amended by striking out all after the word "volunteers," in the eighth line thereof.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment striking out at the end of the bill the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $18 per month, to date from January 5, 1874, the day of the death of William H. Tarbell."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

COL. JAMES H. BLOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2263) granting a pension to Col. James H. Blood.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Col. James H. Blood, late colonel of the Sixth Regiment Missouri Infantry, and pay him a pension of $70 per month from and after the passage of this act, to be in lieu of the pension now received.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "seventy" and insert "thirty."

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

That from an examination of the papers on file in the Pension Office in this case, and from the report made in the Senate thereon, and the affidavit and petion therein set forth, which said report is adopted as part of this report, it appears that Colonel Blood was a brave, patriotic officer; that he has been and still is suffering severely from disabilities contracted while in the army; that the evidence shows that said disabilities are constantly increasing and rendering said soldier more and more unable to perform any labor necessary for his support; that although his application for increase of pension at the department is still pending and undetermined, still the nature and extent of the disabilities under which the soldier is now suffering are so clearly set forth and established in the evidence, and the fact that he is now in Europe for the benefit of his health, and is supported by his friends, and the difficulty in his returning to this country for further medical examination before the examining boards of the Pension Department, would serve to justify the committee in reporting favorably upon this case.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass, after the same shall have been amended by striking out the word "seventy," in the sixth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The claima t, James H. Blood, was a lieutenant-colonel in the Sixth Missouri Volunteers. The main facts upon which the relief asked for in the present bill is claimed are particularly set forth in the following petition and affidavit:

Petition in favor of Col. James H. Blood, praying for a pension for total disability.

James H. Blood, then a resident of the city of Saint Louis, State of Missouri, raised the Sixth Regiment of Missouri Volunteer Infantry, largely at his personal expense, for which he has received no remuneration, and was mustered into the military service of the United States with said regiment as lieutenant-colonel thereof about June 1, 1861, it being the first three-year regiment mustered in from the State of Missouri.

The regiment was assigned to the First Brigade of the Second Division of the Fifteenth Army Corps, and he served with it until his disabilities compelled him to resign in the spring of 1864, having in the mean time been promoted to the colonelcy of the regiment.

In the fall of 1861, while on a night scout after a band of bushwhackers or guerrillas in Southeast Missouri, he was felled from his horse by a severe blow on the back of his head, from the effects of which he has never recovered, having received severe mental as well as physical injury.

In 1862, while encamped near Memphis, Tenn., on returning from a reconnaissance, by the falling of his horse he was thrown violently forward against the pommel of his saddle, resulting in severe injury to the prostate gland and adjoining organs, causing severe stricture, from which he has continuously suffered since.

In the battle at Chickasaw Bayou, near Vicksburg, Miss., while leading the charge of the Second Division of the Fifteenth Army Corps, he was struck by a musket ball in left chest. The immediate result of this wound was the partial paralysis of the left arm, but the ultimate result was disastrous, causing atrophy of the heart, and all the muscles, bones, &c., of the left thorax, causing a shrinkage of the side affected over 3 inches, so that the slightest excitement or exercise tending to accelerate the movement of the blood and action of the heart causes excrutiating pain and complete prostration, wholly incapacitating him from any physical or mental labor, and compelling him to wholly abstain from the usual avocations in order to insure relief from continuous suffering and prostration.

It is further represented that on his resigning from the military service of the United States Colonel Blood had no intention of making any claim for a pension, believing that he had sufficient to keep him from want during his life; but in 1876 he was reduced to poverty, and has since been dependent upon his relatives and friends for support. It was not until 1881 that he was prevailed upon to make an application, which was filed in September, 1882.

After waiting until August, 1885, and despairing of getting any action on his claim, he sailed for Europe, hoping thereby to relieve in some measure his sufferings. He still remained abroad, unable to return in the present state of his health, which is continually on the decline. He is now under the care of physicians, and requires the constant attendance of some person, as he frequently falls senseless, and often remains so for hours at a time. His physicians claim that his heart is so affected that death is probable in any of these attacks of insensibility and prostration.

Finally, in October, 1885, a certificate was issued in his favor by the Pension Bureau at the rate of $15 per month, a sum wholly disproportioned to the extent of his injuries; for to those who have known him for years past it is self-evident that if he is entitled to any pension at all he is entitled to what he claims, a pension for total prostration, disability, helplessness, and necessity of constant attendance.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

Frank M. Fogg, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a resident of Lansing, Mich., and has been an editor and publisher for eight years past; that he first became acquainted with Col. James H. Blood in 1877; that in 1878 the said Colonel Blood, upon the advice and with the assistance of ex-Governor Coburn, of Maine, purchased a third interest in the Greenback Labor Chronicle, which deponent was then publishing in Auburn, Me.; that during the time said Colonel Blood was in business with deponent he was unable to perform any manual labor, but was only able to perform light clerical work; that he often complained of pains in his head, which he claimed were caused by a blow on the head received during a skirmish in the service, and from which he did not regain consciousness for nine hours; that he suffered with stricture of the bladder, which he said was caused by an injury received in the Army, to such an extent that is was often necessary to use a catheter before he could get relief of the bladder; that he also suffered severely from a wound in the left shoulder near the collar bone, which he said was received while leading a charge of his division in the battle of Chickasaw Bayou, and this wound caused a partial paralysis of the left arm, and to such an extent that he had but little use of that arm, and that wound so affected his side that it caused a contraction of the muscles, and consequent contraction of the ribs, to such an extent that the left side of his body was much smaller than the right side.

And deponent further says that said Colonel Blood often had fainting spells and was entirely prostrated and helpless for several hours at a time; that deponent first knew of this in February or March, 1879, while riding with said Colonel Blood in a sleigh from Auburn to Augusta, Me.; that when within a few miles of Augusta Colonel Blood partially fainted, and remained in an almost helpless condition for two days; that knowing the causes of his condition deponent then and several times thereafter advised Colonel Blood to apply for a pension; that Colonel Blood refused to do so, saying he knew he was entitled to receive a pension, but he would not apply for a pension so long as he could live without it. That his condition continued to grow worse; that in October, 1880, Colonel Blood was obliged to give up business entirely; that he was unable to do anything.

In 1882 Colonel Blood attempted to take charge of a bakery in New York; that he there performed light duties for a few weeks, and was then obliged to give up all attempts to work in any way on account of frequent attacks of fainting spells and utter prostration whenever he attempted the least exertion, and from that time Colonel Blood lived with his brothers until last June, when he visited deponent in Lansing, Mich.; that he was then unable to travel without an attendant, and was a great part of the time under treatment and care of physicians; that he left deponent in August, 1885, intending to go to Europe for his health by advice of his physicians; that after arriving in New York he was prostrated from the exertion of the journey and was confined in bed for about a month; that he afterward sailed for Europe, where he is now, living on the charity of his friends.

Deponent says that he has been in frequent communication with Colonel Blood since he has been in Europe, and from recent letters learns that his condition or health has not been in the least improved, and that whatever change has taken place has been for the worse, and that at present, on account of continued helplessness, he is not able to return to this country.

And deponent further says that he has no interest whatever in the claim of Colonel Blood for a pension other than a friend who knows the claimant to be a man of strict integrity, sobriety, and honor, and entitled to a pension, not only for total disability, but for utter helplessness.

FRANK M. FOGG.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 4th day of May, 1886.
[SEAL.] WILLIAM TWOMBLY,
Notary Public in and for the District of Columbia.

Among other things, it appears from the affidavit of Mr. Fogg that Colonel Blood is now absent in a foreign country on expense, and obliged to be at the further expense of an attendant there. The committee recommend the passage of the bill, which seems to be a small provision for his absolute necessities, and not likely to be wanted long.

The enforced absence of Colonel Blood from the country compels application for special legislation to secure relief. The very high testimonials of Generals Sherman and Smith and others attest the gallantry and patriotism of Colonel Blood, and his invaluable and disinterested service to the country.

Mr. WISE. I shall object to this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] that we are not proceeding now under unanimous consent——

Mr. WISE. I understand that; but I give notice that this case shall not pass if my opposition can avail to prevent it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to put the question in the usual way unless the bill be passed over by unanimous consent. The first question is on the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. WISE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a statement in regard to this bill, and a very brief one. Every particle of the testimony in this case comes from the claimant himself; for those affidavits which have been read are made upon information furnished by him. He is traveling in Europe; and it seems to me that before this House should vote to increase his pension beyond the present amount, he should come to this country, come back from his pleasure trip, and be subjected to the same examination and the same tests to which every other claimant must submit. Open the door so that a man may go to Europe and send his petition to this Congress for an increase of pension! We had better give everybody applying for a pension all that he asks. I here give notice that so far as this case is concerned, if it is pressed to a vote I shall insist upon a quorum.

Mr. LONG (to Mr. WISE). Why not ask that the bill be passed over?

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to obstruct the consideration of cases which I believe to be meritorious; I have no such intention; in no case will I call for a quorum where I believe the claim has merit. I ask the committee to allow this bill to be passed over.

Mr. WOLFORD. I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] will withdraw that request. I know he is a reasonable man; and I believe he will not insist on his opposition when he hears a few facts. I wish to say that there never was a case of total disability more strongly established than this. My distinguished friend from Virginia, a very clear-minded man, is in this case proceeding upon a wrong proposition. There never was a better case than this. I voted against the amendment proposing to reduce the amount because I believed that even the sum named in the original bill was not enough. Now, let me state the facts just as they appear, and I ask my distinguished friend from Virginia to listen and reflect.

This man is now drawing a pension of $15 a month. He was knocked in the head, was fallen upon by a horse, was shot in the arm, and from these injuries he is totally disabled, as appears by the testimony, not of himself, but of others.

Mr. WISE. Will my friend from Kentucky allow me to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WISE. I do not wish to disturb the gentleman at all, but he will permit me to say that for such injuries as have been properly proved this man has been granted a pension after an examination by the Pension Bureau.

Mr. WOLFORD. That is exactly what I understand. This is the proposition to which I want your attention——

Mr. WISE. The proposition is now for an increase.

Mr. WOLFORD. But for such injuries as I have described Colonel Blood has been allowed only $15 a month. I want to call attention to the facts; they do not rest upon his testimony. It is not by his testimony it has been proved that he was knocked in the head, that he was fallen upon by a horse, that he was shot and wounded in the arm. I know, and my friend from Virginia knows, for he has been in the army, and has seen many other men who were in the army, that the effects of injuries of this kind increase as years advance. The doctors swear that this man is so affected by his injuries that he can not come back. He did not go to Europe upon a "pleasure trip." According to the testimony, which he does not make, he attempted to make a living. He did not claim a pension at the start, because his patriotism forbade his doing so. He did not claim a pension until he had lost his property and become disabled. He tried to make a living in New York. Then, subsisting upon the bounty of his friends, he went to Europe, not on a "pleasure trip;" that is not the proof.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will my friend permit me to ask a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. Who is this man Blood?

Mr. WOLFORD. He was lieutenant-colonel in a Missouri regiment.

Mr. BRADY. Is he the husband of Victoria Woodhull? [Laughter.]

Mr. WOLFORD. I do not know anything about whose husband he is.

Mr. BRADY. I understand that he is.

Mr. WOLFORD. I do not care whose husband he may be. [Laughter.] I do not care what may be said of him in regard to such things as that. He was disabled in the cause of his country. The proof is clear that he went abroad for his health, and having done so he is disabled to such an extent that he can not come back, and can not be examined. Surely there is no prejudice to be invoked against him in the pure mind of my friend because he may be the husband of one woman or another. [Laughter.] If he were the husband of a dozen women the mind of my distinguished friend would not say that he should not have justice done him.

It matters not what may be the character of his wife; it matters not what may be the nature of his sentiments. Having fought for his country, having done all that he could to maintain its honor and dignity and glory, though he may disagree with you and me upon many questions, he has done his duty. And now he is abroad, not able to get here. That is the proof. On that proposition he can not be examined. A man wounded in the army gradually grows weaker and weaker. He grows more and more feeble. I say upon such a proposition as that I hope my friend will not call a quorum or in any other way object to this man receiving a pension. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

I have said all I want to say. Being wholly disabled, wholly incompetent to make a living, now in a foreign land, shall this wounded soldier be left to die there among strangers? Shall it be said to our dishonor, that proud America will allow one of its private soldiers to die in a foreign land in poverty and want, when, under every law, he is entitled to a pension at our hands? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on passing the bill over.

Mr. WINANS. I hope we will take a vote on this bill, as the House understands the matter as well as it ever will.

Mr. WISE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass.

The motion was agreed to.

CLARA B. DAVIDSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2321) granting an increase of pension to Clara B. Davidson.

Mr. MORRILL. That bill passed the House several weeks ago, and ought to be taken off the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be taken from the Calendar.

THOMAS WEEKLY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8437) granting a pension to Thomas Weekly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Weekley, late of Company E, Fourteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was read, as follows:

Soldier enlisted November 3, 1862; discharged June 27, 1865; filed claim for a pension October 13, 1873, alleging that while engaged in procuring timber for a block-house at Piedmont, W. Va., June 1, 1863, and holding the end of a log on the side of a hill, his hand-spike slipped—he fell with his face against the log, his chin and lower jaw were bruised, his upper teeth and part of the lower teeth were mashed out, and his back and breast were seriously injured.

Claim rejected on the ground that there is no record evidence of the alleged injury, and claimant can not furnish the testimony of any officers or comrades who have personal knowledge that he was injured in the line of duty in the service.

The evidence of claimant's health and soundness at the time of his enlistment is full and not questioned by the Pension Office.

Comrades Andrew Liestin and Elijah Hissen testified that it is their personal knowledge that claimant lost his teeth and received an injury to left breast while on detached service in falling and delivering logs for a block-house built to guard bridge No. 21 on Potomac River, near New Creek, W. Va., and that after receiving said injuries he was sent back for treatment, and that the injury was received in June, 1863; and the said comrade Elijah Hissen further testified that claimant was at the time with Sergeant Freeborn and Private David Fields, who were subsequently reported killed at the battle of Cloud Mountain, and that claimant was treated in hospital by Surgeon Morse, who died in the service.

Asst. Surg. J. H. Bromfield has no recollection of treating soldier in the service. From a private record in his possession it appears that soldier was given a surgeon's certificate on account of chronic rheumatism and loss of teeth. To the best of his recollection this was in May or June, 1865.

A number of neighbors testified that when soldier returned home from his regiment his teeth were all gone; he complained of pain and weakness of side and back.

The record of Adjutant-General's Office shows him absent working on block-house at Bloomington, Va., May 1863; also shows him absent sick in hospital at Parkersburg, Va., and Cumberland, Md., August 31, 1863. Regimental hospital records not on file.

The Saint Paul board of examining surgeons report as follows:

"Man has not a vestige of a tooth or root in his head. The spines of lower dorsal vertebræ project more than normal, and curve toward left. Complains of pain on pressure. Seem thicker than the line above and below. No evidence of any injury to chest, by inspection, auscutation, or percussion, or in left side; at times has difficulty in passing water; and rate him three-fourths total for injury to back."

The evidence shows that soldier was healthy and sound at the date of his enlistment; that he received some injuries while working on the block-house while on detached duty; that he was treated in the hospital; that he returned home after his services in an enfeebled condition, and has continued in that condition more or less ever since.

In view of all the testimony, your committee are of the opinion that the soldier received the injuries for which he claims a pension while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MISSOURI ANDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5171) granting a pension to Missouri Anderson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Missouri Anderson, widow of Reuben W. Anderson, late of Company A, Tenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) was read, as follows:

Reuben W. Anderson, of Company A, Tenth Regiment, Kentucky Cavalry, enlisted December 20, 1863, and was dischargd June 26, 1865, and died April 4, 1870. He was married to the claimant in November, 1865. The claimant has two children by the deceased soldier, who are both under sixteen years of age. She is very poor and without means to support herself and children.

The evidence is as follows:

The Adjutant-General's report shows the soldier was admitted to the hospital at Paducah, Ky., March 18, 1864; July 11, 1864, admitted to hospital at Camp Nelson, and returned to duty October 19, 1864. He entered Post Hospital, Paducah, Ky., March 27, 1865; entered Joe Holt Hospital, Jeffersonville, Ind., May 22, 1865, as convalescent, and was mustered out of service at Louisville, Ky., June 26, 1865. Several comrades testify soldier was sound at enlistment; that about August, 1864, his eyes began to get sore from the effects of a long and rapid march while in pursuit of the rebel General Morgan through Kentucky; that his eyes continued bad, and he became nearly blind. His habits were good.

Maj. J. Johnson testifies that about April 4, 1870, said soldier had been at work; was cutting a tree with an ax; that when the tree fell it took with it another tree which was turned up by the roots, and the body of this last tree fell on and across said soldier and killed him; that affiant saw him after he was killed, and from the place where he had been chopping and the place where he was found he must have been trying to escape, and, as he supposed, from the effects of vision and not being able to distinguish objects clearly, instead of getting out of the way of danger ran into danger by the falling of the other tree. Deponent witnessed the body while under the tree and was the second person to him after the accident.

The soldier, in his life-time, in an address to the public, stated that he had lost his eye-sight in the service of his country, and that he did not wish to become a burden to the public; appealed to the public to buy the poetry that he had composed that he might maintain his family.

The Pension Office rejected this claim November 7, 1874, on the ground that "the cause of soldier's death was not the result of his military service," and then adds, under date of October 20, 1875, "Inform the claimant that the claim can not be allowed under the general pension law. Her only recourse is to Congress for a special act."

Your committee are of the opinion that the soldier lost his eye-sight from his army service, and that it was owing to the loss of sight that the tree fell on him and caused his death; that this claim is a meritorious one, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY KAYLOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6423) for the relief of Mary Kaylor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Kaylor, widow of John Kaylor, deceased, late of Company C, Fourth Illinois Infantry.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) was read, as follows:

John Kaylor enlisted September 10, 1861, in Company C, Fourth Illinois Cavalry, and was discharged November 3, 1864.

He filed his application for a pension February 3, 1876, for wound over the left temple and injuries to his kidneys and groin, which he alleges was caused by his military service. Said soldier died before completing his claim, on January 21, 1879, and his widow, Mary Kaylor, the claimant, asked for a pension on the ground that said soldier died from injuries received in the service. Her claim was rejected in the Pension Office on the ground that there was no record of the alleged injury and the inability to furnish any medical evidence to show the existence in the service or at date of discharge.

The Adjutant-General's report shows the soldier sick in hospital November and December, 1862, but fails to show the cause of his sickness. One of the officers of the company swears that he had the fever. Said Adjutant-General's report shows that he was taken a prisoner December 20, 1862, and returned to his company February, 1864, and that he remained with his company until he was mustered out of the service.

The evidence of his officers shows that he was not fit for service after he returned, and that after his return to his company in 1864 he was thrown from his horse and badly injured by a cut in his head.

Several witnesses testify that he was a sound, able-bodied man at enlistment, and that when he returned from the army he was broken down in health, was suffering from an injury in the head, and was ruptured in the groin, and complained of injuries and misery in his kidneys.

Two comrades swear they saw him thrown from his horse while in the service, and that he received the injury to his head in the fall.

It appears that one of the physicians who treated the soldier after his return from the army is dead, and the one that treated him at the time of his death was a traveling doctor, and that he left the country shortly after the death of the soldier, and no one knew where he went to.

Several witnesses testify that this soldier came home from the army with the injury to his head, and that he was ruptured and that he suffered continuously from his kidneys, and that he gradually grew worse to his death; that prior to his death his disease assumed the form of dropsy, which caused his death; that he was very poor, left no minor children, and his widow is over sixty years of age, and very poor and needy.

Your committee are of the opinion that the cause of the soldier's death is fairly traced to his army service, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. There seems to be no evidence to show why this application was not made before. This soldier died some ten years ago. How does it happen the application was not made before this?

Mr. NEECE. The report states the facts, and I can not say why the report was not made before. This man died in 1879.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY LAFNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2308) granting a pension to Henry Lafner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Lafner, formerly a private in Company A, One hundred and eighty-first Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) was read, as follows:

That they have had under consideration the bill with the foregoing title (No. 2308), and adopt the Senate report, which is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"The petitioner was a private in Company A, One hundred and eighty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers. He made application for a pension, alleging total blindness in both eyes, the result of exposure in the service, which was rejected on the ground of insufficiency of testimony.

"In reference to this case, the captain of the company says:

"'He was quite a boy, and did his duty as a good soldier. I have since learned that he was blind; in fact he was led into my office, and I know he is blind. He stated that it was caused by exposure in the service. I know he was subjected to a great deal of hardship and exposure.'

"In an affidavit, the captain testifies to his activity and efficiency as a soldier, notwithstanding his youth; that during the winter of 1864-'65 and the spring of 1865, in consequence of exposure and unusual bad weather, he contracted a cold, which affected his eyes, causing inflammation and a blood-shot appearance, and symptoms of granulation, which continued until after discharge and return to Ohio.

"Fred. McDonough, who also was in command of the company, testifies that the soldier was thoroughly examined; that he passed a good examination; that he was a faithful, active soldier, and that the command experienced great hardships and exposures during the winter of 1864-'65 and the early spring following.

"The certificate of an examining surgeon pronounces him totally blind. In his petition the soldier says that his peculiar disability prevents him from prosecuting his claim with any hope of success in procuring such testimony as is required to complete his case, and he appeals to Congress for the relief which he can not hope to obtain but by the passage of a special bill. The committee regard this as a very hard case, in which there is no appearance of fraud, and in reference to which the witnesses are evidently convinced of more than they can certify under oath. There is evidence to show that the inflammation commenced before he was discharged. No proof has been offered disparaging his reputation or questioning his claim. It is a case of sad necessity, to which relief can only be extended by Congress, which, in the opinion of the committee, may properly be done. The bill is reported with an amendment changing the name 'Lafuer' to 'Lafner' wherever it occurs, with a recommendation that it do pass."

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. How long was this man in the service?

Mr. NEECE. He was a private in Company A, One hundred and eighty-first Regiment.

Mr. EDEN. Does the Senate report show when this blindness occurred?

Mr. NEECE. It does.

Mr. EDEN. If the report states when he became blind I did not see it.

Mr. NEECE. The report states all the facts.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE FAULK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2147) granting a pension to George Faulk.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. MILLS. This seems to prove this party never was in the service—never was mustered in—never away from the camp where he went to join.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Never exposed to any hardship.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, never exposed to any hardship, rugged as he seems to have been. I object to the bill.

Mr. WISE. Let it be passed over, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

JOHN P. TAYLOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1779) for the relief of John P. Taylor.

The bill and report were read.

On motion of Mr. COX, of North Carolina, the bill was passed over informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

JOSEPH JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9301) granting a pension to Joseph Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Jones, who served in First Regiment Tennessee Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Joseph Jones enlisted as a private in Company C, First Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, February 1, 1863, and was discharged May 27, 1865.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the alleged wound of right shoulder was not received while in line of duty.

The claimant alleges that while in the service and line of duty, near Panther Springs, Tenn., about December 5, 1864, he received gunshot wound of right shoulder.

A report from the Adjutant-General's Office says:

"This soldier, on my muster pay-roll, dated April 30, 1865, was charged with desertion, since which time I learn, by a certificate from James P. Brownlow, adjutant-general of Tennessee (late colonel of the First Tennessee Cavalry), that he gave soldier permission to be absent on account of a wound received from guerillas.

"JAS. E. COLVILLE,
"Captain, Commanding Company."

Claimant, in his own statement, says he was detailed by Capt. John A. Thornhill on detached service, and never was absent a day from June 26, 1864, until the time he was wounded, December 5, 1864, and was sent to a private house, as they were 40 miles from any hospital.

Andrew L. Walker, a comrade of the claimant, states that he knows of the claimant receiving a gunshot wound in right shoulder; that claimant was on special detail duty when he received the wound, acting under orders of Captain Thornhill; was not present when he was shot, but saw him directly afterward.

Thomas W. Thornhill, another of claimant's comrades, states substantially as above.

James M. Shepard, claimant's comrade, says he was present when claimant was shot; he was hit on the right shoulder. The shooting was done by a rebel soldier, near Panther Springs, Tenn., about December 1, 1864.

Claimant has been examined before examining boards at different times, and he gets a rating of one-half.

Your committee, after examining the proof in the case, find the claim a meritorious one. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended in line 6 by striking out the word "the," and insert in lieu thereof the words "Company C."

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I move that bill be informally passed over.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know anything about the merits of this claim, except as they are shown in the report. It seems to me it is a meritorious case. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] is not here, and as we have listened to the reading of the bill and report, I hope the gentleman will not interpose an objection.

Mr. WINANS. I agree with the gentleman from Kansas that we ought to vote on this bill.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I object to laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. Chairman, there are some bills which are considered good, and some which are considered not good. I introduced a number of bills before this Pension Committee at the last session of Congress, some of which I was perfectly satisfied had merit, yet I have been unable to induce that committee to report back a single bill out of over one hundred I introduced.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is that the reason you oppose this one? [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No, sir; I will tell you in a moment if you will just keep your seat.

Now, among all of the various bills I have introduced into the House was a bill for a man who had lost his eyes; who was sent out by a detail to bring in a horse. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Who sent him?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Gentlemen, I do not want to be rude, nor will I submit to rudeness, nor do I wish to be compelled to call gentlemen by name, but I repeat I will not submit to these rude interruptions.

Mr. PERKINS. It is all good natured.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Gentlemen have got to treat me politely on this floor.

What I wanted to say was that there is a clear distinction made by this committee as between States North and States South. We people who are down in the Southern States, with soldiers who were as good and true to the Union as any people in the whole country, can get no reports from that committee.

Mr. PERKINS. This bill was reported by Mr. TAULBEE, of Kentucky, and the soldier lives in Tennessee. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. That does not alter my proposition. I objected to the consideration of the bill for the reason that I wanted to call attention to the fact that there is a clear discrimination made by this committee.

I wish to ask how it is that out of over one hundred bills I have introduced and referred to that committee, they have reported not one.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from West Virginia is mistaken. My recollection is that I did, during the last session, report one or two of the gentleman's bills, which had been referred to me among a number of others, and which finally became laws. If no others were reported it is because the gentleman never appeared before the committee or the subcommittee at least; and my attention has never been called to a single bill introduced from West Virginia where the gentleman was willing to come forward and say that the claim was one of merit.

I have had many bills referred to me, and it is physically utterly impossible to consider all of them. Perhaps the gentleman has had a hundred referred to the committee, but he has not taken any pains to have them considered.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. But will the gentleman tell us why it is that no West Virginia bill has ever been reported from his committee?

Mr. NEECE. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that. I reported one or two, I think, during the last term. I believe he appeared here, and they were passed at a night session. I may be mistaken, but that is my present recollection; and the gentleman never came before the committee to report in favor of a single bill which he claimed had merit.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Because I did not regard it as my business to go to a committee of this House and lobby through the claims that were referred to it. I regarded it as their duty to investigate the cases.

Mr. NEECE. But that is the way other members have done. We can not possibly consider all the bills referred to us. We do the best we can, and have worked faithfully.

Mr. WOLFORD. I want to say a word on this case. I think my friend from West Virginia, who is a good and fair man, is mistaken in reference to it. I happen to know this soldier and Colonel Brownlow——

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia (interrupting). I have no desire to impede the progress of the business, and withdraw any objection I made. I simply wanted to express my opinion about the neglect which I think has been shown to the West Virginia claims. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!".]

Mr. WOLFORD. Well, if the committee want to vote I will take my seat.

So (there being no further objection) the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WINANS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Allow me to say that the clerks have been busy reading here all day long. They are tired out, and I think we had better have some little consideration for them. We have got to act on all of these bills which have been already passed in the committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. We ought to have some consideration for the claimants who have been waiting for their claims all these years.

Mr. WISE. Before that motion is submitted I ask the gentleman to yield to me to submit a request for unanimous consent, not on my own account, but in behalf of a friend of mine; and gentlemen will not suspect that I am governed by any party views when I say I am asking for a Republican [Mr. SPOONER], who desired me to request that Senate bill 2232 be taken up and considered. He is kept away from the House by sickness, and I make the request for unanimous consent in his behalf.

Mr. WINANS. What is the character of the bill?

Mr. WISE. I think it is a meritorious case.

Mr. WINANS. Is it a pension bill?

Mr. WISE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINANS. I can not yield for unanimous consent to take up a pension case. They must be considered in their order.

Mr. WISE. Then I have one request to make in behalf of myself, and that is the privilege of taking up and passing two bills for the removal of political disabilities, so as to get them before the Senate for action.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. There is no objection to that.

Mr. MILLS. Those bills are in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. No; they are on the Private Calendar.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

THOMAS B. NALLE.

The bill (H. R. 11199) for the relief of Thomas B. Nalle was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all legal and political disabilities imposed by virtue of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon Thomas B. Nalle, in the State of Virginia, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

Mr. PETERS. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HAMMOND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the petition of Thomas B. Nalle, of Virginia, for the removal of his political disabilities, and respectfully recommend the passage of the bill which is herewith reported. Mr. Nalle's petition accompanies the report.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES H. LEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11200) for the relief of Charles H. Lee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all legal and political disabilities imposed by virtue of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon Charles H. Lee, in the State of Virginia, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

Mr. PETERS. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HAMMOND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the petition of Charles H. Lee, of Virginia, for the removal of his political disabilities, and respectfully report the accompanying bill, with the recommendation that it do pass. Mr. Lee's petition is with these papers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM B. BARNES.

Mr. WINANS. I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER].

Mr. WEBER. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 2687) granting a pension to William B. Barnes. This bill has already passed both Houses and is now in the hands of the President. It originated in the Senate and is on the House Calendar; but I want to move to have it stricken from the Calendar, so that in case I am not here it will not be again passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2687) granting a pension to William B. Barnes.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; the committee divided, and there were—ayes 14, noes 28.

So the committee refused to rise.

HENRY P. REED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3963) granting a pension to Henry P. Reed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry P. Reed, formely a private in Company D, Fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Henry P. Reed enlisted as a private in Company D, Fourth Pennsylvania Veteran Reserve Corps, on the 17th July, 1861, and was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability October 8, 1862, for hemorrhoids.

Claim was rejected on the ground that alleged hemorrhoids existed prior to enlistment, as shown by certificate of disability.

Testimony, as proven by Charles E. Stewart, Bernard Fox, Harry S. Roberts, Humphrey Murphy, and Martha W. Murray, showing that claimant was a sound, healthy man at and before enlistment.

A. Patze, late surgeon of claimant's regiment, in a letter to claimant's attorney, states that he has no recollection of claimant's disability, but well remembered the name, and in his opinion claimant would not have been accepted in the service with such disability, and further says:

"I have no recollection of the treatment which I undertook with claimant Reed; however, my memory is often revived by collateral circumstances; please advise Reed to write me reminding me of such collaterals as may help to awaken the slumbering mind, and if I can write him a certificate, so far as conscience permits, he has to pay me $5 in advance."

The claim was rejected on the medical certificate of this surgeon, based on an examination of claimant had about fifteen months after enlistment.

Your committee is of opinion that injustice would be done to a worthy claimant if his claim should be rejected upon the certificate of this surgeon, under the circumstances, and with the facts as above recited. The only unfavorable feature in the case is the surgeon's certificate as to the existence of disability at enlistment, based on an examination had about fifteen months after enlistment, when the evidence of soundness of claimant at enlistment is abundant and reliable.

A captain of claimant's regiment states that when claimant enlisted he was in good bodily health and a sound man, being fully capable of performing the duties of soldier.

E. D. Barthe, publisher of the Star, at Plymouth, Pa., states he was acquainted with claimant for ten years before his enlistment, having lived in the same house with him, and never knew of claimant having a day's sickness, and visited his family daily and weekly during all the time above specified, and knows claimant was a sound man when he enlisted.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH A. JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8355) for the relief of Sarah A. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah A. Jones, mother of —— Jones, who was a member of Company C, Ninth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the following amendment:

Fill the blank with the words "Robert A."

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

It appears that the soldier enlisted September 15, 1861, and died December 24, 1863, of wounds received at the battle of Mission Ridge, Tennessee. Pension is claimed as the dependent mother of the soldier. The husband of the claimant died December 7, 1881.

The claim was rejected on the ground that the claimant was not dependent upon the soldier for support at the date of his death.

The following is a summary of the testimony in the case:

Mr. Tracy, a neighbor, says claimant's husband in 1863 owned very little property; all his personality was not worth more than $75; his income was very small; he was an old man and not able-bodied.

Daniel Huntsman, a neighbor, says that claimant's husband was sixty years old in 1853; he owned 240 acres of land, which was worth about $3 per acre; his whole personality was not worth more than $300; his income was about $200 or $250; that the soldier worked two years with his father, and his parents used his wages.

Hezekiah Cook, a neighbor, corroborates the testimony of Daniel Huntsman.

E. E. Horton, a neighbor, says the claimant's husband was sixty years old in 1863; owned a farm worth $500; had no income except the products of said farm; owned two "plug horses," a cow, and a few hogs.

P. I. Martin, a neighbor, corroborates affiant E. E. Horton.

John W. Huntsman, a comrade of the soldier, states that in 1863 the claimant's husband was "hard run" and in debt some; owned two "plug horses," both worth $75, and a poor farm; his income from all sources was hardly $200; that the soldier, while in the army, sent money to the claimant; affiant wrote letters transmitting the same; the claimant did not have much support after the war.

J. W. Martin, a comrade of the soldier, testifies that the soldier gave him $30 or $40 before the battle of Mission Ridge to be sent to his father in the event that he was killed in that battle; he was wounded, and died.

The testimony, of which the above is a summary, was taken before a special examiner of the Pension Office, and the witnesses were thoroughly interrogated.

Your committee are of the opinion that the rejection of this claim was a great injustice to the claimant, and believing that it is meritorious and fully proven, recommend the passage of the bill, amended by inserting in line 6, and after the word "of" where it last occurs, the words "Robert A."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question being taken,

The CHAIRMAN stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 24.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come when the committee should rise. I give notice that I will call a quorum from this time on.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Whether the bill has merit or not?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, sir; I give notice now.

JAMES H. HUSK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7035) granting an increase of pension to James H. Husk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of James H. Husk from $4 to $8 per month (certificate numbered 154986), subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 5, strike out "$8" and insert "$6."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, no 1.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No quorum. I state that I make this point of no quorum in order to close the session to-night, without having ill-will toward any particular measure.

Several MEMBERS. Let us have a call of the House.

Mr. PETERS. I ask unanimous consent that members present be allowed to call up bills for half an hour. This is the last pension night we will have during this Congress.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Not necessarily. Members are very tired, and I think we should bring this sitting to a close.

Mr. HOPKINS. Why not let us call up bills that are unanimously reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes none.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas withdraw the point of no quorum?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Before the call of the roll was completed,

Mr. MORRILL said: I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further call of the roll. It is very evident we can do nothing.

Mr. FELTON and others objected.

The Clerk continued and completed the first call of the roll.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MATSON. I ask the Chair whether the rule requires in this proceeding a second call of the roll?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. MATSON. Then I ask unanimous consent, out of consideration for the clerks, that the second roll-call be dispensed with and that if any gentleman has come in after his name has been called he be permitted to report himself as present.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I desire to know, in case the call has developed the absence of a quorum, would it be possible then for the House to go on and dispose of the business which has been acted upon in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not until a quorum appears.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then I suggest that the proceedings under the call of the roll be vacated by unanimous consent. It is better to hold on to the bills which have been laid aside to be reported favorably and take final action upon them than to have nothing done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]. That gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the second call of the roll.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLS. My inquiry is this: After it is demonstrated that there is no quorum present, would it then be competent to dispense with further proceedings under the call and go on and pass the bills that have been favorably considered in committee, the record showing no quorum?

Mr. MORRILL. That has not been disclosed yet.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then we had better not have it disclosed.

Mr. MILLS. Why not stop the proceedings under the call right now, and go on and pass the bills? I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done in the committee. The Chair will state that the rule is imperative that when a committee of the whole finds itself without a quorum, it is the duty of the Chair to cause the roll to be called, and to report the fact to the Speaker, when he resumes the chair, that the Committee of the Whole having found itself without a quorum, the chairman caused the roll to be called and the following-named members failed to answer to their names. Then the Speaker announces the result. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole has nothing to do with announcing the result. That is done by the Speaker.

Mr. MILLS. And then only two motions can be made, one to adjourn and the other to send for the absent members.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Is it not competent for me now to withdraw the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. And thereby vacate the proceedings under the call and dispose of any inconvenience that would arise from the disclosure of the lack of a quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Now, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of confirming in the House what has been done in the Committee of the Whole, I withdraw the point of order, but state that I will make it again unless the committee immediately rise.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then let us not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], in reply to his inquiry, that, by unanimous consent, the further call of the roll has been dispensed with; so that the Chair has not announced whether a quorum is present or not, or what number of members have failed to answer to their names. Pending the call of the roll, its further call can be dispensed with by unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] can withdraw his point of order; but, of course, if the call is completed the Chair will be compelled to report the result to the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MORRILL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. MORRILL, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 32, noes 3.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MILLS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration bills upon the Private Calendar under the special order, and had instructed him to report to the House sundry bills with various recommendations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection all the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole will be agreed to by a single vote.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now, if there be no objection all the pension bills reported to the House with the recommendation that they do pass will be passed in gross.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Under the foregoing order House bills of the following titles were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 4678) restoring to the pension-roll the name of James Monohan, minor child of Richard Monohan, deceased, late a private in Company A, One hundred and eighty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 8828) granting a pension to Giles Wright;

A bill (H. R. 6823) granting a pension to Peter P. Hoffman;

A bill (H. R. 8437) granting a pension to Thomas Weekly;

A bill (H. R. 5171) granting a pension to Missouri Anderson;

A bill (H. R. 6423) for the relief of Mary Kaylor;

A bill (H. R. 9301) granting a pension to Joseph Jones;

A bill (H. R. 8355) for the relief of Sarah A. Jones; and

A bill (H. R. 6162) granting a pension to Joseph M. Potter.

Senate bills of the following titles were severally read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 1326) granting a pension to Caroline E. Pratt;

A bill (S. 1170) granting a pension to Nancy C. Smith;

A bill (S. 1930) granting a pension to John Duffy; and

A bill (S. 2308) granting a pension to Henry Lafner.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof:

A bill (H. R. 11199) for the relief of Thomas B. Nalle; and

A bill (H. R. 11200) for the relief of Charles H. Lee.

Mr. MATSON. I move to reconsider the several votes by which these pension and disability bills have been passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS INDEFINITELY POSTPONED.

Bills of the following titles, reported adversely from the Committee of the Whole House, were severally taken up and indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 158) granting a pension to Mary A. Mykins;

A bill (S. 1459) granting an increase of pension to Walter A. Donaldson;

A bill (S. 2263) granting a pension to Col. James H. Blood; and

A bill (S. 2687) granting a pension to William B. Barnes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up and pass a Senate bill.

Mr. WINANS. I object.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It will not take more than a minute.

Mr. WINANS. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up and pass the bill (H. R. 11115) to increase the pension of Alonzo B. Chatfield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WINANS. I object.

Mr. WISE. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 16, noes 21.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having put the question on the motion for a recess). The noes seem to have it.

Several members called for a division.

Mr. HATCH. Pending the motion for a recess, I move that the House do now adjourn. I hope that members will not bring this evening's proceedings into ridicule.

The motion of Mr. HATCH was agreed to, there being—ayes 22, noes 18; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 19, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War recommending the enlargement of the scope of section 7 of the river and harbor act of July 5, 1884, to secure proper protection of Davis Island Dam, Ohio River, and other similar works; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a supplementary report of the Surveyor-General of New Mexico on private land claim No. 107, known as the grant to the town of Socorro; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 17, 1887, information respecting judgments and awards against the United States in connection with the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which, with the accompanying papers, was, on motion of Mr. SAWYER, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CELEBRATION OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution adopted by the citizens' committee of Alexandria, Va., inviting the members of the Senate to unite with them in celebrating Washington's birthday; which was read, as follows:

ALEXANDRIA, VA., February 16, 1887.

At a meeting of the citizens' committee charged with the conduct of the proposed celebration of the anniversary of Washington's birthday, February 22, 1887, held this date, the following resolution was unanimously adopted, and the secretary was instructed to forward a copy thereof to the President pro tempore of the United States Senate:

Resolved, That an invitation be extended to the President pro tempore of the United States Senate and to the members of that body to unite with us on Tuesday, February 22, 1887, in the celebration of the anniversary of the birth of the immortal Washington.

In transmitting this invitation I am instructed by the committee to express the hope that it will be the pleasure of the Senate to accept the same.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. W. ZEISSE, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That paper had better lie on the table for the present, until the Committee on Appropriations can be consulted as to whether we may have time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Lemert Post, No. 71, Grand Army of the Republic, of Newark, Ohio; the petition of David Lloyd Post, No. 374, Grand Army of the Republic, of Marengo, Ohio, and the petition of Forsyth Post, No. 15, Grand Army of the Republic, of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the passage of the dependent pension bill over the President's veto; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented the petition of J. H. Case and 39 other citizens of Iowa, residing at Winthrop, praying that the law relative to oleomargarine may be continued without amendment; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

FREE SHIPS.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, as the Senate is aware, I have for a number of years been presenting and urging bills and petitions for the repeal of our navigation laws so that the people of the United States desiring to engage in the foreign carrying trade on private account could buy ships where they could get them cheapest, as all their foreign competitors now do. Failing for a long time to obtain consideration of these important questions, I have had a memorial prepared, setting forth probable or possible foreign complications, which Congress, in my opinion, would do well to consider. The memorial is signed by myself. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce, before which committee I shall ask to be heard on the subject.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Memorial presented by JAMES B. BECK, of Kentucky.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

All indications point toward the probable outbreak of a great war in Europe at an early day.

In that event Germany, France, Italy, and Belgium may be counted in as belligerents, with an even chance that Russia, Austria, and perhaps England, may take a hand in the war.

With all those countries except Russia the United States has an extensive and profitable export trade in its leading staples.

Upward of 85 per cent. of our exports are carried in vessels—principally steamers—that sail under flags which, in event of a general war in Europe, will be exposed to the risk of capture on the high seas, to escape which they must seek the protection of a neutral flag or remain idly in port during the continuance of the war.

The withdrawal of even 25 per cent. of the European steam tonnage, upon which we are dependent for the transportation of our surplus cotton, breadstuffs, provisions, tobacco, and petroleum to European markets, would seriously curtail our exports of those staples and produce a glut of the same in our home markets, which would be ruinous to producers.

We have no supply of tonnage, especially of steam tonnage, to make good even a partial withdrawal of European steam tonnage from our ports.

Our iron-ship building establishments will be fully occupied for several years in building ships and engines for our new Navy.

If Germany, France, Italy, and Belgium become parties to the anticipated war, and England remains neutral, she will be the only neutral in possession of a large fleet of ocean steamships, and will monopolize all the profits of neutrality in ocean transportation.

Citizens of the United States will be entirely dependent upon English-owned steamships for the transportation of cargoes, mails, and passengers to and from Europe.

Englishmen will reap all the profits of a neutrality from which citizens of the United States will be debarred by our ship registry law, which denies to an American citizen the right to purchase a foreign-built steamship and have her registered as American property entitled to the protection of the American flag.

However high ocean freights by neutral vessels may rise, American citizens being unable to purchase modern ocean steamships or build them within a year can not profit by the advance so long as the prohibitory ship registry law stands unaltered.

If England shall cease to be neutral freights and insurance by British vessels will advance to war rates.

American capital is already invested in some of the European steamship companies; in event of war their ships will be liable to capture unless they can be transferred to their American owners and registered as American ships entitled to the protection of the American flag.

Unless this Congress shall so amend the ship registry law as to permit American citizens to purchase and register foreign-built steamships to be used exclusively in the foreign carrying trade, there can be no relief from our present prohibitory law forbidding the issue of a register to a foreign-built steamship until next December, except by the call of an extra session of Congress.

The impending war may break out within a week after the expiration of the present Congress, and interrupt our communications with Europe, retard the movement of our exports to European markets, tax shippers with war rates of freights and insurance, and prevent this opening of an opportunity to re-establish our merchant marine with a highly profitable business so long as the war shall last; yet if this Congress shall fail to amend the obsolete and obstructive ship registry law, we shall be without a remedy until the next Congress shall meet.

The Franco-German war of 1870 was declared by France on the very day (July 15) that the two Houses of Congress had agreed upon to adjourn. The news reached Washington at 11 a. m., and President Grant promptly sent a message to Congress urging the immediate passage of the much needed amendment of the ship registry law. As but five hours of the session remained in which to act upon the recommendation of the President, the opponents of the measure succeeded in defeating it by dilatory motions until the hour for adjournment arrived.

With another day for discussion the obstructive law which paralyzes American enterprise upon the ocean would have disappeared from the statute-book of the United States, and the United States flag would now be borne by at least three lines of transatlantic steamships.

The impending European war threatens to be more far-reaching and of longer duration than the war of 1870. Competent observers of European politics believe that all the leading powers will be drawn into it, and that the only prominent neutral will be the United States. If this view is correct, we may again be in a position to control the ocean carrying trade of the world, and American ships may be in urgent demand as they were during the Crimean war, when half the commerce between England and her Indian possessions was carried in American ships; but to regain that position American citizens must be free to purchase the steamships that have superseded sailing ships in modern commerce.

Respectfully presented.

JAS. B. BECK.

Mr. BECK. Accompanying the memorial I desire to refer, without printing in the RECORD, as a part of it, to show in part the basis upon which I think the subject important, the speech of Baron von Moltke before the German Reichstag, showing that, in his opinion at least, a European war is almost inevitable. I will only insert in the RECORD a brief extract, showing the spirit and temper of this speech. I also present an extract from a New York paper, which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD, in regard to the action of England concerning her steamship lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

THE NEW OCEAN MAIL SERVICE—DETAILS OF THE AGREEMENT—PREPARING FOR PEACE AND WAR.

The details of the new ocean mail transportation between England and New York, arranged by the British Admiralty, were received yesterday. The agreement has two distinct phases, which may be separated into mail service and war service. As regards the mail service, it is arranged that after March 1 the White Star steamers will carry the mails every Wednesday from Liverpool, calling at Queenstown on Thursday; and those of the Cunard Company on Saturday from Liverpool and from Queenstown on Sunday. This arrangement will not preclude those who desire to forward letters by the Inman line on Tuesdays from Liverpool or by the North German Lloyd from Southampton on Thursdays. The correspondents will simply have to write on their letters the name of either of these lines.

But the most interesting and certainly most novel feature of the new arrangement is that which concerns the employment of the mail-boats in the emergency of war. It is thus described:

"Hitherto when war broke out freights rose enormously, and the hiring of steamers as transports or cruisers was an onerous burden on the national exchequer. It was also a harvest-time for steamship owners. The new arrangement with the mail contractors is to provide against this contingency, and to give the Government the power of engaging their vessels on fair terms, settled, not under the pressure of urgent necessity, but in peaceful times by anticipation. Concurrently with the mail contracts the Admiralty have made a subsidiary arrangement with the White Star Company by which the service of their fleet is secured to the nation at peace prices in the event of transports being required, and the same agreement provides for the construction of new vessels by that company of a type to meet naval requirements as armed cruisers. For these vessels, which are to be the largest and fastest vessels afloat, an annual subvention is to be paid in consideration of owners building them to meet the Admiralty designs. Thus, at moderate cost, the country will secure the nucleus of a fleet of reserved armed cruisers of great speed and formidable fighting powers. Messrs. Harland & Wolff, of Belfast, are to build the new ships, and, as they will have twin screws and be divided into numerous water-tight compartments, they will be placed beyond all ordinary chance of disablement. A similar arrangement is being negotiated with the Cunard Company, and it is also stated that the Messrs. Laird are preparing designs for the Inman Company for a new vessel also to comply with the requirements of the department in Whitehall."

The extract from Von Moltke's speech is as follows:

So long as the public opinion in France impetuously demands the surrender of two important German provinces, and we are firmly resolved never to surrender them (loud bravos), an understanding with France is scarcely possible.

I might show the preparations France, Germany, Austria, Russia, and Belgium are making for war, but I will not take the time of the Senate to do so. I will, however, call the attention of the Committee on Commerce to them in support of the memorials I have the honor to present.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Ida May Welton, of Groton, Vt., praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 3328) granting a pension to Ida M. Welton; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10395) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, to report it with an amendment. As the committee only propose a single amendment to the bill, I think it is unnecessary to reprint it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar without reprinting.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CULLOM. I submit an amendment to be proposed to the deficiency appropriation bill, with a petition accompanying it. I move that the amendment be printed and, together with the petition, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6974) to provide for bringing of suits against the Government of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVARTS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

OREGON RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read and lie on the table, and I give notice that on Monday morning next, immediately after the close of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of it for the purpose of enabling me to submit some observations relative to the subject-matter.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution of December 7, 1886, report relative to river and harbor improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory, and now on the table, be referred to the Committee on Commerce with instructions, if, in the judgment of such committee, it is deemed expedient, to investigate and report to the Senate as to the cause of delay in resuming work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River in the fall of 1886, and as to the reasons for change of engineers in charge of such improvement in October, 1886, and if such investigation is deemed expedient by such committee authority is hereby given to send for persons and papers and administer oaths.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That Senate bill 662, Senate bill 663, Senate bill 3286, and Senate bill 3288 be printed as passed by the Senate.

Those bills have not been printed as passed, the original bills having been amended, and it is important that they be seen as they were passed.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOURS OF SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] on the 17th instant, which comes over under objection.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of Mr. CALL, as follows:

Resolved, That for the remainder of the session the Senate will convene at 11 o'clock a. m. and, with a recess of one hour, will continue in session until 9 o'clock p. m.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better be referred to the Committee on Appropriations to see how their business is.

Mr. CALL. I hope we shall take a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the motion to refer, at any rate.

Mr. CALL. I hope the motion will not be insisted on.

Mr. INGALLS. May we hear the resolution read again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. CALL. If there is any objection to continuing in session, of course it will be always in the power of the Senate to control the hour of adjournment. I will move to amend that part of the resolution which provides for evening sessions, if desired, but it is obvious that we ought to meet at 11 o'clock in the morning. There is a great number of important bills that the interests of the country require should be acted upon, and we can very well afford to meet hereafter at 11 o'clock.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say a word, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is absent. That committee is in session now considering the District of Columbia appropriation bill. We have to consider in that committee yet the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, the deficiency appropriation bill, the diplomatic and consular bill, and quite a number of other important matters. It will facilitate the business of the Senate very much more if the Committee on Appropriations is allowed to sit until 12 o'clock without being forced to be absent from the Senate.

I hope that there will be no change made in the existing rule at present. The chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. MORRILL], whom I see before me, knows that we have a half dozen very important matters that need discussion in that committee as well. To meet at 11 o'clock would be simply cutting off committee work, and would do no good.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations in order to see if the public business can be advanced by any change in the time of meeting.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that there is no reason for the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations. There is nothing in it which requires the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Finance to be present at 11 o'clock. There is a large number of important bills pending, to which there is no objection, and which can be passed by those of the Senate who are not on those committees, as a very large proportion, more than a majority of the Senate, do not belong to either of those committees. There are a great many bills that might be acted upon in the other House if there was time to have them considered here.

I have two important bills in charge of great importance to large numbers of people in the United States and in the State of Florida, that I have not been able to have considered, to which I believe there is no objection on the part of any one in the Senate, and meeting at 11 o'clock will afford an opportunity to have them considered, the consideration of which it may otherwise be impossible to obtain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 35, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Allison,	Frye,	Kenna,	Platt,

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CLAIMS AGAINST FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution, which comes over under objection.

The resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN February 17 was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the matters presented in the message of the President of February 14, 1887, relating to an agreement concluded between the minister of the United States at Madrid and the Spanish minister of state for the settlement of claims growing out of occurrences at Santiago de Cuba in regard to the persons of the officers and crew and passengers of the steamer Virginius; and also inquire into the matters presented in the message of the President of January 29, 1887, relating to awards made by the arbitrator in the cases of Antonio Pelletier and A. H. Lazare against the Republic of Hayti, under an agreement made between the Secretary of State of the United States and the minister plenipotentiary for the Republic of Hayti, dated 24th May, 1884.

And that said committee inquire and report whether the United States has any and what power or rightful authority to interfere in any way by legislation to control or dispose of the matters in dispute or in question between the parties interested in said agreements respectively.

2. That said committee further consider and report what action is required, in their opinion, to be taken by the Senate or by Congress in each of said matters in the event that the Senate or Congress shall decide that the United States have any duty to perform in respect thereof, and that said committee have leave also to report by resolution or bill such measures as will carry into effect the conclusions at which they shall arrive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is a matter of importance regarding foreign relations that should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a resolution of instruction to that committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it, but I do not think they ought to be instructed until we look into it. It is pretty broad.

Mr. MORGAN. I think they can bear instruction by the Senate as well as any committee I know of. One of these topics is before the Committee on Foreign Relations by the reference of a letter of the Secretary of State. I think the committee have agreed to report upon that. My view of it was that the report was not as broad as the subject deserved.

This is rather an extraordinary method of dealing with subjects between our own people and those of foreign governments, through agreements that are not diplomatic in the proper sense of the word. They are not conventions; they are not treaties; they are mere agreements of a private nature, if I may use that expression in connection with such a subject, between our Department of State and the foreign ministers or the departments of foreign affairs in other governments.

In several instances, some of recent date, three of which are mentioned in the resolution, our Government has agreed informally with other governments for certain arbitrations and for the dispensation of certain funds that have been placed in the hands of our Secretary of State for distribution among our own citizens upon an acknowledged demand in their favor against foreign governments. But I find that in consequence of the want of law, the want of Senatorial ratifications of any of those conventions or arrangements, the Department of State is under embarrassment; it must necessarily be so; and I wish to extract from this committee their opinion of what the state of the law is upon that subject and what are the responsibilities of our Government.

If we have no right to interfere at all legislatively to control the action of our Secretary of State in respect of these private and semi-official arrangements with foreign countries, that class of arrangements ought to be hereafter abandoned. If they amount to conventions, if they amount to legislation, or to a committal of the Government, we ought to know to what extent.

I trust that the Senator from Vermont will not feel that the committee is being intruded upon in any way merely because I use language of instruction, that they shall inquire into certain phases of the question. It was merely to give the committee full jurisdiction of the whole question relating to the judicial character of our relations with foreign governments that I desired to have the resolution passed in the form of instruction. I hope the Senator will not have the resolution referred, but let it be passed upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would give me great satisfaction to accommodate my friend from Alabama in that way, but I think the subject is of such importance, and as this resolution is so drawn, enumerating a variety of cases about which I do not know anything personally at this moment to any great extent, every object he has in view in calling the attention of the committee to the subject will be attained by referring the resolution, and not by the Senate in advance undertaking to say precisely what the resolution does say.

Mr. MORGAN. Then, if the Senator will allow me, I will amend the resolution in order to meet his view by saying instead of the committee being instructed that it be referred to the committee to inquire and report, so as to get the subject in a legitimate form before the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A simple reference does that. I suggest to my friend, which he has forgotten at the moment, that the very constitution of the Committee on Foreign Relations, like that of every other committee in this body, would authorize it to proceed to make that inquiry, if it thought it advisable, and to report by bill or otherwise to the Senate upon the subject. It is inherent in the nature of all our committees. The Judiciary Committee constantly has its attention called to judicial subjects, and reports bills or resolutions in regard to them, and so does every other committee.

Therefore every object can be obtained that is desirable at this moment by my friend by just simply referring the resolution to the committee. He knows that the committee is always ready to consider what he brings forward.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that, except that it looks a little inappropriate to refer a resolution to a committee which purports to instruct them to do a certain thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is often done, in order to see whether it ought to be done in that way.

Mr. MORGAN. I make no point about it. I have no objection to the proposed reference with that view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 10) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882;

A bill (S. 1458) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan at Bay City, in said district; and

A bill (H. R. 9116) to provide for holding terms of United States courts at Texarkana, Ark., and for other purposes.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 28, 1887, certain information in relation to the water supply in the District of Columbia; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate another resolution that comes over under objection.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BUTLER:

Resolved, That it is expedient for the Senate to consider without further delay House bill 6966, to change the time of meeting of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order on that resolution, that it is not in order as in effect disturbing the rule in respect of the order of business provided by the Senate which fixes the Calendar, and it is not of course on the face of it, and does not purport to be a resolution to make a special order. If it were proposed in the proper form, a resolution to make a special order, it would of course be in order and would not be subject to debate. My point of order is one that lies back of that. The very same question apparently was raised on the 2d of August, 1886, when the President of the Senate "laid before the Senate a resolution submitted by Mr. BECK on Saturday last, providing for the consideration of House bills on the Calendar." I had submitted a similar one providing for the consideration of some other bills—the bills on the Calendar:

Mr. MILLER raised a question of order that the resolution would operate as a change in the standing rules of the Senate, and that proper notice had not been given under the fortieth rule.

The President pro tempore—

The present occupant of the chair—sustained the point of order—

In both cases, and the resolutions, of course, were not considered.

Now the fact that this describes only one bill instead of two, or eight, or ten, it appears to me, can not make any difference to the rule.

I admit clearly that my friend would have a right to offer a resolution making this particular subject a special order for any day that he chose, or would have a right after 1 o'clock to move to take it up, but in neither of these cases would the subject be open to debate until the bill was before the Senate; but the objection back of that is the one which the Chair ruled upon last year when it happened that more than one bill was in the proposition as to how they should be taken up.

Mr. BUTLER. I believe the resolution is debatable, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present question is not debatable, but the Chair will hear debate and will decide the question afterward.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, with a view of determining whether it is advisable to bring that bill before the Senate or not, I ask the Secretary to read the minority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that that would not be in the nature of debate on the point of order. The Chair has a right to call for debate on a question of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not discussing the question of order. I was proposing to discuss the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question of order must first be decided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Where a point of order is made discussion on the merits is not in order. If the Senator from South Carolina desires to say anything on the point of order the Chair will hear him.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to make the point that the resolution is not in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is substantially the point; that it is not in order, as it changes the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not understand that the resolution changes the rules of the Senate. It simply expresses the opinion of the Senate on a given subject; that it is its duty to consider, not to pass, a certain bill. I can not for the life of me see how that changes any rule or order of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not interrupt my friend, the language is "it is expedient for the Senate to consider without further delay." Therefore, if that resolution passes, it would be clearly the duty of the Chair to lay that bill before the Senate. It is a direct order of the Senate to go on with it forthwith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that this resolution does not fall within the precedents referred to by the Senator from Vermont, because they did expressly change the rules by prescribing a different order of business. This is merely an expression of opinion. It does not seem to alter a rule, and the Chair would hold that even if this resolution should be adopted the only way in which the bill referred to could be reached would be the ordinary way, by moving to proceed to its consideration. The Chair feels bound, therefore, to hold that this resolution is in order, although it is manifestly intended to follow it with another resolution or motion which would bring the bill before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. That being the ruling of the Chair, I will state, briefly, my object in introducing this resolution. It was to enable the majority of the Committee on Territories to carry out the terms of a very distinct, well-understood stipulation made by that majority with the minority of the committee, to call up this bill at the earliest practicable moment, and pass it. That, at least, was my understanding.

Mr. PLATT. "And pass it?"

Mr. BUTLER. Well, to call it up—I will not say "to pass it"—but to call it up. It was certainly understood by the committee that that should be done at the earliest possible moment. Now, sir, I have tried again and again to get consideration of this bill. In one instance I was met by one class of objection. This morning I am met by a point of order. I desire to state to the Senate the reasons why I think the bill ought to be considered, and with a view of getting them clearly before the Senate, I ask the Secretary to read the minority report, or, if that is objected to, I will read it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks that a certain paper be read.

Mr. PLATT. Will not the Senator have the whole report read?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection. I will read the minority report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to the Secretary reading it.

Mr. PLATT. But will not the Senator have the whole report read?

Mr. BUTLER. The Secretary may read the minority report first, and then if the Senator pleases he can have the majority report read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the views of the minority of the Committee on Territories on the bill (H. R. 6966) to change the time of the meeting of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory.

Mr. HARRIS. How does this matter come before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On a resolution presented by the Senator from South Carolina yesterday, and coming over under objection.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a resolution that is under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A resolution is under consideration.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to a point of order, or rather a parliamentary inquiry. The pending resolution that comes over under objection is in the nature of a motion to proceed to consider a bill, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice of the Senate is to allow limited debate upon a question of this kind on a resolution that comes over under the rule. This is in the form of a resolution coming over under objection. The practice of the Senate has been to allow debate.

Mr. HARRIS. I am aware that the consideration of the resolution is in order, and I do not raise any question as to that; but if it be in the nature of a motion to proceed to consider, my point is that it is not debatable, and all of this reading of reports and debating the merits of the question involved in a bill proposed to be taken up is out of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I stated that point to the Chair in connection with another proposition, and the Chair has ruled upon it that this is a resolution merely expressing the judgment of the Senate, and therefore the Senator from South Carolina has a right in his own way to discuss it just as long as he chooses.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, if it is not in the nature of a motion to proceed to consider it is debatable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair has so held.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has so held, but at the same time it suspends the order of business for the morning hour. A motion to proceed to the consideration of this bill would be in order. This is an indirect way by which the Senator is enabled to discuss it.

Mr. BUTLER. I have the floor, and it is only a question whether the Secretary shall read this report or I shall read it.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no objection of that sort.

Mr. BUTLER. I will read it myself if you impose the labor on me. I have the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. No such question is raised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No such objection is made.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the views of the minority, as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

On the 3d day of February, 1886, the following memorial passed the council and house of representatives of Washington Territory, and on the 4th day of February, 1886, was approved by the governor of said Territory, as appears from pages 546 and 547 of the Laws of Washington, 1885-'86:

House memorial No. 19, in relation to the time of holding the biennial session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, respectfully represent:

That the members of the Legislative Assembly of this Territory are chosen at the general election held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November in each even-numbered year, when the Territorial Delegate to Congress is elected, and that it is inexpedient to change the time of election of the members of the Legislative Assembly on account of the additional expense which would occur from a separate election for said members of the Legislature.

That the biennial sessions of the Legislative Assembly commence on the first Monday in December in each odd-numbered year, thirteen months after the election of the members thereof.

That the lapse of this long period of time between the election of the members of the Legislature and the commencement of its session works to the disadvantage of the people of the Territory in this, that the Legislature is prone to consider and act upon matters which were not in issue at the time of the election of the members thereof, and to neglect matters which were in issue at such time, and which were the vital questions which determined the election.

That the rapid growth of population and development of the material resources of this Territory in the past few years has made necessary to the welfare and advancement of the Territory much legislation which it has been impossible to consider in the session of the Legislative Assembly now drawing to a close, and that it is highly important to the people of the Territory that a session of the Legislature be held in January, 1887.

Whereupon your memorialists pray your honorable bodies to appoint the first Monday in January, 1887, as the time for the commencement of the next biennial session of the Legislative Assembly of this Territory, and to provide that the biennial session of the Legislature be held ever(y) two years thereafter.

Passed the house of representatives February 3, 1886.

R. O. DUNBAR,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the council February 3, 1886.

B. B. DAY,
President of the Council.

Approved February 4, 1886.

From this memorial it will appear that at the time of its passage very cogent reasons existed for a change in the time of the meeting of the Territorial Legislature of Washington, which reasons not only exist at this time but have been greatly augmented.

It would also appear from this memorial that the Legislative Assembly, elected upon the 2d day of November, 1886, will meet at Olympia, the capital of said Territory, on the first Monday in December, 1887, being the 5th day of said month.

Thus it will be seen thirteen months will elapse between the election of said Legislature and the time of its meeting.

The minority of your committee feel perfectly secure in maintaining the proposition that the condition of things, thus outlined, is not at all conducive to the public good.

It is submitted that the interests of the public would be best subserved by the convening of the Legislative Assembly within a reasonable time after its election.

The above memorial evidences a pronounced desire on the part of the people of Washington Territory for the change suggested.

In order that a government "by the people" may prevail in Washington Territory, so far as is compatible with the existing Territorial condition, the people's wishes, when they can be ascertained, must be recognized.

If, in the face of this positive declaration on behalf of the people of Washington Territory, the change in the time for the meeting of the Legislative Assembly is not made, the idea of a recognition of the wishes of the people ceases to be a fixed factor in our governmental policy.

The objection is urged, however, that had this change been essential to the welfare and prosperity of the people of Washington Territory to the degree claimed, the Legislative Assembly itself was competent to so change the time of its meeting as to conform to the requirements of the existing emergency.

A brief examination of the legislation in this connection will clearly establish the absurdity of such a claim.

The act of March 2, 1853, provided that the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory should meet annually. (See organic act, Laws of Washington, 1854, page 33, section 4.)

It was therein provided that the governor of the Territory should fix the time of the first meeting of the Legislature, and that the time of its annual meeting thereafter should be fixed by the Legislature.

By proclamation of the governor the first Legislature convened on the 27th day of February, 1854, and during that session said body provided that it should meet in each year thereafter on the first Monday in December. (See Laws of Washington, 1854, page 450.)

The last annual session was begun on the first Monday in December, 1866, and ended February, 1867. On the 29th of June, 1866 (see page 3, Laws of Washington, 1866-'67), Congress passed a law providing that after the conclusion of the next annual session of the Legislature its sessions should be biennial.

The Legislature which ended in February, 1867, provided that the first biennial session should begin on the first Monday in October, 1869. This law continued in force until the ninth biennial session, which convened on the first Monday in October, 1883, at which session the time was changed to the first Monday in December, 1885. (See Laws of Washington, 1883, page 62.)

The tenth biennial session convened on the first Monday in December, 1885, and before its adjournment passed the memorial referred to.

It requires but little intelligence to see that the Legislative Assembly of 1885-'86 exhausted its power and authority when, by this memorial, it relegated the matter to Congress.

By the act of March 2, 1853, the Legislature was to convene annually, and therein Congress conferred upon it the power to fix the time of the annual meeting.

By the act of June 29, 1866, the character of the meeting of the Legislative Assembly was changed by Congress from annual to biennial. This act provided that after the adjournment of the Legislature in February, 1867, the meetings should be biennial instead of annual.

In accordance with this positive declaration of Congress the Legislature of 1866-'67 provided that the next Legislative Assembly should convene on the first Monday in October, 1869. With the change in the law as to the character of the meeting the Legislature retained the power of fixing the time for the meeting of the biennial session.

The Legislature of 1885-'86, the tenth biennial session, convened a little more than one year ago, on the first Monday in December, 1885, and continued in session 60 days, adjourning early in 1886. Had this Legislature by law attempted to provide for the meeting of the eleventh biennial session on the 7th of January, 1887, or during the present winter, it would have enacted that the present meeting be annual instead of biennial, thus placing itself in direct antagonism with the act of Congress of June 29, 1886, in which the assertion is distinct and unequivocal that the sessions must be biennial instead of annual.

The bill under consideration (H. R. 6966) was introduced by Hon. C. S. VOORHEES, Delegate from Washington Territory, during the first session of this Congress, passed the House of Representatives May 1, 1886, and was referred to the Committee on Territories of this body the 3d day of said month.

Notwithstanding the determined, aggressive, and persistent efforts of Delegate VOORHEES and of a minority of this committee, from that time to the present it has not been possible to secure action thereon.

While the reasons set forth in the memorial referred to are amply sufficient, in our judgment, to justify and warrant the desired legislation, there are other reasons even stronger and more conclusive.

In ascertaining these additional reasons it becomes very important, as well as very interesting, to review the history contemporaneous with this attempted legislation.

On the 28th of November, 1883, the Legislature of Washington Territory, wholly dominated and controlled by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, passed a law, which has since been known as the "gross-earnings tax law," exempting from taxation all the lands within the Territory of any railroad company, from whatever source the title may have been derived. (See Laws of Washington, 1883, page 66, section 5.)

The Legislative Assembly of 1885-'86 was elected the 4th day of November, 1884, upon a distinct and unambiguous pledge that this so-called "gross-earnings tax law" should be repealed, and a law enacted taxing the lands of railroad companies in the same manner as the lands of individuals. This was one of the foremost issues upon which the campaign was based, and it resulted in the election of a Legislature in which the Republicans had a majority of 16 on joint ballot, the total membership of the Legislative Assembly being 36. Notwithstanding the fact that the platforms of both the Democratic and Republican parties declared in favor of the repeal of this unjust and iniquitous "gross-earnings tax law," the Northern Pacific Railroad Company again dominated and controlled the Legislature with its 16 Republican majority on joint ballot, and the relief which the overburdened people of the Territory so eagerly and earnestly demanded was denied them.

At the last general election, in 1886, members of the next Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory were elected upon precisely the same issue. So determined were the people in their efforts to right this great wrong that the present Legislative Assembly, instead of developing a Republican majority of 16 upon joint ballot, shows a Republican majority of 2. The presumption, therefore, is certain that as soon as called together this Legislature in the face of this overwhelming rebuke to the last Legislature will keep the pledges so unhesitatingly and unblushingly broken by the Legislative Assembly of 1885-'86.

At all events they should be placed in a position where their loyalty to their pledges can be tested, because of the benefits and advantages which the people may enjoy by reason of such loyalty.

The so-called "gross-earnings tax law" provides that all taxation upon the property of any railroad company within the Territory shall be included within 2 per cent. of the gross earnings, and also provides that the railroad officials shall determine the amount and extent of such earnings. This act also provides in terms, by section 5, for the exemption from taxation of the lands within the Territory belonging to railroad companies.

By the act of July 2, 1864, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was granted within the Territories twenty alternate sections per mile to "aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," upon certain positive and well-defined conditions.

Section 5 of the so-called "gross-earnings tax law" is as follows:

"The lands of any railroad company shall become subject to taxation in the same manner as other similar property, as soon as the same are sold, leased, or contracted to be sold or leased." * * *

When this law was passed the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Prescott vs. The R. R. Co., 16 Wallace, 603, and McShane vs. R. R. Co., 22 Wallace, page 444, was in force. This rule was that whenever Congress had required that the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying should be paid before there should be any transfer of title from the United States to the land-grant companies, the compliance with this condition was essential to the vesting in Territorial or municipal authority of the right to tax the lands so circumstanced.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company has willfully failed to comply with this condition, so that up to the 10th of July, 1886, it was impossible to reach, for the purpose of taxation, any of their so-called granted lands. On the above date Congress passed a law which destroyed the force of the rule thus promulgated by the Supreme Court of the United States, and provided a scheme for the taxation of such lands, notwithstanding the failure of the land-grant companies to pay the costs of surveying, selecting, and conveying.

This beneficent law is in force in every State and Territory through which the Northern Pacific Railroad extends excepting the Territory of Washington.

No revenue has thus far accrued to this Territory by reason of the passage of said law, because of the presence upon the statute-books of the Territorial law known as the "gross-earnings tax law," exempting these lands from taxation.

In a letter to Delegate VOORHEES the Commissioner of the General Land Office thus indicates the amount of lands withdrawn by the United States for the benefit of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in Washington Territory:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1887.

SIR: Referring to your verbal request to be furnished with a statement of the quantity of lands withdrawn in Washington Territory for the benefit of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, I have to advise you that owing to the limited time in which you wish us to give you this information, it will be impossible to examine the diagrams of withdrawal by section, township, and range. I therefore furnish you the following approximate estimate, which is substantially correct, to wit:

	Acres.
Lands withdrawn in granted limits	9,500,000
Lands withdrawn in granted limits, indemnity	2,500,000
Total	12,000,000

Very respectfully,

WM. A. J. SPARKS,
Commissioner.

Hon. C. S. VOORHEES,
House of Representatives.

According to the acreage indicated in the Commissioner's letter, and establishing a very moderate and conservative average as to the price of these lands for taxation and the rate of taxation, we reach a surprising result. Considering the value of the mineral and timber lands withdrawn in Washington Territory for the benefit of this company, the average price of $2.50 per acre for purpose of taxation is entirely within bounds. The rate of taxation in Washington Territory ranges from 11 to 23 mills, so that an average rate of 15 mills is admissible.

The following table is submitted as indicating approximately the vast benefit which will accrue to the people of Washington Territory by the repeal of the so-called "gross-earnings tax law" before the tax levy for the ensuing year goes into operation:

	Acres.
Lands withdrawn in granted limits. (See Commissioner's letter)	9,500,000
Deduct 25 per cent. for lands sold by company	2,375,000
Total, in granted limits, subject to taxation, in hands of company	7,125,000
Lands withdrawn, indemnity limits. (See Commissioner's letter)	2,500,000
Deduct 25 per cent. for lands sold by company	625,000
Total indemnity limits, subject to taxation, in hands of company	1,875,000

	Acres.
Taxable lands in granted limits in hands of company	7,125,000
Taxable lands in indemnity limits in hands of company	1,875,000
Total taxable lands	9,000,000
Value of lands in granted limits for purposes of taxation, at $2.50 per acre	17,812,500
Value of lands in indemnity limits for purposes of taxation, at $2.50 per acre	4,687,500
Total valuation	22,500,000
Tax levy on lands in granted limits, at 1.5 per cent	$267,187 50
Tax levy on lands in indemnity limits, at 1.5 per cent	70,312 50
Total tax levy	337,500 00

Confronted by this conclusive and startling exhibit, the minority of your committee does not hesitate to confess its profound surprise and amazement at the action of the majority. The time has come for calling a halt to the unreasoning and unwholesome cupidity and rapacity of the railroad companies of this country. No good reason can exist why the Northern Pacific Railroad Company shall continue to be relieved from the obligation of the payment of nearly one-half of the tax levied in Washington Territory.

In accordance with the latest available statistics the total property valuation of 1885, in Washington Territory, exclusive of the valuation of railroad property, was $50,484,437; upon this valuation the total tax levied was $724,065.75. From these figures it appears that if the Northern Pacific Railroad Company is made to pay its just proportion of the public burdens, in respect of the single item of their lands, to say nothing of the taxes based upon a proper valuation of their road-bed, rolling-stock, and other vast property interests, maintaining the present rate of taxation in the Territory, the people's burdens will be reduced nearly 50 per cent.

The minority of your committee insist that any movement which tends to relieve the people of the onerous tax, so unconscionably placed upon them by this land-grant railroad company, and by the other railroad companies of the Territory, should be fostered and encouraged. For this reason they contend that the present Legislative Assembly should be afforded the opportunity, which can only be given them by an act of Congress, of repealing at once the odious railroad-tax legislation which now incumbers the statute-books of Washington Territory.

We therefore ask for the passage of the bill, amended as follows:

In line 3 strike out "first Monday in January" and insert "first Monday in March."

In line 5 strike out the word "next" and insert the word "eleventh."

In line 6, after the word "the," insert the word "twelfth."

In line 7, after the word "held," insert "the first Monday in January, 1889," and insert section 2 at end of bill; so that the bill as amended will read:

An act to change the time of the meeting of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first Monday in March, 1887, be, and the same is hereby, fixed as the time for the commencement of the eleventh biennial session of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory; and that the twelfth biennial session of the Legislative Assembly be held the first Monday in January, 1889, and every two years thereafter.

SEC. 2. That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $22,730 for legislative expenses, namely, for per diem of members and officers of the Legislative Assembly, mileage of members, printing, rent of secretary's office, hire of messenger, light, fuel, stationery, postage, office furniture, repairs, painting, and other incidentals.

Mr. BUTLER. I have had that report read in order to put the Senate in possession of the exact condition of things in that Territory, and let them decide whether the people of the Territory are entitled to the relief which the minority of the committee think they are entitled to.

It has been stated that this is a political bill. I have given no such aspect to it. But let us see what the opinions of both political parties of Washington Territory are on this subject. I read from the Republican platform of that party in Washington Territory, adopted September 8, 1886—

We favor just and equal taxation, and believe that the property of corporations and individuals should be assessed and taxed upon the same basis——

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask what the Senator is reading from?

Mr. BUTLER. From the Republican platform of Washington Territory of September 8, 1886—and we therefore demand the repeal of the present Territorial law known as the "gross-earnings law," providing for the levy and collection of taxes upon railroad property, and we demand the enactment of a law which will impose the burden of taxation upon corporations and individuals alike.

I find in the Democratic platform of Washington Territory, adopted August 18, 1886, the following:

We demand the immediate and unconditional repeal of the gross-earnings tax law enacted in 1883, and denounce the Republican Legislature of 1885 for the violation of its pledged faith to the people in its failure to repeal the said law, and for its subserviency to the corrupt influence of interested corporations.

We insist that the property of corporations shall be taxed by the same laws as that of individuals, and that the rich and poor shall bear the burdens of government in proportion to the valuation of property owned or controlled by each.

This report, which I think can be sustained by the record, shows that there have been lands withdrawn within granted limits, 9,500,000 acres; lands withdrawn, indemnity limits, 2,500,000 acres; total indemnity limits in hands of company, 1,875,000 acres; taxable lands in granted limits in hands of company, 7,125,000 acres; making in all 9,000,000 acres of land subject to taxation, upon which there would be realized, at a fair estimate, $337,500, which would go into the treasury of the Territory of Washington. This bill, it is true, only provides for the change of the time of holding the meeting of the Legislature, but according to the pledges of both parties this gross-earnings act must be repealed by this Legislature whenever it meets, and the advantage of having it meet before next December is to be found in the fact that in the mean time an additional levy will be made upon the property in that Territory, and this additional sum of money will go into its treasury.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything further to endeavor to impress upon the Senate the importance of having this bill passed.

There is a letter from the governor of Washington Territory, on which a good deal of reliance is placed. He attempts to carry water on both shoulders, as it seems to me. He remarks:

The main reasons for a session are:
1. The desirability of obtaining an appropriation for maintaining the new penitentiary at Walla Walla.
2. The desirability of repealing or modifying the "gross-earnings act" in relation to taxation of railroads.

Then he goes on, by way of criticism, and says that it is very doubtful "what course the Legislature would pursue on these and other subjects." I can not understand how there can be any doubt when both parties are pledged to repeal the gross-earnings act. I have here a letter bearing on the same subject received from a gentleman this morning, dated "Yonkers, N. Y." It is a private letter, and therefore I am not at liberty to give the name of the writer, but I judge from the letter that he is a very intelligent man:

YONKERS, N. Y., February 17, 1887.

DEAR SIR: The citizens of Washington Territory will be grateful for your efforts to hasten the repeal of the gross-earnings law. Permit me as one of them to thank you.

It is not merely the grant of the Northern Pacific that escapes taxation. Every coal company pleads its railroad; every important logger is building a road that will come within the law; the immense tracts of the mill companies will soon be exempt. In two years not a county in Western Washington will be without its railroad reserves, nor will the public receive compensatory transportation facilities.

It was this issue that defeated known representatives of railway corporations who were candidates for the Legislature. The voice of the Territory was unmistakable and ought to find immediate expression in law.

Very respectfully,

——— ———, of Skagit.

Hon. M. C. BUTLER,
United States Senate.

That is from a gentleman who signs himself of Skagit. I presume it is Skagit County, in Washington Territory. He appears to be a very intelligent man. Doubtless if I were to give his name some Senator would know him; but I do not feel at liberty to do that as it is a private letter.

Now, sir, I have done what I conceived to be my duty to get the Senate to act upon this bill. They can take the responsibility of doing so or not doing so, as they see fit. I am not actuated or influenced by any feeling of hostility to railroads; but these railroads in the Northwestern Territories have received the most imperial benefactions and donations from the Government of the United States, and about that I have no complaint to make, and I am not one of those who indulge in raids (as I find the expression used) upon corporations. They have their uses, and they are in my opinion necessary evils.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I ask for information whether the Committee on Territories have any petitions or memorials from citizens of Washington Territory asking for this legislation on the ground on which it is now placed by the minority of the committee?

Mr. BUTLER. I must ask the Senator to repeat his question, for I could not hear him.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. My question is whether the Committee on Territories had any petitions or memorials before them asking for legislation expediting the time of the meeting of the Legislature of that Territory for the reasons stated by the minority now upon the floor of the Senate in favor of that legislation?

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator had listened to the reading of the minority report he would not have felt called on to ask that question.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I have read the minority report. I had the honor to read the Senator's report, in which, by the way, with all deference to the Senator, there are several inaccurate statements, not of course intentional, in reference to certain matters in connection with the situation of affairs and the taxable property of Washington Territory; but I do not understand, even from the minority report, that there was before the Committee on Territories a demand by petition by the citizens of that Territory in favor of this legislation.

I understand, of course, that the Legislature of the Territory, at its last session in 1885, passed a memorial recommending that a change be made by Congress so that the next session thereafter might be called for January last, which date has elapsed; but that memorial, as I read it, does not give as a reason any one of the reasons now being urged by the Senator from South Carolina. The reason given in that memorial, as I understand, was simply the fact that the time between the election of the members of the Legislature and the date of the meeting of the session of the Legislature was, in the judgment of the Legislature of that Territory, too long.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator certainly has not read the minority report, or he would not make that statement. The memorial goes on distinctly to say that the Legislature which went out of existence was not able for want of time to attend to a great many public questions that ought to have been attended to, and we have a right to assume that among those public questions was this question of the repeal of the gross-earnings act.

In addition to that memorial, which is quite sufficient for the Senate—it is the unanimous voice of the people as expressed through their representatives in the Territorial Legislature—we have the earnest solicitude and anxiety and wish of the Delegate of that Territory in the other branch of Congress that this bill should pass.

Now, sir, if there is any higher evidence of the wishes of the people of any country than those two expressions, I have failed to know what they are.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. But the Senator from South Carolina must agree with me that in the memorial adopted by the Legislature of the Territory, asking that the time of the meeting of the Legislature should be fixed for January last, which has now passed, no reference whatever was made to the advisability or desire on the part of the people of Washington Territory to have it meet for the purpose of legislating upon the subject of the railroad gross earnings and tax law—not one word.

Mr. BUTLER. It does not say so; but there are a great many things we have a right to take notice of as public facts, and which, I think, when we state them, the Senator will not deny. Will he deny that the members of his own party in their platform pledged themselves distinctly to a repeal of the gross-earnings act? Will he deny that the representatives of the Democratic party in their platform pledged themselves to repeal it? Then can the Senator consistently and properly state to the Senate that we are not in possession of information which will guide us in coming to a conclusion on this bill?

Now, I should like to put a question to the Senator. I should like to ask him if he, as a citizen of the State of Oregon, believes that that is a just and proper law?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. When we come to discuss that I will tell the Senator from South Carolina precisely what I think about it. We have not got to that yet. The point under discussion now is simply whether in the memorial adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of 1885 asking certain legislation looking to a changing of the time of the meeting of the Legislature of that Territory the reasons given were the reasons stated by the Senator now and by the minority of the committee. I say that that memorial made no reference whatever to a desire for a session for the purpose of repealing the gross earnings and tax law; and moreover it could not have done so from the fact that the act of Congress authorizing that thing to be done was not passed until long after that memorial was adopted by the Legislature of the Territory. So that instead of conforming here to it, so far as the minority of the Committee on Territories are concerned, and the expressed wish of the Legislature of that Territory as expressed in its memorial—so far from proceeding for the reasons stated in that memorial, a wholly different ground has been taken, and we are now called upon to pass a law convening—because that is what it amounts to in substance and effect—a special session of the Legislature of that Territory.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. That is practically the effect of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. And for the purpose of performing or considering the propriety of performing a certain act of legislation which the Senator from South Carolina says is desirable, and which indeed may possibly be desirable. I am not discussing that question now.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is evidently mistaken on that subject.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I will say this in answer——

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to know what the Senator thinks of it.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Taking the Senator's statement in his minority report in regard to the amount of lands that would be taxable to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in that Territory to be entirely accurate and correct, I am inclined to think very probably the Senator from South Carolina is right; that it would, in the interest of the taxpayers of that Territory, and in the interest of fair play and common justice, be desirable to change the law as to the rule of taxation in reference to the property of the railroad company in the Territory; but I undertake to say that the statements of the Senator from South Carolina in the minority report are to a very great extent in several respects wofully inaccurate.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad now if the Senator would point out in what respect they are inaccurate. The Senator gets up and puts a question to me and puts his own construction upon the minority report, and yet fails to point out any one single item where there is inaccuracy in that report.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. I have yielded to the Senator two or three times, and he has made a speech.

Mr. PLATT. Allow me——

Mr. BUTLER. One moment. I should like to put a direct question to the Senator from Oregon, as he seems to have taken up the cudgels for the majority of this committee, not being a member of it. I should like to put a direct question to him: if he thinks in case that Legislature should be called together it would be desirable, or proper, or just to repeal that gross-earnings act by which the railroads of that Territory are exempt from taxation practically?

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator yield to me now for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have the answer of the Senator from Oregon to that question.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I have already answered.

Mr. PLATT. I will answer it when I come to reply.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. It seems the Senator from Oregon has—I will not say himself, because he had a perfect right to the floor—but he has certainly taken up the cudgels for the majority of the committee, and he was conducting the discussion, and I was quite willing to go on and discuss it with him.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The Senator from South Carolina can not place me in a false position.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not desire to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I take up the cudgel for no committee. That committee is amply able to take care of itself. I simply rose, as the Senate will bear me out, and as the honorable Senator must admit, for the purpose of asking the Senator from South Carolina a question as to whether there were any petitions before the committee demanding this legislation. That was my question. I desired information on that subject. I was ignorant and unadvised as to that fact; I was not advised by anything in the minority report as to whether or not the people of Washington Territory had sent to the Committee on Territories of the Senate petitions asking for this legislation. I rose simply to ask that question.

Mr. BUTLER. The report speaks for itself. Now, I put another question to the Senator. Is there any evidence in his possession, by petition or otherwise, against the passage of the bill by any respectable number of citizens of that Territory?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I want to answer that question.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad to have it answered.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I will say this: I am accustomed to receive communications from all over Washington Territory ever since I have been in the Senate from citizens and tax-payers of that Territory in regard to matters of legislation affecting the people of that Territory and their interests, and I say here and now in all candor and truthfulness that up to this moment not one letter, not one petition, have I received from any citizen of Washington Territory asking for this legislation or soliciting my aid in its behalf, while I have received scores of letters from the citizens and tax-payers, and many of them leading prominent men, Republicans and Democrats, of that Territory within the last month, earnestly protesting against this legislation at this time, and giving as reasons that the convening of the Legislature of that Territory at the time proposed now by the minority of this committee in March next would be to seriously interfere with the business interests, calculations, and arrangements of the people of that Territory.

I will say, moreover, in addition now, as the Senator has asked the question, that during the last month I have met in consultation at the Capitol very many, ten or twelve, of the leading citizens of that Territory, and with one exception every one of those gentlemen has come to me and insisted that this piece of legislation ought not to be permitted to pass. One of the prominent citizens of the Territory, a Republican, did come to me and appeal to me to aid the legislation and assist in getting it through. He gave as a reason that it was necessary in order to enact some legislation with reference to the penitentiary in that Territory.

Mr. BUTLER. If that be true—and of course if the Senator says it is so it must be so—the Senator has certainly not given the Committee on Territories the proper consideration in not giving it the benefit of some of that information.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I have referred various letters which I have received to the acting chairman of the Committee on Territories, as he, I have no doubt, will bear me out.

Mr. BUTLER. The acting chairman of that committee has read perhaps two or three. I remember he read a telegram from a man by the name of Owen, the secretary of that Territory, and one or two others, perhaps, but it nowhere appeared that there was any widespread, general feeling against the passage of this bill. On the contrary, all the information that I have been able to get is the other way. I admit that a great deal of it has been gathered from the distinguished Delegate of that Territory in the other branch of Congress, who is the representative of the people of that Territory, and who, I think, is in very much better condition to speak for the people of that Territory than even the distinguished Senator from Oregon. I submit that his voice is entitled to as much weight certainly on this floor as that of the Senator from Oregon, who does not represent the Territory, and who has no interest there so far as I know, who represents another State. I submit that the Delegate in Congress is the proper representative of the people of that Territory before the Congress of the United States, and he certainly knows whereof he speaks when he comes to me and to every member of the committee and begs and implores and urges us to pass this act of common justice to the tax-payers of that Territory, not necessarily as against the railroads, but simply to require the railroads and other corporations to come in and pay their share for the support of government, and not to continue to receive the benefactions of the government, and at the same time having their immense possessions practically exempted from taxation. It is for that and that alone that I have urged this measure.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I regret this irregular discussion of the merits of the bill which is the subject-matter of this resolution. I regret it because I know that the Senate feels that this discussion trespasses upon time which should be devoted to matters of very great public importance; but since it has been brought before the Senate in the ingenious manner in which it has been, and the minority of the committee have presented their views endeavoring to show why the report of the committee should not be adopted, I feel it due to myself and to the subject and to the people of Washington Territory and to the Senate itself to present as briefly as I may, and yet thoroughly, the reasons why the majority of the committee think this bill should not pass, at any rate why it should not be considered at this time. I ask, therefore, that the Secretary will read the majority report of the committee, which the Senator from South Carolina declined to have read.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not decline to have it read.

Mr. PLATT. I asked to have it read.

Mr. BUTLER. I stated that I would have the minority report read first, and then if the Senator from Connecticut desired the majority report read it might be.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that it be read now. It is not necessary to read the memorial of the Legislature, because that has already been read.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. PLATT February 12, 1887, as follows:

The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6966) to change the time of the meeting of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, having considered the same, submit the following report:

By section 1846 of the Revised Statutes of the United States it is provided that members of the Territorial Legislatures "shall be chosen for the term of two years, and the sessions of the respective Legislative Assemblies shall be biennial," and that "each Legislative Assembly shall fix by law the day of the commencement of its regular sessions." Prior to the year 1883, elections of members of both branches of the Legislative Assembly in Washington Territory had been held on the Tuesday next following the Monday of November in the even-numbered years, so that eleven months elapsed after the election of members before the session of the Legislative Assembly to which they were elected.

At the Legislative Assembly in that Territory commencing on the first Monday of October, 1883, the time for the meeting of the Legislature in 1885 was fixed upon the first Monday of December, 1885, and it was provided that the Legislature should convene biennially thereafter upon the first Monday of December. So that the Legislature of 1883 extended the time which elapsed between the election of the members and the session of the Legislative Assembly to which they were elected.

The Legislature of 1885, near the close of its session, also memorialized Congress to pass a law providing that the next session of the Legislature should be held on the first Monday of January, 1887, and the sessions of the Legislative Assembly biennially thereafter. By the law as it now exists the Assembly will convene on the first Monday of December, 1887. The memorial of the Legislature is appended to this report, marked A.

It will be seen that the principal reason given for changing the time for holding the Legislative Assembly in the Territory was founded upon the fact that so much time elapsed between the election of the members and the commencement of the session that no necessity for legislative action prior to the next legal meeting of the Assembly was pointed out or alluded to.

The bill referred to the committee passed the House of Representatives on the 1st of May last, but no action was taken by the Committee on Territories upon the bill during the last session further than its reference to a subcommittee.

Correspondence was had with the governor of the Territory and other prominent citizens as to the advisability of the passage of such a bill, and later, during the present session, correspondence has been renewed. Pending this correspondence the time fixed by the House bill for the meeting of the members of the Legislative Assembly upon the first Monday of January, 1887, passed by, and the question now arises whether any present necessity exists for the passage of a bill by which the next meeting of the Legislative Assembly shall be held some time during the month of March next, or at some other time prior to that fixed by law, namely, the first Monday of December next.

The principal reason now urged for a meeting of the Legislature at a date earlier than the law provides is the opportunity for changing the law relating to the taxation of railroads and railroad property in the Territory growing out of the passage of the act of Congress approved July 10, 1886, which makes the surveyed lands of land-grant railroads subject to local taxation. It will be observed that this reason for an earlier session of the Legislature did not exist at the time of the passage of the act by the House, but is an afterthought.

A letter from the governor of the Territory, giving the reasons for and against the proposition to convene the Legislature of the Territory at an earlier date than the time fixed by law, is appended hereto and marked B, from which it will be seen that upon the whole the governor, after consultation with prominent citizens of the Territory, does not think it for the best interests of the Territory that such an act should be passed.

The spring season for farming has already commenced in many portions of the Territory, and the Legislature, if held during the month of March, will be convened when the farming operations of the Territory are most active and imperative, a reason which doubtless operated, though in a lesser degree, for the change made by the Legislature itself from the first Monday of October to the first Monday of December as the time for the session of the Legislative Assembly.

The committee has endeavored to ascertain the views of prominent citizens of both political parties in the Territory upon the question of whether a meeting of the Legislature is desired in the month of March, and is satisfied that the weight of opinion is that such a course is undesirable. It has been informed that some effort has been made to obtain petitions and opinions in favor of a March or spring session, but none have reached the committee, and it feels justified in concluding that the time mentioned in the memorial having already passed without the change having been made, it is not desired by the citizens of the Territory best qualified to advise, that a meeting should be ordered to be held during the month of March. If any special emergency arises or exists the governor of the Territory is legally empowered to call an extra session of the Legislature.

With regard to the reason urged in the memorial that the time of the convening of the Legislative Assembly should be advanced on account of the time which elapses after the election of the members before the session of that body, it may be said that the time of session was fixed by the Territory itself with a complete understanding of the facts; that only at the last previous session of the Legislative Assembly the time between the election and the convening of the Assembly had been extended; that Washington Territory is not singular in this respect, at least three other of the Territories, as it is believed by the committee, holding their elections and convening their Legislative Assemblies so that fourteen months elapse between the election and the legislative session. It may also be observed that the Legislative Assembly of 1883, in fixing a time for the convening of future sessions of that body, followed the precedent to be found in the election of Representatives in Congress and the meeting of Congress.

Upon the whole the committee concludes that it is better that the Legislative Assembly already elected shall convene at the time fixed by law, namely, the first Monday of next December rather than during the month of March, a period and season so inconvenient for legislative proceedings.

The indefinite postponement of the bill is therefore recommended.

OLYMPIA, January 4, 1887.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have waited a few days since receiving yours of December 17, so as to confer with a few leading citizens in different parts of the Territory in regard to the matter referred to in your letter. I have consulted with both Democrats and Republicans.

The weight of opinion seems to be opposed to a session of the Legislature the present winter. I have no personal choice in the matter, and see reasons both for and against the proposed session. The main reasons for a session are:

(1) The desirability of obtaining an appropriation for maintaining the new penitentiary at Walla Walla.

(2) The desirability of repealing or modifying the "gross-earnings act" in relation to taxation of railroads.

The reasons against the session are:

(1) The uncertainty as to what course the Legislature would pursue on these and other subjects.

(2) The fact that the winter will necessarily be far advanced before the session can be commenced, and the effect of this upon the business of the farmers who may be members of the Legislature.

In regard to the penitentiary, I may state that we can continue our present prison contract at Seatco, and have the same prison accommodations and service that we have had for the past five or six years.

The new building at Walla Walla is nearly finished, and the law provides for the removal of the convicts to Walla Walla whenever the building commissioners of the new prison shall notify the governor that the building is finished and ready for occupancy. I have not yet received this notice, but am expecting to receive it within a few weeks.

There is no provision of law for paying the expense of maintaining and guarding the convicts in the new prison.

It has been suggested that if the removal of the prisoners takes place the governor may make a contract with parties who may look to the next Legislature for their pay. But no steps have yet been taken in this direction.

On general principles it is no doubt better to have the Legislative Assembly convene on the first Monday in January after the election; but that time being already past in the present instance, it is very questionable whether the public service would be best promoted by a session this winter.

I am yours, very truly,

WATSON C. SQUIRE, Governor.

Hon. O. H. PLATT,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. PLATT. Now, Mr. President, this is not a question to-day whether the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory shall be convened at the time asked by the memorial of that body, for that time was the first Monday in January, 1887, and that time has passed.

I will not stop to discuss the question why action was not had upon this bill before the time when the Legislative Assembly asked that its next session might convene had elapsed. I simply want to say this about it, that I do not think the majority of the committee was in fault in respect to that matter, nor was the minority of the committee. There was no fault in that matter on the part of any one.

The question now is, whether the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory shall convene at the time fixed by law, which is the first Monday of December next, or whether it shall be convened at a time not asked by the Assembly of the Territory and which can not be earlier than the middle of March. I agree that the proposed amendment of the Senator from South Carolina would convene it on the first Monday in March next, but there are only two weeks from to-day in which to pass the bill with its amendments in the Senate, to have the amendments concurred in by the House, to have the bill approved by the President, and notice given of the meeting of the Legislative Assembly. So I assume that it is impossible, if the Senate were to pass this bill to-day, in the nature of things, that a session of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory can be convened before the middle of March. That body has never asked that the next session of the Assembly should be in the middle of March. I do not believe that the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory ever would have asked that. It is a period when neither State nor Territory desires a meeting of its Legislature. It is the period of putting in the crops, the busiest season of the year for farmers. If I am correctly informed, the business of plowing is already progressing in that Territory.

Mr. BUTLER. May I put a question to the Senator just there?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does he not think that any farmer would leave the plow-handle for the purpose of saving 50 per cent. of his taxes, as I believe this meeting of the Legislature would save?

Mr. PLATT. Would it not really be better to let me come to that in order? I will show before I get through that on the basis of taxation proposed by the Senator from South Carolina the Territory will not receive as much money as it is now receiving under the gross-earnings tax. I think that is a pretty good answer to the question which has just been asked.

Originally this railroad question was not in this matter at all. It is only here because it has been dragged in, as Putnam is said to have dragged his wolf out of the den, by its ears. It is not a party question to-day or a question which excites any particular interest in Washington Territory as to whether the Legislative Assembly shall sit in March or in December. If it is, then all my efforts to obtain information have been sad failures.

I agree that there is interest here. I agree that it is attempted here to raise the ghost of the railroad question upon this very simple matter, and somehow it seems as if this railroad question were to be dragged into everything which comes before Congress. People outside of the Senate—I will not say inside—seem to suppose that when a measure is pending here, if it can only be urged that a railroad company wants it, then it is to be defeated; and if it can be urged here that a railroad company does not desire it, then it is to pass.

Now, I want to say one word about this matter of railroads. I think I sympathize as much as anybody with efforts to restrain the improper management of railroads, but I do not think that that question comes into the consideration of this matter at all. As I said before, it was not a question which was before the Legislative Assembly which asked that the time for its meeting might be fixed on the first Monday of January, 1887. The bill referred to allowing taxation of railroad lands did not pass the House of Representatives here until the 10th of July, 1886. So that until the 10th day of July, 1886, no scheme for the repeal of the gross-earnings railroad tax in that Territory and taxing the lands of the Northern Pacific Railroad could have been in the mind of any one.

There is another reason why the memorial did not contemplate that. If it be true, as the Senator from South Carolina says, that the Legislative Assembly of 1885 violated the pledges made for it in not repealing the gross-earnings tax, then it must follow that it did not ask for the session of the Legislative Assembly to be advanced for the purpose of repealing that law. So when the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory memorialized Congress it had no idea, for it could not have foreseen the passage of a law by Congress on the 10th of July last, that the Assembly when it did convene would have the opportunity to impose a tax upon lands of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company instead of the gross-earnings tax.

I dwell upon this for the purpose of doing away with any idea which may prevail here that it is asked by Washington Territory that there should be a meeting of the Legislative Assembly in March.

Mr. President, I do not believe that there is any considerable number of the tax-payers of Washington Territory who desire the passage of a law which will convene its Legislative Assembly in March. We have here the letter of the governor, and I suppose that is entitled to some little consideration. The voice of the Delegate of the Territory should be listened to, and it should be listened to perhaps a little more when it is backed by a memorial of its Legislature than when it does not appear to have any backing. If there be anybody in Washington Territory who desires the meeting of this Legislature in March he has failed to communicate it to the committee, unless the views of the Delegate of the Territory are to be taken as a conclusive representation of the wishes of the people of the Territory.

When it became evident that this law could not be passed so as to convene the Legislative Assembly at the time that the Legislative Assembly asked that it might be convened, I took occasion to correspond with people whom I supposed to be familiar with public sentiment in the Territory of Washington, and naturally its governor. I want to read his letter. The Senator from South Carolina said he tried to carry water on both shoulders. To me he appears to have judicially and judiciously considered and honestly answered the question which I submitted to him. The letter is dated Olympia, January 4, 1887, and he says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have waited a few days since receiving yours of December 17, so as to confer with a few leading citizens in different parts of the Territory in regard to the matter referred to in your letter. I have consulted with both Democrats and Republicans.

And that has been the aim of the majority of this committee, to consult both Democrats and Republicans for the purpose of ascertaining what was the real sentiment of the people and tax-payers of that Territory. The governor goes on to say:

The weight of opinion seems to be opposed to a session of the Legislature the present winter. I have no personal choice in the matter, and see reasons both for and against the proposed session. The main reasons for a session are:

1. The desirability of obtaining an appropriation for maintaining the new penitentiary at Walla Walla.

2. The desirability of repealing or modifying the "gross-earnings act" in relation to taxation of railroads.

The reasons against the session are:

1. The uncertainty as to what course the Legislature would pursue on these and other subjects.

2. The fact that the winter will necessarily be far advanced before the session can be commenced, and the effect of this upon the business of the farmers who may be members of the Legislature.

Skipping now what he says about the Walla Walla matter, because that does not form any important part of this discussion:

On general principles it is no doubt better to have the Legislative Assembly convene on the first Monday in January after the election; but that time being already past in the present instance, it is very questionable whether the public service would be best promoted by a session this winter.

I am yours, very truly,

WATSON C. SQUIRE, Governor.

The majority of the committee felt that they had a right to rely upon that as a true representation of public sentiment in Washington Territory at this time.

In addition to that many letters have been addressed to the committee. I will not refer to all of them, but I will read a telegram or two. I read a telegram dated January 27, 1887:

OLYMPIA, Washington Territory.

In our opinion no pressing necessity exists for extra session of Legislature.

T. M. REED, Territorial Auditor
N. P. OWENS, Sec'y Washington Ter.
JNO. F. GOWER, Member Council.
T. M. REED, JR., Member House.

Senator PLATT, Washington.

I do not know these persons personally. The Senators from Oregon do. They are officials of the Territory, one of them an appointee of the President, and three of them members of the Legislature or connected with it. I received one from Ellensburgh. I shall not read that telegram, however; there are some allusions of a personal nature in it.

I leave the matter, then, so far as the telegrams and the letter of the governor is concerned, without reading further; but I will say that since this matter has been under discussion I have seen many of the leading citizens of Washington Territory. Some of them have come to see me upon this, and some upon other matters. Some of them have been Republicans, and some have been Democrats. I have taken occasion to talk with those who did not themselves introduce the subject, and who came to see me on other business, as well as those who came to see me with reference to this matter, being in Washington, and I aver here that no one with whom I have conversed has indicated that there is any considerable sentiment in Washington Territory in favor of a March session of the Legislative Assembly, but on the other hand have expressed the opinion that it would be exceedingly detrimental to the interests of the Territory. A letter received from a gentleman in the Territory protesting against the calling of the Legislature in March said that he understood that an effort was being made to get petitions and letters and opinions in favor of it. If that be true, it is, so far as the committee have any opportunity to judge, a failure. No petition has been presented to the committee; with one exception, no letter has been addressed to the committee; no individual from Washington Territory has represented to the committee that it was desirable to have a session of its Legislative Assembly in March, always excepting and excluding the "determined, energetic, and persistent" efforts of the Delegate from that Territory.

It would seem as if this ought to settle the matter; but I apprehend that the Legislative Assembly which memorialized Congress to provide that its next session should be held on the first Monday of January, 1887, had full power to do it itself. That point is not made in the majority report, and is not particularly insisted upon; but the minority of the committee, supposing it would be insisted upon, have so controverted it that I shall allude to it for a moment.

The session of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory which met last before the session which convened on the first Monday of December, 1885, met on the first Monday of October, 1883. The meeting of the Legislative Assembly in that Territory had been for a long period of years held on the first Monday of October, a period of two years elapsing between the meetings of the Assembly. The Legislative Assembly which met on the first Monday of October, 1883, provided by law that the next session of the Legislative Assembly should commence on the first Monday of December, 1885, a period of two years and two months from the date of the convening of the Assembly which adopted that legislation.

It is true that the statute of Congress says that the meeting shall be biennial. It is also true that it says the Legislative Assembly may fix the time of its meeting. In the face of that statute, that the meetings of the Legislative Assembly should be biennial, the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory assumed to exercise the power conveyed to it by the act of Congress to fix the time of its meeting and fixed it more than two years beyond the period of the meeting of that Assembly. So no Legislative Assembly in Washington Territory was held within two years from the first Monday of October, 1883, and this very Assembly which memorializes Congress met in session two years and two months after the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory held on the third Monday of October, 1883. If the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory had power to do that, then it had power to advance the time of holding the Legislative Assembly, so that it did not hold it within a year from the time when the Assembly making the change was convened.

The memorial to Congress is that the Legislative Assembly which meets next after the first Monday in December, 1885, shall convene on the first Monday of January, 1887. That is more than a year; it is fourteen months; and if the Senator from South Carolina or the majority of the committee say that is not a biennial session I reply that upon the same reasoning the session which was held at which this memorial was adopted was not a biennial but a triennial session. I apprehend the Legislative Assembly itself had full power to change the time of the meeting and to adopt the first Monday of January, 1887, as the time for the meeting of the then next session of the Legislative Assembly without petitioning Congress.

But it is said now that a new reason has arisen why the meeting of the Legislative Assembly should take place, not at the time asked for by the memorial, but now in the height of the farming season, in the month of March, so that the Assembly should have an opportunity to repeal what is known as the gross-earnings railroad tax of the Territory. I probably am not so well able to discuss the question of the advisability of the repeal of that act as other Senators. I accept what the Senator from South Carolina has read here to-day, and which has never been presented to the committee—the platforms of the two parties which pledged the Legislative Assembly to the repeal of the gross-earnings tax; but it will be observed that those platforms were adopted last fall, were adopted while this bill was pending, and that in neither of them is it suggested that there should be an earlier session of the Legislature called for the purpose of repealing that law.

I wish to say right here another thing. If there was such an anxiety on the part of the Territory, and I do not deny it, to repeal that law, the Territory has been negligent, and the people of the Territory have been negligent, and the Delegate from the Territory has been negligent in not bringing the matter to the attention of Congress. The laws of Washington Territory stand unless disapproved by Congress, and if this tax had been such an iniquitous proceeding as is now represented in the report of the minority of the committee is it not a trifle strange that there has not been found in all Washington Territory one individual to memorialize Congress to disapprove that act. It seems to me that the Territory can not play fast and loose with Congress in that manner. It seems to me that the Territory can not sit down three years under the operation of an act passed by the members of its own Assembly and then come all in haste and with "uncommon anxiety" ask that the session of its Legislative Assembly may be advanced to a period inconvenient for the people of the Territory in order that it may have an opportunity to repeal the law itself. The Territory has estopped itself to make such request.

I do not know what the effect of the repeal of that law will be. I do not know what legislation the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory may adopt when it repeals that law, as the members of both parties seem pledged to do. I wish to throw in here, by way of parenthesis, that I do not understand that any failure to repeal that law has been the result of the drawing of party lines in that Territory. If it has the committee has not been advised of it otherwise, as the lawyers say, than by the report of the mihority of the committee, and we therefore leave them to make such proofs as they are advised may be necessary upon that subject.

I said I did not know what the Legislative Assembly would do after repealing this act, but two annual payments have, I suppose, been made under it. Half of the other annual payment was to be made on the 15th of this month, so that practically three years' payments have been made under that act. They have been increasing payments. The views of the minority are entirely silent as to the amount of money which goes into the treasury under that act, but in two years more, whatever that amount may then be, it will be doubled by force of law. It is 2 per cent. of the gross earnings within the Territory, which the railroads pay as a tax during the first five years, and 3 per cent. after five years. So whatever the amount may now be paid into the treasury of the Territory, if the law stands, will be doubled after two more annual payments.

I should like to put on record here my belief that if the gross-earnings tax law were to stand for ten years the Territory would receive more money from its gross-earnings tax in the aggregate than it will receive by the adoption of the scheme of taxation proposed by the minority of the committee alone.

It is said figures will not lie, but they will exaggerate wonderfully. The minority of the committee has built up a table of figures here from which it concludes that under the scheme of taxation of the lands of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company adopted by it, and which it supposes the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory will adopt, there will be paid into the treasury $337,500 annually as taxes, and it asks the question why the Northern Pacific Railroad Company should be relieved from the payment of one-half of all the taxes of that Territory.

I concede that if the basis of the scheme of taxation which has been so ingeniously constructed by the minority of the committee were correct, the Northern Pacific Railroad would be called upon to pay one-half of all the taxes of that Territory. Whether it is just or not is a question on which I am not advised. I should think it very doubtful, however, whether any scheme of just taxation would require the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to pay an amount of taxes equal to that paid by all the other property in that Territory.

But the trouble about that is with the premises of the minority of the committee. This computation is based upon the lands withdrawn in granted limits and in indemnity limits, which are held at 9,000,000 acres in all, deducting an assumed amount of 25 per cent., which has been leased, sold, or contracted by the company, and therefore are not taxable to the company, but are taxable to individuals under the law, and are already taxed. So the minority of the committee figures out, taking all the withdrawn lands in place and in the indemnity limits and deducting from it those which it assumes the company has sold, contracted, or leased—and it has no knowledge on that subject—there are 9,000,000 acres of Northern Pacific Railroad lands remaining for taxation; and then it proceeds to say that a fair valuation of all those lands for taxation is two and a half dollars an acre.

I apprehend there is not a Senator who does not know that large quantities of those lands are practically valueless, and I apprehend, although I speak with no definite knowledge on the subject, that they would not be taxed at a valuation of $2.50 an acre to individuals if they should happen to be sold, contracted, or leased to individuals. But I let that pass.

The difficulty is there is no such quantity of land in that Territory belonging to the railroads subject to taxation, nor half of it, barely a quarter of it. On the 17th of April, 1886, the Secretary of the Interior transmitted to Congress a letter of the Land Commissioner, Mr. Sparks, stating the facts in relation to these lands.

I wish to say right here that the statute passed July 10, 1886, expressly exempts the unsurveyed lands of the railroad company from taxation in so many words. The withdrawn lands, as I understand it, are all the lands within the 20 and 40 mile limits which are coterminous to the railroad completed.

Mr. DOLPH. The odd sections.

Mr. PLATT. The odd sections. It is only the surveyed lands which can be taxed. Now, let us see. The Commissioner of the General Land Office was called upon to inform Congress of the amount of lands heretofore surveyed within the limits of said grant, and he said:

> The amount of lands surveyed within the 20 and 40 mile limits of the withdrawal for said road is established at about 21,732,542 acres, distributed as follows:
> * * * "Washington Territory, 7,370,818 acres."

That, mind you, embraces all the land, both the odd and even sections, Government and railroad lands, in both the 20 and 40 mile limits, so that the very first thing that must be done to determine the amount of surveyed railroad lands is to divide it by two.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the date of the Commissioners' report?

Mr. PLATT. There certainly has been nothing done since. It is dated the 14th of April, 1886 (Ex. Doc. 146). You divide it by two and you have the surveyed lands in place and in indemnity limits, 3,685,409 acres; but if they get their lands within the 20 miles they are entitled to nothing within the 40-mile limit; so, practically, you have got to divide it again in order to get the surveyed railroad lands belonging to the Northern Pacific Railroad which are subject to taxation in that Territory, and that reduces it to 1,842,704 acres.

Now we will apply the assumed rule of the majority of the committee as to the lands sold, and take out a quarter. What have we left? We have of land in that Territory belonging to the Northern Pacific Railroad, surveyed and subject to taxation, saying nothing about the selection, the segregation, and all that, 1,182,026 acres. What would the tax on that be? The value of those lands at $2.50 an acre would be $2,955,065. The tax would be $44,325.97. But my information is that the railroad company pays into the Treasury this very year practically a hundred thousand dollars.

What becomes of the scheme of the minority of the committee which it proposes to substitute for the repeal of this gross-earnings tax? When I saw these figures all built up here and insisted upon as a reason why the Senate should drop all the great public measures which it has before it and take up this matter, never asked for by the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory or by its people, as to whether there should be a session of its Legislature in March or in December, I was tempted to reply, in the language of Prince Henry after he had heard that famous story of the men in buckram:

> Mark now, how a plain tale shall put you down.

I repeat, the committee has been actuated by no motive in this matter except to ascertain the sentiment of the people of Washington Territory and determine whether they wanted a session of the Legislative Assembly to be held now, in the most inconvenient season of the year, having changed only two sessions previously the time of holding the session from October to December, as I suppose, because October was a farming season. The committee have desired only to be governed by what they believed to be the sentiment of the Territory.

If there has been any other motive I have not been aware of it, and I believe as the result of all my investigation, without prejudice in favor of or against railroads, desiring only to do what the people of the Territory want done, and what seems best, that there is no sentiment in Washington Territory to-day which demands or requires or will be satisfied with a meeting of its Legislative Assembly in the month of March.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. BUTLER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit to the Senator from South Carolina that this is rather an indirect way to discuss this question. It seems to me that we ought either to debate the bill itself, or that we ought to proceed with the other business. As I understood it, a day or two ago there was an arrangement made whereby a certain order of business was agreed upon in this Chamber, with a view to facilitating the necessary work of the session. Two hours have now been occupied in this discussion, not upon the bill itself, but upon a mere resolution saying that we ought to consider it. I think we have spent enough time on the resolution, so I will move to lay it on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. One moment, before the Senator makes that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his motion?

Mr. ALLISON. For a moment.

Mr. BUTLER. That seems to me to be about on a par with the conduct of the majority in regard to this matter from the beginning. The Senator is simply acting upon the course which seems to have been adopted by the majority of the Senate all the time in regard to this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. Now, one moment; I think I have the floor. The Senator says——

Mr. ALLISON. I did not yield the floor absolutely to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I yielded out of courtesy for a moment, not withdrawing my motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator stated, if he will allow me one moment, that this was an indirect method to get at this bill. It was the only method I could adopt. The majority would not permit me to get it in a direct way, and I had to adopt the only method which a minority of the Senate has to get at any question. This bill has been before the Senate for weeks and weeks, and I have been trying "in season and out of season" to get the Senate to consider it, either to pass it or to reject it, and I have been confronted with one objection and another, and now, after an argument made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], not upon the merits of the bill, but in favor of the gross-earnings act of Washington Territory, I am met by a proposition to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. PLATT. I have made no argument in favor of the gross-earnings act; I do not know enough about it.

Mr. BUTLER. The speech of the Senator will speak for itself.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I want to say one word to the Senator from South Carolina. I know of no minority or majority side with reference to this question. I know nothing of the merits of the bill except what has been stated here this morning. I am entirely willing, for myself, to consider the bill, but both sides of the Chamber have agreed that in order to facilitate the business of this session certain measures must take precedence.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. One moment. In that order we have been progressing, and if the pending appropriation bill or other bills that must pass are to pass before we adjourn, then we must proceed in the order agreed upon and not discuss such resolutions, which have no significance in any sense. If the Senator believes that a majority of the Senate want to take up his bill why does he not move to take it up?

Mr. BUTLER. I have moved it certainly half a dozen times.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; and a majority of the Senate have decided against the Senator. Now, merely for the purpose of indirectly taking this bill out of order, and in this indirect manner, he proposes a resolution, places it in order, and occupies two hours of the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. That is carrying out the agreement, I suppose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regular order.

NICARAGUA MARITIME CANAL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be laid before the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2636) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to lay aside the pending business informally and proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor bill. If there is no objection that will be done. The Chair hears none.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to introduce morning business. I present, first, a memorial of Fred Smyth Post, No. 10, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Hampshire, of Newport, N. H., in which they say that they—

Respectfully represent that we believe that a great wrong has been done to many thousands of needy and dependent Union ex-soldiers and their families by the veto of President Cleveland of the dependent pension bill (so called); do respectfully request each of you in your official capacity to use all your influence, by vote or otherwise, to pass the aforesaid pension bill over the President's veto. For we believe that those who fought for the preservation of the Union are as deserving as Mexican confederates.

I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present also the memorial of Storrer Post, No 1, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Hampshire, Portsmouth, N. H., in which they resolve that—

Whereas the dependent parents and disabled veterans' pension bill was designed and would have proved a measure for the relief of a large number of our worthy and needy comrades:

Be it resolved, That we, the members of Storrer Post, No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Hampshire, do hereby protest against——

Mr. HARRIS. What is the proceeding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is presenting a petition.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire desired to present a memorial. A brief statement of the object of it is all that is legitimate under the rule. I raise the question of order.

Mr. BLAIR. The memorial continues:

do hereby protest against the veto of said bill in this, that it cuts off from relief those who, through no fault of their own, are unable to obtain justice from those in authority at the Pension Office; and who, through lack of influential friends, can not invoke special legislation in their behalf.

Resolved, That it is the duty of every patriotic citizen of this Republic to use his best endeavors to see that no veteran soldier be left to the tender mercies of almshouse keepers, and no soldier be consigned to a pauper's grave. That while we believe it to be the duty of all to unite to honor the noble dead, all should also unite to see that the worthy living be supplied with the comforts as well as the necessaries of life.

I move that the memorial lie on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. That is carrying out the agreement of which so much has been said here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The memorial will lie on the table.

Mr. PLATT presented resolutions adopted by Mansfield Post, No. 53, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Connecticut, Middletown, Conn., and Palmer Post, No. 33, Grand Army of the Republic, of Winsted, Conn., favoring the passage of the so-called dependent relatives' pension bill over the President's veto; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GIBSON presented a petition of citizens of the parishes of Lafayette and Vermillion, in the State of Louisiana, praying for the improvement of Vermillion River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ADDITIONAL REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] has the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent pending that to make a report from a committee. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10802) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments; and I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5477) to restore to John W. Mears a fine improperly imposed on him, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 74) to grant an increase of pension to Frederick Beno, reported it with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 112) relating to early records of the Capitol, city of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I will state that this joint resolution is in reference to preserving certain ancient records relating to the early history and establishment of the Capital, the construction of the city, and the organization of the District, which it is important should be in possession of the Government. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. MAHONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. JULIA DE QUINDRE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2451) for the relief of Mrs. Julia De Quindre; which was, in line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twelve."

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. BLAIR, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. PALMER were appointed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD ACCOUNTS.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire to give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the consideration of the maritime canal bill, which I see is the unfinished business of the Senate, I shall ask for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 170) authorizing an investigation of the books, accounts, and methods of Pacific railroads which have received aid from the United States. I understand that is in accordance with certain agreements which have been spoken about today, and I further understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is not present to speak for himself, will be ready to go on with the joint resolution at that time. I therefore desire to give notice to the Senate that I shall ask with great persistency the consideration of the joint resolution immediately after the conclusion of the maritime canal bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had

A bill (S. 2519) granting an increase of pension to Richard B. Rians.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the river and harbor bill be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10419) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HALE to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, which was, in section 3, line 4, after the words "land or," to strike out the word "material" and insert the word "earth;" so as to read:

The Secretary of War may cause proceedings to be instituted, in the name of the United States, in any court having jurisdiction of such proceedings, for the acquirement by condemnation of any land or earth needed to enable him to prosecute such works for the improvements of rivers and harbors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. HALE. There will be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The amendment, I understand, is to strike out the word "material."

Mr. MCMILLAN. And insert the word "earth."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I will explain that in a moment. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. No; the Senator from Vermont has the floor in his own right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was merely at this moment, not to speak of the merit of the amendment, about to raise the point of order that the whole of the provision is clear legislation and nothing else. I do not wish to cut off my friend from Maine on the merits, but I want to get that matter determined.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to await the decision of the Chair on the point of order made by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is inclined to decide in favor of the point of order raised by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to suggest that that is true of all the first part of the section with the provision as it came from the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not make any difference to the point of order. It is on the amendment proposed here.

Mr. DOLPH. The point is made simply on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it is on the amendment of the committee that I make the point.

Mr. HALE. As I understand it, the point of order raised by the Senator from Vermont he wishes to apply to the entire section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HALE. I agree fully with the Senator from Vermont that that is new legislation, and subject to the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels obliged to decide that the point is well taken. It seems to the Chair clearly legislation.

Mr. DOLPH. I suggest that if that apply to the section it ought to apply to the whole substitute, to the whole bill.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Vermont does not make the point on the whole bill.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to state the situation of the amendment. The Committee on Commerce have reported a substitute to the House bill. It is one amendment, and is in effect to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the bill reported by the committee. Included in that amendment is this section 3, which includes part of section 3 as it came from the House of Representatives with certain amendments made by the Senate Committee on Commerce. I suggest whether if the point of order made by the Senator from Vermont is good, it does not go to the whole amendment reported from the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order on section 3 of the amendment reported from the committee, and upon nothing else, and that is clearly out of order.

Mr. HALE. The Chair has so decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that is clearly to be separated from the rest of the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. What becomes of section 3 in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That we will determine when we consider the bill as it passed the House. We are considering the amendment now.

Mr. DOLPH. I make the point of order on the next section.

Mr. HALE. I rise to offer an amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I make the point of order as to section 4.

Mr. HALE. That has not yet been reached, I believe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, it is all up.

Mr. HALE. Are amendments now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read in the usual way for amendment, and is now pending as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. HALE. So I understood. On page 88, in section 2, after the word "inclusive," in line 6, I move to insert "Owl's Head Harbor, Maine." It is for a survey simply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine to the amendment reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is a mere provision for a survey, to which there is no objection.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon makes a point of order against section 4.

Mr. DOLPH. I withdraw it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Section 4 is in order because it merely directs the expenditure of the money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon withdraws the point of order.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state, however, that so does section 3 direct the expenditure of money.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. CALL. On the ninety-first page, after the ninetieth line, at the end of section 2, I move to insert:

For survey of the Number Four or Northwest Channel at Cedar Keys, Fla.
For survey of bar and river at Andote, Fla.
For the survey of the channel in Pensacola Bay to Milton, Fla., and estimate for a deep-water channel.
For the survey and estimate for the Northwest Channel at Key West, Fla.
For survey of bay and outer bar at Saint Augustine, Fla.
For the survey of the Alafia River, Florida.
Charlotte Harbor and Caloosahatchie River, Florida.
For a survey and estimate of an inland channel through Mosquito, Logan, and Indian Rivers to Jupiter Inlet, Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida present the different items as one amendment?

Mr. CALL. I present them as one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the question will be put in that way.

Mr. CALL. I think this amendment will not be objected to by the Committee on Commerce. These surveys are all recommended as at important places in the different reports of the engineers. Charlotte Harbor is now the terminus of a railway. It is the farthest point south upon the coast of Florida in proximity to the West Indies, and is growing to be a place of very considerable importance. There have been several reports from the Engineer Department in regard to it, but no thorough survey. The Caloosahatchie, opening from Charlotte Harbor, is being connected now by a canal projected and completed by private enterprise with the headwaters of the Saint John River.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Florida will permit me to make an inquiry of him in regard to the amendments he proposes, I understand they are amendments which embrace merely provisions for surveys in particular localities?

Mr. CALL. That is all.

Mr. MCMILLAN. No special appropriation is asked for in either case?

Mr. CALL. None. The Senator is right.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Florida deems the matters of importance to the public interest I suppose there can be no valid objection to submitting them to the judgment of the Secretary of War, and that is the effect of his amendment, although we supposed we had embraced most of the surveys necessary.

Mr. CALL. That is all that is asked for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to insert, after line 90 of section 2, at the end of the amendment agreed to on motion of the Senator from Florida:

For the survey of the Mobile River from Mount Vernon arsenal to the channel in the bay of Mobile, to ascertain the depth and width of the channel and what obstructions, if any, exist that would prevent a ship drawing 25 feet of water from reaching Mount Vernon arsenal from Mobile.

That comes in the same classification; and I desire to announce simply this: We have passed a bill through the Senate giving an opportunity to have cruisers built in the waters of the Gulf. I think the most eligible site in the waters connected with the Gulf is at Mount Vernon arsenal. I wish to have a survey made of the river, so that the Secretary of the Navy will know precisely what that river is.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On page 55, in line 366, after the word "improvement," I move to strike out "sixty-two thousand five hundred" and to insert "one hundred and fifty thousand;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Oakland, Cal.: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

I ask to have read a memorial from the Oakland Board of Trade, which states this matter more clearly than I can do.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OAKLAND BOARD OF TRADE, OAKLAND, CAL., January 6, 1887.

HONORED SIR: The subject of appropriations for Oakland Harbor is now before you. Will you permit the undersigned officers and directors of the Oakland Board of Trade to call your attention, and the attention of your committee, to a few facts in the interest of commerce.

First. What has the work already accomplished done? It has reduced freight charges from $5 per ton to $1 per ton on steamers, and 40 and 50 cents a ton on schooners between Oakland and San Francisco. It has enabled the lumber dealer of Northern California to ship lumber to all points in the State and Territories. Their schooners now unload direct into the cars on this side of the bay, avoiding an extra loading and unloading. It has enabled vessels with partial loads of coal to come to the wharf. The consumption of coal by Oakland amounts to 8,000 tons per month. Complete the improvement of the harbor so that the largest draught vessels can come in, it will save to the consumers $50,000 a year.

In considering the matter of Oakland Harbor permit us to suggest the propriety of ever keeping before the mind the fact that Oakland is the terminus of overland railways; hence all the commerce between the United States and the ports of the Pacific, Sandwich Islands, Japan, China, Australia, passes through this gateway, hence has to be unloaded on this side and transferred on to the other side (and vice versa), where the steamers are obliged to anchor, owing to the fact of not sufficient depth of water to enable steamers to come alongside of the wharf and railroad track. Complete the improvement of Oakland Harbor and you will reduce freight charges, extra handling, &c., on all the commerce of this country with the countries above mentioned. The growth of the United States traffic with these mentioned countries can best be understood by the statement that two large, powerful 3,000-ton steamers are plying twice a month between this country and the Sandwich Islands; that two 5,000-ton steamers are plying to Japan and China semi-monthly; one 5,000-ton steamer running every thirty days to and from New Zealand and Australia.

In addition to the steamers mentioned there is a large number of sailing vessels in the trade. Three-fourths of the freight carried is freight destined to and from the Eastern States, a large quantity being agricultural implements, machinery, &c., manufactured in the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Ohio, and New York. In addition to the saving referred to—the producers of this State—the wheat shipments alone paying $240,000 last year for towage, towing ships up to Port Costa, Vallejo, Martinez, so as to bring ship and car together. If Oakland Harbor had sufficient depth of water this charge for towage would be avoided and the producer benefited. Many other facts could be adduced. We trust that the foregoing will suffice, and that not only in the interest of this locality and State, but in the interest of the commerce of the United States, which is growing rapidly, you will render your assistance to secure the early completion of the work so well begun.

In behalf of the Board of Trade, we remain, very respectfully,

V. D. MOODY, President.
M. J. KELLER.
GEO. L. FISH.
A. C. HENRY,
JAMES CAHILL.
SOL. KAHN.

E. W. PLAYTER,
Chairman of Committee on Harbor Improvements.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This increase I think is justified on the score of economy. It will enable every farmer to receive his lumber at much less than the present rate, and it is in the interest of the people of my State that this amount of $150,000 should be appropriated. I understand the engineer says $250,000 can be economically expended during the year.

I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This appropriation was permitted to remain just as it came from the other House. Of course the merit of the increase was called to the attention of the Senate Committee on Commerce; but, in connection with that, applications were made for other increases for improvements in California, and the committee were called upon to determine what amounts could be increased there most properly, as well as to determine the amount of the increase.

It will be observed that the committee increased the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor and bay at Humboldt, Cal. That was done upon very urgent and special grounds urged upon the committee. These appropriations being increased for California to the extent the committee has increased them we thought the harbor at Oakland, having one-fourth of the amount of the estimate made by the Chief of Engineers, could safely be permitted to remain as it was. There is $63,000 still remaining from the last appropriation which is applicable to this improvement and will be added to the appropriation here made of $62,500. This is 25 per cent. of the estimate made by the Chief of Engineers. Of course it was not because we did not believe the harbor a proper subject of improvement, but we thought the appropriations had better be increased for the other places.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANCE. I move after line 556, of section 1, to add:

And the said Pedee River, as far up as its junction with the Uwharie River, in North Carolina, is hereby declared a navigable stream and public highway; and at least 40 feet thereof, including the main current, shall be kept open and unobstructed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suppose that would be subject to the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. VANCE. I did not hear the Senator. What is the point of order?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is new legislation, and it ought not to go into the bill now.

Mr. VANCE. I suppose it can hardly be considered new legislation. The Pedee River is extending up virtually from South Carolina, and the nearer it gets up to the timber region of North Carolina the more important it is to keep the stream free from obstructions, so as to secure the passage of lumber down the river in rafts.

I hope the Senator will not insist on any point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is legislation, and therefore not in order.

Mr. BUTLER. On page 48, section 1, after line 182, I offer the following amendment:

For the improvement of the bar at Winyaw Bay, Georgetown, S. C., $30,000.

In connection with that I ask to have read a letter from Captain Bixby, of the Engineer Corps of the Army, and I trust the chairman of the committee will not object to the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER'S OFFICE,
Wilmington, N. C., January 19, 1887.

SIR: In compliance with the request in your letter of 10th instant to Messrs. H. Kaminski & Co., of Georgetown, S. C. (forwarded by them to me), I make herewith the following statements as to the improvement of Winyaw Bay bar:

This work was reported to Congress as worthy of an expenditure of at least $300,000. (See page 1169 annual report Chief of Engineers, 1885.) Since Congress voted no money for any river and harbor works from the date of this report up to the 30th of June, 1886, this work was not under improvement at all during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1886, and consequently the Chief of Engineers was not given any opportunity to say anything to Congress on the subject of this improvement in his annual report of 1886.

You will see by this that the last time the Engineer Department had occasion to say anything on this matter they expressed themselves to the effect that the work was one of great importance and worthy of a large appropriation. I have every reason to suppose that the department is of the same opinion to-day and awaits the renewed action of Congress upon its last recommendations.

I inclose you copies of my information circulars on this work, in which you will find my recommendations.

My own individual opinion is, that two-thirds of the State of South Carolina, and considerable of North Carolina, will be benefited by this improvement; and that the settlement and development of the Santee, Pedee, and Waccemaw River basins will be hastened and assisted more rapidly and effectively by the opening of Winyaw Bay bar than by anything else that can be done with an equal sum of money spent in any other way.

Were these river basins the private property of an individual or corporation of moderate wealth, the latter would, in my opinion, be consulting its own best interests should it spend $300,000 per year upon this work until the bar were opened to 16 feet depth at low water.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. H. BIXBY,
Captain of Engineers, U. S. Army.

Hon. G. W. DARGAN,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I raise the point of order that there is no estimate for the improvement embraced in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a new item of appropriation, and is out of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Chair hold that it is subject to the point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a new item of appropriation.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I ask to have a survey of some small rivers. In section 2, on page 91, after line 90, I move to insert:

Coosawhatchie River, South Carolina.
Broad River, South Carolina.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have no objection to urge to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EUSTIS. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 71 of section 2, on page 90:

Vermillion River, from Abbeville to its mouth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. According to the line, that comes after a river in Massachusetts. There is no Vermillion River in Massachusetts.

Mr. MCMILLAN. What State is it in?

Mr. GIBSON. Louisiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Louisiana" will be added.

Mr. GIBSON. I presented a petition from citizens of that part of the country this morning in favor of this survey.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I ask the chairman of the committee to consent to an amendment, after line 650 of section 1 to insert:

And for the improvement of Holmes Creek, Florida.

I will state that Holmes Creek is a tributary of Lagrange Bayou, that it has been estimated for and reported on in a former survey, and that a small portion of this appropriation, as the report states, may very wisely be expended in removing some slight obstructions to navigation. It is a very deep creek, and a tributary of Lagrange Bayou, at which there is a regular expenditure being made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the estimate for that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, after line 607, it is proposed to insert:

And for the improvement of Holmes Creek, Florida.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is no estimate for that, and I make the point of order.

Mr. CALL. There is an estimate and a survey for it. This amendment does not propose to increase the appropriation at all. There is no doubt about there being an estimate. The facts are well known. There is a very deep channel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to see the estimate.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Vermont ought to know about the estimates, and not call for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is clearly not within the rule. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CALL. On page 49, section 1, lines 195 and 196, where the item is—

Improving harbor at Tampa Bay, Florida: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

I move to increase that amount to $20,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This should not be increased, I think. The committee have given all the amount they thought ought to be given for this improvement with the others in Florida, and we have given them fair consideration and allowed them a good amount for improvements in that State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. On page 48, section 1, line 194, I move to increase the appropriation for "Improving harbor at Pensacola, Fla.: Continuing improvement," from $7,500 to $20,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The estimate there is but $20,000, and this is more than 25 per cent. of the estimate, which has been the rule acted upon by the committee generally. This item has not been decreased at all by the Senate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I move, on page 48, section 1, line 192, to increase the appropriation for "Improving harbor at Cedar Keys, Fla.: Continuing improvement," from $3,500 to $10,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The estimate there is but $13,000, and there is more than 25 per cent. of that sum given. The same rule is applicable here. We applied the same rule wherever we could.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. On page 48, section 1, line 186, in the item—

Improving Cumberland Sound, Georgia and Florida: Continuing improvement, $75,000—

I move to increase that amount to $100,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There were two improvements in Florida, the one referred to by the Senator from Florida, Cumberland Sound, and the other the improvement of the Saint John's River, for which large sums were asked. The Saint John's River appropriation was increased and the appropriation for Cumberland Sound was decreased to this amount of $75,000, and the same applied upon the Saint John's River as being the improvement most urgently demanded at the present time; and it was done, as we understood, with the approbation of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FRYE. At his request.

Mr. CALL. Certainly, as between the two appropriations, my judgment is that the Saint John's River ought to have the larger amount; but I do not desire the appropriation for Cumberland Sound to be decreased.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The committee were of the same opinion on the merits of the proposition comparatively.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I shall abandon any further effort, as I see it is useless to resist the committee.

Mr. BROWN. In line 188 of section 1 I move to strike out "$65,000" and insert "$150,000;" so as to make the item read:

Improving harbor at Savannah, Ga.: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

I wish to make a few remarks on that subject and call the attention of the Senate to a few facts that if they were considered would fully justify an increase of this appropriation.

In another forum, as I understand, the one-quarter rule was applied to the estimate for Savannah Harbor, Georgia, which is $180,000.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the estimate?

Mr. BROWN. The committee usually allow 25 per cent. of the estimates. That is not a fair rule as applied to the port of Savannah, for this reason: Some six or seven years ago the Government ordered a survey of the port of Savannah and of the river between Savannah and the bar, which is some 20 miles in length, with a view to get a channel 22 feet deep. The estimate was made by the engineers. My recollection is that it was about $1,130,000. Appropriations have been made from year to year, generally $200,000 a year. The work has been pressed forward to a point where it is near completion, and it is being very much damaged for want of money to complete the job. This year it ought to be completed by an appropriation of $180,000, which is the balance of the original estimate. At the last session of Congress we got $150,000. The Senate voted us $200,000, but the 25 per cent. rule, as you remember, was applied, which cut it down to $150,000.

Now, $180,000 will finish up the work in accordance with the original plan of the engineers, some $200,000 having been appropriated annually for that purpose. The committee now apply the 25 per cent. rule to the last installment of the $1,130,000. Upon the same principle that they appropriated $65,000, which the Senate Committee on Commerce have given us, increasing the House appropriation to that extent, taking that from the $180,000, I suppose another year they will give us only one-fourth of the remainder, for that will be the amount estimated for, to finish the improvement.

What we really ought to have, and what ought to be appropriated, would be the other $180,000, which would finish the improvement in accordance with the original plan of the engineers and give us 22 feet of water. But if there are only $65,000 appropriated a great portion of that will be lost by the delay of another year. It is great waste as well as great injustice to us. If we had the $180,000—and I am only asking now for $150,000—we should get within this year a channel 22 feet deep from the city of Savannah to the bar, and the bar is 26 feet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator how much was appropriated for this object in the first part of August last?

Mr. BROWN. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much of that is left yet?

Mr. BROWN. I do not know how much; but I know they have been very actively at work and expending the money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the work being done by contract?

Mr. BROWN. The work is partly done by contract and partly by the engineer employing hands to do the work at certain places.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The amount available there June 30, 1887, will be $152,943.

Mr. BROWN. There is no question that the amount asked for now would be expended within the year, and it could be profitably expended within the year. The engineer's estimate is that it ought to be expended to protect the work already done.

Now, a word about the importance of the commerce of Savannah. I will make a comparison between that and the appropriations made for some of the other cities. You have appropriated $300,000 to the harbor at Charleston. I do not complain of that; I voted for it very cheerfully, and was glad to see the spirit which was displayed on the other side of the Chamber in giving Charleston that amount. The proposition is to give to Norfolk and to the approaches to Norfolk $125,000, and to almost every Southern port a larger amount than Savannah; and yet the annual amount of commerce that goes out at the port of Savannah is, in round numbers, $50,000,000 a year, and is double what it is at any other one of the Southern cities between Baltimore and New Orleans.

You give the others $300,000, $125,000, and other large sums. I make no complaint of that; I vote for it cheerfully; but why cut down Savannah to $65,000 and leave this balance of the $1,130,000 estimate not completed, leaving the work in its unfinished condition, filling up with sand all the time and taking 50 per cent. of the amount when you make another appropriation to clean out the obstruction that has got in the way by not finishing the work? Why not give us the usual appropriation and let the work be completed on the plan originally reported by the engineers? It seems to me it is obviously proper. It seems to me it is just as compared with any of the other cities along the coast—perfectly just. As I have stated, we have a much larger commerce than any of them. Why should we be put off with half or one-third the estimate, and especially when the work has been carried as far as it has been and is as near completion as it is? Why take two or three years to finish up the little balance of the improvement?

Not only the commerce of the State of Georgia that goes out by water goes out of Savanah, but a great portion of the commerce of Alabama and of the commerce of South Carolina, on account of the arms of the Central Railroad extending into those States, goes out at Savannah, and a very large quantity of the commerce of the State of Kentucky and the State of Tennessee and the State of Illinois and the State of Indiana, and indeed the West generally, goes out at Savannah. They send a great deal out for New York by that route, it being really a shorter route than any other, making allowance for the difference between land and water, counting 3 miles of water for 1 of land. There is a very considerable commerce going out from the Western States through Savannah to New York and to foreign ports.

Why is it that the West will not aid us in a contest of this sort? Here is a terminal point of one of the great Western connections of railroads. Why cripple it? Why give it one-fourth or one-third or one-half of the amount you give the other Southern cities that do not have that connection? I do not think it is fair. I trust the Senate will not hesitate to give us at least $150,000 instead of the $65,000 provided for in the committee's bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Georgia must be well aware from his experience in the past that the Committee on Commerce has always regarded the improvement of the harbor of Savannah with great favor and has gone as far as it thought judicious in making appropriations for that improvement. In this instance, we think we have carried out the same policy.

The House bill appropriated for this improvement $45,000. The Senate committee increased it to $65,000, an increase of $20,000. The estimate of the engineers as to the amount which can be profitably expended is $180,000, and $65,000 is much more than 25 per cent. of the estimate made by the Chief of Engineers. The balance on hand on the 1st of November was $148,000 in round numbers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The estimate of the expenditure of these appropriations runs to June 30, 1888.

Mr. McMILLAN. We are making provision for that. This appropriation is for that year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see in the bill any appropriation for a given fiscal year.

Mr. McMILLAN. This bill is not made for fiscal years. No fiscal year applies to a river and harbor bill. The amount unexpended on hand applicable to this improvement is $148,000 in round numbers, to which the House of Representatives added $45,000, and we increase that appropriation $20,000, making it $65,000.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he regards these reported amounts on hand as being actually correct; whether he has any information that enables him to determine that the amounts stated in the report that the committee seems to have made are actually amounts which have not been expended or are not under contract?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that these amounts may be charged with contracts which are to be carried out. The funds reported remaining on hand are certainly in the Treasury and not expended, although they may be chargeable with obligations which are to be performed, but the work has not been performed and will of course go forward in connection with that for which an appropriation for this year is applicable.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the date of the report as to the amount on hand? Is that the amount on the 30th of June last, or the 1st of December, or what date?

Mr. McMILLAN. We have a communication from the Secretary of War, and also from the Chief of Engineers through the Secretary of War, which brings the date to the 28th of October.

Mr. BROWN. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce in this case states that the House gave us one-fourth of the $180,000, which was the balance of the original estimate to finish this improvement, and that the Senate committee has increased that $20,000. That is true.

I ask again, when shall we ever get through with this job if we divide the balance that is left every year and get one-fourth? We are to get at this time $65,000, which is something over one-fourth, but there are $115,000 left, which will be the estimate next year to finish the job. Then I suppose you would give us a fourth of it again, and the next year a fourth of the remainder. When do we get through by that process?

When the engineers have made an estimate to Congress for an improvement costing more than a million dollars, and Congress has made an appropriation from year to year of $200,000 to carry it out, and we get within $180,000, and need every dollar of it to finish the job, why then apply the one-quarter rule to it, and take several years to complete it, leaving the work all the time that has already been done to be damaged and liable to be filled up? That is not the rule that is applied in other cases to other commercial ports, and I can not see the justice of applying it in this case.

Mr. McMILLAN. The amount of $180,000 will complete this improvement.

Mr. BROWN. Why not let us have it completed this year?

Mr. McMILLAN. For the reason that this bill does not contain appropriations sufficient to complete the improvements embraced in it. There was no exigency in this case, no special features of it which seemed to the committee to require an appropriation of any greater amount in order to make it a matter of economy, or save that which has been appropriated heretofore, and would carry on the work of improvement as fast, if not faster, than the other improvements going forward.

Mr. BROWN. It is a notorious fact that a portion of the channel cut out is filling up for the want of the removal of the earth in the way of the completion of the balance of it. If the balance of the job were done so that the tide going up and down could pass through it, it would be scoured out, but as it is now it is filling up all the time, and every year will continue to fill up until the rest of the earth in the way is cut out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We find from the report quoted, on page 73 of the report of the Committee on Commerce, that the engineer says:

Total amount appropriated for this work to date	$1,032,000
Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project	180,000
Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1888	180,000

So that, according to the engineer, if he had all the money now, it would take him until the 1st of July, 1888, to expend it—a year from the 1st of next July—and $180,000 is all that is necessary to complete the whole work.

On the first of the year they had in the Treasury applicable to this business $148,296.65. This bill gives $65,000, I believe it is now, which, added to the $150,000, in round numbers would be $215,000 if this bill passes with the $65,000 to complete a work that the engineer says he only wants $180,000 for, and yet the Senator says——

Mr. McMILLAN. The $180,000 is exclusive of the amount on hand.

Mr. BROWN. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me finish my sentence. I seem to have struck adversaries on every side. When we get to arithmetic I suppose I may not be able to compute figures, and therefore am to be corrected by schoolmasters to the right and the left.

They say they have $148,296 on hand on the 1st of November. This engineer's report brings the thing down to the 1st of July, four months preceding this statement of the amount they had on hand. On the 1st of July, 1886, therefore, $180,000 was all that was wanted, and requiring two years from that time, the 1st of July, 1886, to the 1st of July, 1888, to expend it profitably, and that is all that is wanted to complete it. Of that money on the 1st of November they had $148,000. The committee's amendment gives them $65,000 more, making $215,000 in round numbers, and then the Senator from Georgia wishes to carry that up still more.

So it would seem that we are piling up money here for this object which, when it is done, as stated two years from the 1st of July—a good way in advance ordinarily in making appropriations for carrying on a government when we care nothing about the people's money, as we do not seem to do—in two years there is to be an advance, an excess of appropriation, when the engineer himself says that it will take to the 1st of July, 1888, to complete the work any way.

Mr. BROWN. Is not the Senator mistaken about $180,000 being the estimate on July 1, 1886?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have read it.

Mr. BROWN. We have made an appropriation of $150,000 since July, 1886. We appropriated that last session, in August, and the estimate is, as I now understand, $180,000 still to finish the job. That is the condition of it unless I am very much mistaken.

Mr. FRYE. That is right.

Mr. BROWN. So that the Senator from Vermont has unintentionally misstated it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see if I have. This print of the report of the Chief of Engineers which is condensed and excerpted and put into the report of the committee is the regular report made I suppose at the beginning of this session.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Here is the report of the Chief of Engineers himself. This report is made to the Secretary of War, and by the President sent in accompanying the report of the Secretary of War. This is the report of the Secretary of War for the year 1886 and the report of the Chief of Engineers. It is dated the 28th of October, 1886, and it opens by saying:

> I have the honor to present for your information the following report upon the duties and operations of the Engineer Department for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1886.

In that report, of which I have the original here, and the committee has quoted it correctly, speaking as of the 1st day of July, 1886, the Chief of Engineers states the case just as the committee has quoted it from his report. The amount named for the completion of the existing project is $180,000. He has taken out of that the appropriation of $150,000 on the 5th of August, 1886, or taken out of the previous sum, so as to leave this balance as either of the 5th of August or of the 1st of July as they state it in this regular report, as $180,000, being all that is required to do the whole thing, and say that the amount which can be expended profitably in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, is $180,000.

So that was all that was estimated. Now, having got $150,000 still in hand, we are asked by the committee within just about six months after the passage of the last appropriation to appropriate $65,000, to which I do not object, and we are asked by the Senator from Georgia to increase that enormously, so that there shall be $215,000 to be expended apparently, if you take these papers. They may be wrong, but there they stand, with the statement of the engineers that $180,000 is all they want altogether.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Vermont is certainly mistaken about this matter. I remember very well the estimates at the last session of Congress. The estimate was $330,000 to finish the projected improvement. Congress at the last session appropriated $150,000, leaving $180,000 of balance still to be appropriated. The estimate to which the Senator refers was made up as the amount necessary to finish the improvement after the $150,000 appropriated at the last session had been deducted. That is the fact of the case. I know something about the appropriations which have been made, and several members of the Committee on Commerce say I am right about that. I know I am.

Mr. MILLER. As a member of the Committee on Commerce I wish to say that there is no possible question about the correctness of the statement the Senator from Georgia is making. It is simply a question whether under the present condition of affairs we are prepared to appropriate $180,000 to complete the work or appropriate a portion of it, as the committee has recommended, and that is all there is of it. It is a very important work. The committee heard a committee of citizens of that town seeking it, and made this increase. There can be no question that the $180,000 is needed for the completion of the work. The only question is whether we shall grant the full sum or what the committee has recommended.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator from New York for his statement. I knew I was right about it.

The other statement with reference to the balance now on hand, I beg the Senate to bear in mind, was made as of the 1st of November last and not as of the 19th of February. A large part of that $148,000 has been expended since that time. It is not now a surplus.

Mr. MILLER. It is under contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to say one word. I appreciate all that the Senator from Georgia has said in behalf of this amendment; and if it were the policy of the Government to make appropriations to finish works under such circumstances as he has detailed in reference to Savannah Harbor, I should feel like supporting the amendment. But I have a case in my own State which is very similar, and accordingly when I went before the committee insisting that it was economy on the part of the Government in a financial point of view as well as a great accommodation to complete two locks in the improvement of that river, and that the amount necessary to complete the two locks should be appropriated at once, the committee gave me to understand that that was not the policy of the committee and of Congress at this session, but that the most they could do, in view of the large appropriation that would necessarily be made, even if they did that, was to give me a proportion of what the estimates were that were furnished by the Engineer Department of the Government. I submitted to that, and the bill is reported with that kind of provision in it, making a proportionate appropriation of the amount called for, and a very small proportion at that, for the improvement that I refer to, the Illinois River, the completion of two locks.

It would be of very great service to the people of that section of the country if those two locks were completed this year, and I think they ought to be completed, and that Congress ought to make a sufficient appropriation to finish them up during the coming summer; but that has not seemed to be the policy of the committee or of the Senate so far, and as it is not, I feel that I can not support the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, although I recognize the justice of the appropriation as a proposition by itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, being voted for by less than a majority of a quorum, no further count being demanded.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In line 1026 of section 1, after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

Continuing improvement at Atchison, Saint Joseph, Fort Leavenworth Reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, in Kansas and Missouri, and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment in terms was a part of the appropriation bill of last session; and no part of the money then appropriated by Congress specifying the continuation of work at these points has been expended, and no work there has been done or proposed by the Missouri River Commission. In that state of case a resolution was introduced and passed by this body calling on the Secretary of War for information as to why, as Congress had designated the manner in which this money should be expended, it was not done.

The reply to that resolution is certainly somewhat remarkable. This commission undertook to sit in judgment upon the act of Congress. When Congress had declared what it should do, the commission gives the reasons why it ignored this act of Congress and repealed it and reversed it. True, the same may be the result of the adoption of this amendment if that course is recognized. It may be of no avail to all those hundreds of miles of river which I am seeking to protect. We are told, I think, by some Senators or some of the committee that this matter was disposed of summarily by the commission, and it may not be advisable to repeat the attempt at the exercise of the legislative power by the Congress of the United States. This was acknowledged to be just, because it met the approbation of the committee, or a part of it at least, during the last session, and of Congress itself because it was placed in the law in these very terms.

Now, it seems that when it was understood that this commission had resolved to repeal this act of Congress and be a law unto themselves, remonstrance was made at the War Department from the States of Kansas and Nebraska as to this distribution of the money.

The Secretary of War, replying to the resolution calling for information, presents a letter of Major Suter, who is the Army engineer, and the president, I think, of the Missouri River Commission, in which he says:

In their last annual report the commission submitted an estimate of $1,000,000 for continuing the improvement of the river from Kansas City down, this estimate including the continuation of work then in progress at Kansas City and Saint Joseph, two of the places specially mentioned in the above-quoted act. As regards the other places mentioned but little is actually known.

That certainly was a humiliating concession on the part of the Missouri River Commission, and from the chairman of the commission, in view of the fact that he himself had had charge of the work upon the Missouri River, in view of the fact that report after report for the last half dozen years or more by the Army engineers in their printed reports had detailed what work had been done and the necessity for the work; and yet Captain Suter turns it off by saying:

Reports and plans and estimates for work of improvement have been made for all of them in former years—

I speak of this to show the necessity for this work and the neglect which prevails since this commission has had charge—and at all except Arrow Rock work on a small scale has been executed. From the best information available the commission infer that but little, if any, trace of such work is now to be found.

They infer from the best information available that there is no survey as to some 400 miles of this river between Kansas City and Sioux City, bounding the States of Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri, an important part of this river, if importance can be attached to any part of it, and then from such information as they can pick up they infer that this river commission, with apparently nothing to do during the last year, picked up this information, and then they drew inferences:

The cause of such failure is to be sought in the utterly insufficient appropriations which were made from year to year, and which never allowed work to be done of an extent and character which would insure permanence or efficiency. From these old reports and maps the commission infer that to do the necessary work at the various points enumerated in the act, exclusive of Saint Joseph and Kansas City, would require from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000, besides a large addition to the present plant, amounting to probably $300,000 more.

Now mark, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this:

To scatter the current appropriation in allotments to all the points enumerated in the bill would result in no good whatever, as the amounts would be everywhere inadequate to even begin the work needed. Under these circumstances the commission deem that a literal compliance with the requirements of the act is impossible, and they have therefore decided to recommend the continuance of work at Kansas City and Saint Joseph, two of the places enumerated, and on the general improvement of the river in the vicinty of Kansas City. At these points a good deal of work was done last year which needs extension and completion. With the funds now available this can be done, and reasonable progress be made toward completion of the local projects. As regards the other points mentioned, the commission propose to make, at once, such surveys as are needed, and to submit plans and estimates in time for the action of Congress at its next session.

I should like to know from the committee whether that has been done, as was stated in this report sent in by the Secretary of War:

As regards the other points mentioned the commission propose to make, at once, such surveys as are needed, and to submit plans and estimates in time for the action of Congress at its next session.

I desire to ask whether that has been done. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to the suggestion of Major Suter in reply to the resolution adopted by the Senate. He says in that letter:

As regards the other points mentioned the commission propose to make, at once, such surveys as are needed, and to submit plans and estimates in time for the action of Congress at its next session.

I suppose the committee have heard nothing of that. That is Major Suter, and that is the mode in which he answers his duty as an officer in the execution of the law. Before that gets up, however, the Engineer Office here in Washington reply:

In the opinion of this office the views of the commission are based upon sound principles, and its recommendations are believed to be for the best interests of the improvement. It would evidently be necessary that some plans for the improvements at the localities designated in the act be decided upon before undertaking work, and such plans can only be properly designed upon the results to be derived from careful surveys.

Now—

On the other hand—

Says General Parke, in charge of the office here in Washington—

the terms of the act are specific, and it is questionable whether, upon the statements made by Senators PLUMB and VAN WYCK, any deviation from its plain requirements would be permissible.

One would suppose not, if these engineer officers are law-abiding citizens, if they have reached that high point where they can carry out an act of Congress. Suter says he disobeyed this law, and he gives the reason why; but General Parke, being a little nearer, within the reach of sound information as to obeying laws when they are made, says:

On the other hand, the terms of the act are specific, and it is questionable whether, upon the statements made by Senators PLUMB and VAN WYCK, any deviation from its plain requirements would be permissible.

Yet it seems it was made.

The subject is respectfully submitted for decision of higher authority.

That was in October. Then Suter writes a longer letter on this matter, in which he undertakes to infer and argue why he should be permitted to violate the law. He argues by inference in several ways. I do not propose to read the whole of his letter, but in this connection I would somewhat like to know if this commission is appointed to preserve and protect the navigation of the Missouri River why is it necessary to expend the appropriation of last year, $375,000, and the appriation of this year, $300,000, all at or near two points, Kansas City and Saint Joseph? I would ask my friend from Missouri as to the amount of traffic by water from Kansas City to Saint Louis. Are there ninety steamboats running between Kansas City and Saint Louis, and what is the river trade?

Mr. VEST. There are two steamers running from Kansas City to Saint Louis regularly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. As between Saint Joseph and Kansas City, what is running there?

Mr. VEST. I can not answer very accurately. I think there is one boat plying in that trade. Then there are barges.

Mr. VAN WYCK. From Kansas City to Saint Joseph they proposed to apply $375,000 last year, because they kept it all for that. I say to my friend, the chairman of this committee, the whole $375,000 of last year, which Congress apportioned in the manner I have designated, they spent on that portion of the river, and now you propose $300,000 more to be spent there; and in that connection I would state a reason which Major Suter gives besides the one I have already stated:

It is proper to add here that the allotment for Saint Joseph is absolutely necessary to secure the work of last year, which could not, for want of funds, be extended sufficiently to secure its safety. At Kansas City, in addition to the great local interests requiring protection, changes in the river channel, which occurred last spring, must be met, or Kansas City bridge will be the head of navigation on the Missouri. This work must not only be done, but be done promptly, as the season for possible work is nearly ended.

That was last fall.

In addition to the great local interests—

So he mentions the same terms in regard to Saint Joseph—"the great local interests;" but there is not a word said about the great local interests from Saint Joseph for several hundred miles up that river to Sioux City—not a word about them. Major Suter mentions these terms, showing that they entered into his reasons for the determination of this matter that there are local interests at Kansas City and at Saint Louis to be protected, and if this is not done the river will stop at the Kansas City bridge. It will stop there in any event. It is proposed to do nothing to protect this river. That is, it will be so in case Major Suter's idea is carried out, because year after year this river is neglected, and it will be worth but little for that whole country for navigation if there is only a line of two boats running from Kansas City to Saint Louis.

I supposed the object of this was to save the navigation of the whole river. Will the chairman of the committee tell me why you leave several hundred miles of river from Kansas City to the mouth and then jump over several hundred miles of river and commence at Sioux City, and then from Sioux City up $50,000 is appropriated.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Nebraska desires a reply to his inquiry I will state that he is mistaken in the character of the appropriation. The appropriation is for—

Improving Missouri River from the mouth to Sioux City: Continuing improvement, $300,000; of which sum $5,000 may be used between the southern limits of Saint Joseph and the head of Lake Contrary, if in the judgment of the commission it be necessary.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Read on; $50,000 is appropriated from Sioux City up.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The next item is for—

Improving Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton: Continuing improvement, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $50,000.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely; but my friend knows there is no provision made for the river between Saint Joseph and Sioux City for expending a dollar.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Nebraska understands the appropriation here it covers the whole reach of the river from the mouth.

Mr. VAN WYCK. And your commission sit down and say there is not enough for the whole river, and they will confine it to Saint Joseph and Kansas City; and my friend knows it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is a matter over which the committee have no control. If the commission act in that way there is a way of remedying it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. How?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Either by a law directing them how to proceed, if you think their judgment is not right or by abolishing the commission.

Mr. VAN WYCK. We had a law last session directing them to proceed, and did they obey it?

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senate can not enforce a law of Congress I do not see how the Committee on Commerce can.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then we ask to try once more, and we prefer that the Committee on Commerce should not justify law-breakers.

Mr. MCMILLAN. When the Committee on Commerce does that, or does anything in that direction, the Senator will be acting properly in making that charge.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am now, with all due deference to the Senator, saying that Congress at the last session provided for this river from its mouth to Sioux City, and the commission met and the commission said "no," and here it is. I have tried to read it to my friend. "No; there is not enough; Congress doled out to us too little; we have not enough. We will confine this appropriation to Kansas City and Saint Joseph." My friend knows that fact, does he not? Does not my friend know that the commission has provided in the face of this act of Congress how this money should be expended?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suppose they acted in accordance with the law, in accordance with the act of Congress.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir. Did not the law provide that these points should have some benefit from this appropriation, I ask my friend? Did not the law distinctly name these points?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think that was left to the judgment of the commission.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Oh, no; in the appropriation these points were provided for. The appropriation was for continuing the work at these places; and I say now to the Senator—because he has not answered my question—after the law was passed and the commission had taken action on this matter they said there was not enough to provide for all the places, and therefore they thought it best to confine the expenditure to Saint Joseph and Kansas City. That left 700 miles of this river unprovided for. Does the committee justify that? Read Suter's report.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I can read the language of the last appropriation, so that the Senator can have the benefit of it:

Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City: Continuing improvement, including necessary work at Omaha, Atchison, Saint Joseph, Fort Leavenworth Reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, Plattsmouth, Brownsville, and Nebraska City, $375,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with plans and estimates to be furnished by the Missouri River Commission.

That was the language of the last appropriation.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, that is the language of the act; but I say to my friend that this commission does not put it on the ground that it is not necessary. This commission does not put it on the ground that they do not consider it necessary. They concede that it is necessary, but they say there is not money enough to go around. And now we come here and say that that river had no benefit from that appropriation of $375,000 last year. Now, I ask the Senator if he thinks it just to hundreds of miles of that river, the most important part of it, to let them go by this session without making some provision for the benefit of the commerce of that river.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the appropriation applies to the entire river from the mouth to Sioux City.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My friend says he thinks it applies from the mouth of the river to Sioux City. So it does in words; but the commission who have the disposition of the money say, "No, we will not expend it from the mouth to Sioux City." They sit in judgment upon the act of Congress, and say they will not expend the money as Congress directs. They expend it from the mouth of the river to Saint Joseph, and stop there.

Then I ask my friend what is to be done with the other part? Your bill says, your committee think, Congress think, that the money should be used from the mouth to Sioux City. That is what I understood the chairman to say. That is the bill. This commission sit in judgment on Congress, and they say, "We will take this money and spend it from the mouth to Saint Joseph only, and stop there, not reaching several hundred miles of river above that." Is that what you mean? The Senator shakes his head. It is not what he means. It is not what Congress means.

The Secretary of War, I suppose, will have some regard for the law. Let us have it as we had it before, and abolish the commission; but when you know the Missouri River Commission passes its verdict on your judgment you allow the whole money to be distributed between the mouth of the river and Sioux City, and yet the commission say, "We will stop at Saint Joseph and let the rest of the river take care of itself."

Mr. MCMILLAN. Does the Senator propose to abolish the Missouri River Commission?

Mr. VAN WYCK. No, sir; let the committee do that. I am trying to get some relief. You made a solemn law to give it to us last year, and your officials defeated it, and they did not do it. They neglected three or four hundred miles of river which are being ruined along Iowa, along Kansas, along Nebraska. They have neglected it, and you sit by and see them do it. There is the reason the Missouri River Commission gave for doing this thing. They say Kansas City is of great local importance. So it is; but no greater than other towns on the river. It is the low bridge at Kansas City that makes trouble, and so of the low bridge at Saint Joseph; and so they stop there and say Congress has been niggardly. They wanted a million dollars from Kansas City to the mouth. Congress gave $375,000 for the whole river, but the commission are supreme. They will not expend the money except where they please. They will do what they choose with the $375,000, and here are three or four hundred miles of river neglected and no power to improve it.

I call this matter seriously to the attention of the Committee on Commerce, and I supposed the chairman of the committee at least would feel that Congress had been improperly treated by this commission. I trust he will suggest a mode of relief. I have called his attention to it. He admits the necessity of this appropriation for the whole river. He admits that Congress supposed they had provided for it. They intended it should be taken care of; and yet this commission defies your authority and the act of Congress, and you propose to do the same thing another year. I ask the committee if they think creatures that Congress creates in the way of commissions can undertake to set at naught the acts of Congress.

I should be perfectly willing in this connection, in order to relieve Major Suter and relieve this commission, if the committee would assert or this body say that they will appropriate $100,000 for the work which I have mentioned. If it is necessary that the local interests of Saint Joseph and Kansas City shall be taken care of and this river shall be so worked on as to injure commerce and destroy navigation for three or four hundred miles, say so. You are asked to protect commerce on your rivers because to protect commerce is for the benefit of the country. Is there any sense or justice in leaving 300 or 400 miles of country subject to the ravages of the river? I suggest to my friend if he thinks it necessary that Major Suter should overrule the action of Congress? Then at least protect three States and the commerce of many Territories, protect them by placing in the bill $100,000 for the purposes which I have enumerated, so that there may be some attention to the river above Saint Joseph.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course the Senator from Nebraska denounces the Missouri River Commission for what it has done, and for what it has not done, too. When men make frank statements as to the facts of the case they are entitled to fair consideration. We ought either to carry out the recommendations of the Missouri River Commission and give them the necessary appropriations for that purpose or we ought to abolish the commission. We ought not to establish a commission to take charge of a great river and then disregard their recommendations entirely and give them a totally inadequate amount with which to operate, and then indulge in all this sort of rhetoric in abuse of them.

After the Missouri River Commission was established and was called upon to say what it thought should be done with that river, it made a recommendation, the substance of which without reading it was this: That the only practicable way in which to treat that river, the longest upon this continent, and one of the most important, was to improve it by reaches, 10 miles to the reach, commencing at the mouth and going up, and that $10,000,000 would be necessary for that purpose. For the last fifty years we have been systematically and persistently throwing away money upon that river and upon all our Western rivers by what are local and sporadic improvements, $10,000 to this spot, $20,000 to that, and in each recurring spring-time the improvements which were commenced the year before were washed out and carried to the Gulf.

I take my share of the responsibility for some of these appropriations. The House of Representatives would send to the Senate appropriations put in by the respective members of Congress for their districts, and then would clamor that the appropriations should be kept in the bill at the hands of their Senators here. I do not intend to defend this sort of appropriations, but I speak what every Senator here knows to be the truth.

When Major Suter, at the head of this commission, was called upon to make recommendations in regard to this river, in my judgment a more sensible and wise system was never recommended and could not be found than the system he did recommend, to improve the river by reaches, and to abandon the theory of attempting to improve it in spots and localities. After the recommendation was made Congress disregarded it. I have year after year implored and begged at the hands of the Senate to increase the appropriations for the Missouri River.

It is now said that there are only two boats on the river from Kansas City to the mouth. While the railroad system has to a large extent been responsible for this fact, the additional truth remains that Congress has refused to make such appropriations for the river as permitted any systematic attempt for improvement to be carried on.

As to the complaint made by the Senator from Nebraska, what are the facts? The House of Representatives in the last river and harbor bill sent us an appropriation for the Missouri River, from its mouth to Sioux City, of $500,000. After the bill was reported by the Commerce Committee of the Senate to this body, under a procrustean rule against which I remonstrated and protested in vain, that appropriation was cut down to $375,000. But the Senate did not stop there. After cutting off $125,000 upon this appropriation an amendment was then placed upon it pointing out certain localities on the river where the improvements should be continued. It turns out now in the report of Major Suter, which has been read by the Senator from Nebraska, that improvements were called for at points where there were no surveys or estimates at all. It had been four years since there was any improvement at Arrow Rock, on the Missouri. Improvements of great importance were being made at Kansas City and Saint Joseph. I am not here to claim any special favoritism to Kansas City or to Saint Joseph because they are in the State that I represent or because I live at Kansas City, but I say now that with the commerce that Kansas City has and that Saint Joseph has, the one with a population of 50,000 and the other with a population of 140,000, they are entitled to the kindly consideration of Congress in legislating for the whole country and for all the commerce of the country.

When the inadequate appropriation of $375,000 was made, and when the Missouri River Commission saw these points specified from Saint Charles and up to Saint Joseph, what were they to do? As honest men with public money put into their hands as trustees, they were either to take that $375,000 and throw it away, as much so as if they cast it upon the bosom of the river itself, or they were, if they could possibly do so under any sort of fair construction of the provision put in the bill in the shape of an amendment, to preserve the improvements already made and attempt to do the best they could with the inadequate money that was given. The work at Saint Joseph had already progressed to such a condition that unless continued all that was done would be absolutely lost. The Missouri River, the most difficult stream upon this continent to manage, in one of its freaks had changed its current at Kansas City until, as Major Suter said, unless that work was continued the Kansas City bridge at that point would become the head of navigation upon the Missouri.

Major Suter submitted this amendment to the Department for their construction, stating at the same time what was the absolute fact, that if he undertook to scatter the $375,000 along the whole river it would do no good at any point and would be absolutely throwing away the entire amount. On the other hand, he said by utilizing the $375,000 at that point in preserving the works already done, and at the same time making surveys at the points which were named in the amendment, he would be able to make such use of the money as would be in the interests of navigation upon the whole river. The War Department adopted that construction.

How could any of this money have been used at those points where there were no surveys, where no plans or specifications had been made? I can see very well how the commissioners could not have done anything else in common fairness and honesty than what they did do. If it is thought proper let the commission be abolished; but if it is continued in existence let us give it enough money to carry out its own plans, and cease this eternal criticism and harping against the commission because they are not able with the small amounts that we give them to do an enormous work which under the system they have heretofore recommended can alone be carried out.

Recurring to what I said a few minutes ago, I believe that these local improvements, if we abandon the general system recommended by the commission, will result simply in throwing away every dollar that is applied for that purpose. If this hundred thousand dollars be given to be expended at eight or ten points upon that river the improvements will hardly make an impression at the different localities, and the money might as well be cast at once into the Gulf of Mexico.

The only way in which the Missouri River can be utilized, the only way in which it can be made a competing factor in transportation with the great railroad system of the country, is by the expenditure of $10,000,000, as recommended by Major Suter. These infinitesimal appropriations of one or two hundred thousand dollars from year to year, through the immense length of that great river, absolutely result in no benefit at all. All that the engineers can do with the amount which we give them is to attempt under the terms of the law to preserve the works at important points already commenced, hoping that Congress may hereafter in its judgment and liberality give enough to carry out the improvement systematically and earnestly.

I know that in whatever I say in regard to continuing the improvements at Saint Joseph and Kansas City—as I live at Kansas City—I may be subjected to the criticism of desiring to improve localities in my own State. Three of the other points specifically named in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska are in Missouri, and the citizens in those towns have written to me urging that money should be appropriated for those specific local improvements. I have answered them frankly, as I state to the Senate to-day, that in my judgment there is only one system under which anything can be done with that river; it is a systematic improvement by reaches; and until Congress adopts or permits the engineer commission to adopt that system we are wasting time and throwing away money in these sporadic and local endeavors to improve a river the most difficult upon this continent to manage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. PLUMB. Let it be read.

The SECRETARY. At page 82, after line 1026, insert:

Continuing improvement at Atchison, Saint Joseph, Fort Leavenworth Reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, in Kansas and Missouri, and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. PLATT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator from Nebraska would state to the Senate how he expects a different result to be reached in case this amendment should be adopted from that which followed the appropriations made last year. I remember when the bill was pending at the last session, on my motion the names of Atchison and Fort Leavenworth were inserted as points at which a part of the appropriation was to be expended. Disregarding what appeared to be the express purpose and intent and declaration of Congress, the entire amount, instead of being distributed among the different points named, was applied exclusively to the works at Saint Joseph and Kansas City, neglecting the other points that were equally entitled to consideration under the bill, and that Congress had named.

Now, the Senator from Nebraska simply repeats the language that was employed in the last appropriation bill. While I am ready to vote for the amendment, I am still unable to see how he fortifies or reenforces his position.

Upon this point the Senator from Missouri attempts to leave the impression on the mind of the Senate that the money was thus expended last year because, as he said, there had been no surveys made for the other points; that the Secretary of War in the exercise of his discretion did not feel justified in apportioning any part of the money to places where there had been no surveys made. There have been surveys made at every single one of the points named, and at the place where I live, Atchison, there have been $120,000 expended under the direction of the Missouri River Commission, for the purpose of preventing the depredations of the river on the bank by which the great bridge erected at that point and used by ten or a dozen railroads was liable to be cut off at its eastern terminus so that the river might flow between the terminus of the bridge and the eastern bluffs of the Missouri.

It is the grossest misapprehension to declare that these are places at which no surveys have been made, and that the Secretary of War was justified in absorbing the entire amount that was appropriated by Congress in the bill, and that Congress intended should be applied pro rata among the points named, to Saint Joseph and Kansas City.

I have no desire to speak in derogation of Kansas City or Saint Joseph; neither have I any disparaging remarks to make because they are in the State of Missouri; but it is a little singular that the State of Missouri, which is fortunate to have a member of the committee in this body and a very influential member of the committee in the other House, and a member of the commission also, succeeded in impressing their views so forcibly on the Secretary of War, made such a powerful presentation of their arguments that the entire $375,000 which was appropriated was expended at two points in the State of Missouri.

There is no defense for it, and the statement of the Secretary of War in response to our resolution was a paltry subterfuge. It was a pretext, and nothing but that.

Kansas City is an important point; Saint Joseph is an important point. But there have been surveys made at every single place that is named in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, and that was inserted in the bill last year on his motion, and on mine, and on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

I have no doubt that with the same persuasive power that belongs to members of committees which have appropriations to make, notwithstanding the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, the same process will be resorted to again, and these other points, not perhaps as populous, it may be not as commercially important, will be neglected to the ravages of the stream, because the State in which they are located is not so fortunate as to have a representative who can make his arguments as forcible and convincing as those from the State that received the benefit of the appropriation.

Mr. President, all that Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska want in this matter is fair play. They happen to be so unfortunate as to border on the Missouri River, a stream that, in my judgment, stands in more actual need of appropriation than any other river on the planet. It is a stream not useful for navigation. It has often been said to be a little too thick for a beverage, and a little too thin for cultivation; but it requires improvement simply because, in consequence of the movable quality of the stream itself and the friability of its shores, continual depredations are made by which great structures that span the stream are liable to be left inland.

The talk about navigation between Kansas City and Saint Louis is the broadest comedy. Now and then a little stern-wheel steamer painfully and toilsomely picks its way through the uncertain chutes of that stream, loaded with merchandise for some of the grocery-keepers along the shores; but the talk about the navigation of the Missouri River is enough to make men and gods laugh. There is no navigation there.

The Senator from Missouri knows that there is no navigation there worthy of the name; that both sides of that stream from Saint Louis away above the States of Nebraska and Iowa are provided with ample railroad facilities that carry all the inward and outward commerce, the surplus production of the country, and all that the people there require for their own consumption. Above where the railroads terminate, from Sioux City up to Fort Benton, where the channel of the stream is not so tortuous, there is a little attempt at navigation. A fleet of steamers remain there the year round unable to get below in the larger portion of the stream on account of the obstructions in its channel. That is the only part of the stream where navigation exists, and that is where the least part of the appropriation is made—only $50,000 from Sioux City to Fort Benton; and the appropriation from the mouth of the Missouri River up to the point that is named, Sioux City, I believe, is not made and not intended to be made for navigation.

Therefore, all this talk about the predominant commerce, the great controlling commercial interest of Kansas City and Saint Joseph is not an argument to be made on this floor. It has nothing whatever to do with the commerce of the river. The money is expended to prevent the river in its depredations upon the shores from rendering the structures that span it unavailable for the purposes of commerce. So I say that the talk about there having been no surveys and about the comparative commercial importance of these towns falls to the ground. They are all entitled to consideration. There is a bridge, I believe, at every single point named in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. I know there is one at Fort Leavenworth. There is one at Atchison. There is one at Saint Joseph. How many are there in Nebraska?

Mr. MANDERSON. There is one at Omaha.

Mr. INGALLS. And one at Brownsville?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, and at Plattsmouth.

Mr. INGALLS. These appropriations are made distinctly for that purpose, and unless they are distributed in accordance with the intention of Congress and the amendment offered, those vast structures, expensive and costly, and just as essential to commerce as the structures that cross the river at Saint Joseph and Kansas City, are to be rendered valueless.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are they railroad bridges?

Mr. INGALLS. They are railroad bridges, every one of them, constructed by authority of Congress by a special bill authorizing the construction.

All that we ask, as I said before, is fair play, and not because one State happens to be more potential, either regarding its politics which happens to be coincident with the politics of those who have the disbursing of the money, or because it has greater weight and influence on the committee to overshadow the other points in these three great States that are exactly as much entitled to consideration as those of any other State in the Missouri valley.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 199) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

CATHARINE F. ELLSWORTH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. 3107) granting a pension to Catharine F. Ellsworth, returned from the House of Representatives at the request of the Senate.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask unanimous consent, and then I shall move that the bill be indefinitely postponed, because the pension has been allowed at the Pension Office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection, and it is reconsidered.

Mr. SAWYER. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill be indefinitely postponed, as a pension has been allowed to the beneficiary of the bill at the Pension Office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, submitted the following report, which was read:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 199) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same amended to read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, in sections 1 and 2, and insert the following:

"That for a period of six months after the passage of this act United States trade-dollars, if not defaced, mutilated, or stamped, shall be received at the office of the Treasurer, or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in exchange for a like amount, dollar for dollar, of standard silver dollars, or of subsidiary coins of the United States.

"SEC. 2. That the trade-dollars received by, paid to, or deposited with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer or national depositary of the United States shall not be paid out or in any other manner issued, but, at the expense of the United States, shall be transmitted to the coinage mints and recoined into standard silver dollars or subsidiary coin, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the trade-dollars recoined under this act shall not be counted as part of the silver bullion required to be purchased and coined into standard dollars as required by the act of February 28, 1878."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

JNO. P. JONES,
JAS. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

S. W. T. LANHAM,
JNO. P. HEMPHILL,
C. N. FELTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Nevada explain what changes have been made in the bill as passed by the Senate?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The only material changes made in the bill as passed by the Senate are that the subtreasurers of the United States shall issue in lieu of trade-dollars subsidiary coin as well as standard silver dollars, and that the trade-dollars retired and recoined shall not be considered as part of the purchase of bullion required by the silver-coinage act of February 28, 1878; that is, that they shall not be considered as a part of the amount required to be coined under that act, which is from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000 worth of silver each month. Those are the only material changes made in the bill as passed by the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I was unable to subscribe to the conference report. It seems to me that the quantity of silver dollars coined has already reached as great an amount as ought to be authorized by Congress. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, there were coined 29,838,000 standard silver dollars. This would unquestionably add to the amount to be coined within the next six months after the passage of this act not less than $10,000,000. There is no provision by which they can not be returned from China if they have not been stamped or mutilated, and therefore the amount that may be brought here for redemption may be much larger than $10,000,000.

I have no sort of question if the policy had been pursued of stopping the coinage of silver dollars two years ago we should have brought silver up to about the par of gold to-day.

I desire to read a few sentences of what the Secretary of the Treasury says on this subject. All will admit the ability of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that he has been in a position to know something about the subject upon which he treats. He says, in his last annual report:

To go on as we are is the least creditable of all the courses open to our choice. The Treasury silver purchase is defended by nobody, approved by nobody.

* * * * * * *

It is a policy which, if now prolonged by our hopes, may easily be so protracted thereafter by astute delays and dilatory proceedings and by the time taken for negotiation itself as to force an Asiatic silver basis for America.

* * * * * * *

To stop the purchase and coinage of silver is for this our local trouble also the first and best step. To increase our stock is to increase the difficulties of the Treasury, illegitimate and abnormal difficulties, which ought never to be imposed upon the Treasury of any democratic government, and which ought not to be increased.

* * * * * * *

If to manufacture and store or distribute coin of a depreciated metal could stop its depreciation, or relieve the depression of trade, or improve the money circulation, or call out into use for the employment of labor more of loanable capital, or arrest the drop in prices, then the Treasury trouble and the tax burden would have some offset.

Mr. President, it is obvious that this measure is a very important step toward a single silver standard for our country. We have already coined over 250,000,000 of the standard silver dollars. Nearly two hundred million of those are now in the Treasury Department, and there are not less than $80,000,000 that are unrepresented by silver certificates.

It is therefore obvious that there is no necessity for an increase of the number of silver dollars in the country. There is no demand for them. Then why ought we to increase the amount, as we do by this bill, to the number of all the trade-dollars now outstanding?

Let me say that the expense of the transportation of the silver dollars alone is not less than $750,000 each quarter, amounting to $3,000,000 per annum for sending and receiving the silver dollars. That is the statement by the book.

I was willing myself to strain a point in order to get rid of the nuisance of the silver trade-dollars. I never thought there was any legal or moral obligation on our part to redeem them. They were made solely for exportation, and when made they were worth 3 or 4 per cent. more than a gold dollar. When they depreciated in value the owners of silver bullion found that they could make a profit by getting their bullion coined into trade-dollars and giving them whatever circulation they could obtain. They did obtain some circulation on the part of those who had large numbers of men in their employment, and they were enabled to pay them off at a cost of perhaps not more than 90 cents on the dollar.

The whole arrangement for the obtaining of these trade-dollars and putting them into circulation was a fraud upon the Government; and when the proposition is presented to me that I shall not only submit to the redemption of the trade-dollars but say that they shall not be counted as a part of the bullion that we are to purchase monthly, I can not agree to it.

If we redeem ten million trade-dollars the loss on the part of the Government will amount to over $2,000,000. That is a considerable sum to pay for this act of liberality of ours. The trade-dollars as bullion would not be worth to-day quite 80 cents to the dollar, and therefore the loss will amount to about $2,000,000.

But, Mr. President, I have no expectation of defeating the passage of this bill. However, I desire to place on record my objections to it. It is a preposterous claim on the part of those who say that we are guilty of repudiation if we do not redeem the trade-dollars. No government in the world that has any coins issued ever redeems the coin unless for the purpose of recoinage where it has been worn; and there is some loss, of course, to the Government in such cases as that.

I shall ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, as I was one of the conferees and agreed to this report, I have been inquired of by a number of Senators around me to state exactly what its provisions are. It enacts almost precisely the first and second sections of the Senate bill, reading thus:

That for a period of six months after the passage of this act, United States trade-dollars, if not defaced, mutilated, or stamped, shall be received at the office of the Treasurer, or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in exchange for a like amount, dollar for dollar, of standard silver dollars.

Adding:

Or of subsidiary coins of the United States.

The provision of the House bill was:

That for a period of six months after the passage hereof, United States trade-dollars, if not defaced, mutilated, or stamped, shall be received at their face value in payment of all dues to the United States, and shall not be again paid out or in any other manner issued.

The House conferees have agreed to the Senate provision that the trade-dollars defaced, mutilated, or stamped shall be received only at the offices of the Treasurer or some assistant treasurer of the United States in exchange for standard dollars, instead of being received in payment of all dues to the United States, perhaps at little local post-offices everywhere where the cost of transportation to the mints would be expensive, and our officials might not be able to determine whether they were mutilated, defaced, or stamped as provided for in this act. The House agreed with the Senate conferees that it is better that the exchange should be made by responsible officers who hold our standard dollars and can decide properly all questions, instead of requiring every local official from a postmaster up or down to receive them and determine these questions.

Then the House and Senate propositions as to recoinage are in almost the same words. Section 3 of the bill as passed by the House and section 2 of the bill as passed by the Senate each provides "that the trade-dollars received by the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States shall not be paid out or in any other manner issued, but, at the expense of the United States, shall be transmitted to the coinage mints, and shall be recoined into standard silver dollars or subsidiary coin, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury."

As the two Houses had agreed almost in words to that, we adopted the House provision instead of that of the Senate, because the words "subsidiary coin" were used in the House provision and not in ours. The principal difference between the House and the Senate was in the proviso, which the conferees on the part of the Senate have agreed to:

Provided, That the trade-dollars received under this act shall not be counted as part of the bullion required to be purchased and coined into standard dollars, as required by the act of February 28, 1878.

The Senate bill required them to be counted as part of the monthly purchases of silver bullion; the House provision did not require them to be counted, and a majority of the Senate conferees agreed with the House conferees that they shall not be so counted. That is the whole bill as now agreed to in this conference report.

Mr. GEORGE. How many trade-dollars are there to be redeemed?

Mr. BECK. Several statements were made before us. They generally assumed that the probabilities were that from $7,500,000 to $10,000,000 would be presented for exchange. The Senator from Vermont places it at $10,000,000, and says that more may be brought here from abroad for recoinage; but as it is conceded that these trade-dollars have gone all over China and been stamped, branded, and marked as their own coin and adopted by them, and therefore are not to be redeemed or exchanged here, the presumption is that but a small amount now there will reach here within six months, even if there are some there not branded by the Chinese.

It is said now by the Senator from Vermont, as it has been stated time and again, that they are not coins of the United States. I wish to state that they were issued by the authority of the United States. The counterfeiting of them was made a crime just like the counterfeiting of any other coin. They were made a legal tender in sums of $5; they were paid out to people for wages year after year, and if of late they have accumulated in the hands of a few people, and perhaps they have, that is no reason why coin issued by the United States, and the counterfeiting of which is made a felony by the United States, and which was made legal tender to the amount of $5, should be dishonored because the bullion of which it is composed has fallen in value as compared with gold in the markets of England for the time being.

Mr. HARRIS. The legal-tender quality was repealed, though, before they were issued, was it not?

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon, a large amount, some $15,000,000, was issued before the legal-tender quality was taken away, and I think the Secretary of the Treasury had the discretion to issue or not afterward. He issued a very large amount after that quality was taken away, and many of those subsequently issued were placed in the hands of the people, and were paid to laborers for their wages, and all were issued by the authority of the United States; and under the discretion given to the Secretary to issue them, they passed, as I said, into the hands of all sorts of people, and were paid out as wages year after year until they became dishonored.

This question remains. It is said speculators have bought them up. Perhaps they have; I do not know or care. If they bought them at a discount they have held them for years, until I suppose that whatever profit was made by taking them has been lost long ago.

There are 420 grains of silver in each of them; there are 412½ grains in the standard silver dollar for which they are to be taken in exchange. There is far more surplus silver in the trade-dollar than will pay for the cost of making the change into standard silver dollars out of them; therefore there can be no loss in that regard. We give a stamped coin issued by us with 7½ fewer grains in it than the coin we receive in exchange, and get clear of the dishonor of having a repudiated coin of our issue outstanding.

Then it all comes back to the question, as the Senator from Vermont substantially admits, that the men who seek to strike down the standard silver dollar and deny that it is lawful coin, equal to our gold coin for all purposes, are opposed to this bill. Of course they are; the Senator from Vermont is one of them. He reads the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is also opposed to the coinage of the standard silver dollar. It may be that the Secretary is opposed to this or any other measure looking to the restoration of our silver coinage, but I am not going to discuss that question now, and do not quite see why his report is paraded before us at this time.

We have been told ever since 1878, year after year, by our officials and others, that if the coinage of the silver dollar went on any longer gold would take wings and fly away, and that we should be reduced to a degraded single silver standard; and yet, in the face of all these gloomy predictions, official and unofficial, by men who desire to so limit our coinage and increase the burden of all our debts, public and private, as to make gold worth twice as much as it was before they destroyed the silver dollar, and thus enable the men who hold gold to buy the property of the people for one-half what they could buy it for if the standard dollar is allowed to do its share of the work in the world's exchanges—in the face of all the pretensions of these false prophets, gold has not only not flown from the country, but we have more than doubled the amount of gold that we had in 1878, and thirty millions of gold came from foreign countries into this country in the last six months, as shown by the official reports of the Treasurer.

Mr. President, all these pretenses have been falsified by the facts, and to-day, in the face of the great warlike preparations of Europe, the increase of their armies by Germany and France, the war footing on which Belgium and other nations are placing themselves by the increase of armament elsewhere, the people of Europe are moving in the direction of bimetalism and are protesting against the single gold standard in spite of the prophecies of evil that have been so lavishly uttered in this country and in all others by the owners of gold.

Let me state one fact which I think proves our need for all the silver we can coin and issue certificates on. The national banks have, per force if you please, yet in fact they have, contracted their much-needed circulation $110,000,000 since the 1st day of November, 1883. In the face of the fact that over 30,000 additional miles of railroad have been built in this country, coupled with a large increase of our population and the increase of business from 1883 to the present time, which demands an increase of circulation of $110,000,000 instead of the contraction to that amount, that contraction has been in fact made by the withdrawal of the national-bank circulation. These facts are all shown by the official reports of the Treasury Department.

Now we are told that we must "stop the coinage of silver," when we have not half the amount that France and other countries have and yet are maintaining it at par with gold—stop the coinage of silver, turn to gold, and gold alone, when, if the Senator from Vermont will look at the great report that was made last year by the English commission, composed of twenty-one of the ablest statesmen of that country, and laid before their Parliament, he will find the statement of twenty-six of the leading chambers of commerce and business men of the country, embracing the president and other directors of the Bank of England, all agreeing, with but two exceptions, that it was the destruction of silver coinage by England, by Germany, and the United States which has been the cause of nearly all, certainly of a great part, of the depression of prices in Great Britain and of products all over the world.

They prove that so long as France could hold her own, as she could against England's monometalism, she was the world's clearing-house, and no evil result followed from England's degradation of silver; but when Germany in 1872 and 1873, after she had demanded and obtained a thousand millions from France, and when the United States, by an act that was discreditable to Congress, struck down the silver coinage of this country against the will and without the knowledge of the representatives of this people in order to support England in her effort to put all the property of this country into the hands of the bankers and the bondholders and the gold-owners of the world, France could not maintain herself alone. I repeat that the leading men of England who were called upon went before that commission and all but two of them asserted that the combination of Germany and the United States with England against silver coinage was at the botton of all the trouble, and that the only remedy was to restore silver to the position it held from time immemorial; that done, they all agreed that the depression of business everywhere prevailing would soon pass away. I hope before this session closes to lay all these facts before the Senate, and show how we are sacrificed to the greed of England and her determination to build up her East Indian colonies by the destruction of our trade. I will only add now that I introduced a bill on the second day of this session, which has been pending before the Finance Committee ever since Congress met, demanding that we shall issue coin certificates without limit upon gold and silver deposited anywhere with the United States depositories. That committee has held it back until this time. I have demanded the consideration of it over and over again without success. If the Senator from Vermont wishes to enter upon a discussion of the silver question, I serve notice on him now that he shall have a chance on that bill, and further, that if it is not reported back either favorably or adversely by Tuesday next, I shall move to discharge the committee from its further consideration in order to bring the bill before the Senate, and then we can discuss the silver question in all its phases and bearings to his heart's content.

Mr. HAWLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask a question or two of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly; I retaining the floor. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know of the Senator from Kentucky if these trade-dollars now are not simply bullion?

Mr. BECK. I should say they are.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the bullion value of trade-dollars at the present market price?

Mr. BECK. I do not know what the market price is to-day, but I suppose from 85 to 90 cents.

Mr. MORRILL. Less than 80 cents.

Mr. GEORGE. Then the effect of this bill is to pay the men who hold this bullion in the shape of trade-dollars 100 cents for only 80 cents.

Mr. BECK. They were worth 3 per cent. premium at one time, and it was because of our own legislation that their value was destroyed.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I understand that for the trade-dollars which weigh 420 grains in silver nine-tenths fine we propose by this bill to give 412½ grains of silver nine-tenths fine. I do not see that the United States loses very much by that.

Mr. GEORGE. Four hundred and twelve and one-half grains stamped as standard silver is worth 100 cents.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. It does not cost anything to put the stamp on.

Mr. BECK. We put the stamp on the trade-dollar as well, and make it a felony to counterfeit it.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky another question. Do I understand him as saying now that persons who received this coin in payment of wages, &c., have all probably parted with it as bullion, and it is now in the hands of speculators who have bought it up as an investment at its bullion value?

Mr. BECK. I do not know anything about who owns the trade-dollars, and I do not care. I know that the coin was issued as a coin of the United States, and that the United States received value for it as a dollar. We never parted with a penny of it at less. The people took it for wages. They believed it was a dollar.

Mr. GEORGE. Have the workmen been able to hold this silver for the last ten or fifteen years?

Mr. BECK. I do not know whether they have or not. I do not suppose they have; but the value of it depends upon the authority given by the United States. Mere bullion never has the stamp of the United States upon it. The trade-dollar has, and there is where our obligation comes in. When we put a piece of silver coin in circulation with the stamp of the United States upon it, allowed it to pass as coin, made it a legal tender, and punished men who counterfeited it, if it is for any cause repudiated ought we not to take it back and give something else in exchange for it that has the stamp of our authority and will pay the debts of the holder? That is all we propose to do.

The intrinsic value of the greenback is nothing but the paper and the print upon it. Its real value is our stamp and our authority that we will pay for that piece of paper a standard silver dollar that will pay all the debts of the United States, and all the debts of every State and every municipality, and of every private individual in the country, and is a legal tender for all purposes. For years the standard silver dollar was not a legal tender for more than $5.

Mr. MORRILL. The United States never issued a dollar of this money. It was all coined for those who carried the bullion to the mint and paid for the coinage. So the Government never issued a dollar of it.

Mr. BECK. I said that the United States received dollar for dollar for all that passed through its hands. It did receive it in payment for years. Whilst it was issued originally to other people, the Government received it and paid it out as a dollar to everybody who took it. That is what I said.

Mr. MORRILL. The Government paid it out to the men who brought the bullion to the mints to be coined, and those men paid the mints for the coinage. The Government of the United States merely allowed its mints to be used for this purpose.

Mr. BECK. The Government does that with gold bullion to-day, and always has done; and is gold not good when paid out by the United States because it was originally coined for somebody who brought his gold bullion and took the coin? Is that to be the argument? The gold bullion is treated now, and always has been, just as the trade-dollars were treated when originally coined; but when the gold coin came back into the Treasury of the United States, or when the trade-dollar came back into the Treasury of the United States, the United States paid it out again—it paid out the trade-dollar just as it paid the gold coin that was coined for other people.

Mr. MORRILL. A very different thing.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am not quite willing that the argument of the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] shall pass as representing the views of those who are opposed to the present plan of coining silver. I object to it. I think it is a mistaken policy. I think it is driving us on toward a single standard, and that the silver standard. That I sincerely believe; but there I part company with him. He never has been in favor of redeeming the trade-dollar in any form, while to me it seems a question of national honor. We did not stamp upon it "not to be circulated in the United States." We called it a trade-dollar of the United States. We put in it 7½ more grains of standard silver than we have in what we call the legitimate dollar. We sent it out into the world. We paid it out. For a time we made it a legal tender; then we withdrew our sanction from it, and now the dollar that is worth about 2 per cent. more in bullion than the standard dollar is depreciated to the extent of 20 per cent. I think it is a very discreditable position for the nation to occupy.

But I do not desire to complicate this at all. I would avoid complicating it with the discussion of the general silver question, because I am happy to believe that a large majority of the Senate is willing to remove what I consider a national reproach and provide for a redemption of this dollar. I would rather deduct the recoinage of this dollar from the coinage of $2,000,000 a month of silver bullion; but that is not an essential point at all. Those of us who take the view held by the Senator from Vermont that the present policy is unwise lose nothing by the passage of this bill save that by recoinage we add the few millions of trade-dollars to the number of standard dollars.

I am glad of the opportunity to vote for the conference report.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I am paired upon this bill with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], who is absent, and therefore I shall not be able to record my vote; otherwise I should vote against the acceptance of this report solely for the reason that it adds so much to the bullion which is to be converted into silver dollars. I should be in favor of the redemption of the trade-dollar, and would vote for this bill were it not for that provision.

I do not think the United States can complain very much that every dollar of this transaction takes about 20 cents out of the Treasury, for the United States has been in that business with all its citizens for a good many years, and has drawn somewhere about 20 cents out of the citizen in every piece of bullion which it has turned into a dollar to the amount of some $200,000,000. So the United States has no business to complain that the citizen gets back in about $10,000,000 of it about what the United States has been taking out of the citizen for the last six or eight years; but it adds to the amount of bullion to be turned into silver dollars at this time, which, in my opinion, is a peril, and for that reason I would vote against it.

It is, as the Senator from Connecticut says, due to the good faith of the Government that the trade-dollars be taken by the Government back again and made into silver dollars of the standard, but not to increase the volume of silver in the Treasury, as it will so much each month. You are adding to the $2,000,000 of silver which the law now requires shall be coined into silver dollars every month. If it were not for that, if the trade-dollars were a part of that two million and did not increase it, I should be glad to vote for the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in reference to this conference report, as I intend to vote in favor of it.

This trade-dollar question is one that has been in the Senate for many years. I was one of those in the Finance Committee who originally doubted the expediency of redeeming these coins, believing that that question should be relegated to the people who had in one way or another taken them. But the public sentiment of the country seemed to favor the redemption of these coins by the Government of the United States because it had pledged its faith that these coins should pass as dollars. They were coined at our mints as dollars; they were coined as other coins were coined from 1873 to 1876. Then the United States withdrew from these coins the legal-tender quality, and after that time very few of them were coined.

Mr. INGALLS. How many were coined in all?

Mr. GEORGE. In 1876, did the Senator say?

Mr. ALLISON. In 1876 the legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar was taken away.

Mr. GEORGE. Eleven years ago.

Mr. ALLISON. Eleven years ago. There were coined in all about thirty-six or thirty-seven millions of these dollars. They were coined at the mints of the United States chiefly for exportation to China.

Mr. INGALLS. Where they are now.

Mr. ALLISON. It is estimated that from seven to ten millions of them are now in this country, and the remainder of them are in China. They are stamped in China, as is supposed, by their usual method of stamping silver coins, and therefore it is not supposed that these coins will be returned to the United States, so that this bill provides for the redemption of such coins as may now be in our country.

Mr. INGALLS. And the estimated amount of them is about $7,000,000 or $8,000,000?

Mr. ALLISON. From $7,000,000 to $10,000,000. I think that part of the discussion has passed away.

The Senate at its last session passed on the resolution known as the Morrison resolution by a vote, if I remember right, of 32 to 30, an amendment declaring that these coins should be redeemed, and should be redeemed at par, by the Government of the United States; and the Senators who voted for that amendment were chiefly Senators from the Eastern States in sympathy with the views just expressed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that the Government of the United States was bound in honor to take care of these coins.

In obedience to that sentiment, the Committee on Finance at this session reported back the bill, which was sent to the House of Representatives, providing for the redemption of these coins, and providing also that $500,000 a month for those redeemed should be taken out of the bullion fund, so-called, of $2,000,000 a month. That bill passed this body without a division, no Senator on either side of the Chamber expressing any particular view upon the question of the trade-dollar; but all voted for that bill. So we may say, so far as our public record is concerned, that every Senator on this floor voted in favor of the principle of redeeming these trade-dollars, and therefore I regard myself as foreclosed, not only by the vote of the Senate last year but by the general prevailing public sentiment of the country, from voting against this bill as it now stands or as it originally passed the Senate.

Now, what is the conference report? It is simply that that provision which deducts $500,000 a month from the bullion fund shall not prevail. In other words, if this bill shall pass now, as the conferees have presented it to us, there will be at the end of a year from the passage of this act just six million silver dollars in the country more than there would be if the Senate bill had passed the House, as we passed it, unanimously.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me ask my friend if it would not be just the amount of trade-dollars redeemed.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all, because our Senate bill originally provided that we should redeem every one of these trade-dollars and that we should issue standard silver dollars in lieu of them, except that we should take $500,000 a month from the bullion fund. Now we repeal that $500,000 a month clause, which simply leaves the only question for us to consider whether or not this country is going to everlasting ruin in one year from this time by the admission of six million silver dollars. That is the only point now before us for consideration.

Without expressing at this time any opinion on the policy or impolicy of the original act of 1878, or the policy or impolicy of repealing it, I do not believe that the addition of $6,000,000 to the silver coinage of the United States in a year will be a material question in our finances. I do not believe that that little addition will break the camel's back. If it is to be broken, it is not to be broken by $6,000,000 a year.

That is the only question there is here; and so believing, and thinking that this is not a material point with reference to the amount of silver that is to be thrown into circulation, with reference to this report, over and above the amount provided for in the Senate bill, I shall vote for the conference report.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I have ever believed that the honor of the Government has been pledged to the redemption of the trade-dollar. I think the very act which made legal tender of the silver dollar made the trade-dollar one of the coins of the United States. It is mentioned in the act as a coin of the United States. Upon the strength of that law the coin went into circulation; it circulated as a dollar in common with the standard silver dollar, and until Congress passed a law taking away from it its legal-tender quality the trade-dollar circulated as a dollar. It was paid out very largely to laborers and to those who knew not the difference between the trade-dollar and the standard silver dollar. For that reason I have been in favor of redeeming it, whether in gold dollars, in currency, or in standard silver dollars; it made no difference to me how it was redeemed. I am to-day in favor of redeeming it.

I have ever voted in committee and in the Senate in favor of making the trade-dollars redeemed a part of the $2,000,000 of bullion per month which under the law we purchase and coin into silver dollars; but we have been beaten upon that proposition every time. I now favor the adoption of the conference report. I am perfectly willing to add $6,000,000 more to the currency of this country if by that means we can get rid of this ever-perplexing question of the trade-dollar.

I have not favored an increased coinage of silver. I have favored the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar for the reason that I believed that to be the only mode by which we could get an international conference and an agreement between nations by which silver coinage might be safely and properly continued. We have, however, been unable to do that, and the Government of this country seems to be committed absolutely to the policy of a continued coinage of the silver dollar.

There is another reason which prompts me somewhat at this particular time in saying that I will vote for this report, and it is that in a very short time we are to be troubled with a large surplus in the Treasury for which there is no possible use; and further than that, we have reduced the circulation of the country very greatly by the payment of the 3 per cent. bonds, in that way displacing a certain portion of the national-bank circulation. By these means, the time may come in the not far-distant future when the people of this country will not have any more circulating medium than they need.

At this time I am ready, for the purpose of getting rid of the trade-dollar, to increase the silver coinage to the extent provided under the bill as reported by the conference committee.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Mississippi asked me a question which I can answer now by the report of the Director of the Mint. There were 15,161,000 of the trade-dollars coined and in circulation when the act of 1876 was passed making it no longer a legal tender. They were coined at the mints afterward by permission of the Secretary of the Treasury without any sort of attempt to see that they were sent out of the country, so that they were circulated to whomsoever saw fit to circulate them and went into the hands of the wage-workers of the country.

Mr. GEORGE. Was the commercial value of these dollars at the time of the repeal of the legal-tender quality 103 cents?

Mr. BECK. No; I can not answer as to the exact figure, but the value of bullion began to fall very soon after Germany and the United States demonetized silver and the Latin Union could no longer maintain both metals. How much it had fallen at that time I can not tell.

When I was on the subcommittee we had before us a gentleman from New York, Mr. Hawkins, who represented those people, who embodied the history of all the laws on the subject and gave us an exact statement of all the facts. I desire to have it go in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be printed in the RECORD.

The paper is as follows:

THE REDEMPTION OF THE TRADE-DOLLAR—THE LAW UNDER WHICH IT WAS ISSUED.

I desire to call your attention to the law in relation to trade-dollars, namely:

By Chapter CXXXI of the laws of 1873 (see volume 17, page 424) Congress enacted as follows:

"SEC. 15. That the silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half-dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter-dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime or ten-cent piece, and said coins shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment."

The act of which this is a part was approved by the President, and became a law of the United States, February 12, 1873. There is not a word in the statute to indicate any other or different use than that of the fifty-cent, twenty-five-cent, and ten-cent silver coins; hence the statement often made that they were coined only for export has no justification in the statute.

Under said section 15 of said act, the United States Mint, between July 12, 1873, and August 1, 1876, coined 15,631,000 of these trade-dollars. (See Report of Director of the Mint as to trade-dollars from 1873 to 1879, inclusive.) Every one of these 15,631,000 trade-dollars was "a legal tender for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment," and, like the small silver coins described in section 15, could be used to the extent of not exceeding $5 as a legal tender in any payment, public or private, in the United States.

When the Government issues a coin, and by act of Congress makes it a legal tender, the quality of legal tender can not be taken away from said coin without redeeming it, except by repudiation. The faith of the Government resides in the coin just as fully as it resides in a bond when the Government issues its bond. No government can repudiate without world-wide disgrace. Even if the Government becomes bankrupt it must take its coins in payment of dues to itself at the nominal value at which it issued them.

The courts have repeatedly decided that a bank, even if insolvent, must receive its own bills at par in payment of dues to itself. The Supreme Court of the United States have repeatedly rendered a similar decision in relation to the Virginia coupons made, when issued by the State of Virginia, receivable for taxes.

If the United States could be directly sued, the same court would undoubtedly enunciate the same law of honesty and good faith as to the United States that it declares as to individuals and banks and States.

Repudiation by the Government is so great a national disgrace that the courts would hesitate long, and seek every other possible interpretation of the law, before they would accept that of repudiation. They would require repudiation to be expressed in the statute in the clearest and most unequivocal and unavoidable terms before they would give to the statute that disgraceful interpretation.

Under the act of 1873 the coinage of trade-dollars was, like the coinage of gold and the coinage of the standard dollar before said act, free and unlimited. Anybody was at liberty to bring to the mint any amount of silver bullion, and on paying the coinage charge have it, like gold bullion, coined into trade-dollars and delivered to him for use as lawful money. If the Government can honestly repudiate these trade-dollars, it can repudiate every coin it issues.

HOW THE TROUBLE AROSE AS TO THE TRADE-DOLLARS.

No statute has ever been enacted that in terms or by just implication takes away from the 15,631,000 trade-dollars coined before August, 1876, the legal-tender quality given to them by said section 15 of the act of July 12, 1873.

But what has been done as to the trade-dollar is, that on July 22, 1876, after said 15,631,000 trade-dollars had been coined and issued, Congress passed a joint resolution, the second section of which is as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same."

The resolution as it passed the House had nothing in it about the trade-dollar. This section was inserted in the Senate, though it did not seem to be understood or its propriety or impropriety comprehended. But it has caused the Treasury Department to repudiate all trade-dollars, both those coined before the date of the resolution as well as after, and thus brought upon the Government as to the 15,631,000 the disgrace of repudiation.

This is a joint resolution, not a statute.

THE PROPER INTERPRETATION OF THE RESOLUTION.

It in terms, though awkwardly, seems to limit itself to the hereafter-issued trade-dollars, not the theretofore-issued trade-dollars. If the intention of the resolution was to repudiate the trade-dollars theretofore issued, to demonetize them, and to reduce them from money with limited legal-tender quaility to merchandise with no legal-tender quality whatever, it would have omitted the word "hereafter." The word "hereafter" has no proper function or meaning in the resolution except to indicate that Congress did not intend to affect or to change anything already done or the trade-dollar already issued. When this section was inserted by the Senate, had any Senator suggested that it would cause repudiation, the Senate would probably have either withdrawn it or so modified it as to preclude such a construction.

Government had issued from the Mint, including the whole month of July, 1876, 15,631,000 legal-tender trade-dollars. These dollars would remain for all time a legal tender in this country to the same extent as when issued till by clear, positive, unavoidable enactment they should be repudiated; that is, the legal-tender quality without any compensation simply taken away from them.

The remaining clause of this section 2, namely, "The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demands for the same," indicates, though imperfectly, that in the first clause of the section the words "shall not hereafter be a legal tender" were intended only to apply to the trade-dollars thereafter coined. Not a word in the statute of 1873 creating them indicates any use other than domestic use. There is no authorized statement of any other use until this resolution was passed. But all coined after the resolution of July 22, 1876, were by the terms of that resolution intended, not for domestic use, but only for export; hence the propriety of the provision, "shall no thereafter be a legal tender."

If this phrase refers to those previously coined it is repudiation, for they were a legitimate coin money of the United States. Those thereafter coined being only for export, they were merchandise, not money, and they were intended by the Government to have no domestic money function; and if the resolution had been promptly and strictly complied with by the Treasury Department they would have had none.

ACCORDING TO PRECEDENT, HOW SHOULD THE GOVERNMENT GET THEM OUT OF THE WAY?

When even a foreign coin has by law been made a legal tender and the Government for any reason wishes to take that quality away from such coin, it does not do this by repudiation or simply declaring it not a legal tender, but by calling it in and redeeming it at par, and giving the people reasonable time to send it into the Treasury for redemption. Then it is recoined before being again issued. (See act of February 9, 1793, sections 2 and 3, where the statute fixed this time at three years, and required the President to issue a proclamation.)

Numerous acts have been passed taking away the legal-tender quality after a certain date from foreign coins circulating here, but always with redemption and a reasonable time for presentation.

By the act of February 21, 1857, foreign silver coins, though so worn as to be of light weight, were for two years redeemable at par at the Mint in exchange for minor coins. This time was on March 3, 1859, extended to February 21, 1861, or two years more, making four years in all. Our Government, if acting intelligently, would certainly treat its own coin with at least as good faith as it has heretofore treated foreign coins circulating here by its authority. It has never repudiated such foreign coins, but has repeatedly redeemed them and given the people reasonable notice to present them for redemption, so that no one need lose anything unless from his own carelessness in not heeding the notice.

In order to stop their circulation it redeems the 3-cent coin and 5-cent silver piece at their nominal value, and also worn and light-weight gold and silver coins.

England has repeatedly redeemed objectionable coin. In 1548, under Edward VI, her shillings became of light weight and extensively counterfeited, and she called them all in, redeemed them at par, and gave the people one year three months and twenty days to bring them in.

In 1696 the silver coin became greatly worn and clipped, and William III, under an act of Parliament, at a cost of £1,000,000, redeemed the current coin "at the same rate or value as if such moneys were unclipped or undiminished."

During the financial straits resulting in England from the French Revolution, silver became so scarce that Spanish dollars were stamped at the Bank of England with the king's head, and issued as legal coin. There was a profit in this, and private parties obtained large quantities of Spanish dollars, counterfeited the stamp, and put them in circulation.

On learning this the government stopped their circulation, and redeemed at par these stamped Spanish dollars from all parties who had taken them, whether the stamp was genuine or counterfeit. It did this because, though innocently, it had made it possible for individuals to put in circulation the dollars with the illegal stamp. In 1803 she demonetized the five-shilling dollar, gave reasonable notice, and called them all in and redeemed them at par.

England has never repudiated her own coin; hence the credit of English money. All other European governments receive all their own coin at par at the treasury when they wish to remove it from use or deprive it of its legal-tender quality.

If our Government had stopped the coinage of trade-dollars on July 22, 1876, or had changed the face or even the date of all coined that year after that day, so that the people could readily determine at sight what were coined after the date of the resolution, there would be some legality in refusing these last. But instead of that the Government went right on steadily coining them through the remaining five months of 1876, just as though no resolution had been passed, and it issued to the people in those five months 2,975,200 more trade-dollars, not one of which could be distinguished from those coined in 1876 before the date of the resolution.

The Government itself having made this confusion, and thereby led the people to accept all trade-dollars up to the end of 1876 as legal-tender money, is now by a well-known principle of law, bound to protect the citizen from loss in having accepted any of said trade-dollars.

This makes 15,631,000 plus 2,975,200, equal to 18,606,202 trade-dollars coined and issued with the said legal tender quality; and so many of these as are still in existence the Government, in common honesty, is legally bound to receive as legal tender at least to the amount of $5 in any one payment, unless it sets itself up as a repudiator; rupudiation is not to be supposed or imputed to it. But the Treasury Department, under the inexact wording of the resolution, feels constrained to set up repudiation, and has done it.

THE FACTS AS TO THOSE COINED AFTER 1876.

The plain intention of the resolution of July 22, 1876, was that none should be coined after that date except for export. But right here the Government failed of its duty to the people. It paid no attention to the last clause of the resolution as to coining only for export, but let unlimited coinage of trade-dollars go on for fifteen months, or until October, 1877. From July, 1876, to and including October, 1877, it coined $15,079,400. (See statement of Director of the Mint.) This is as nearly as many as in the previous three years and five months.

Then it did not stop the coinage. All it did was, on October 15, 1877, to order at the Philadelphia Mint and the New York assay office, and four days later at the other mints, "That the receipt of deposits of silver for coinage into trade-dollars should be discontinued." (See Mint Report, 1878, page 11; also Forty-fifth Congress, second session, Senate Executive Document No. 80, page 2.)

But twenty days later, November 5, 1877, this order was modified so as "to authorize deposits of silver bullion at the mint in San Francisco for returns in trade-dollars." (See Forty-fifth Congress, second session, Senate Executive Document No. 80, pages 10 and 11.)

Under this modification unlimited coinage of trade-dollars went on for seven months more, until May, 1878, when for the first time the coinage was actually and finally stopped. During this seven months 5,248,960 more trade-dollars were coined, making a total of 35,950,360. (See report of Director of Mint as to trade-dollars, 1879.)

The official returns of exports of trade-dollars from the beginning of their coinage up to October 31, 1879, show $27,089,817; and according to the statement of experts these no longer exist, but have in the Asiatic countries to which they were exported been converted into their coin. (See statement of Director of Mint, 1879.) This would leave in this country $8,869,543, but the bullion dealers say that at least $2,000,000 have been melted up in this country for manufacturing purposes. That would leave about $7,000,000 still in existence. Of this $7,000,000 all that bear date previous to 1877 were legal-tender coin in this country, and common honesty and the practice of nations require the Government to redeem them. It must either do that or repudiate.

All that bear date of 1877 or 1878 the Government enabled parties to put into circulation, first, by having in 1873 given to the trade-dollar the legal-tender quality; and second, by continuing to coin after July 22, 1876, more than were sufficient to meet the demand for export, and thus enabled parties to put some 4,000,000 of them into circulation here instead of exporting them.

The Government knew during all this time that the people had for so long been using irredeemable paper that they were, so to speak, hungry for silver money, and would use these dollars if issued. As soon as this desire for silver dollars was supplied by recommencing the coinage of the standard dollars, the coinage of the trade-dollar was stopped.

The well-established practice of both this country and England, and other European countries, requires that the trade-dollar should be got out of the way, not by repudiation, but honestly and fairly by redemption. The House has twice tried to do this, June 19, 1882, and again by a vote of 198 to 45 on April 1, 1884; but the Senate apparently through misinformation has refused. It is to be hoped for the honor of the country that the bill will be brought forward a third time and will go through.

WHO HOLDS THIS STOCK OF TRADE-DOLLARS?

In the State of Pennsylvania there are held by savings banks, benevolent, beneficiary, and religious societies, banks, and private individuals, $2,560,927.

In the whole country 714 national banks hold $1,605,764. They received them on deposit from their customers until July 1, 1883, when by common consent their circulation was stopped. The remainder are held by every class of people—shop-keepers, day laborers, brokers, and women and children; all waiting for the Government to be honest, do them justice, and redeem its own coins.

AT WHAT RATE WERE THESE RECEIVED?

More than one-third are held in Pennsylvania; 95 per cent. of these were received at par; the remaining 5 per cent. at from 10 to 15 per cent. discount.

An inquiry in the State of New York of three hundred and fifty holders shows that the great majority took them at par. One large holder, who had them of each year of their issue, took them on the average at 97½ per cent.

No doubt if we had the statement of every holder, it would show on the whole a like result. But the duty of the Government to redeem them is plain, whatever they may have cost the holders.

HOW LONG HAVE THE HOLDERS LOST INTEREST ON THEM?

Certainly on the average from the time they ceased to circulate, July 1, 1883, for since that date they could not be used as money. So that, as matter of fact, if the Government redeems them at once at par the holders will by reason of the attempted repudiation be large losers.

THE TREASURY HAS MADE MONEY OUT OF THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

When goods were bought in Asia with trade-dollars the Treasury in 1875, in fixing the amount of duties to be paid here, valued the trade-dollar as the equivalent of the gold dollar, though it was worth as bullion from 1 to 4 per cent. less. (See Report of Director of Mint, 1879.)

After the trade-dollar was repudiated by the Treasury, and so had fallen in value, merchants remonstrated, and claimed that when they paid it in Asia for goods the Treasury, in adjusting the duties, should put the same value on it that it had here.

The Treasury, by two letters, one of June 15, 1877, to the collector of the port of New York, and the other of July 3, 1877, to the Secretary of State, rejected this view and decided that in the invoices for the purpose of adjusting duties the trade-dollar should be considered "as of the same value as the gold dollar." By so doing the Treasury largely increased the duties. This continued through four years, 1875-'76-'77-'78; in fact, as long as any trade-dollars existed in the Asiatic trade.

By thus repudiating the trade-dollar here, and especially when tendered in payment of duties, and yet in the same breath calling it gold for the purpose of increasing the amount of duties, the Government has been making money out of this repudiated coin.

WHAT DOES PLAIN JUSTICE AND COMMON HONESTY REQUIRE THE GOVERNMENT TO DO?

These dollars, 15,631,000 of them, were at the start put on the same level as the subsidiary silver coins. Let the Government restore them to that level and order them redeemed at par on presentation with the subsidiary coin—say half-dollars—and coin the trade-dollars redeemed into half-dollars to pay the redemption. It will take at the extreme limit not over fourteen million half-dollars. Two half-dollars contain 385 grains of standard silver; the trade-dollar 420 grains, leaving a profit of 35 grains, or a little over 7 per cent. to the Government for being honest. The 7 per cent profit will pay the expense of recoinage, and leave at least 5 per cent. net profit to the Government, or $50,000 on every million redeemed. This is less than justice to the holders, for through the management of Government they have lost several years' interest.

It is not easy to see how any one on behalf of the Government can object to this, unless totally depraved, for by being honest in this way it not only does not cost the Government a cent, but the Government actually makes money; and it does not in any way affect the monthly coinage of the standard dollar or the purchase of silver for that purpose.

It seems to the holders of the trade-dollar that a short, simple bill for this purpose, free of everything else, would pass without difficulty and would relieve the Government from the disgrace of repudiation.

DEXTER A. HAWKINS.

111 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, March 30, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for the yeas and nays on this question. Is the call sustained?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall vote against this conference report, not because I am opposed to increasing the circulation of the silver dollars in the country, for I am in favor of that. If it be the policy of Congress to increase the number of silver dollars coined each year, then we ought to increase it in what I regard as a legitimate way—go out and buy bullion and coin it. I shall vote against this report for this reason: Since the year 1876, now eleven years, this coin has not been money, it has not been a legal tender, it has not circulated as money. It has gone out of the hands of the persons who parted with their goods for it, parted with their labor for it, and it has been bought up as bullion at 20 per cent. discount, and is now in the hands of persons who bought it. I am opposed to giving those persons 20 per cent. more than the value of the bullion which they have in the shape of these dollars, and probably 20 per cent. more than they paid for them.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I am informed by his colleague, however, that he would vote "yea" if present. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is necessarily absent from the city to-day, on all questions. I do not know how he would vote on this report, and therefore I withhold my own vote.

Mr. MORGAN (when Mr. PUGH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PUGH] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea" and the Senator from Vermont would vote "nay."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] by a transfer which has been made to-day. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KENNA. I am satisfied that my colleague would vote the same way, so that the Senator may vote.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Being so assured by the Senator's colleague, I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. SEWELL'S name was called). The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]. As I am informed, the Senator from New Jersey, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. BOWEN (when Mr. TELLER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. TELLER] is necessarily absent to-day. If present, he would vote in favor of the conference report.

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania

[Mr. CAMERON], who is temporarily absent from the Chamber. I understand he would vote "yea" on this proposition. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] is absent and paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If the Senator from Rhode Island were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES. As I have already stated, I am paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. I would vote against the report, and he would vote for it. My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. I do not know but that the pair has been announced.

The result was then announced—yeas 49, nays 5; as follows:

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10419) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Having conferred with some of the members of the committee since the conference report was taken up, I am authorized to accept the amendment in the form in which it is submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand that the amendment increases the amount $100,000?

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; I do not understand that there is any increase of the amount of appropriation. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1026 of section 1, after the word "dollar," it is proposed to insert:

Continuing improvement at Atchison, Saint Joseph, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, in Kansas and Missouri, and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. VEST. With my convictions, I can not vote for that amendment. I endeavored to express as distinctly as I could that these sporadic and local appropriations on a great river like the Missouri amount to nothing.

I want to say a very few words in reply to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. I am very glad that I have not the fatal facility of speech to impugn the motives of other Senators that seems to attend upon that Senator in the discussion of almost every measure, particularly the river and harbor bill. I do not know that this facility arises from any innate bad temper on the part of the Senator, but I should imagine it rather came from a sort of inherent necessity of his. He is always willing to stamp out any sensibility or sacrifice any interest in order to round a sentence or point an epigram. The Senator seems to be under the delusion that he is posing upon a pedestal continually, and that he has a sort of prerogative right of scattering his rhetorical fulminations promiscuously around this Chamber. There are persons who might be ill-natured enough to imagine that the Senator's opposition, consistent and persistent as it is, to the river and harbor bill at every session arises from the fact that there are no navigable streams in the State of Kansas, and that none of these appropriations are, therefore, to go directly to the community which he represents on this floor.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Kansas intimates that there has been any sinister, occult, hidden influence as to these appropriations to Kansas City and to Saint Joseph, that because I happen to be a member of the Committee on Commerce I have used some sort of back-door influence to secure the appropriation of money at those places, the intimation is simply untrue and unfounded in one single shadow of fact. I have never spoken to the Secretary of War, to a single engineer officer, to a member of the Missouri River Commission, upon this subject directly or indirectly. I have never approached any of those officers. I have no information upon this subject except what is derived from the public and written communications of the Missouri River Commission, which are placed on the desk of every Senator. I know nothing in regard to the reasons why these appropriations were expended at Kansas City and Saint Joseph except the reasons that have been read here by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] and are sent to us by the chief officer of the Missouri River Commission. I have not the honor of Major Suter's acquaintance; and I repeat again that neither verbally nor in writing, directly nor indirectly, have I ever approached any officer of this Government in regard to this question.

The Senator thinks it remarkable that the State of Missouri has received the expenditure of this money at two places in Missouri when there is a member of the Committee on Commerce, a Senator from that State, and he intimates that because this is a Democratic administration this money has been so appropriated. The record will show that under a Republican administration, since I have been upon that committee, the appropriations for the Missouri River have been in every instance larger than under the administration of President Cleveland, and the record will show that I have never asked for any increase of appropriation except in this particular instance, when I did ask of the committee in this bill, which came from the House of Representatives with $7,000,000 of appropriation in it, an appropriation of $50,000 more for the Missouri River from Sioux City to the mouth than was appropriated by the House of Representatives.

I have endeavored persistently and consistently not to use my place upon that committee for the benefit of my own State. Yet with his facility of misrepresentation and insinuation the Senator from Kansas says here that this money has been expended at Kansas City and Saint Joseph on account of my membership of the Committee on Commerce.

The Senator is also pleased to remark that it is a gross misrepresentation to say that the want of surveys at these particular localities was the reason why the money was not expended at all. The Senator lives on the banks of the Missouri River. He knows that that river changes its character from year to year; that of all the streams upon this continent it is the most uncertain, the most devious, and that when the current of the river one year is on one bank it is almost certain the succeeding season will find it on the other. A survey made two years ago is worth nothing in that locality on the Missouri River. It is not like the rivers of the East, of New England, with rocky banks and steady currents that flow on almost to eternity in the same volume and the same direction.

The rivers of this country change according to the climate of the country, and much more distinctly than the character of the people. There is no parallel between the rivers of the East and the rivers of the West and South; and of all the streams upon this continent the Missouri River, as I said before, is the most uncertain and the most difficult to manage.

I know nothing personally of the facts of this case, except as Major Suter declares that he did not have the surveys and the plans and specifications for this work. He states that to be the truth, and if he has stated a falsehood he alone is responsible for it. I know myself that at Arrow Rock, on the Missouri River, there has been no survey and no plan or specification for four years.

I voted for this amendment when it was offered by the Senator from Nebraska on the last river and harbor bill; and to-day all that I have said in regard to the course pursued by the Missouri River Commission has been simply in the direction that I believe, and I assert it here to-day, that it would not be anything else than a criminal waste of money to distribute $375,000 at different localities along that river from Sioux City to the mouth of the river. I repeat that the Missouri River ought either to be abandoned to the course of nature or it ought to be systematically improved by reaches of 10 miles to the reach through its whole length; and until that is done we may have here from year to year the same criticism. I care not whether the control of that river be under the Bureau of Engineers directly or under a commission, the same results will always be obtained. Until we make up our minds, and act upon it, to improve the river or to abandon it, it must inevitably, with these small appropriations, meet with the same result that stares us in the face to-day.

The Senator from Kansas intimates that selfish purposes animated me. All such surface indications do not touch me. What is the complaint of the Senator here now? It is that a few localities in his State have not received a portion of this money; that Leavenworth reservation and Atchison have not received a portion of the $375,000 appropriated in the last river and harbor bill. I tell that Senator now that in my judgment until we systematically apply an appropriation much larger than any hitherto given to the Missouri River the putting money in any local improvement, either in his State or in mine, is worse than throwing the money into the bosom of the ocean itself.

I have never pretended that the commerce of the Missouri River was gigantic. I have never perverted one single fact in regard to it. I answered the Senator from Nebraska on his inquiry that there were but two boats on that river from Kansas City to the mouth.

The State of the Senator from Kansas is as much interested as the State of Missouri in the navigation of that river. All that I have ever hoped for was, not to take the commerce of those States away from the great railway systems now in existence but if we could to create an opposing or rival factor to those railway systems in a reasonable amount of navigation, especially by barges that could carry our grain from the points on that river to the Gulf of Mexico and to the markets of the world. But if this is to be done at all, it is not to be done by putting $10,000 or $20,000 or $50,000 at certain localities. The river should be abandoned or we should adopt the suggestions of the commission that we ourselves created, and furnish them with the means to carry out the system that they have so often recommended to Congress.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to say in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas as to how much better we should be off with this amendment in the bill than we were under the act of last year, that we have this difference: The Senator will notice the phraseology already introduced by the committee appropriating the $300,000 placed in the bill, from the mouth of the river to Sioux City. The Senator has remarked the phraseology. If the Senator from Missouri knew that it was not to be expended above Saint Joseph, why provide in the bill for Sioux City, 400 miles further up the river? That, I take it, is left at the discretion of the commission to be used by them, and the $50,000 you have appropriated, from Sioux City to Fort Benton, is placed under the direction of the Secretary of War and not under the control of the commission.

In the amendment which I have suggested, I will say to the Senator from Kansas, I have provided that what work is done at the designated points shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War. They are not to be shut out by the action of the commission.

Mr. VEST. Let us understand the amendment. Does the Senator understand the amendment to mean that $100,000 out of the $300,000 appropriated for the Missouri River from the mouth to Sioux City, is to be expended at these different localities named in the amendment, or does he mean $100,000 over and above the $300,000?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have designated no sum. I suggest to my friend that I have proposed phraseology precisely the same as was adopted in the bill of last session, supposing that would meet with no opposition, except that I have put it to be expended at these points under the direction of the Secretary of War, thereby eliminating that much from the control of the commission.

I did suggest to the chairman of the committee that I was perfectly willing to accept an amendment for $100,000 to be expended at the seven places named. That would form no part of the $300,000. That I was willing to do if a suggestion of that kind was made, and I appeal to the chairman of the committee and to the committee in this matter. They concede the necessity of this work; they put this in last year, and the Senate agreed to it, and they supposed under the bill of last year these points would be taken care of. The chairman himself said that he supposes to-day he had provided for the river from its mouth to Sioux City; but he knows this commission will never go above Saint Joseph with the expenditure, leaving 400 miles of dangerous rapids and wide river untouched. Major Suter gives no reason for his action except the commercial importance of Saint Jo and Kansas City. Above them are Fort Leavenworth not provided for, Atchison not provided for, Brownsville and Plattsmouth not provided for, Nebraska City, Omaha, and Council Bluffs not provided for. All these points combined are of as great commercial importance certainly as Saint Jo and Kansas City.

The chairman of the committee supposed this river was all provided for from its mouth to Sioux City. The Senator from Missouri, I think, knew better. I think he knew that the commission was there standing in the way and did not intend to go above Saint Joseph.

Mr. VEST. I knew nothing about it. I repeat that I never had any communication, directly or indirectly, with any member of the commission, or any engineer officer, or the Secretary of War, or any official of the Government on the subject. I know no more about it, in fact not as much, as the Senator from Nebraska, because it appears from this correspondence that he and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] went to the War Department. I never had any correspondence about it; I never looked after the appropriation.

I am perfectly willing here to-day, if Senators think that it is proper and right, to give these local appropriations, though, in my judgment, it is throwing the money away. But I do appeal to the Senate not to put this amendment in, taking the amount of money to be expended at these different points out of the $300,000. If we have this commission, let us leave it to their discretion, and if they do not obey the act of Congress, let us annul the commission and wipe it out of existence.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me ask the Senator from Missouri how he supposes this $300,000 will be expended?

Mr. VEST. I will answer the Senator frankly, and I have no more information upon it than he has, but simply supposition. I know nothing except from the documentary evidence, the communications before the Senate. I suppose from what Major Suter and the Missouri River Commission have sent us in regard to the last river and harbor bill, that he will consider it his duty to take this $300,000 to perfect or preserve the important work now going on at different points along the river. I suppose he will complete the work at Kansas City and at Saint Joseph, the largest towns upon the river. I think he will do so from what he has said in regard to the last appropriation of $375,000.

I say now if it is the purpose of the Senate to rebuke that commission and to say that this money or any portion of it should be expended at certain different points, taking the discretion away from the commission and putting it in Congress, let us do so emphatically and dismiss the commission and get rid of this criticism when the next river and harbor bill comes up for discussion. Let that proposition be fairly made. Let the Senator from Nebraska in the amendment say $100,000 shall be expended at certain points outside of the $300,000, so that there can not be any discretion used by the commission in regard to the matter at all.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Missouri that if this amendment as proposed by my colleague be placed upon this bill, the action of the Missouri River Commission and the action of the Secretary of War will be in nowise different from what it was last year.

I am in hearty accord with my collengue in the result that he seeks to obtain, but I do not believe that it can be obtained by the language he proposes to engraft in this bill. I think that the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is an excellent one, and that is that in addition to the $300,000 proposed to be expended at points south of Saint Joseph there should be enough increase of appropriation to enable the works that are already constructed and that are being ruined by neglect to be kept in repair.

I am in sympathy too with the proposition of the Senator from Missouri that the proper way to make a permanent improvement of the Missouri River is by the system of reaches, which will take a great many years to improve the river so that it will be available for barge transportation; but perhaps that is the best engineering. I submit also, that where the Government has made great expenditures of money at these points above Saint Joseph, expenditures that have been made for the purpose of keeping the channel of the river between the arches of the bridges that have been erected, those works should be maintained. At the city of Omaha, where I have some degree of familiarity with the work that has been done, at least a quarter of a million dollars has been expended by the Government of the United States, by the two railroads owning property on the banks of the river, the Union Pacific Company and the Burlington and Missouri, and by that great corporation there known as the Omaha Smelting and Refining Company—at least a quarter of a million dollars has been expended for the purpose of keeping the course of the river between the arches of the great bridge between Omaha and Council Bluffs, the Government investment being nearly $100,000. I think there should be some money expended there for the purpose of maintaining this costly work.

I submit this as a substitute for the amendment of my colleague and hope he will accept it, for I think it means something and the other will avail nothing, and I believe it will be acceptable to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not strictly in order, but it will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let it be read for the information of my colleague.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I withdraw my amendment and accept this?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. MANDERSON, as follows:

Continuing the improvement and repair of works already constructed at Atchison, Fort Leavenworth reservation, and Arrow Rock, in Kansas, and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $100,000.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will modify my amendment so as to read in that form.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, let us have the clause read as it will stand, if that should be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition now is to insert this amendment at a different point in the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the paragraph may be read as it will be if that amendment be adopted.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

Continuing improvement and repair of——

Mr. INGALLS. No. Where does that come in?

Mr. MANDERSON. Commence to read at line 1024.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City: Continuing improvement and repair of works already constructed at Atchison, Fort Leavenworth reservation, and Arrow Rock, in Kansas, and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $100,000.

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, no; the amendment should come in at the end of line 1029.

Mr. FRYE. A new item entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be regarded as offered as coming in at the end of line 1029.

Mr. ALLISON. If that be the idea—and I think it is the correct idea in reference to this amendment—then it seems to me the original text as proposed by the Committee on Commerce should be changed:

Improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City: Continuing improvement, $300,000; of which sum, &c.

This phraseology in the bill is deceptive, and it has been misleading. There never has been, or at least in the last two or three bills there has been no improvement of the river from its mouth to Sioux City. It is the failure to make such improvements that induces the Senators from Nebraska to propose the amendments. The truth is, that these expenditures have been made at Kansas City and Saint Joseph for the benefit of those localities and those alone, and there is no reason that can be given why those localities should have this expenditure any more than can be given for every other locality that has a bridge across the Missouri River, because these appropriations are really not appropriations to improve the navigation of the river, but they are for local improvements to keep these bridges from washing into the river.

Mr. VEST. I beg the Senator's pardon. He is mistaken in relation to that.

Mr. ALLISON. Wait a moment, if you please. The Senator from Missouri stated truthfully that there are but two boats between Kansas City and the mouth of the river. There are not so many between Omaha and Kansas City. A gentleman connected with one of the railroads crossing the Missouri River at Atchison or at Saint Jo—and I do not remember now which point—told me that the draw of that bridge had only been opened once during the last year for the passage of a steamer. In other words, there is no navigation practically between Sioux City and the mouth of the Missouri River, and there never will be any navigation, as the Senator from Missouri has justly said, between those points until you enter upon a large expenditure, and this appropriation of $300,000 is as much an appropriation for localities, I repeat now, with all due deference to the Senator from Missouri, as is this suggested appropriation of $100,000.

When you come to the Missouri River above Sioux City the conditions are entirely different. There are lines of boats running from Sioux City to Fort Benton, navigating that river during the entire season of navigation, and transporting a large amount of commerce; and if money is not to be expended for the improvement of the Missouri River until we are ready to enter upon an extended system of reaches, as suggested by Major Suter in his report, we ought to multiply the appropriation between Sioux City and Fort Benton, and for these local improvements, as they are nothing else, we should diminish the appropriation. I think that the railways, with all due deference to the suggestion of the Committee on Commerce, ought to pay a portion of these expenditures as well as the Government of the United States.

I know that the bed of this river is constantly changing, and it is perhaps the duty of the Government to maintain the channel, but it does not maintain it for the primary purpose and object of navigation, because navigation will not exist there until there is an extended system of improvements by means of arranging the banks on both sides of the river practically from the mouth of the river to Sioux City, because there is alluvial soil all the way.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Nebraska having modified his amendment and made a very great change of it, of course it is not understood that I assent to the amendment as now pending.

I wish to say in regard to the improvement of this river that I believe this improvement is for the navigation of the Missouri River. The reason why there are not a great number of boats on the river and why the transportation is not upon the river instead of upon railroad is because the channel of the river is so changeable that it is practically difficult to navigate it, and the boats will not enter upon that stream. If you get the channel of the river improved so that boats can run on it and make it a matter of business, there will be a large transportation upon the bed of that stream; the boats upon the Missouri River will be numerous; the transportation of freight will be great, and the competition with railroads will be very important to the people of this country. That is to regulate the transportation of freight by railroad, and that is the view in which this river is to be improved. That is the reason why the Missouri River Commission adopt the plan which they submit to Congress, and that is the only ground on which I should support any appropriation for the improvement of the river.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have occupied a place in the Senate for now nearly ten years, each year hoping for an opportunity to have a bill presented to the Senate appropriating money for public improvements for which I could conscientiously and constitutionally vote. I have been unable as yet to vote for a single river and harbor bill that has ever been presented to the Senate. I now find in addition to the objects for which millions have been appropriated almost every year, to wit, the improvement of trout streams that can scarcely be found upon the map of any of the States, that there is a new use to which the money of the United States Treasury can be appropriated and paid out. It is now proposed, if I understand aright the arguments of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Nebraska, to take money out of the public Treasury for the purpose of protecting railroad bridges.

Mr. MANDERSON. Did the Senator from New Jersey understand me to make any such proposition?

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood the Senator from Nebraska, when questioned as to the bridge across the river between Omaha and Council Bluffs, to say that it was a railroad bridge.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood him further to say that the Government had expended $100,000 and the railroad company a certain sum—I think he did not state the amount—and that private corporations that needed the river for some purpose or other—smelting works, I think he said—had also paid a sum of money, and the sum total was about $250,000 already expended there for the purpose certainly of helping a private corporation.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think the Senator exactly understood the position I took in reference to the matter. If he understood the Missouri River as well as those of us do who live upon its banks, he would understand that the only place where there is a bank that is at all immovable, that does not change with the pleasure of the current of the stream, is where by solid masonry you have put in a bridge approach. These bridges being built with their piers adapted to the passing of boats upon the river, it then becomes a matter essential to the navigation of the stream that this changing current that changes from one bank to another and eats into the bank on each side, should be kept between the piers of the bridge, and therefore it is that expenditure of the character I have mentioned is for the purposes of navigation strictly—not that the bridge may not be washed away, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, but that the channel of navigation may be kept between the piers of the bridge that have been constructed for the purpose.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then if I understand the Senator aright now, the ever-varying and ever-changing character of the stream itself would imply that as often as it changed the Government of the United States must put in an additional amount of money to protect the property of the corporation that has put a bridge across the stream, for the stream would still be navigable at one place or another. The Government of the United States, as I suppose, has no power to go in any direction except to improve navigable streams by money appropriated in the river and harbor bill.

I submit that as I understood the argument of the Senator from Kansas he confessed that the appropriation of money here made distributed along the whole line of the Missouri River could do nothing and did do nothing except protect the railway and other bridges on that stream. If that be so, it is no proper use of the money and it should not be devoted to such a purpose.

Here is $300,000 appropriated in this river and harbor bill for the purpose of protecting bridges along the line of the Missouri River.

Next year there will be just as much necessity for another appropriation of $300,000 more. I would rather see an appropriation of $10,000,000, a continuing appropriation, the Government pledged to it, to attempt a plan of improvement for the Mississippi and Missouri River, and appropriate for it year after year and complete it, so that finally we shall know what we are to get for our money; but this continual appropriating away three or four hundred thousand dollars year after year to protect the property of private corporations is going beyond what I think this Congress has any right to do.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope not. Let us get through the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator to allow us to have an executive session.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw my motion for the purpose of an executive session.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McMILLAN. We can take a vote on this matter in a very short time, and there will be very few other amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. I move an executive session.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the motion will be voted down.

Mr. CALL. Will not the Senator from Illinois allow me five minutes to ask the Senate to pass a bill?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Kansas objects to my yielding, as he yielded to me for the purpose of making the motion for an executive session.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the motion will be voted down. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON]. I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). I was paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], but the pair is transferred to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and I vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—20.

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLUMB (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senate will finish this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the paragraph be read as it will read when the amendment is incorporated if it be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 1029 it is proposed to add:

Continuing improvement and repair of works already constructed at Atchison, Fort Leavenworth reservation, and Arrow Rock, in Kansas, and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $100,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a separate and independent paragraph.

Mr. INGALLS. Then it does not, as I understand the last reading of the Secretary, attempt to interfere in any way with the disposition of the $300,000 that is provided in the first part of the paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That depends on whether it is made a separate and independent paragraph or not.

Mr. INGALLS. That is what I desire to be advised about, and I think we ought to be advised before we are called on to vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is treated as a separate paragraph after line 1029.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the word "further" were inserted before the word "sum" I think that would make the object very distinct.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not, at this hour of the day, propose to enter into any general discussion of the navigability of the Missouri River nor the methods that should be employed for its improvement. The Senator from Missouri suggested that it ought to be improved by a system of reaches. It appears to me that that is the system already adopted. Kansas City reaches out for about two-thirds of the appropriation and Saint Joseph reaches out for the balance, so that the river is really improved by a system of reaches, and the opinion therefore of the Senator from Missouri as to the method of improvement receives fitting illustration from the method of distribution that has heretofore been adopted by the Secretary of War and the Missouri River Commission.

I repeat what I said before, as it has been attempted to be impugned, that there is no navigation whatever on the Missouri River. A steamboat is a phenomenon and when in the course of the year a single craft that finds its way up or down that stream sounds its steam-gong it is a signal for the inhabitants of the villages along the banks to gather on the bluff to gaze at the unwonted spectacle.

At the city where I live a bridge was constructed with a draw weighing 400 tons, reaching on either side from a central or pivot pier. It was arranged with an engine, so great was supposed to be the necessity for opening it in order to admit the passage of boats up and down the stream, but the engine with which it was equipped has been sold, the whole structure is dismantled, and not to exceed once or twice a year is that draw ever opened for the purpose of enabling any craft to pass through on either side of the pivot-pier.

Mr. HALE. They go around?

Mr. INGALLS. They would go around if there was no appropriation made for the purpose of improving the navigation of the stream. [Laughter.] Therefore the principle that is sought to be applied to this particular curve in the Missouri River, which was known as the grand détour of the French voyageur, extending from Kansas City at one point of the curve around to Saint Joseph on the other, which is the place where the Missouri River makes the greatest excursion inland in all its journey through the three States that have been named, is a principle that is applied to no other point and to no other appropriation that is made in this bill in any portion of the country.

The Senator from Missouri states that it is a criminal waste of this money to apply it in small portions to uncompleted work. Is there any other point on any other river in the whole circumference of the continent where that is not exactly what is done? Is there any other place from the Atlantic to the Pacific on any stream that the necessary amount to complete the work at any one given point is appropriated and spent and then that is abandoned? No, sir; not one, but for some occult and mysterious reason—I do not know what that reason is and do not pretend to assign any cause for it—but for some mysterious reason it is declared that with regard to this particular tract of 80 miles, about, in length, following the meanderings of the stream from Saint Joseph to Kansas City, the entire amount shall be taken and devoted to the improvement of the river at these two points until it is absolutely completed and that meanwhile all the other points are to be abandoned.

Is that method applied to other points on the Mississippi River? We have been spending uncounted millions on that stream below Saint Louis. Has it ever before been urged that the Mississippi River Commission or the Secretary of War should take the whole eight or ten million that we appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and apply it all to one single reach, the way they do at the Kansas City reach, and so continue from year to year until the work at that point is completed, and meanwhile leave all other points open to the depredations of the stream or to the ravages of time? Certainly not, Mr. President, and therefore I am justified in saying that the attempt to apply this principle and this method to this particular space upon the map of the United States to the neglect of intermediate points, is something that is unjustifiable, unprecedented, and that requires more explanation than I have been able to find for it in the report of Major Suter or General Parke; and if there be any possibility by which the same method can be adopted for the expenditure of this appropriation that has been followed in every other appropriation since the river and harbor bills have been enacted I desire that it shall be applied to the expenditure of these $300,000. I am not content to leave that sum to be divided again upon the reach system between Kansas City and Saint Joseph and allow a little appendix of $100,000 to be made for the purpose of protecting the works that have been commenced at these other points and that are just exactly as essential to the protection of commerce and to the welfare of great communities as the contemplated works at Saint Louis and Kansas City.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. It is evident we can not get through the bill to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 21, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 19, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

CLAIMS ALLOWED UNDER EXHAUSTED APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental list of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury under exhausted appropriations; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY POSTAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates from the Postmaster-General of deficiency appropriations for the fiscal years 1885 and 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a supplemental report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico upon private land claim No. 107, known as the grant to the town of Socorro; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL EXPENSES IN WYOMING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting a communication from the United States attorney for the Territory of Wyoming in relation to the inadequacy of fees and mileage allowed to the United States attorney and marshal and to jurors and witnesses in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10658) to provide for terms of the United States district court at Raleigh, N. C., and change the lines between the eastern and western districts, said bill having been returned from the Senate with amendments and a request for a conference.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference requested.

Mr. DINGLEY. In this connection I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this a bill in which a request is made by the Senate for a conference?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask if a single objection would prevent the House from taking up the bill and considering that request?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The Chair has had occasion to decide the same question several times. After there has been an actual disagreement between the two Houses the matter is privileged; but until an actual disagreement takes place no privilege attaches to it.

Mr. DINGLEY. And one single objection here interposed would send this bill to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It would; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DINGLEY. And when it comes back from the committee it would go on the Calendar, and could not be taken up except by unanimous consent until that committee is called for consideration of bills under the hour rule.

The SPEAKER. That would be the order.

Mr. DINGLEY. And hence a single objection would practically prevent a House bill with Senate amendments from being taken up and considered under the rules of the House, as it is rarely that a committee is called under the hour rule.

The SPEAKER. It would be placed just in the position of any other legislation of the House or Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. But it seems to me that when the House has passed a bill and the Senate has concurred with an amendment, the rules of the House should provide some method by which it can be reached by the House, and not be at the mercy of a single objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair might agree with the gentleman as to what the rule should be in that respect; but it is the duty of the Chair to administer the rules as they are.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is true; but my object in calling attention to the condition in which our rules place a bill that has advanced so far as to pass this House and to also pass the Senate with an amendment is to impress upon the House and the Committee on Rules the importance of an amendment to our rules which will free our procedure from such an obstruction to public business. Last session I introduced and had referred to the Committee on Rules, of which the Speaker is chairman, an amendment designed to give a majority of the House the power to take up and act upon House bills in which the Senate had concurred with an amendment, and I trust that committee will report that or some other amendment to free the House from the power of a single objector in the case of bills advanced to such a stage.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the bill?

Mr. BENNETT. It is in reference to a judicial division of a State.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the order requested by the gentleman from North Carolina will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BENNETT, Mr. CULBERSON, and Mr. HEPBURN.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER, CHATTANOOGA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 8880) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Chattanooga, Tenn.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent to concur in the amendments of the Senate. I have examined them, and see no objection to incorporating them in the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendments had better be reported.

The amendments were read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HATCH. One moment. Will the gentleman state what this bill is? I could not catch the reading of it.

Mr. CRISP. It is to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River.

There being no objection, the Senate amendments were concurred in.

UNITED STATES COURTS, VICKSBURG, MISS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 6764) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Vicksburg, Miss.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the House concur in the Senate amendments. They are simply verbal amendments, and do not affect the general scope of the bill as it passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The amendments had better be reported.

The amendments were read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be some explanation of the effect of these amendments.

Mr. CATCHINGS. They are simply of a verbal character, and do not affect the general terms of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate amendments were concurred in.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, RICHMOND, VA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 7209) to authorize the construction of a gravel road to the Richmond national cemetery, near Richmond, Va.

Mr. WISE. I hope the amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. BRAGG. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the amendment here is simply to insert the word "dollars," which was omitted by the House.

Mr. BRAGG. Omitted by the engrossment clerk.

There being no objection, the Senate amendment was concurred in.

ADELIZA PERRY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 4535) granting a pension to Adeliza Perry.

The SPEAKER. This is simply a correction of the spelling of the name of the beneficiary of the bill by inserting the letter "z" instead of "s;" and without objection the Senate amendment will be concurred in.

There was no objection.

STABLES FOR HORSES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 10091) for the construction of a stable for the use of the horses and wagons for the offices of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask for the reading of the Senate amendments.

The amendments were read at length.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JAMES W. GOODRICH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 5652) for the relief of James W. Goodrich.

The SPEAKER. This amendment simply corrects the name of the beneficiary; and if there be no objection the Senate amendment will be concurred in.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3288) to provide for the increase of the naval establishment; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RETURN OF BILLS TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House requests of the Senate for the return of bills of the following titles, namely:

The bill (S. 2944) making appropriations for the jetties in Charleston Harbor; and

The bill (S. 3107) granting a pension to Catharine F. Ellsworth.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will be directed to return these bills to the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INTERNATIONAL SHEEP AND WOOL SHOW.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate, providing for the printing of 2,000 additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture on the International Sheep and Wool Show of Philadelphia, in 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MAYBURY, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LOWRY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, for three days, on account of important business.

ORDER TO PRINT SENATE BILL NO. 2288.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], asks an order to print the bill (S. 2288) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship-railway Company, and for other purposes. This is a bill which has passed the Senate. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. MCRAE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 10) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882;

A bill (S. 1458) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan at Bay City, in said district; and

A bill (H. R. 9116) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Texarkana, Ark., and for other purposes.

VETO MESSAGE—DEPENDENT PENSIONS.

Mr. MATSON. I rise to present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. Is it a conference report?

Mr. MATSON. No, sir; it is a report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the message of the President vetoing the dependent pensions bill. I ask unanimous consent that the report may be printed in the RECORD; and I give notice that on Thursday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, it will be called up for the action of the House after debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, presents a report on the following bill and message of the President. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10457) for the relief of dependent parents and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to have this report printed in the RECORD, and gives notice that he will call it up for consideration on next Thursday.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. MATSON. Then I ask that the report be printed in the usual way.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana does not ask for the present consideration of the report.

Mr. BURROWS. But objection is made to its being printed in the RECORD, and I ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed as a document.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask for its reading, unless gentlemen on the other side withdraw the objection to its being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HAMMOND. We are not called upon to vote on the report at this time, and I object to the reading. That would be in the nature of debate.

The SPEAKER. But if the report is before the House and some other action is not taken with regard to it, it is here for consideration.

Mr. HAMMOND. But the gentleman from Indiana who makes the report has stated he did not intend to ask for action upon it until next Thursday.

Mr. MATSON. I ask, as this is a matter of great importance, that the report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] renews his request that the report be printed in the RECORD. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] still object?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do. Let the report be printed in the usual way.

Mr. MATSON. Then I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Is it in order for the report to be read when presented?

The SPEAKER. It is. The report is privileged and is now before the House, and unless the House makes some other disposition of it it is here for consideration, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], who has the floor, asks to have it read.

Mr. DUNN. Let us vote on it now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was submitted the bill——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order. I submit to the Chair that under Rule XXXI the reading of the paper is not in order if objected to, as it is not proposed that final action shall be taken upon it at this time.

The SPEAKER. But action must be taken upon it. It is a privileged report. If the House does not recommit the report or order it to lie over it is before the House for consideration at this time, and the reading of the report is a part of the debate.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I understood the Chair to say that the gentleman from Indiana did not desire action on the report at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And he would not if the gentleman from Arkansas had not made his objection.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the report be laid over until next Thursday.

The SPEAKER. That is a proper motion. The Chair repeats that unless some action is taken by the House to postpone the consideration of the report it is here for consideration at this time.

Mr. BURROWS. I make the point of order that the objection comes too late. The Clerk has already commenced the reading.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] has moved to postpone the consideration of the report.

Mr. BURROWS. Although the gentleman from Georgia has made a motion to postpone the consideration of the report, I insist that nevertheless it must be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided otherwise.

Mr. BURROWS. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Of course a motion to postpone requires a vote of the House, and the question is debatable under the rules.

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly. Let the report be read.

The Clerk again commenced to read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was submitted the bill (H. R. 10457)——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, addressed the Chair.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This is the regular order. I withdraw the objection. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I will give gentlemen the regular order. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Is it in order for me to withdraw the objection?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. BRAGG. I renew it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is it in order for me to withdraw the motion to postpone?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HAMMOND. I withdraw it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was submitted the bill (H. R. 10457) for the relief of dependent parents, and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, who are now disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, and the message of the President, stating his objections thereto, having had said bill and accompanying message under consideration, respectfully submit the following:

Two facts will arrest the attention of any one who reads the message under consideration; the first is, that no objection is made to the bill on any ground of its constitutionality. The right of Congress to enact the law is not questioned; all the questions raised are questions of mere expediency. The other is, that the first section of the bill is not touched upon by the message, and no intimation is given by the President as to whether that section of itself alone, embodying as it does an independent proposition, and in the precise form specifically urged by the Secretary of the Interior in his last annual report, meets with his approval or disapproval.

The message is devoted wholly to the second section of the bill, and this report is intended to meet the objections the President has seen fit to urge against that.

The subject-matters embraced in the second section have, since the earliest days of this Congress, received the earnest and continued attention of this committee, and a brief history of what has been done may not be altogether uninteresting, and, indeed, seems to be made necessary, in order that a more thorough understanding of the facts may be had.

The bill appears to have been introduced by the writer of this report, and was so introduced on the 10th of January, 1887. Months before that time, however, except as to the fourth section of said bill, the bill had been agreed upon by this committee after long, careful, and exhaustive deliberation, and the committee had directed that any privilege belonging to it as a committee should not be allowed to escape without an attempt to pass the bill in the House.

When this Congress met a number of important matters of general pension legislation were pressed upon the attention of the committee; some of them, in our judgment, involving the expenditure of more money than is caused by this bill. The arrears proposition was pressed with great force and earnestness; a proposition to equalize bounties, to pension prisoners of war, and a general service pension bill to pension all the soldiers of the Union at $8 per month, besides many others of less magnitude, but each having its especial champions, who were continuously contending for precedence before your committee. The conclusion was that the really indigent soldiers were first of all entitled to some relief, and that relief to them would satisfy, in a measure, the demands for many other kinds of legislation; and with this in view, your committee went to work to frame a bill upon which we could all agree, and which we believed, in that regard, would meet the immediate needs of our ex-soldiers, as well as the approval of the country.

On the 1st day of March, 1886, Mr. ELLSBERRY, of Ohio, introduced a bill (H. R. 6230) entitled "A bill granting pensions to all invalid soldiers, or their widows, of the United States in the late civil war who are dependent upon their daily labor for support." The first section of this bill, out of deference to the gentleman who was its author, as he had so persistently pressed us to give the subject preference over all other measures, was taken as the frame-work for the bill agreed upon by the committee. It will be ascertained upon examination that the Ellsberry bill provides a pension for a total disability, and also for an "inferior disability an amount proportionate to that," and so when the criticism was first made in relation to the bill now under consideration that the class of pensions embraced by said bill was not well defined, this committee set about, with some apprehension, to inquire whether there was that vagueness or ambiguity that aid it open to the objections stated.

After the most painstaking, candid, and judicial consideration of the subject, we are compelled to insist that the construction given to it by the committee, as stated upon the floor of the House at the time the bill passed, is the only fair interpretation to be put upon it. It provides but one pension, and that pension is one of $12 per month, and is given for a "total inability to procure a subsistence by daily labor." There is no provision for any less rate, nor for any less degree of disability than a total inability, and it is further provided that "such pension shall continue during the existence of the disability in the degree herein provided." What degree? There is but the one provided for, and that is a degree of total inability to procure a subsistence by daily labor. The point we wish to emphasize is that but one pension is provided, and that to obtain it a degree of total inability to procure a subsistence by daily labor must be shown, and that it is further expressly stated that the pension shall only continue while that degree of inability continues.

By some strange circumstance this provision of the bill which fixes the time during which the pension provided for shall continue, and states as aptly as language can state anything that it shall be in "the degree" provided for therein, has escaped the attention of the Executive and other critics referred to by him, who seek to place a construction upon the bill different from that which was clearly intended and which we believe is clearly expressed. All agree that the bill embraces those who have this degree of total inability. The only question at issue is whether it does not embrace more than that class. In the light of the express limitation that is placed by the bill as to the time during which the pension shall continue, we submit with confidence to the discriminating judgment of the House and the country that but one construction can be given it, and that is the one adopted by your committee.

But the President says that "if the bill had been intended to embrace only those who were totally unable to labor it would have been very easy to express that idea instead of recognizing, as is done, 'a degree' of such inability." This may be true, but the question is not whether the language is the most apt to give expression to an idea, but rather what is the idea expressed and what is intended by the bill; and in view of the fact that the last words used in the bill, and words which prescribe the right to a pension to exist only in one class who have "the degree" of disability provided for, entirely excludes the construction sought to be given by the President that more than one class would be included.

These words are used in prescribing the right to a pension under the bill, and are not mere words of description. Taken altogether, and not so delicately analyzed that the refinement of a chemical experiment is exceeded in an effort to do away with the plain provisions of the bill, we again submit to the judgment of the House and the country that those who framed the bill, after months of careful, deliberate consultation, have made no mistake, and have embraced but one class, and that class can be well described as those "totally unable to labor" and "who are dependent upon their daily labor for support."

But it is asked what is a support, and how is it to be fairly determined? The answer to that is that this very question for twenty-five years has been adjudicated by the Pension Office, and in perhaps more than ten thousand cases. Whenever a claim has been made by a dependent father, one of the material inquiries was, was the claimant himself, at the time of the death of the soldier, happening in some cases many years before, then able to earn his support by daily labor. Under this bill the inquiry will be one that will relate only to the date of the filing of the application, and for that reason can be the more easily adjudicated. If the Pension Office can not adjudicate that question, the whole business of rating pensions is a farce, for upon all degrees of disabilities under the general law the rate of pension is fixed in amounts ranging from $1 to $72, upon the degree of physical disability, and to the extent it disables the pensioner, for what? for earning a support by manual labor.

This section of the bill is to be construed as all other laws or legal instruments are construed, so that the words used should be given their ordinary meaning and acceptation. No technical or other meaning that by the practice of the Pension Office or otherwise may attach to a word, or to an expression, is to obtain, and the rule laid down by the Executive that "pension laws should be liberally administered as measures of benevolence in behalf of worthy beneficiaries" may be a sound rule of construction; but if it is, it is at least met by another rule of law, that statutes conferring new rights are to be strictly construed, and especially is this true where the statute is not in aid of any contract, express or implied, with the beneficiary named.

If this bill did embrace all who are described in the President's interpretation of it, this committee would still favor its passage, for those he describes are such as are, to say the least of it, in a needy condition, and we are not prepared to refuse a pension even to them, if one is needed to give a comfortable living.

We regard the strained interpretation put upon the bill in the message as an excuse rather than a reason for returning it to the House, and we believe we do no injustice to the Executive when considering the whole message to say that if its provisions had been plainer, and that no question could have been raised as to whether it included only those unable to labor, that he would have yet interposed objections. He says:

"If none should be pensioned under this bill except those utterly unable to labor I am satisfied that the cost stated would be many times multiplied, and with a constant increase from year to year."

The cost referred to by him has just been stated at $4,767,120 per annum, and the number of persons to be embraced in that estimate, 33,105. And again he says: "Never before in the history of the country has it been proposed to render Government aid toward the support of any of its soldiers based alone upon a military service so recent, and where age and circumstances seem so little to demand it."

If the estimate referred to is too small, so that it would be multiplied many times, it can be said that the number of soldiers who could be reached by this bill, who are totally unable to work, and who are dependent upon their daily labor for support, is about 100,000; for if our estimate is multiplied by three, which certainly is not more than many, then the appalling fact is reached that so many of the heroic men who have suffered for their country's sake are now absolutely needy and totally unable to work.

This consideration causes us to stand more firmly for the proposition embodied in the second section of the bill, because, conceding that our estimate is too low, and that the number utterly unable to work is larger than was heretofore estimated, then there is a that much stronger reason for giving the relief; that many more are to be found of (using the language of the President, taken from his last annual message) "those who have served their country long and well and are reduced to destitution and dependence, not as an incident of their service, but with advancing age through sickness or misfortune." And we have been "tempted by the contemplation of such a condition," and are yet tempted more strongly when we consider the fact that we have not fully realized the full extent of suffering now being undergone by those heroes, "to supply relief," and if we were wrong in our estimate we submit that we are supplied now with a stronger reason than ever before for the passage of this bill notwithstanding the objections of the Executive.

But it is urged that some unworthy ones would be benefited by this bill. Possibly so, and so under any general law, no matter how you might attempt to guard it, great abuses might arise. As to the length of service, it is contended that as only three months' service is required, some who had seen little, if any, field service could take advantage of its provisions. Yet upon the other hand, thousands and tens of thousands of men who enlisted for only three months saw some of the most arduous and dangerous service of the entire war, and the injury that results to one who quits the peaceful vocations of life to undergo the trying ordeal of an active military service is most likely to follow from the earlier months of his service than from a period of his service later, when he has become inured to it.

The same process of reasoning adopted by the Executive in support of this objection would have obtained against every general statute that now gives a pension or ever did give one. More than all that, this bill is intended to relieve those who can not prove a pension claim under the present laws; men who saw field service and who made no hospital records. Those who made hospital records can now conveniently use them to procure relief. They have no difficulty in going through the Pension Office upon their hospital records, and a large share of such soldiers are pensioned, while the man who was always in his place in the ranks and can show no disability by the records that was sufficient to keep him from duty, but as old age comes on begins to feel the strain put upon him by the fact that he was always ready to report "present for duty," is left to suffer, and for him we supply no relief.

It passes the comprehension of this committee to understand how the President could have overlooked in another bill what are alleged as faults in this bill. The bill we refer to passed the House on the same day this did, and met with his unhesitating approval. It is the bill to give pensions to the survivors of the war with Mexico, &c. Under that bill if one who was a soldier in that war and is now under sixty-two years of age applies he must allege and prove some degree of dependency, and no matter how slight, quite vague and indefinite, and any degree of disability is sufficient, no matter how incurred, except in the military service against the United States; and no matter if he be worth millions he need only show sixty days' service; he need not have been in actual engagement with the enemy, or subjected to any of the actual dangers of war, or even that he should have been in Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof; it is sufficient if he had been en route thereto; and it embraces within its provisions more persons than are to be benefited by the bill now under consideration.

It grants the pension to every soldier over sixty-two years of age without any condition as to his circumstances or necessities, and without requiring any disability as the result of service, even though he be a member of Congress drawing a salary of $5,000 per annum. It gives a pension to every soldier under sixty-two years for any disability, even if the disability resulted since his service and from his own vicious habits or gross carelessness, and for this he gets $8, while the Union soldier for the same disability received in the line of duty and while in the service would get perhaps only $2; and it gives a pension to every widow of a soldier in that war who is now sixty-two years of age, whether she was the wife of the soldier or not at the time of his service, without reference to the cause of his death, even if he was killed in battle while serving in the confederate army.

This committee would rejoice if there could even now be found some indefinite vagueness or latent ambiguity in the Mexican pension law that would enable the President to say that these results were not foreseen by him when he was approving the one and contemplating a veto of the other.

The bill we presented to the House was broad, liberal, and patriotic. It struck down any disbarment from the pension-list on account of any service against the flag, excepting such persons as were laboring under political disabilities. It was intended to reach mainly the survivors of our civil war who had fought for the Union, but it embraced within its generous terms the survivors of the war of 1812, the Indian wars, and the war with Mexico—all who could show that they were totally unable to labor and were dependent upon their daily labor for support could appeal to its provisions, and all were to be treated exactly alike. If this bill fails to become a law, such distinctions are made by the acts of the Executive in approving one and disapproving the other that the committee can not believe it will be indorsed anywhere by the patriotic sentiment of this country.

Inasmuch as the bill under consideration has, in a measure, been treated by the Executive as a service pension bill only, and particular reference has been made by him in his veto message to the first legislation had by Congress under which the soldiers of the war of the Revolution became pensioners regardless of disability contracted in the service and line of duty, it is deemed proper in this connection to give a brief history of such legislation, and to present such facts in connection therewith as may be pertinent to the matter under consideration.

On March 18, 1818, Congress passed an act granting pensions to the surviving officers and soldiers of the war of the Revolution, who, "by reason of their reduced circumstances in life, shall be in need of assistance from their country for support." The only other requirement under the act was nine months' service during or at the close of the war. The rate of pension provided in said act was $20 per month in cases of officers, and $8 per month for enlisted men. The act further provided that the title to pension thereunder shall be determined by the respective courts of the locality in which the applicant resided.

Under this act 22,297 applications, in accordance with its provisions, were filed in the Department, but, so far as the records show, 20,485 only were allowed.

On May 15, 1828, Congress enlarged the pension provided for by the aforesaid act of March 18, 1818, to the full pay of officers and soldiers of the Continental line. This increase largely benefited the officers.

The next legislation with reference to Revolutionary soldiers' service pensions was had in 1832, when, under the act of June 2, of that year, full-pay pensions, without regard to financial condition, were granted to all, except foreign officers, who served for two years, and to those who served at least six months an amount proportionate, according to the length of their service.

From the best information obtainable there were, during the recognized period of the war of the Revolution (April 19, 1775, to April 11, 1783), 30°,791 enlistments. This number, however, includes re-enlistments and transfers a .d th erefc : docs not represent the actual number of individuals engaged in said war. It may be safe to say that 165,000 individuals served at one period or the other dt ring the war. The number of invalid pensions granted by the General Government on account of disability contracted in said war was small, 2,513 only being of record. This is explained, however, by the fac tthat prior to March 23, 1792, the pensions found to be due to an invalid, under the regulations established by the President, was paid by the State to which his services were credited.

The President takes occasion to remind Congress of the fallacy of the estimate made by the Committee on Invalid Pensions on section 2 of the bill under consideration as to the probable annual cost of the pensions provided therein by referring to the estimate made by Mr. Bloomfield, of New Jersey, chairman Committee on Revolutionary War Pensions, in December, 1817, regarding the probable number of beneficiaries under the bill proposing to grant a pension to the indigent survivors of the war of the Revolution.

In justice to this committee it may be stated that while its estimate was largely based upon official data, and other reasonably reliable information, the estimate of the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions at the time referred to, seems to have no foundation whatever, except such as his own limited knowledge, confined to his own locality, could afford.

He based his estimate upon the then to him known survivors of the officers of the New Jersey Brigade, 20 in number, out of a total of 160, who he states served in said brigade; which he considered a fair guide as to the proportion of surviving officers in other States, and, as he believed, the whole number of officers during the war to have been 2,720, there were then living 340, one-tenth of whom, or 34, would apply for pension. He further estimated the number of enlisted men in the service at the close of the war at 17,000, one-tenth of whom, or 1,700, he believed were then living. He further believed that one-fifth of that number, or 340, would try to avail themselves of the pension provided by the bill, making a total of officers and enlisted men as probable beneficiaries, 374.

Admitting, for sake of argument, the statements made by Mr. Bloomfield that there were 17,000 deaths in the Army during the war and that there were only 17,000 men in the Army at the close of the war, we fail to find in what manner he accounted for the other 275,791 enlistments during the war, as shown by official statistics.

Estimating that by that number only 150,000 individual persons are represented, and that three-fourths of that number rendered during different periods of the war the requisite nine months' service under the act, there were left sight of, in this so-called estimate, 112,500 soldiers. Following up Mr. Bloomfield's calculation, 11,250 of that number would have been alive at the date of his speech, and 2,324 would have been the number of expected applicants instead of 374. But were his estimates in any particular based upon what could then even be deemed sufficient ground therefor? Only thirty-four years had elapsed since the close of that war.

Presuming that the total individual enlistments were only 165,000, and that 17,000 died during the war, 148,000 survived the same. According to Mr. Bloomfield's statements, one-tenth only of the survivors were supposed to be then living. Instead of 2,040, as he would make us believe, there would have been 14,800. But that he estimated the losses by death at an entirely too high and unwarrantable rate is self-evident. No recognized mortality tables warrant such an extraordinary calculation. If the mortality among the 148,000 presumed survivors reached 12 per thousand annually for the first twenty years, we find 112,480 survivors in the year 1803, and 20 per thousand for the remaining fourteen years, 80,994 would have been the number of survivors in the year of Mr. Bloomfield's remarkable estimate of 374. This estimate is in keeping with recognized authorities on the subject, and borne out by the fact that, as heretofore stated, 22,297 of the soldiers of that war presented themselves before the courts of their respective counties under the act of 1818, 1,200 under the act of 1828, and 39,208 more under the act of 1832.

This committee does not desire to question Mr. Bloomfield's honesty of purpose in his explanation of the cost of his bill. He evidently had overlooked the fact that the bill would benefit a large number of ex-soldiers whose term of service had expired before peace was declared. Again, the facilities for making estimates in a matter, under the most favorable circumstances, necessarily involved in more or less doubt, were not of the character afforded the legislator of to-day. The country was in its infancy. The stage-coach was the only means of travel, the post the only means of communication. Either was expensive and tedious, and little calculated to promote intercourse and communication with persons living in remote places or any considerable distance. Soldiers' reunions of to-day would have been an impossibility, while 4th of July gatherings, to which Mr. Bloomfield referred, were necessarily limited to those who lived within a distance of a few miles.

The young soldier of the Revolution who left his home in the East to seek his fortune in the then hardly known western part of the country, was soon lost sight of by his former comrades. This undoubtedly was the case with thousands. To-day the railroad, the telegraph, and the cheap mail reach nearly every neighborhood throughout the entire United States, affording facilities for intercourse and communication, not only cheap but rapid. The New England soldier who since the close of the late war has settled in the far West is enabled to attend the reunion of his old regiment in his native town without much expense or loss of time. The present whereabouts of nearly all the survivors of the war of the rebellion are known to the Government.

Without any desire to discuss the relative distinctiveness of the act of 1818 and the bill under consideration, it is evident that the former was not subjected to that strict interpretation that pension laws at this date receive at the hands of the proper authorities, or would have been subjected to had the power to determine the merits of each individual case been placed in the Government instead of the local court officers. It is true that under the provisions of the act of 1818 claimants were not required to prove "total inability to procure their subsistence by daily labor" in addition to their dependence upon such labor for their support, but that, even under the more liberal provisions of that act, many, through favoritism, by misrepresentations and other disreputable devices, were adjudged indigent there can be doubt, for it is hardly possible that one out of every four of the survivors, "by reason of his reduced circumstances in life," needed the assistance of his country for support at an average age of fifty-five years.

The committee have after long and patient labor exhausted every means at their command to ascertain the probable number who would be beneficiaries under the second section of this bill. General J. C. Black, Commissioner of Pensions, last year, with great care and labor, made a special effort to learn the exact number of persons who had at any time been in the military service of the United States and who are now supported wholly or in part by public charity. For this purpose he caused carefully prepared blanks to be sent to every county in the nation. Reports were received from thirty-six States and seven Territories, including the District of Columbia. These reports he has fully and carefully tabulated, and from the data thus secured he concludes that the total number of soldiers now in the poor-houses and other charitable institutions, not including the soldiers' homes maintained by the General Government, can not exceed 9,000.

This includes some who have served in the regular Army in time of peace, and who would not therefore be entitled to any of the benefits of this act. Your committee are of the opinion that this number constitutes at least one-third of those who would be placed upon the pension-roll under the provisions of this bill, and this opinion is strengthened by a careful and elaborate examination of reports of the Commissioner of Pensions for several years past, and a careful comparison of tables submitted in such reports. But to guard against any possibility of underestimating, they have placed the number at three times that given by the Commissioner, making the total number 27,000, the annual cost of which would be about $4,000,000, allowing the full pension to all. But the statistics obtained show that of the 9,000 so estimated to be dependent 1,200 are now receiving pensions of some amount, and 1,800 are reported insane or blind. It is highly probable that many are now receiving the full amount allowed by this measure.

It is proper to add in this connection that the amount of pensions paid under the pension laws, except where the rate is fixed for a specific disability, depends to a considerable extent upon the report made by the examining boards of surgeons and the decisions of the medical referees of the Pension Office, and also upon the construction given by the Commissioner of Pensions. If the benefits of this act are restricted to a total inability to procure a subsistence by daily labor, your committee are confident the amount required would not exceed the estimate herein made. It is true that "cost should not be set against a patriotic duty or the recognition of a right." The duty to provide for those soldiers now in want, or who are either inmates of our almshouses, or who are cared for by private beneficence, seems to be clear and indisputable. No consideration of probable cost should be allowed to come between them and the relief which they are entitled to receive from a country which they have helped to save.

The cost as estimated by your committee was not excessive, and was well within the means of the Government. But if it should happen that the cost should be largely increased by addition to the list of many more than was estimated, the country is well able to care for them. The system of taxation which has existed since the war, and which Congress has manifested no disposition to interfere with, produces a revenue far beyond that which is necessary to carry on the Government economically administered. This surplus is constantly on the increase, and is a standing temptation for every kind of device to again get it into circulation among the people. This committee has nothing to say as to the immediate necessity for fortifying our harbors and coasts, nor as to the amount of expenditure requisite for such an undertaking, nor have they any special fault to find with the erection of public buildings whenever the public convenience require them, nor yet do they criticise the large amounts annually expended in the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country.

But it is a patent fact that no such schemes would be entertained in many instances, nor such large amounts expended in these directions were it not for the large and constantly increasing surplus in the Treasury—a surplus which there will be no way of returning to circulation among the people after the payment of the 3 per cent. bonds, now nearly completed, and before the maturity of the bonds becoming due in 1891, except by appropriations for some purpose. Dismissing the question whether a pension is a gratuity, which the President in a former message says it is not, and accepting his definition in his present message that it is a charity, and not considering it necessary to present purposes exactly to define whether a pension is a gratuity or a charity, or simply an expression of gratitude from the people to those who have in times past been their defenders, and reducing the whole question to one of money expediency, it seems to your committee that this surplus will be best restored to them in the manner proposed by this bill.

No bonded interest or huge monopolies can claim it as their own, and share it among themselves according to the strength of their "combine." It will go among the people in small amounts and will be spent in their midst. It will be returned directly to those from whom it largely came. Your committee has thus far failed to receive any expressions of disapproval of this bill from soldiers or army organizations; on the contrary they heartily approve of it, as indeed they should, for it was framed at their instance and in accordance with the necessities of cases constantly brought to the notice of this committee and claiming their attention. So far as they have been able to gather public sentiment on this question, the opposition to the bill seems to be strongest in moneyed centers in which all water which does not turn their mills is considered as worse than wasted.

Your committee has no means of ascertaining what bonded indebtedness is still "resting on a great majority of northern counties and cities on account of the large local bounties paid our soldiers." So far as the knowledge of their own districts goes, this indebtedness has been paid long since. No motives of patriotism were concerned in the creation of this debt. A draft was imminent, which would have swept into the army the rich and poor, without drawing any nice distinctions of any character whatever. The counties, townships, and the cities, therefore, decided for themselves, and on their own motion, that they would prefer to pay bounties and raise their quota rather than have their citizens subjected to the drag-net of the draft. If any counties, townships, or cities are yet oppressed by the debts erected in this way, it is because the aversion of their citizens to military service was so great that they were willing and anxious to pay extraordinary bounties to those who were willing to go in their places.

It was a bargain all around, and neither party to it is entitled to any special sympathy or consideration. It is undoubtedly a "source of pride and congratulation to the American citizen that his country is not put to the charge of maintaining a large standing army in times of peace," and it is also to be regretted "that we are now living under a war tax which has been tolerated in peaceful times to meet the obligations incurred in war." Your committee regret that they are not able to suggest a way of escape from the expenses incurred in the prosecution of war. An army is not a necessity in times of peace, and the expense of maintaining one can be dispensed with, but to carry on a war with any degree of success an army is necessary, and all the unusual expense consequent upon its equipment and support must be incurred, to be paid for when peace and prosperity are again restored. The era of universal peace not yet having arrived, we must continue to fight first and pay afterwards.

Your committee has no desire to discuss all the points alluded to in the message of the President, but they feel constrained to allude to that portion of a former message in which he says: "I can not rid myself of the conviction that if these ex-soldiers are to be relieved, they and their cause are entitled to the benefit of an enactment under which relief may be claimed as a right, and that such relief should be granted under the sanction of law, and not in evasion of it; nor should such worthy objects of care, all equally entitled, be remitted to the unequal operation of sympathy, or the tender mercies of social and political influence with their unjust discriminations."

The experience of your committee has brought them into hearty accord with these views of the President, and largely in accordance with his suggestions they framed a bill which they then thought, and still continue to think, will best accomplish the ends proposed. They are of the opinion that the bill, if interpreted by the officers of the Pension Bureau, or by any one in sympathy with its object, will fully meet the case. They are also equally well aware that to those who are opposed to pension legislation no bill, however framed, can escape misconstruction and misinterpretation.

The President says:

"Recent personal observation and experience constrain me to refer to another result which will inevitably follow the passage of this bill. It is sad but nevertheless true, that already in the matter of procuring pensions there exists a widespread disregard of truth and good faith, stimulated by those who as agents undertake to establish claims for pensions, heedlessly entered upon by the expectant beneficiary, and encouraged or at least not condemned by those unwilling to obstruct a neighbor's plans."

Your committee do not share in the opinion that "there exists a widespread disregard of truth and good faith" in the prosecution of pension claims. Nor do we believe that the ex-soldiers of the country are prone to commit fraud, perjury, and subornation of perjury for that purpose or for any other. If, however, such be the fact, it does not appear to be productive of result in the successful issue of fraudulent claims in any appreciable degree.

The late Commissioner of Pensions, Hon. W. W. Dudley, in an annual report, says that with the most searching investigation of all cases of suspected fraud the result showed that in the number of allowed claims one-tenth of 1 per cent., or one in each thousand only, of allowed cases were fraudulent. With the present large force of special examiners in the field, charged with the duty of reporting to the office any evidence, even of a hearsay character, that tends to show a claim to be fraudulent, the opportunity to procure a fraudulent pension, or to enjoy one after it is procured, seems to be reduced to the minimum.

No pension attorney or other claim agent has ever advocated this bill before this committee or spoken in its favor to a single member thereof. Indeed, the paltry fee of $5 allowed for the prosecution of claims under it offers no inducement to them. They prefer to confine their business to the more profitable channel of $25 fees now allowed under the general law; and for that reason would rather not see this bill become a law. This is the free-will offering of the committee to the soldiers of the country, uninfluenced in any degree by claim agents, and brought about by the needs of those it proposes to benefit, as we have been brought to know them. It is not claimed that it goes as far as very many desired it should go, but it is at least a good start in the right direction.

In conclusion we submit that the general tone of the message is to be fairly taken as an expression in advance of a purpose to use the Executive power to prevent any further legislation that will add any new class to our pension-list, or that will materially increase the cost thereof, and based upon the idea that the country is against it.

We are aware that there is a sentiment of that kind, but insist that it is not a controlling one. We are loth to believe that the people of this country are willing to allow the defenders of the nation's honor and life to live in their declining years in misery and want, and that they would prefer that those who make their laws should err upon the side of mercy rather than upon the side of a too rigid economy in the expenditure of the public money in that direction, and if more taxes, or even a different kind of taxes, are necessary to meet this demand it would be cheerfully paid by the people.

Holding fast to these views of our duties as legislators, and with a cheerful willingness to answer here and elsewhere for the results of honest labors to relieve the indigent soldiers of our common country in every section of it, coming as they do from many wars in which we have been engaged, and with every confidence of a right verdict upon the whole matter, we submit our bill again for the judgment of the House, and ask for it the most rigid criticism, believing it will tend to strengthen rather than to weaken it. We recommend, without a dissenting voice in this committee, that the bill do pass notwithstanding the objections of the President.

At several points in the reading and at the conclusion of the report there were applause and laughter on the Republican side.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of this matter be postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. MATSON. Then I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Thursday next, and in connection with that motion I give notice that I will call it up on that day after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BRAGG. On that motion I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. My point is that this is a privileged matter, and that its consideration having been entered upon it can not be suspended until the matter is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House has always the power to suspend the further consideration of a matter pending before it, whether privileged or not.

Mr. BRAGG. Then I hope the motion will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] that the further consideration of the bill and report be postponed until Thursday next.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. MORRILL. That is the unanimous wish of the committee.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 131, noes 21.

Mr. BRAGG. That is not a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG].

Mr. JACKSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Several members called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to raise the point of "no quorum" if I can be permitted to make a brief statement to the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BURROWS. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. As many as are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will say "ay."

Mr. JACKSON. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I renew it.

The question was taken; and the yeas and nays were refused, only three members voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not desire to press the point of order, Mr. Speaker, but I did not know but the House would give me an opportunity to say a word. I simply wanted to say that I was one of two Northern Democrats who voted against this bill when it was before the House for consideration, but I had no opportunity then to speak upon the bill, and it is manifest that I am to have no opportunity to speak upon it now.

REDEMPTION OF TRADE-DOLLARS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to announce the appointment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] as a conferee on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 199) known as the trade-dollar bill, in the place of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], who is absent.

REPEAL OF PRE-EMPTION AND TIMBER-CULTURE LAWS, ETC.

Mr. COBB. I send to the desk a report from a committee on conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

THOMAS R. COBB,
W. J. STONE,
H. B. STRAIT,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. N. DOLPH,
P. B. PLUMB,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COBB withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. RANDALL. I want to submit to the gentleman from Indiana, we are in this situation: If I had known at the time this matter was taken up it would have occupied the floor so long, I would have raised against it the question of consideration.

Mr. COBB. You occupy the same position toward this matter that I did toward my colleague from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], for if I had thought he would have taken up so much time with his report I would not have yielded to him, but have insisted upon going on with my own matter.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman's colleague from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] brought to the attention of the House a constitutional question. On this I can raise the question of consideration as between the sundry civil appropriation bill and the conference report.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let us postpone this until after the sundry civil bill has been disposed of.

Mr. PETERS. We have entered upon the matter now and let us finish it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield the floor?

Mr. STRAIT. Permit me a moment. You do not wish to mislead the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS]. He asked some questions in relation to the first section of the bill. The Senate conferees, I understand, agreed to yield the first section entirely except that part referring to repeal.

Mr. COBB. I do not so understand it. I understood it was conditional.

Mr. STRAIT. No.

Mr. COBB. That is my understanding. It is not a matter of importance, because the condition on which they agreed to yield it was the adoption of the eighth section, which I do not agree to.

Mr. STRAIT. No.

Mr. COBB. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty minutes.

Mr. COBB. At this point, as I have been interrupted through the pathway of my remarks, I will yield the floor and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PERKINS. I rise for the purpose of inquiring when it will be in order to move to recede from our disagreement to the Senate amendments and accept the same with an amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to move to postpone this matter until after the sundry civil appropriation bill has been disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana has yielded to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. PERKINS. No; the gentleman from Indiana has yielded the floor, reserving the remainder of his time.

Mr. RANDALL. I have moved that this matter go over until after the sundry civil bill has been disposed of, and I ask for a vote on that motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 31.

Mr. STRAIT. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as tellers Mr. RANDALL and Mr. STRAIT.

Mr. PERKINS. Perhaps we can make some agreement in regard to this matter. How much time will the sundry civil bill take?

Mr. RANDALL. I am not able to answer.

Mr. PERKINS. Will it take more than half an hour?

Mr. RANDALL. We may get it through in an hour.

Mr. STRAIT. Postpone it until Tuesday next after the reading of the Journal, and I will consent.

Mr. COBB. I can not do that.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it not in order to ask that this matter may go over until Tuesday next?

Mr. STORM. Tuesday next has been fixed for the delivery of obituaries.

Mr. PERKINS. Then say Wednesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and after the call of committees, this matter shall be taken up by unanimous consent, and not to be antagonized by appropriation bills.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to state to the gentleman that on Wednesday next it is the intention to call up a privileged matter relating to the fisheries

Mr. PERKINS. I ask then that this matter be postponed until Wednesday, not to be antagonized by appropriation bills. We will take our chances between this and the fisheries question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will limit the time to two hours on this matter.

Mr. PERKINS. The other side has already taken up forty minutes, and we should have on this side at least an hour and a half.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope no more than two hours will be taken.

Mr. COBB. I object.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 44.

So the House decided to take up for consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

FILING OF REPORTS.

Mr. PEEL. I ask for unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to submit this morning may be permitted to file them with the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Under the leave granted the following reports were filed:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to make a privileged motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before that I wish to give notice that on Monday next one of the bills reported by the Committee on War Claims to-day, that is the bill (H. R. 11130) relating to private claims and demands against the United States, will be taken up and a motion made to suspend the rules and pass it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. It sends private claims to the Court of Claims for a judicial ascertainment of the facts. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD so that members will have the opportunity of reading it between now and Monday. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES], chairman of the Committee on War Claims, is authorized by his committee to move to suspend the rules on Monday next and pass the bill as amended by that committee. The bill was introduced by me on Monday last, and is printed in bill form, but I desire it to be printed also in the RECORD in order that members may have an opportunity to examine its provisions.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I call up the veto message of the President on the bill (H. R. 5394) granting a pension to Sally Ann Bradley.

Mr. RANDALL. On that I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not desire to antagonize the appropriation bills; and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until next Friday, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

A MEMBER. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The demand for the regular order is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I call the bill up for present consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. And I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Have I not a right, Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent to postpone the consideration of this bill until next Friday?

Mr. RANDALL. I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have merely asked to postpone the consideration of this bill until next Friday, so as not to interfere with the appropriation bill; and if anybody sees fit to object to that then, I shall demand the yeas and nays on the question of consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no objection to postponing it until next Friday.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is just what I ask.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to next Friday, which is private bill day, being set apart for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. There is so much confusion in the Hall that it is impossible to hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks that the consideration of this veto message be postponed until next Friday.

Mr. RANDALL. I presume there will be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection was made by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say to the gentleman from New Hampshire that this will not seriously interfere with the Private Calendar. It will not occupy over an hour.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not withdraw the objection. That is private bill day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is a private bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not insist upon his demand for the yeas and nays, as I have not objected to his request.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I demanded the yeas and nays upon the idea that the objection came from the other side of the House. I now withdraw the demand, but will call the bill up next Friday morning at the earliest moment.

PROPOSED EVENING SESSION.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to submit a privileged resolution to lie over under the rule. It is a resolution simply asking an evening session to consider business reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday next, February 23, the House take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., the evening session to be devoted solely to the consideration of bills reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BAKER. I now call up the matter of privilege, which was the resolution offered by me on yesterday, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDALL. I can not hear what the gentleman from New York calls up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the resolution presented by him on yesterday, and asks its reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to calling it up; and make the point of order that that portion of it which relates to the rules takes it to the Committee on Rules without any motion.

Mr. BAKER. That is just what I ask.

The SPEAKER. It will go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BAKER. And have it considered as read.

The SPEAKER. It has gone to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to submit the point whether on a notice like this any matter under these circumstances other than the resolution itself has the right to be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised of the existence of any positive rule or statute on the subject. Under the law the RECORD must contain the debates and proceedings of the House. The Chair will state, however, that only a part of the matter which was read from the Clerk's desk on yesterday had any privilege under the decisions heretofore made.

Mr. RANDALL. And on that point I maintain that that portion which relates to the amendment of the rule is alone privileged for reference.

Mr. BAKER. That is just what I ask to have referred.

Mr. RANDALL. And any matter extraneous, not privileged, not only does not go to the Committee, but the effect of presenting jointly that which is privileged and that which is not privileged destroys the privilege.

Mr. REED. It is too late to make that objection.

Mr. BAKER. The resolutions themselves are on the table, and I ask to have them referred.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been referred to the Committee on Rules. But the point the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] makes is that the preamble at least which preceded the resolution was not in order under the rule of the House and has no privilege. The Chair has had occasion to decide this question quite frequently, not only during the present session, but during the last. For instance, the Committee on Printing has sometimes reported resolutions back to the House which provided not only for the printing of matter for the use of the House, which is privileged, but also for the printing of matter for the use of Departments which has no privilege; and the Chair has always in such cases held that a resolution containing these matters, one of which was privileged and the other was not privileged, went to the Calendar and did not come up for immediate consideration.

Now the point of order of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that this matter which was not privileged under the rule, to wit, the preamble, should not have been printed in the RECORD. That the Chair can not dispose of, because it has been printed in the RECORD; and if any action is to be taken as to that it is for the House to do so.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask, in harmony with the suggestion of the Chair, that that matter be omitted from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that question also heretofore, and has held that when matter has been printed in the RECORD the Chair has no right to direct it to be expunged; but the House has control over the RECORD, and can order matter to be inserted or omitted.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that that matter be expunged from the RECORD; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the preamble of the resolution be omitted from the permanent RECORD, and upon motion demands the previous question.

Mr. REED. That is a part of our proceedings.

Mr HISCOCK. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to get on with his sundry civil appropriation bill, I suggest to him that he had better withdraw that motion.

Mr. REED. We will ask the yeas and nays on this.

The SPEAKER. The demand is for the previous question, and debate is not in order. If the previous question shall be ordered fifteen minutes will be allowed for debate in support of the proposition, and fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose it is permissible for the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] to read the preamble and resolution as a part of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. That question is not presented to the Chair just now. The only question before the House is the demand for the previous question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 75, noes 65.

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House fifteen minutes are allowed in support of the proposition, and fifteen minutes against it.

Mr. BAKER. In order that the House may understand what is proposed to be expunged from the RECORD, I desire the Clerk to read the preamble and resolutions as part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States on the 5th day of February, 1886, passed the act entitled "An act to provide for the admission of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln," the favorable report upon which was submitted by Mr. Harrison from the Senate Committee on Territories January 11, 1886; and

Whereas the Democratic majority of the Committee on the Territories of the House, through Mr. SPRINGER, submitted on the 25th day of May, 1886, a report adverse to said Senate bill, in which it is claimed that said Territory does not possess the area, the population, nor the legal right to be admitted into the Union other than as one State, and concluding with the further statement: "Your committee are therefore of the opinion that the people of the southern half of Dakota are not entitled to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and therefore recommend that the Senate bill admitting the proposed State into the Union and organizing a Territorial government for the northern half of that Territory should not pass;" and

Whereas the Republican minority of said committee united in a report, dissenting from the conclusions of the majority and advised the immediate admission of Dakota into the Union, under the aforesaid Senate bill, which said minority report concludes with the following words: "We believe it is the constitutional right of the State of Dakota to be admitted under the bill which has come to this House from the Senate. It will be observed that the majority report has not one suggestion of relief for that great and growing State, only flat rejection, denial of the right of citizenship, and representation on the floor of Congress, refusal of the constitutional right to have guaranteed under them a republican form of government to the end that the 'Union' may be made more perfect, justice established, domestic tranquility insured, the common defense provided for, the general welfare promoted, and the blessings of liberty secured to them and their posterity in accordance with the corner-stone upon which our fathers builded the Federal Constitution in 1787. The undersigned in conclusion respectfully but earnestly urge the passage of the Senate bill No. 967 for the reasons stated, and that the State of Dakota be immediately admitted into the Union;" and

Whereas the population of the State of Dakota is upward of 263,465, and of the proposed Territory of Lincoln upward of 152,199, as appears by the census taken in the summer of 1885. While the area of the State is 77,000 square miles, and of the proposed new Territory is about 73,000 square miles, and at the present time the population of said State and proposed Territory is believed to have nearly doubled since the census of 1885; and

Whereas the Senate, on the 10th day of April, 1886, passed the act favorably reported by its Committee on Territories, January 25, 1886, an act entitled "An act to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes," which proposed State, including its mountain area in lands, waters, and that portion of Idaho embraced within the same, has an area of about 90,000 square miles, and an estimated population of 176,069; and

Whereas the House Committee on the Territories on the 20th of January, 1887, reported favorably upon said bill but so amended as to provide for the admission of the State of Montana, with an area including her mountain ranges and inland waters of 146,080 square miles and an estimated population of 151,472; and

Whereas the said State of Dakota, and said proposed States of Washington and Montana, respectively urge and demand recognition and admission into the Union, without unnecessary delay: Therefore,

Resolved, That under our system of Government the right of local self-government with the right to participate in the government of the whole country should be granted to all the citizens of the Territories as soon as consistent with the public morals and the material welfare, and this House recognizes and acknowledges its duty to accord a prompt, full, and fair consideration of the claims of Dakota, Washington, and Montana to be admitted into the Union under the pending or other appropriate legislation; and to that end,

Resolved, That on Thursday, the 24th day of February, 1887, immediately after reading the Journal, the said pending bills for the admission of Dakota, Washington, and Montana shall be considered in the House as if in Committee of the Whole in the order named, and such consideration shall be continued until a vote upon the passage thereof, respectively, shall be had, and inasmuch as under the rulings of the Speaker the foregoing resolutions must be referred to the Committee on Rules for consideration and report, it is further

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and they are hereby, directed to report back said resolutions within two days with their recommendations to the House.

Mr. BAKER. The minority of the Committee on Territories felt it their duty to themselves and to the country and to the interests involved in these bills that they should make one good and honest effort for their consideration by this Congress at this session, and for that purpose with a preamble simply stating the facts, which appear by the record, have offered these privileged resolutions in order that a day might be fixed for the consideration of those bills. It is with no purpose to delay the business of the House that these resolutions are offered. The object is to expedite it.

The people of Dakota elect and send to this House a Delegate by a majority greater than the entire vote for the entire delegation from Georgia, and yet our friends from Georgia object to the consideration of a bill which is intended to give those people a representative on this floor. These bills have been reported; they are on the Calendar; they are entitled to consideration; and the sole purpose of these resolutions is to enable the Committee on Rules to designate a time when they may be considered. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RANDALL. It is far from my purpose to abridge in any particular the right of fair and free speech on this floor. I have made the motion I submitted, and I have accomplished the object I had in view, and that was to have a ruling whether a member, even in respectful language, can by indirection inject that which is not privileged under the statement that he rose for a privileged motion.

I wanted also to have it settled and have a decision of the House, which should furnish a precedent, that the RECORD should not be made the vehicle, under a misconception of the rules, of matter introduced as an alleged privileged question which is not in fact a privileged question; and I have felt the more inclined to make the point at this time in view of what occurred at the close of the last session, when the same gentleman [Mr. BAKER] made a like effort in another direction.

Now, what I desire is that the House by its vote to-day shall say that matter can not secure a hearing through the columns of the RECORD in that way. I have no feeling about it. I am perfectly satisfied that what the gentleman wanted to state should go, as it has now gone, into the RECORD in a legitimate way under the rules. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BAKER. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that I remember exactly how this matter was presented in the House, but I think it was without any objection on the part of anybody until it had been partially read. If I recollect the proper method of procedure as we used to have it frequently in other Congresses, it was to make objection early and then have the matter submitted to the Speaker for his judgment. Had the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] pursued that course and called the Speaker's attention to the last part of the resolutions, I have no doubt that the Speaker would have ruled as he has intimated this morning; but if the matter is before the House now, it is before it through the laches of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and other gentlemen who now make objection.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not know the character of the paper that was presented until it had been read, and I accepted the statement of the gentleman presenting it that it was a matter of privilege.

Mr. REED. But when the gentleman discovered what the character of the paper was, the proper course of procedure would have been for him, having examined the matter, to have called the Speaker's attention to it and pointed out why it was not a matter of privilege.

For my part, while I agree that it is quite possible that this might have been ruled out, I confess that I have a great deal of sympathy with the effort made to get before this House and before the country, the great fact that a large portion of our population, of the most enterprising character, who are extending our empire in the West, have been, by the action of this House with 40 Democratic majority, prevented from having a hearing, prevented from being admitted into the Union of States; prevented from that local self-government which every well-regulated community has a right to have under our system; and above all—for I state at once cause and effect—prevented from participating in the election of a President of the United States at the next election.

I believe that is a matter which ought to be brought to the attention of the country, and I hope that notice may be taken of the fact that these great Territories, in their efforts to become States, have been smothered in this House with its Democratic majority of 40. And I believe that the people of the United States, and that history will take notice not only of the fact, but of the plain and evident motive which caused that fact to exist. Denied the right of self-government, denied the privilege of voting at the next Presidental election—I say that such things as that will make themselves heard in some way or other, and even the skilled ingenuity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will not be able to entirely silence popular expression and popular indignation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAKER. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. BAKER. I reserve it.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND.]

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire, in anything that I say, to go away from the question under debate. The mere fact that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has been allowed, out of order, to put in a political speech, shows the wrong of this whole proceeding.

Let us see what is the real situation. On yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] arose and made this announcement: "I desire to present a privileged resolution, and after it is read I will ask unanimous consent that the last portion of the resolution be immediately considered." The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] interposed saying: "I desire to reach the consideration of the amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill." Mr. BAKER replied: "Under the rule, the resolution I present must go to the Committee on Rules if the House refuses to adopt the last resolution, which requires the committee to report back the resolution in two days."

Now a portion of the resolution was read because that gentleman in his capacity as a Representative had stated that he was presenting a privileged matter. As soon as enough of it had been read to show that he was not presenting a privileged matter, it was objected to by an inquiry as to whether he could, under the cover of privilege, inject into the proceedings a stump speech by way of preamble to the resolution. The Chair finally held that if the reading was objected to the question must be decided by a vote; and the House voted that the paper should not be read. Thus the House, in as solemn a method as it could command at that time, put its condemnation upon the procedure. That part which had been read appeared in the RECORD. The motion is made this morning—the simple, plain, business motion—to take out of the RECORD that which properly could never have been in it. In discussing the question the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] proceeds, amidst the laughter and applause of the other side, to force into the RECORD the residue of the paper as his remarks. As no words that I know in the English language could make proper condemnation of such conduct stronger than the statement of the fact, I am satisfied to leave the matter there.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, let the other side proceed. I propose that we alternate on this question.

Mr. BAKER. We have the closing of the discussion, and I have reserved my time.

The SPEAKER. There is no rule fixing the order of debate. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made the motion.

Mr. BAKER. I have agreed to yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, the motion pending before the House is to expunge from the RECORD certain matter as having been improperly injected into it. The matter complained of is the preamble to a certain resolution; and the motion, as I understand, is to strike that out as being improperly a part of the RECORD. Now, what is the matter complained of? It is a preamble, or matter of inducement, to a certain resolution setting apart a definite time for the consideration of certain important legislation. It is not complained, as I understand, that this preamble is disrespectful to the House or is untrue in fact. It contains certain recitals which are entirely pertinent to the resolution, which are material with reference to the importance of the consideration of the question, and which are proper matter of inducement to the resolution. It has already been ruled by the Chair that the resolution itself was privileged; and the only question now before us is whether the inducement or the preamble to the resolution is of such a character as to exclude it from the privilege.

Now, what is the preamble which it is sought to strike out? It recites certain official reports of the Senate and of the House; and the only thing in it which can be complained of—the only thing in it, I apprehend, that induces the complaint—is its recital that certain action has been taken by the "Democratic majority" of this House and certain other action by the "Republican minority." I think if the two words "Democratic" and "Republican" had been omitted—in other words, if reference had been made simply to the majority and the minority we would have had no motion here to expunge. It is simply the truth of the record that is complained of and the fact that it fixes the responsibility where it belongs—upon the Democratic majority of this House, for the exclusion of half a million of the most intelligent, the most enlightened, and the best people in the United States from participation in their own Government. That is the cause of the complaint.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield all my time except one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that there has been an attempt on the part of the Democratic majority of this House to ignore the rights of half a million of people in Dakota, I simply wish to say, and the record bears me out when I say it, that at no time during this session of Congress have the people of Dakota ever asked for admission into this Union. The only time when that people ever did ask for admission into the Union and present petitions for it was during the Forty-seventh Congress; and then a distinguished Senator from the gentleman's own State denounced them as repudiators and unworthy of participation in the Government as a part of the body politic. [Applause.] And he voted to recommit a bill which had been presented by a Senator from Nebraska to admit Dakota into the Union; and by his influence and with his vote, the bill was recommitted; and there it slept during the remainder of that Congress.

Now, what is the record on this question in the present Congress? A portion of the people of Dakota, less than one-third of the voters of that Territory, on their own motion, without any authority, without any act of their Legislature, assembled in mass meeting, got up a constitution and sent it here, asking that they and the people they represented be admitted, to the exclusion of all the remainder of the people of Dakota. The reports of the committees of this House show the facts in this case; and I hope for the credit of the Democratic party in this House and in order that all the facts may become known, we shall yet have a day or an evening to present this matter before the country, and then the people can judge upon whom the responsibility rests.

Now, I hope I shall have unanimous consent to have printed as an appendix to my remarks what occurred in the Senate of the United States on this subject during the Forty-seventh Congress. If objection is not made I will send to the desk what I have marked to be incorporated in my remarks. I have made this statement, Mr. Speaker, and it is all the statement I desire to make——

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman state the date of the discussion to which he has referred?

Mr. HILL. It was during the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. I do not remember the exact date.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. When both Houses of Congress were Republican.

Mr. HILL. When both Houses of Congress were under the control of the Republican party, when Keifer was Speaker of the House; the same Congress that reduced the tariff on wool, which the party then in the majority have denounced us for not putting it back. [Laughter.]

I ask unanimous consent to append to my remarks what I have already indicated.

Mr. REED. I object. [Laughter on the Democratic side and cries of "Regular order!"] I object and I want it to be understood I do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I do not blame you for objecting. If I were in your place I would object too. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. REED. If this House will give me five minutes I will satisfy them of the reason why. [Cries of "Regular order!" and great confusion.]

Mr. BAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Territories, May 25, 1886, reported a bill (H. R. 8120) to enable the people of Dakota to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and still remains there. They also reported back adversely bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union, and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

A bill (H. R. 7377) to divide the Territory of Dakota and to establish the Territory of North Dakota.

A bill (H. R. 8472) dividing Dakota Territory, establishing the Territory of North Dakota, and providing a temporary government therefor.

As I have already stated the bill reported favorably was placed on the Calendar, and has not yet been reached for consideration. I desire to emphasize the fact stated by the chairman of the Committee on the Territories [Mr. HILL] that ever since the question was raised in the Forty-seventh Congress that Dakota be admitted as a State into the Union, the people of that Territory, so far as any expression on their part is concerned, have been resisting such admission as a whole. The only effort which came to us backed by the citizens was an effort to divide the Territory and in favor of the admission of one part as a State, leaving the other part in a territorial condition.

Mr. STRUBLE. Is it not a fact they are resisting what you propose to do?

Mr. SPRINGER. What the Committee on Territories has proposed, and what I hope will be done, is to give an enabling act to the people of Dakota to be admitted as a whole.

Mr. STRUBLE. That they do not want.

Mr. SPRINGER. A portion of the people of Dakota insist they have the right on their own motion to divide themselves into two parts, and to provide for the admission, and have one part admitted into the Union as the State of Dakota, and for the other part to remain as a Territory. No precedent for that has ever been established in the history of this country. To allow it in the case of Dakota would be destructive of the whole system upon which our Federal Government has been formed.

At the utmost the most liberal count of the population in Dakota shows it has less than half a million of people. By the very latest census of the Territory it has no more than half a million population, and yet, Mr. Speaker, one-half of that number desire to be admitted into the Union as a State, with two Senators, to have the same voice in legislation, and to have the same voice in the election of the President that the 5,000,000 of population of the State of New York, or the 5,000,000 of population of the State of Pennsylvania, or the 3,000,000 of population of the State of Illinois now have.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Just as the little State of Delaware has.

Mr. REED. Or just as the 60,000 voters of Nevada have.

Mr. SPRINGER. Nevada was not our creation. Gentlemen can take that State for their model of what is to be done. But if Territories are permitted to divide themselves into various parts, and have their claims recognized to be admitted as States into the Union as States——

Mr. STRUBLE. Why have you not brought forward a proposition?

Mr. SPRINGER. The Committee on the Territories has reported what it believes to be a proper proposition, and as I have already stated it has been upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union since May of last year. Every effort to bring that proposition up for consideration has been resisted and voted against. Every member on that side of the House voted against reporting that bill, and now are resisting its passage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STRUBLE. It is the other side which resists the consideration of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired, and only one minute remains to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire that the House shall give some reflection to this matter disconnected from the subject which seems to be in controversy between the two sides. The naked question presented here is, Can a member of the House on either side, under such circumstances as these, secure the insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of a document under a statement that he rises to present a privileged question, which is confessed on both sides now to be not privileged? That is the only point I desired to have presented and have considered; and I do not understand the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to indorse the procedure as a fair working of the rules of this House. I now ask a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to expunge from the RECORD what has been inserted of the paper which has been submitted by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GIFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to be heard for five minutes on this proposition. I am a Delegate from Dakota, and hope that privilege will be accorded me.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suppose if that is granted there will be no objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio to print the remarks he asked leave to print a while ago.

Mr. STORM. I object unless that is done.

Mr. GIFFORD. Then I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks on this question.

Mr. STORM. I object unless the gentleman from Ohio is accorded the same privilege.

Mr. GIFFORD. Perhaps I am laboring under a misapprehension. I understood some gentlemen to object to my making remarks.

Mr. STORM. I do object unless the gentleman from Ohio is allowed to print what he has asked leave to print.

Mr. STRUBLE. That is another question entirely.

Mr. REED. I shall not permit any such performance as that.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the preamble of the resolution, which has been in part printed, be expunged from the permanent edition of the RECORD?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 88, noes 83.

So the motion to expunge was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the anxiety expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] for the consideration of this matter, I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday next, after the reading of the Journal, be set aside for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HAMMOND and others demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BURROWS. By whom?

The SPEAKER. By a great number of gentlemen.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the order will be made. I would be glad to have it made.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to ask a question: Whether the resolutions have gone to the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. That reference has been made.

Mr. BAKER. And they are not to consider the preamble?

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 199) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same amended to read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in sections 1 and 2 and insert:

"That for a period of six months after the passage of this act United States trade-dollars, if not defaced, mutilated, or stamped, shall be received at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in exchange for a like amount, dollar for dollar, of standard silver dollars or of subsidiary coins of the United States.

"SEC. 2. That the trade-dollars received by, paid to, or deposited with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer or national depositary of the United States shall not be paid out or in any other manner issued, but, at the expense of the United States, shall be transmitted to the coinage mints and recoined into standard silver dollars or subsidiary coin, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the trade-dollars recoined under this act shall not be counted as part of the silver bullion required to be purchased and coined into standard dollars as required by the act of February 28, 1878."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2.

S. W. T. LANHAM,
JOHN J. HEMPHILL,
CHARLES N. FELTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN P. JONES,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement accompanying the report was read, as follows:

Statement of committee of conference on Senate bill 199, for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

The only changes made in the bill as amended by the House are to adopt the first section of the Senate bill and add thereto that trade-dollars may be received in exchange for subsidiary coins as well as standard dollars, and to limit the period of redemption to six months after the passage of the act.

To strike out section 2 of the House amendment, which after the first section of Senate bill as adopted would be a mere repetition thereof.

To retain section 3 of the House amendment and number the same "section 2," and also to strike out the words "recoinage of," in section 3.

To retain section 3 of Senate bill.

The only substantial change made is to the effect that trade-dollars can only be received at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States.

S. W. T. LANHAM,
JNO. J. HEMPHILL,
C. N. FELTON,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. LANHAM. I move the adoption of the report, and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the report was agreed to.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read amendment 197, in which non-concurrence was recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

EDUCATION IN ALASKA.

For the education of the children of school age in the Territory of Alaska, without reference to race, $25,000.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Yesterday I was recognized for a motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

I would be glad, after the little controversy between the two sides of the House upon a political question, to ask the attention of both sides to something which every man ought to agree, because there is no politics in it. The people I speak for have no politics. They are neither Democrats nor Republicans nor Mugwumps. They are not on this side of the country nor on the California coast, but are away up toward the north pole in our purchased empire of nearly 600,000 square miles of country, reaching as far in one direction as from Florida to Maine, and in another as from Washington to San Francisco. The people of that great Territory of Alaska have nobody here to speak for them, and because they have not it seems the proposition may prevail to strike out the $25,000 in this bill, which is the only money given for their education. I have made the motion to concur in the Senate amendment which gives $25,000 for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, let me remind the members of this House that we get into the Treasury this year $325,000 revenue from Alaska. And are we too mean to give $25,000 of it back to educate the children of that Territory? There are there 35,000 inhabitants, only 7,000 of whom are Indians; all the rest are civilized or partly so. There are about 4,000 people in Alaska from our States and Territories, about 4,000 people who are citizens under our treaty with Russia, more than 7,000 semicivilized recognized by our United States court as citizens, about 17,000 Eskimos, and 5,000 Indians of the interior.

The $20,000 appropriated in the Indian bill is for the Indian industrial schools only, the $25,000 I ask to be given by this House by concurring in the Senate amendment is for the 1,000 children civilized now in schools, and for the 10,000 other children of school age in Alaska.

Why, sir, it is a disgrace to civilization, and will be a disgrace to the members of this House to defeat this proposition. There ought to be no difference among us on this question. There ought to be no denial here of the right of these people to the common-school education which has advanced New England and made the West grow as if by magic.

This House has by every parliamentary device on the part of the majority in control stifled the Blair bill which twice passed the Senate, and which alone can wipe out the illiteracy of the enfranchised race. I for one deplore that action. Let us at least be wiser in the case of Alaska. Let us be more just.

Mr. Chairman, one hundred years ago the Russians established schools in Alaska. Only twenty years ago we took that Territory, an empire as large as the whole Southern confederacy during the "late unpleasantness;" we took it as part of our country. After there had been schools for a century in Alaska it was handed over to our country. The people asked the representative of our country when he went there in his country's uniform, a general with shoulder straps: "Will the people of your country who have now taken us care for our schools?" "Oh, yes;" it was said, "of course." Those officers who went as the representatives of this country believed the common school system of this country would not be denied to that people who had for a hundred years had schools under Russian rule.

And yet what was the result? The very cession itself gave to the people in Alaska the right to have schools. We have their money in our coffers to the amount of $325,000 a year, and we do not give them anything. When $50,000 was given in 1869 that money was never expended. Alaska was thought to be pretty near the north pole, and the school teachers did not go so far north at that time. But in 1884, in the organic act of the Territory it is provided that schools shall be given, and they have been given to the extent of $15,000 in the current fiscal year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCOMAS. I made a motion to concur, and in supporting that motion, as I understand, my time is not limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the bill is being considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COMAS. There has been no such agreement so far as I am aware. It was asked, and objected to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that to be the rule of debate.

Mr. BLANCHARD was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. McCOMAS.

Mr. McCOMAS. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for his courtesy.

I was proceeding to say that these schools have already been put in operation. Within the last year the educational agent, Dr. Sheldon Jackson, a minister who has spent ten years of his life in this humane undertaking, who was appointed by the Commissioner of Education as general agent and superintendent of schools in Alaska, was there to organize these schools. Fifteen schools are now in operation. There are fifteen teachers there in that northern country, exiled from civilization and from summer in that climate. Their pay is $1,500, the object being to get men there who are married, to bring about civilization, and wipe out polygamy by the example of American domestic life carried there by the teachers of American common schools. The lady teachers receive $800 yearly.

There is an alien language and an alien people, and there are now two thousand white inhabitants. There are out of thirty-five thousand all but seven thousand who are not Indians in the proper sense of the term.

These schools established under our Bureau of Education are not sectarian nor denominational, but, as in our own country, teach the elements of primary schooling and in our own tongue.

These teachers are paid by the disbursing clerk of the Interior Department upon vouchers certified by the general agent or superintendent and approved by the Commissioner of Education. The agent does not disburse the fund.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after these schools have been established the proposition which comes from the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, is to strike out the appropriation and to relegate these people to barbarism; to have these teachers—ladies and men—out yonder, 4,000 miles from home, suddenly to lose the pay promised them, pay their own way home, to deprive them of their positions as teachers, to close the school-rooms, and send back the population to the barbaric state they were in one hundred years ago, before the Russian Government began to give them the aid of common schools.

It is to be false to the pledge we made in the annexation of the Territory when we said that we would give these people every right, privilege, and immunity of our other citizens; it is to be untrue to civilization and to christianity, it is to take from them all of their revenue and deny them a pittance of their own money for the education of their own children. This is brutal legislation.

There they are to-day at school under an Arctic sky, and by the action of this House you would make it darker winter for these, our wards—close the doors and turn the lock upon them. I say that if the members of this House, Democrats and Republicans, would consider the rights of these people, who have no vote, who have no politics, but toward whom we owe the highest obligation, they would unite with the governor of that Territory, with the Commissioner of Education, with the general agent of the department, who has gone to that field, with the Secretary of the Interior, and unite with the Senate in making this appropriation of $25,000 to keep up the existing schools. The governor wants $50,000 to extend them. Fifty thousand dollars has been asked, and you deny them a dollar. I protest, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to concur and concur without a division. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I move to concur, with an amendment striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$30,000." Mr. Chairman, it is a dangerous thing for any nation, and particularly for this nation, to attempt to govern a dependency. We never have had that necessity upon us until we acquired Alaska, but now our duty is and will be to permanently govern that vast Territory, a majority of whose inhabitants do not understand the English language, and I say that this appropriation for common-school education is necessary, not so much to raise the condition of the individuals who reside there as to give them the benefit of a civil government.

We passed a law two years ago establishing a civil government for that Territory. We provided for a governor; we established a district court; we imposed upon that Territory a code of laws of which the vast majority of the people subject to them do not understand one word. By the organic act the laws of Oregon are extended over that Territory. All the people residing there are subject to all the penalties imposed for the infraction of the criminal statutes, and their personal and property rights are subject to our laws. Those laws are in a language which is foreign to the people; the proceedings of the courts are in a language which they can not understand. Therefore, perhaps, it was that, in the organic act, section 13, it was provided that it should be the duty of the governor and of the Government that we set up there to establish a system of common-school education.

This provision in this bill is simply designed to carry into effect that existing statute. It is absolutely necessary if we desire to have for the people of that Territory a real civil government. When a case comes into court the parties concerned, whatever their race, have to be brought in and have their rights determined, and whatever evidence they give must be given through interpreters. We ought to see to it that as soon as possible there shall be a general diffusion of knowledge of the language in which the laws are written and the legal proceedings are carried on, so as to enable every resident of the Territory to get the benefit of the civil government which we have undertaken to create for them.

The recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, I understand, is here in the hands of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS]. He omitted to read it, but I should be very glad to have it read as a part of my remarks, and if he will permit me, I will do so.

The letter referred to was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, January 28, 1887.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a communication of this date from the Commissioner of Education, relating to the subject of estimate made by that bureau and heretofore presented to Congress for appropriation for education of children in Alaska, amounting to $15,000.

The Commissioner states that since that estimate was made he has received the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson, the general agent of the Bureau of Education in Alaska, and having also had personal conference with him is now better informed as to the number of schools established, the number of children of school age, the number of teachers, and the necessity for school buildings than when his estimate was prepared.

He states that he is now informed that there are in two sections alone, namely, from Kadiak westward to the Aleutian Islands and in southeastern Alaska, at least 3,640 children, and that there are from 10,000 to 12,000 children in the whole Territory who ought to have school advantages. He therefore recommends that, instead of $15,000 as heretofore estimated for, appropriation to the amount of $25,000 be made for the education of children of school age in Alaska, without reference to race.

In support of this recommendation the Commissioner points to the fact that Gov. A. P. Swineford, in his last annual report, received since the original estimate was made, recommends that the sum of $40,000 should be allowed for this purpose.

As the facts and information thus brought to the attention of the Department seem clearly to show that the sum of $15,000 for education of children in Alaska is not sufficient to meet the wants of that important branch of the public service in that Territory, I concur in the recommendation of the Commissioner that $25,000 be appropriated for that purpose.

I also transmit herewith the inclosures accompanying the Commissioner's letter setting out information more in detail on the subject.

Very respectfully,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have some understanding with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] about closing the debate on this proposition. I understood the gentleman to say the fifteen minutes would be all that he needed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has allowed fifteen minutes to that side of the House.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Say that we close the debate in five minutes more, unless more time is desired to discuss this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already given fifteen minutes to the left side of the House, and none to the right.

Mr. MCCOMAS. That is true. Then let the Chair equalize the matter by allowing ten or fifteen minutes more.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to go on with this appropriation bill if I can. I do not think I have been unreasonable in the matter of allowing discussion.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me a few minutes more to close I assure him I will not waste time.

Mr. RANDALL. All right.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I simply want to read section 13 of the organic act, which provided that—

The Secretary of the Interior shall make needful and proper provision for the education of the children of school age in the Territory of Alaska, without reference to race, until such time as permanent provision shall be made for the same; and the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman please give me the date of that act?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It is the organic act, passed May 17, 1884.

Mr. TARSNEY. That was not a continuing appropriation?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Oh, no; I do not mean to claim that it was. My position is that when we established civil government there this provision for education was a part of the establishment. The moment the present administration came into power it proceeded at once to carry out energetically and in good faith this provision of law. Secretary Lamar is entitled to all praise for the interest he has taken in this particular subject. I think it will be strange indeed if this House refuses to support him in his laudable efforts in that direction.

Mr. RANDALL. I now propose to the gentleman from Maryland that the debate shall close at the end of twenty minutes, ten minutes to be assigned to each side.

Mr. MCCOMAS. That is right. I hope the agreement will be acceded to.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to be perfectly reasonable.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent that all debate on this proposition be closed in twenty minutes, ten minutes to be occupied on each side? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] is entitled to control the time on his side of the question.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] will withdraw his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I made that merely as a formal motion; I withdraw it.

Mr. LONG. I trust that the House will concur with the Senate in granting $25,000 for education in Alaska. The mere statement of the proposition ought to be enough to carry it before an intelligent audience. Not to appropriate that amount is to take a step toward barbarism. It is certainly to take a step involving neglect of the interests of the people of Alaska that are confided to our care.

Now, there are several reasons why we should concur with the Senate. First, everybody admits that the children of Alaska should have the advantages of popular school education. If those people were a State or even an organized Territory they could raise money themselves. But they have no legislature; they have no power to levy taxation; they have no means to raise money for the support of schools. Until we give them such power we are responsible for school education there.

The second consideration is this: to refuse this appropriation is to depart from a policy of popular education there which we have already adopted. In the enabling act which has just been read, we appropriated $25,000 for school education. A similar appropriation was neglected the next year, but the year following, which was last year, the Senate inserted an appropriation of $25,000. The matter was debated in the House, and on the motion to concur with the Senate in that amendment there was a tie. Afterward, upon a conference, there was an agreement to appropriate $15,000. So that last year $15,000 was the amount appropriated for this purpose.

The question which now presents itself is whether we propose to abandon further appropriation for the purpose of educating the children of Alaska? There is there a population of 1,600 under twenty-one years of age, and do we propose to make no provision for their education?

Mr. STORM. Does the gentleman speak of the white children?

Mr. LONG. I am speaking of all the persons reported there under 21 years of age.

Mr. STORM. Does the gentleman know that the Indian bill appropriates $20,000 for school purposes?

Mr. LONG. I know that the Indian bill appropriates $20,000 for the support of Indian children. The gentleman from Maryland has told us that there are there 25,000 whites and 7,000 Indians. Twenty thousand dollars is appropriated for the education of Indian children; but do we propose to leave the large body of white children unprovided for in this respect?

Mr. ROGERS. How will the expenditure of the money proposed to be appropriated be controlled?

Mr. LONG. Under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

A MEMBER. And the Bureau of Education.

Mr. ROGERS. Is there now existing there a school system?

Mr. MCCOMAS. There is a system of public education, embracing fifteen schools, in charge of Dr. Jackson.

Mr. MCMILLIN. When was that system adopted?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCCOMAS. I reserve the remainder of my time until gentlemen on the other side have been heard.

Mr. HILL. I have paid some attention to this matter, and I would like to be heard for a few minutes. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will yield to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has six minutes remaining.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I have given some attention to this matter, and in addition to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] has just said, I wish to remark that the white population of Alaska has greatly increased within the last year or two. Instead of there being only a monthly line of steamers to that Territory, as was formerly the case, there is now a semi-monthly line, and I am reliably informed that next summer there will be a weekly line. There is now an educational system there, and the appropriation of $25,000 proposed by the Senate as an amendment to this bill should certainly not be struck out, for it is really not sufficient. We ought to encourage the resistless enterprise of our people to go there and develop the resources of that country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCCOMAS. I reserve my time.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to put a question, and to get some one to answer it, as to who has the control of this money when it comes to be expended?

Mr. LONG. It is under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, through the agent of that Department, Mr. Jackson, and he pays it out to the school teachers sent there from the East and the North. The whole matter is under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Interior. He oversees it all; every dollar expended is carefully accounted for.

Mr. ROGERS. Are we expending money put in the hands of denominations?

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. ROGERS. Or for a public school system there?

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Who has charge of the schools?

Mr. LONG. The Bureau of Education. They are under the charge of Dr. Jackson, who has gone there and organized fifteen schools, paying from $800 to $1,500 each to school teachers who are employed. Every dollar disbursed is strictly accounted for.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Under what law does the Bureau of Education assume this control?

Mr. JAMES. Under the obligations of treaty supplemented by the act organizing the Territory.

Mr. LONG. This is in accordance with the recommendation of your Government.

Mr. MCMILLIN. By whom did the gentleman say the money was disbursed?

Mr. JAMES. It is disbursed under the direction of the Bureau of Education.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I reserve my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland reserved five minutes of his time, but he has consumed three minutes of it in this colloquy.

Mr. McCOMAS. I want to yield the time I reserved to other gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the right to reserve his time, and then consume the time of the House in a colloquy.

Mr. McCOMAS. I will yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to express my surprise, Mr. Chairman, that there is any disposition to non-concur in this amendment.

It seems to me if there were no treaty stipulation binding us such as we know to exist, this is a case which appeals to the sense of right, as well as the sense of humanity, on the part of this House.

I would like to hear what general objection can be made against concurrence in the Senate amendment. None has been made, and I can conceive of none.

As to the specific objection to Mr. Jackson as the agent of the Bureau of Education, I am glad to say I have known him for eighteen years, and will vouch for him from top to toe. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McCOMAS. I will yield now for one minute to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will concur in the Senate amendment, in the first place, because it is a case that comes to us with the weight of authority. It is recommended by the governor of the Territory. It is recommended by the Commissioner of Education. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. It is also in full accord with the declarations of this administration on the subject of the education of our Indian wards.

I am for it, in the second place, because it is right to have this appropriation established by law. We remember the Roman despot who nailed his decrees so high on the pillars of the Temple of Justice the people could not read them, and then punished them with death for disobedience of the law they could not know.

I am for it, because Alaska furnishes to us the revenue with which these schools are carried on, and we have no right to drain the wealth of Alaska into our Treasury and deny to her the education which is the best and only return we can make.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I now take the floor for the ten minutes remaining, and yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN].

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated that the schools were being carried on in that Territory under denominational influences, and while I recognize the fact that a spirit of religion ought to permeate every school in the land, and that the Bible ought to be recognized as a proper book in every school, I should not be willing to appropriate any money out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of keeping up a school that is strictly denominational.

Mr. JAMES. Nobody wants that in this case.

Mr. McMILLIN. For ruin, and ruin only, could come from such a policy.

Now, I would like to know why we can not have education carried on in this Territory as in the other Territories. If you answer me that there is no government in the Territory, I will reply that you have never seen schools successfully carried on where there was no civil government.

Mr. LONG. How about the District of Columbia?

Mr. McMILLIN. And when I was a member of the Committee on Education and Labor an agent of this Territory came before us for the purpose of urging an appropriation for this very purpose. I asked him to state exactly what were the facts in reference to the schools there. He replied, "Why, if you should go to a school-house and kill the teacher and a dozen of the children there is no means of securing your punishment for such an act." You are beginning at the wrong end with this subject.

Mr. JAMES. Do you want to leave them all in ignorance?

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir; but I would organize the Territory in such a way that it can guard its own affairs in this respect like any other Territory. That is the way to begin.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is just the way we are going to begin.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would not appropriate any money for the purpose of education in such a case as this unless it was in pursuance of treaty stipulations or in the exercise of a wise discretion based upon the actual necessities of the case.

Mr. LONG. There is no doubt about the propriety of the appropriation.

Mr. GILFILLAN. Is not a liberal education the very corner-stone and basis of civil government?

Mr. McMILLIN. But you cannot organize a proper system of schools without some sort of civil government to back it up.

Mr. JAMES. We have it now under the Territorial government.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations did not recommend any appropriation in this connection. There is $20,000 now in the Indian appropriation bill for the education of the Indian children there; and if I am not incorrectly advised, the other children, that is, those other than Indian children, attend these schools also.

The Senate inserted, as an amendment, $25,000. Last year's appropriation for this purpose was $15,000, and the estimate of the Department this year is only $15,000.

I want the House to bear in mind that under the contract with the fur seal company all the population on the Seal Islands are provided for by that company.

Mr. JAMES. How many of these islands are there?

Mr. RANDALL. There are two.

Mr. JAMES. Yes; two only.

Mr. RANDALL. But the population bears a considerable relation to the total number of white children in the Territory.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does not the Secretary now recommend $25,000?

Mr. RANDALL. I have the estimate by me on which the committee based its action, and that estimate is for $15,000 in addition to the $20,000 given to the Indian children.

I ask the House to non-concur, because if we are to give anything it ought not to be in excess of the original estimate in, my judgment. I ask a vote.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the chairman permit me one question before that, in order to remove a misconception?

The estimate from the Secretary of the Interior went, after the House had disposed of the bill, to the Senate committee making the total $25,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I have the estimate right here from the Department.

Mr. McCOMAS. But the other is later.

Mr. RANDALL. And this comes in the regular way, in obedience to the law. Now I understand that pressure has been brought in this connection.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have not heard of any.

Mr. RANDALL. Both on the Department and on the members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have not heard of it.

Mr. STORM. I have.

Mr. McCOMAS. I do not know of any such pressure.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is greatly ignorant of what is going on; and I do not mean that offensively.

Mr. McCOMAS. I understand that; but I think the gentleman himself is mistaken.

I only want to add as a matter of fact that these schools are unsectarian.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not asserted to the contrary.

Mr. McCOMAS. And they are carried on like the common schools generally throughout the country.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the appropriation will not be in excess of the estimate, which, in my judgment, is enough.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. McCOMAS to concur in the Senate amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall not ask for a division on the question, because it may develop the want of a quorum, and I am anxious to proceed with the bill; but it is an amendment to be voted upon in the House.

Amendments numbered 198, 199, 200, 201, and 202 were non-concurred in.

Amendment number 203 was read, as follows:

For purchasing machine to test small specimens, $15,000.

The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move concurrence in this amendment, and in speaking to the proposition perhaps my remarks may not appear very pertinent to the matter pending before the House. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I would be recreant to my duty as a representative of my people on this floor did I not present some answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] in reference to the question of the Dakota bills now pending before the House.

It is true that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has presented to this House through the majority report of the Committee on Territories a miserable pretext, which he calls an enabling act, a miserable pretext which he knows will not be presented before this House for its action during this Congress. And he knows that if that enabling act were presented to the people of that Territory even if they desired admission as a whole they would spurn his miserable proposition. It is an insult to them and to their intelligence.

He tells us that the people of this whole country have as great an interest in the question of the division of that Territory as the residents thereof; but yet he is exceedingly careful that neither the representatives of the people of this country upon this floor nor the representatives of the people of that Territory shall have a voice in that question of division. He is careful to cover and smother that proposition and not permit it to be brought before the House for its action.

The people of that great Territory, with its half million of population, with its thousand or more post-offices, and its three hundred newspapers, and its vast interests have asked for admission into the Union of States. How many times and in what manner shall a people petition the Government of the United States for recognition and admission into the rank of States? Why, sir, they have prayed for admission and presented that proposition in every manner possible.

The gentleman tells us that the Republicans in this House have used every means to oppose his enabling act for the admission of the Territory as a whole. He can not point to the first word, to the first syllable, to the first action of any Republican, much less to the action of the representative of those people upon this floor—to one single act of theirs or of him against the submission of his proposition or against its recognition and passage by this House.

I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall present any proposition which he sees fit to present to this House for its favorable action relating to the people of that Territory and its recognition as a State. Let him present any proposition, even his miserable enabling act which does not provide for admission at all; let him present that if he will; let him present any proposition.

Why, sir, the Committee on Territories has occupied hours and days of this Congress in the consideration of other measures than the Dakota bills. What excuse have they to offer for their silence upon that question? What excuse can they furnish to the House and to the people of the country for not presenting those bills which provide for the admission of Dakota? They can furnish no excuse.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. RANDALL. In the interest of fair controversy I have raised no point against the gentleman from Dakota; but I do not want the consideration of this amendment in reference to the testing machine at the Springfield Armory to drift into a debate and a controversy as to the admission of Dakota.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It would take an arsenal to get Dakota in I am afraid.

Mr. GIFFORD. I ask leave to extend my remarks.

Mr. HILL. I shall object unless the same courtesy is extended to me.

Mr. REED. We do not want to have any garbled arrangement.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no garbled arrangement.

Mr. REED. I mean no reflection on anybody.

Mr. HILL. I give notice that on Wednesday next I shall call up the bill for the admission of Dakota into the Union.

Mr. CUTCHEON. We will all be here.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I hope you will not be here to oppose the admission of Dakota into the Union.

Mr. GIFFORD. I withdraw the motion to concur.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Amendments 204 to 230 were read and the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations of concurrence or non-concurrence respectively were agreed to.

Senate amendment 231 was read, as follows:

Insert, after line 2086, the following:

Confederate cemeteries near Columbus, Ohio: For the erection of suitable fences around the cemeteries in which confederate dead are buried near Columbus and on Johnson's Island, Ohio, and for putting the grounds in good condition, $2,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence in the amendment, with an amendment as follows:

After the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to ascertain and report to Congress at its next session, whether the graves of any soldiers, Union or confederate, who were killed in battle or who died in prison or hospital are not embraced in any national, city, town, or village cemetery, or are unprotected by inclosures or unmarked by headstones, and, if there be any such graves, what amount of money would be necessary to properly fence and permanently mark the same."

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to make a point of order against the amendment proposed by the committee. I submit that under the rule that amendment is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. The original proposition was inserted by the Senate. I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a statement which was introduced in the Senate by Mr. SHERMAN, Senator from Ohio and President of that body.

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think he misunderstands my point of order. I do not make it against the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I was about to give the history which it is proper to give of the manner in which this amendment of the Senate came into the bill.

The Senator from Ohio, Mr. SHERMAN, introduced that proposition; it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, was reported back favorably, and the Senate, without debate and without division, adopted it. The Senator from Ohio, when he presented the proposition, accompanied it with a statement, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Extract of annual message of Governor J. B. Foraker, of Ohio, January, 1887.]

The adjutant-general's report will be found both interesting and comprehensive. You will find in it some correspondence with the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army at Washington relative to the care of the confederate cemetery near Columbus, and you will learn from it that the United States authorities are without funds (appropriated) to care for this place. The title to it is in the United States, and that Government should care for these graves; but it seems to have overlooked them. The fence that incloses the lot is in a dilapidated condition, and the entire burial place is overgrown with weeds and thistles and briars. It is recommended that unless the United States Government can be induced to do so, an appropriation be made to rebuild the fence and clean up the grounds and put them in orderly repair and condition.

The same should be done for the last resting place of about two hundred confederate dead who are buried on Johnson's Island. The hatred and detestation that all loyal people must and should ever entertain for the destructive political doctrines that these men fought for ought not to stand in the way of either a cordial feeling toward the living who have abandoned such heresies, or a proper regard and Christian respect for the graves of the dead who, although wrong, yet heroically and valorously contended for the convictions they entertained.

Mr. RANDALL. That was presented by the Senator from Ohio, Mr. SHERMAN, and it is the language of the annual message of Governor Foraker, of Ohio. Now I maintain that the point of order would have been well taken on an original proposition of this character in the House, but the Senate, not being regulated by the rules of the House, have inserted the proposition in this connection, and the Committee on Appropriations have confined themselves to an amendment which is germane to the proposition as it comes from the Senate.

I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I rise merely for the purpose of asking my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] a question. Do I understand his point of order to be made against the original amendment or against the amendment submitted by the House Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BURROWS. Against the amendment submitted by the House committee and not against the Senate amendment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If my friend will indulge me I wish to say a word on that.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to hear the gentleman from Michigan on the point of order if it is insisted upon.

Mr. BURROWS. I only desire to say one word, if the Chair will indulge me. I do not wish to be put in a false position, as I may be by the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr RANDALL] implying that I am opposed to the Senate amendment. I am not. I have made no objection whatever to that, but I have made a point of order against the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations of this House as an amendment to the proposition of the Senate.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let that amendment be read.

Mr. LONG. The Chair is ready to rule upon the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that no provision changing existing law shall be in order on any appropriation bill or any amendment thereto. If the Senate have adopted such an amendment, the Chair thinks that the fact that they are not bound by the House rule does not give the bill any larger scope when it comes back to the House than it had before, and that the only resource of the House is to vote down the Senate amendment or take it as new legislation. Any other ruling would allow the House, after the Senate had amended a bill, to put upon it all kinds of propositions in the form of amendments to amendments. Therefore the Chair, with much regret, sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. One moment, Mr. Chairman. The House certainly has a right to concur or non-concur. Now, if that be so, has it not the right to concur with an amendment?

Mr. LONG. But the amendment must be in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], who has a modification of the proposition to submit, to which perhaps the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] will not object.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the proposition as it comes back from the Senate is one that finds favor generally with the House, and my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] makes no point of order against it.

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly not. I make no point of order against that, but I desire to make a suggestion in regard to the Senate amendment before final action thereon, which I think will promote the humane purpose intended.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then a word as to that proposition and as to the origin of the Senate amendment. At Columbus, Ohio, near what is known as Camp Chase, there is a cemetery in which are buried several hundred men who died while they were prisoners of war.

The Government of the United States placed around that cemetery a fence to protect it from being a wallowing place for swine and a loitering place for cattle; in other words, they recognized that it was "God's acre." Now that fence has been broken down, and the burial ground is a waste, and this proposition is to provide that that fence shall be restored, in order that the cemetery where those men are buried who died while they were detained as prisoners of war may not be left a common for cattle or a hog-wallow. That, it seems to me, is dictated by every sentiment of Christian civilization.

Mr. BURROWS. I trust my friend does not understand me as differing with him concerning that proposition.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] how the fence was originally provided.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. By the Government. When the place was selected for the burial of the dead it was inclosed by the officers in charge at that time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Where did they get the money?

Mr. BURROWS. I can answer that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I take it that the Government never gets any property without paying for it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My question is a very simple one; there is nothing occult about it. I simply want to know how the original provision was made for constructing the fence around that ground, and why the officers of the United States are not just as able to-day to provide for repairing that fence and keeping it in order, without any specific appropriation by Congress, as they were to construct it originally?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That comprises two questions. One is as to how the Government obtained the ground. I do not know. I only know that the Government has it.

Mr. BURROWS. Will my friend permit me to answer the gentleman's question? When these confederate prisoners died in our prisons, of course they had to be buried, and they were given decent Christian burial. The land in which they were buried did not belong to the United States at that time. Subsequently the Government bought the ground and paid $500 for it, and now holds a deed of the same. At the time of the burial of the confederates therein the spot was very properly inclosed with a substantial wooden fence.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Who constructed the fence?

Mr. BURROWS. It was done by order of the War Department, I understand.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why does not the Secretary of War authorize the fence to be repaired?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Because there are no funds.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. By the recognition of the Chair I hold the floor; but I am willing to answer the question. I am not advised how, but simply know the fact that the land was acquired by the Government. My honored friend [Mr. BURROWS] has stated how it was done. Now the reason the Quartermaster's Department is not authorized to restore the fence which inclosed this burial place and kept it in proper condition, is because no appropriation has been made for that purpose. There is no money available to pay the cost.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Was a special appropriation made to build the fence originally?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Appropriations are made specifically from time to time to defray the expense of caring for the several cemeteries of which the Government has charge and control, but no appropriation has been made which authorizes the repairs contemplated by the pending amendment, and for which it makes provision.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman says that without a specific appropriation, this work can not be done. Now I can not understand why the Department can not do now precisely what it did before.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Because they had a fund to do that which they did then; they have no fund to do what is now proposed to be done.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is my friend from Ohio sure of that?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, I am sure of it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think you are mistaken.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then we shall have to search the records to ascertain how the fact is.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My impression is that the Secretary of War, in his discretion, in the use of the funds placed at his disposal, had originally such proper work done at that cemetery as decency and humanity and the instincts of civilization required.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. True.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I have no doubt whatever that the Secretary of War, under the appropriations made by Congress and with the very liberal fund at his disposal, is to-day fully empowered to carry out precisely the same work again if necessary, so that, as I suppose, there is no need for bringing the matter in here at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] has expired. The Chair desires to know what is pending. The Chair has not heard any motion.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, I move to strike out the last word of anything that is pending.

Now, I desire to answer my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] fully. He knows that neither the Secretary of War nor even the President of the United States is above the law. Whatever the Secretary of War did at the time he constructed a fence, or directed one to be constructed, about that cemetery, he did in pursuance of law and paid the cost out of funds which he was authorized to expend in that manner. At this time he has no such authority and certainly no such fund. If he had, there would not come from the War Department the suggestion of a want in that behalf.

Now, a single word touching the other amendment to the Senate amendment, reported by the House Committee on Appropriations, and which has been referred to by my colleague on the committee [Mr. RANDALL]. It was brought to the knowledge of the committee that in different localities, near the battlefields of the South and in one place in the North, there are buried together indiscriminately confederates and Federals; that originally there were fences placed about these places to guard them in a manner becoming a Christian people; and that those fences are now torn down. This proposition looks simply to an inquiry as to whether there are grounds not dedicated specifically to the purpose of burying either the Federal or the confederate dead, but where, immediately after a battle, the soldiers of the two sides were buried promiscuously.

It is proposed to inquire whether there are such places anywhere in this Republic, and if so, to ascertain the cost of suitably inclosing those localities. The amendment to the Senate amendment, as reported from the Appropriation Committee of this House, goes much further than that. I do not approve of the amendment in its present form, nor do I know that I would approve it with a great deal of modification. But that I would favor an amendment looking to such an inquiry as I have suggested, I do not hesitate to declare.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman read the amendment he proposes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have not had time to prepare any amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does not the gentleman understand that the Union dead have all been gathered together in the national cemeteries, both North and South?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It appears not to be so.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I supposed they had.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It appears that in the neighborhood of the Wilderness, in the neighborhood of Chickamauga—I only mention these places by way of illustration—a number of Union and confederate soldiers have been buried in the manner I have stated.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But the Quartermaster-General has been at work for years gathering those into the national cemeteries at Chattanooga, Fredericksburg, and other places.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will only say to my friend that I understand from reports made upon this matter that the case is as I have stated. I do not know such to be the fact; but if anywhere there are buried in this way Union dead—with confederates, if you please, or without them—there can be no reasonable objection to an inquiry to ascertain the fact.

Mr. BURROWS. Has not the Secretary of War authority to do that now?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Of course he has.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This provision is out, as I understand, on a point of order; but inasmuch as the propriety and fitness of the proposition seemed to be called in question, I desired to state what I understood to be the purpose of the measure.

Now the amendment proposed by the House committee went much further, because it required search everywhere, into every village and hamlet, to find if there was a confederate grave unmarked. This is further than I deem it the proper duty of the Government to go.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Give us yours.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would amend that to read in this way: that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to ascertain and report to Congress, at its next session, whether the grounds wherein the Union and confederate dead who were killed in battle, or died in prison, lie buried together, are unprotected by suitable inclosures; and whether the graves therein are unmarked, together with an estimate of the cost of putting up suitable inclosures around such grounds.

With the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I ask that the Senate amendment amended as I here propose be adopted. The Senate amendment as amended will simply provide for putting a fence around the cemetery at Columbus, and if as we are informed there are other graveyards where Union and confederate soldiers are indiscriminately buried in the same ground and not taken care of, which have become wastes where pigs wallow and cows browse, then this House shall be informed of the facts and the estimated cost of providing suitable fences to protect them be ascertained and reported.

Mr. BURROWS. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether the Secretary of War does not under the law have authority to attend to this matter.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If he has such authority then this amendment is useless.

Mr. BURROWS. In my judgment he has such authority; and your amendment does not include those who have died in the hospitals.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No; I have struck that out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will read my amendment as I have written it. It does not propose to include those who died in the hospitals. I have struck that all out.

Mr. BURROWS. Why not include those?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Because it opens the inquiry beyond what is necessary. It is drawn only to meet the contingency of which I spoke, where the dead were promiscuously buried. If there is such a place there is not a man here who is not in favor of inclosing and protecting it by a suitable fence.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is there any suggestion that the Quartermaster-General's Department has failed to do its duty?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Not at all; and I will say to my friend from Michigan that the money appropriated for care of national cemeteries has, by the terms of the statute, been used for those only which were specifically named in the act or acts——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is there not a general law on the subject? I should be sorry to believe Congress had permitted this thing to go unprovided for until this late day.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Congress has done its duty, but if for any reason a cemetery or group of graves has been overlooked or neglected I see no good reason why that neglect should continue after our attention is called to the fact. The duty remains, though it may have been by inadvertence overlooked. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I move to concur in the amendment of the Senate with an amendment, such as I have stated.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, while I am in full accord with my friend from Ohio, I am firmly of the opinion this authority has already been conferred upon the Secretary of War. I make the point of order, however, that it should be considered by the committee.

Mr. LONG. That winds it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out for reasons already given.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope, Mr. Chairman, I am not misunderstood about the original proposition in the bill. I will inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he proposes to concur or non-concur.

Mr. RANDALL. We concur with an amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. But that amendment has gone out.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee desire to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. As reported by the committee, it went out on a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. But now we have the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. BURROWS. That also has gone out on a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in my belief the time has come when we should pay decent respect to the dead. While some here have a delicacy, I may say, about the proper care of the confederate dead, I think in the name of humanity if there be any place anywhere containing dead bodies of soldiers, who died bravely at least, that, in the absence of anything to protect those bodies, it becomes the duty of this Government to provide fences or suitable inclosures for that purpose so as to save those graves from the desecration of having cattle grazing upon them or hogs digging up the ground.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let me ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. RANDALL. Not now. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to direct the attention of the House to the fact that many of these confederate dead have children now living who to-day are as devoted to our flag as any other, and I really do not think the interests of this great Government or the harmony and peace of this people will be interfered with in the least degree by the construction of fences about the confederate dead which are now uncared for.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does the gentleman intend the proposition shall apply to all the Southern States?

Mr. RANDALL. This is a simple inquiry. It does not propose any action. We want to know whether it is true, as has been alleged, that there are these graveyards in this country that have not this character of protection, and that is all. When we get that information then will come the proposition as to what should be done and the extent of the appropriations for that purpose.

Mr. CUTCHEON. My question, which I desired to address to the gentleman, related to the extent of the inquiry whether it extended over the whole country.

Mr. RANDALL. It does. It extends throughout the length and breadth of this land.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I only wanted to be sure of that.

Mr. RANDALL. Wherever there are brave men who died it refers; because I want to say here and now that the bravery exhibited on both sides in that contest has been the best means of preserving peace to this country that has ever in its history been devised or made conclusive, either by the acts of men or the writing of statutes or laws.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no purpose to put me in a false position.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no; none in the world; and I will stop the gentleman right there to correct him if he has such an idea.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to be clearly understood on this whole matter.

When this bill came back from the Senate it contained a provision appropriating $2,000 for the proper care of the grounds near Columbus, Ohio, and on Johnson's Island, where we buried some 3,000 confederate prisoners of war. To this proposition no objection has been made, so far as I know, by any one. Thereupon the Committee on Appropriations of this House resolved to concur in the proposition of the Senate with an amendment, which is as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to ascertain, and report to Congress at its next session, whether the graves of any soldiers, Union or confederate, who were killed in battle or who died in prison or hospital, are not embraced in any national, city, town, or village cemetery, or are unprotected by inclosures or unmarked by headstones, and if there be any such graves what amount of money would be necessary to properly fence and permanently mark the same.

Against this proposition I made the point of order upon which it went out of the bill under the rules. Here the matter might have ended but for some observations made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

The gentleman from Pennsylvania admits that this proposition goes to the extent of imposing upon the National Government the obligation to inquire whether there are any confederate graves anywhere, outside of established cemeteries, unprotected and unmarked, and as the acknowledged leader of that side of the House expresses a desire that the care of such should become a national charge.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no leader about it; and there is no side about this question.

Mr. BURROWS. Let me proceed. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to assert that the House amendment goes to the extent (with which purpose he is in full accord) of imposing upon the Secretary of War the duty of searching out the graves of all confederate as well as Union dead, outside of any cemetery, with a view of bringing these under national protection and care.

Mr. RANDALL. I voted for that in committee and am willing to vote for it in the House.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand that, and it is this proposition I object to, but as it has gone out of the bill I do not care to be drawn into a discussion of it at this time; it is not before the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. It is only a mere inquiry.

Mr. BURROWS. True it is only in inquiry, but it is not difficult to discover the purpose of it and where it will end. It seems to me it will be time enough to consider the propriety of caring for the graves of those who sought the overthrow of the Government when you have provided a fitting monument to those who preserved it. It will be time enough to mark the graves of the confederate dead when you consent to the bill now pending in this House to rear a monument to General Grant, and build a statue to Edwin M. Stanton, that great rock upon which Abraham Lincoln leaned when the Republic trembled. [Applause]. I am not in accord with that spirit which would care for the confederate dead while withholding support from the living Union soldier now sitting in the shadow of the poor-house.

Now I think I understand the end of this business. I say it without malice, but we may as well come to an understanding about this whole matter in the beginning. I draw the line here, and upon this line we ought to stand: That the men who fought to maintain this Government and defend constitutional liberty were in the right, and those who fought to destroy it were in the wrong; and we can never consent as a nation to honor any man, living or dead, because he betrayed his country.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say only this: That the gentleman speaks of my endeavor to draw a line, or rather he says there should be a line drawn. Now, the difference between the gentleman and myself is that I want to rub out the lines that mark the difference between the two ends of the country.

Mr. BURROWS. I never want to efface the line between right and wrong—between loyalty and disloyalty.

Mr. RANDALL. There is nothing in this proposition that will bear a scintilla of such a construction.

Mr. BURROWS. I think differently, and I also think that the time should never come when we should hold the name and fame of those who assailed the Republic in equal regard with those who defended it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the House that there is nothing before the committee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Not upon my motion, and it is the only one before the House.

Mr. BURROWS. What proposition is pending?

Mr. CUTCHEON. My motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been recognized, and the gentleman from Michigan had no right to make the motion while the gentleman from Pennsylania was on the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But there was no question before the House upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania could take the floor. I made a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman was out of order while another gentleman was on the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I make the point of order that there was no question before the House upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania could be recognized, and that I rose and made a motion which was in order, and was entitled to recognition on my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The response the Chair has to make is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had the floor, and the Chair presumed he would make an appropriate motion. The Chair had a right to presume that he, being in charge of the bill, would do so, and no other gentleman could make a motion while he had the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the Chair proceeds on presumptions I yield to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. The proposition as presented by the Committee on Appropriations is one of inquiry, the object sought being to get information so that the House might hereafter act understandingly. It is in the exact line of what was proposed in the Senate and in accordance with the facts that I have presented. I do think and the majority of the Committee on Appropriations thought that the time had come when war on the dead should cease.

There is nothing in the proposition that even by inference or by any possible construction can be tortured into a controversy on the question of who was right and who was wrong. It is well known to this House and to the country how I feel on that subject. But I want to say when that war was over I thought we ought to proceed to mend rather than to tear down, destroy, and rip open. That is all there is in this proposition. I do not think it was introduced with any purpose whatever of a political nature. It was an appeal to our manhood. It was an appeal to the best sentiment of our nature that these dead people should at least have protection in their bodies from cattle and from persons who were desecrating these cemeteries.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] a question before he sits down. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been an honored and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for how many Congresses I do not quite remember.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not material.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to ask him why it is that this measure has never been brought up before.

Mr. RANDALL. Because this was the first time it was ever brought to the attention of the committee or to my attention.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to ask another question in that connection. What does the gentleman from Pennsylvania mean when he says that the committee had concluded the time had now arrived when this thing could properly be done?

Mr. RANDALL. The general tendency of the thought of the committee membership, I take it, although I have no right to say anything of what occurs in committee, was in that direction.

Mr. BOUTELLE. One more question, and then I will relieve the gentleman. I desire to ask him whether it is not his belief that if no such action as this had been proposed by his committee and no such legislation should take place, the Secretary of War and the officers of the Government are fully empowered with authority and with funds to provide these fences in Columbus and elsewhere as here proposed.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer that question. I am not clear in my judgment whether the Secretary of War has that power now. But we saw the opportunity suggested by the proposition of the Senate as to the confederate dead in the State of Ohio to build fences about the cemeteries to protect them, and we thought that we might proceed a little further in that direction and make the inquiry general, whether, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], a member of the Committee on Appropriations, desires, this action shall be had as to the confederate and Union dead where they are mingled together in common graves, or whether, as some of us thought, this provision might be made as to where there were confederate dead only.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment, which proposes simply to restore certain burial inclosures within the Northern States where confederate soldiers died while held as prisoners of war. I think it is becoming to us as a people to see that those inclosures are maintained; that these cemeteries are not turned into commons. I made the inquiry I did of the gentleman from Pennsylvania simply and in good faith to ascertain the extent of the proposed inquiry, whether it was to extend to all the battle-fields of the South or only to the Northern States.

Mr. RANDALL. I can only say as to my own wish that I wanted it to extend from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. LONG. That question is not before us.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is not before us now. We have before us only a simple matter of concurrence in this amendment.

There is something due to ourselves, to those of us who come from the Northern States, to our self-respect and our feeling toward the dead, simply because they are the dead; because their resting places are away from their friends, and they lie buried in a land of strangers. I think that respect for ourselves and respect for our profession of being a Christian people should induce us to maintain these inclosures about the resting places of these people who died alone and in prison, without reference to the cause in which they died. That these men were brave, all the world knows. The only fault I had to find with them was that they were too brave in what I considered a bad cause.

No one who faced them on the battlefield will ever complain that they were not brave. They were brave. And if the time ever comes when we shall stand again, shoulder to shoulder, North and South, in a common cause, the world will learn and know that the American soldiery are the best and bravest soldiery in the world, whether they hail from the North or the South. [Loud applause.]

I am in favor of building up these waste places in the North; but, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is our duty to go down to the Southern States and hunt out the graves of men where they rest among their own friends, among those who loved them, their brothers, companions, and comrades in arms, because their friends and companions and comrades will find those resting places, and will mark them and guard them.

A MEMBER. They have done it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. They have done it no doubt, and I have not any complaint to make of our Southern friends because they honor their dead. They would be either more or less than men if they failed to do that; and I have no fault to find, and no upbraidings to offer, because when the spring-time comes they lay the flowers of spring upon the graves of their own brave, though, as we think, mistaken soldiers. But as to those who died among us of the North, and who sleep in Northern soil, in God's name let us not leave the ground where they rest unprotected. They were Americans and they are dead; let us protect their resting places. We shall not think of our own dead less tenderly, or hold the cause in which they died less sacred, nor shall we efface or dim the clear line between right and wrong by paying this tribute to our common humanity and our common mortality.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] is recognized.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, as I have always understood the question, there was no necessity for any interruption of the power of the Government of the United States, and I have never had any sympathy with the men who attempted to break up that Government. I was one of those in the North who believed that we knew better what was good for the people of the South than they did for themselves, and we fought them to keep them in the Union. We compelled obedience to the laws of the Union, and so this Government was preserved, and when the war was over if the great philanthropist, the great friend of humanity had lived, we would have had peace and concord long before it came to these people. When Abraham Lincoln died the best friend of all humanity on this continent went down to his grave.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the use of talking about who was wrong and who was right?

Mr. SOWDEN. The war is over, and let us have peace.

Mr. CURTIN. The war is over, thank God, and a great many men who now undertake to revive the war and flaunt its bloody memories had but little to do with it. [Laughter and applause.] It so happened that I was in an official position where it became my duty to stand by the Government. I had sworn that I would, and I respected my oath to my Maker. I gave all the powers of my early life to the maintenance of this Government—to making it a great state. When the authority of the Government had been established, when we had compelled obedience to the law and restored the Southern country as a part of this great Union, I believed the war was over, and I issued the first proclamation from any official source in the North to declare that the war was over. [Laughter and applause.] As to these gentlemen from the South, they are your countrymen, are they not? If they are not your countrymen, why are they here? Why are they occupying seats in this august body, and at the other end of the Capitol, if they are not your countrymen?

Mr. Chairman, there is implanted by God Almighty in every human breast a sentiment of admiration and reverence for heroism. And in all the wars of this great country there are no higher evidences of heroism than were presented in the sufferings and the persistence of the people of the South. I believe they were in error; but there can be no stronger evidence of the fidelity which they now cherish toward the country than the cheerfulness with which in this House gentlemen from the South vote pensions for soldiers of the North who are in poverty.

Mr. Chairman, there is a distinction between a government and a state. A government can control provinces or communities subjected to its power; but if you desire to make this great nation a state it must be homogeneous, so that when the interests of Maine are assailed the wrong shall be felt in California, and when the rights of Oregon are attacked the vibration of the blow shall be felt in Florida. We are now a state—a great homogeneous people; and I am sick and tired of this constant revival of the war, unhappy and bloody as it was. I would carefully guard and care for the graves of the immortal dead who fell in that lamentable strife. While cherishing the memory of those who fell, I would have all the bitterness of the war forgotten; I would look upon every citizen within the borders of this great and powerful country as my brother. [Applause.] Any man within the jurisdiction of this Government who obeys its laws is my brother and your brother. I trust that such a one will not be thrust aside as an outcast.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy perhaps less than five minutes in saying a few words touching the pending amendment. It seems to me there ought to be a time when a plain business proposition could be considered as such.

The governor of Ohio called the attention of the country to the fact that a certain cemetery near Columbus, of which the Government of the United States has charge, and which it owns, was in a dilapidated condition. Recognizing that fact, and without reference to who was buried there, provision was made to do what everybody recognizes the propriety of doing—to make suitable repairs by erecting a fence to inclose the ground.

On the heels of that it was suggested that there were other cemeteries or grounds near battlefields in the South where the Union dead were buried promiscuously with confederates, and where, owing to the poverty of States or of localities, the fences originally constructed about those cemeteries had been torn down, so that the grounds were being in a measure desecrated. It was proposed that inquiry be made as to whether that statement is true. Will anybody object to such an inquiry? Not a man. Nobody here dares say to the mother of the dead soldier, "I objected to inquiry being made as to whether the graveyard where your boy is buried is being neglected and is becoming a wild waste." That is all this inquiry looked to.

Some one called my attention to the fact that if there are Union soldiers buried anywhere in the South, the Quartermaster's Department is not only authorized but required to gather their bones and deposit them in the national cemeteries. If such is the fact, it was answer to the proposition. The inquiry proposed is a plain one; and some one, without having his gall unnaturally stirred, might have arisen in his place and said, "What you propose is already provided for."

I live somewhat near the line where the attrition between the influences of slavery and freedom was greatest. I do not yield to any one in hostility to the institution of slavery and all the things it inspired. Yet I have not felt called upon to part with my humanity or to fail to recognize the obligations that a Christian civilization imposes upon us. [Applause.]

I repeat again, all that is proposed here is an inquiry as to whether anywhere, near the battlefields of the South, there were Union soldiers buried; and we put in the confederates because the fact that the two classes might be buried together did not render the ground of that peculiar character whereon we might not walk to make the investigation. Nor should the fact that the dead of the two armies in such locality are sleeping in graves side by side deter us from protecting the graveyard from desecration.

But if it were true that in these places there were soldiers buried whose resting places had not and have not been properly cared for, this House and the country has a right to know it, and then to take such action as may be fit and proper.

As to what has been said by my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] in reference to the Appropriations Committee, I do not know what actuated the motives of others, but for myself I believed then, and I believe now, every man in this House would be anxious to get the information the amendment as I have modified it would secure.

Mr. BURROWS. Was my friend from Ohio in favor of the amendment as reported from the committee?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I distinctly stated I was not, but without generally discussing the merits of the controversy, beyond recognizing the sacred cause for which these soldiers fought and bled and died, I am willing to hunt up their bones wherever they are, and to see that they have that care and attention which a civilized nation ought to bestow upon its dead.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The civilization of the nation bestowed that care and attention in 1867.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If there are such places, does my friend object to our getting information of the facts?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not; but I do object to the policy of arraigning our people as false to the inspiration of civilization and the instincts of humanity for twenty-odd years since the war.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not arraign them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Here are two pages of the Revised Statutes devoted to that subject by a watchful, civilized, and humane people.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend, the governor of Ohio called attention to the fact that the cemetery which the Government owns at Columbus has become a desert waste, and this he did as an indication, not that we are lacking in willingness to care for the resting places of the dead, but to show that it had been overlooked. That is all. The Senate amendment directs that to be done now which confessedly should have been done long ago.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCOMAS. I move to concur in the amendment with an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And for the erection of suitable fences around the cemetery in Cumberland, Md., called Hook's Cemetery, where twelve Union soldiers are buried, and for putting the grounds in good condition, $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope no further time will be taken up with debate, but that we will be permitted to have a vote.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have a letter here from Colonel Batchelder, in charge of the national cemeteries, from which I should like to read some extracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it up and it will be read as part of his speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon investigation it is ascertained that in one of the burying grounds there, known as Hook's Cemetery, there are the graves of twelve Union soldiers. The grounds are practically abandoned and badly neglected, the greater part of the inclosing fence being gone, and, of course, exposed to depredation of animals running at large, but there were no indications of any recent disturbance of the surface, though it was stated that hogs had invaded the premises.

With reference to those buried in Hook's Cemetery, however, it would seem proper that steps be taken to protect them.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a suggestion to the House in order to bring it to a direct vote in reference to this whole matter. I will move to non-concur in the Senate amendment, so as to send this whole subject to the conference committee. I will suggest to the gentleman from Maryland also to allow his amendment to go to the conference committee.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have the floor, and can not be taken off of it without my consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought the gentleman had yielded to me.

Mr. McCOMAS. I am in favor of the amendment pending, and also of the one now proposed, as shown by the letter of Colonel Batchelder, which has been read relative to Hook's Cemetery. It requires money shall be given for the construction of fences to protect the bodies of the twelve Union soldiers buried there. I have been trying for a year to get it done, but have not succeeded; and now in order to get it done I wish to have this matter included, so that it may go to the committee of conference.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a local matter, and we should treat the subject as a general one. I think now, Mr. Chairman, that there will be no objection to the suggestion I made a while ago to send the whole subject to the conference committee.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to say a word further upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Maryland yielded the floor?

Mr. McCOMAS. I have not.

I want to add to what I said that this cemetery at Cumberland was seized by the military for this purpose, and has since been abandoned to the Government practically and used for no other interments, and was properly fenced originally, but it was done some twenty-five years ago and it has now fallen into decay. The citizens of Cumberland are caring for all of the other cemeteries there where Union soldiers are buried; but this was a separate ground, and was abandoned to the Government during the war when it took possession of it for the interment of these soldiers. It is in precisely the same situation as the ground at Columbus, Ohio. It has been abandoned to its present uses, and if you are going to provide for fencing the one then I ask you for the same reasons to provide a fence for the other, and upon the still higher ground that these Union soldiers were defending this Government from whom I ask at least as fair treatment as you give here to the Columbus confederate graveyard.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, this debate has proceeded upon the theory that some objection has been made by some one to the United States Government properly caring for the ground where the confederate dead were buried who died while held as prisoners of war. The speech of my colleague was directed to that subject very largely.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say——

Mr. BURROWS. I can not yield for an interruption now.

Concerning that question, Mr. Chairman, there is not the slightest opposition from any quarter. Common decency and humanity enjoin that. But I was opposed to the amendment put in by the Committee on Appropriations, because I thought it went entirely too far.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], who takes occasion to enlarge upon the necessity of doing that to which we all agree, namely, what is provided for in the Senate amendment, concurs with me that the amendment proposed by the House committee and to which I have objected, goes too far, and I object to the amendment proposed by him for the House amendment, for the reason that, in my judgment, it will not accomplish the purpose he has in view. If the matter goes to a conference it can undoubtedly be adjusted satisfactorily to all.

I desire to say upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to non-concur in the Senate amendment, that I think that ought to be done for this reason: A portion of the appropriation contained in the Senate amendment is to be expended on Johnson's Island. It will be found upon an examination that the United States has no title to any portion of that island, and the parties owning it live in Sandusky and refuse to sell it, and demand the removal of the confederate dead therefrom unless certain conditions are accepted, which can not well be entertained.

The Quartermaster-General recently caused an examination to be had, and the suggestion is made that instead of attempting to secure title to the property on Johnson Island, the bodies of the confederate dead there be taken up and removed to the confederate cemetery at Columbus. This will cost but about $800, and hence I suggest, if we nonconcur in the Senate amendment, the whole matter can be arranged to the satisfaction of every one.

Mr. KING. I would like to make one statement to the House and to the country. As a Southern man I am grateful for the proposition of gentlemen looking to the preservation of the graves of the confederate dead. But I wish to state here, for the benefit of my friends on the other side, that I know of no confederate grave-yard in the entire South that is derelict; and further, I wish to say that the people who represent the dead of that section hold those graves as the most sacred legacy of a lost cause.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, just a word before the vote is taken.

My colleague from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] certainly must have misunderstood me. I did not intend to criticise his position in what I said, for I understood that he took the same view I did in regard to the Northern cemeteries. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to strike out the last word.

I want to say only a word or two before a vote is taken, being a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

It was found, as a reason for the Senate amendment, that there were two cemeteries in which the confederate dead were buried that were being neglected. It was also stated before the committee that there were confederates buried at Arlington Heights where their graves are marked only by a wooden slab instead of by a marble slab. We all agreed then that an amendment should be put on the bill for the purpose of making inquiry to see whether there were any others in that condition; and on that proposition I repeat we all agreed, because we did not want that condition of things at Arlington Heights or any other national cemetery to exist. The amendment put in, however, is broader than was contemplated, broader than was before the committee; I refer to the amendment reported from our committee and which was drawn after we voted on the proposition as we talked it and understood it.

The only thing we wanted to know was whether there were any other national cemeteries in which confederate dead are buried which are in the same condition, and not treated with the same consideration that we should, every one of us, want them treated with. We wanted to know the facts so that we could have the whole subject before us for consideration. For that proposition I stood in committee and stand for it before the House. I do not believe that the South want us to go South to look after the confederate dead buried there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Maryland to concur with the amendment.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. RANDALL to non-concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion to non-concur was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RICHARDSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 199) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Senate amendments 232 to 243 were read and the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations of concurrence and non-concurrence, respectively, were agreed to.

Senate amendment 244 was read, as follows:

In line 2471, after the word "for," insert "rent of office for the marshal;" so that it will read:

"Rent and incidental expenses, office of marshal, Territory of Alaska: For rent of office for the marshal, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses, $500.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to concur for the purpose of making an inquiry. Why do the committee not agree to an amendment providing for rent of office for the marshal?

Mr. RANDALL. We are informed no provision for rent is required.

Mr. ROGERS. My information from the Department of Justice is directly to the contrary.

Mr. RANDALL. We had a request from the Department to strike out the provision for rent.

Mr. ROGERS. My information I received to-day from the chief clerk of the Department of Justice, who stated there is no public building there.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand Mr. Hodges, of the Department, came to our committee and stated this was the way in which the paragraph should stand. I think we had better non-concur, and I can inquire further before the bill comes up again on Monday.

Mr. ROGERS. I had no information from Mr. Hodges; my information was from Mr. Clay.

Mr. RANDALL. They are both reliable. If there is a difference between them I would like to see them face to face to explain it.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Clay tells me it is essential to make an appropriation for rent for the marshal's office. I have no desire, however, to make a point on this and to call for a division, because it is evident we have no quorum.

Senate amendment 245 was read, as follows:

In line 2565, after the word "when," insert "the court is open for business or;" so that it will read:

"Nor shall any part of any money appropriated be used in payment of a per diem compensation to any attorney, clerk, or marshal for attendance in court except for days when the court is open for business or business is actually transacted in court."

Mr. BUCK. I move to concur in the Senate amendment. I feel reluctant to take up the time at this late hour on Saturday afternoon. But the original bill as it passed the House left the law in such a shape that the attorney, clerk, and marshal would not be paid, except when business was actually transacted.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman that he allow this amendment to go into conference.

Mr. BUCK. I would not object to that if the gentleman will assure me that the committee of conference will consider the matter. I only wish to suggest that the law as this bill would leave it without the Senate amendment would simply cut off any per diem for the United States marshal, or the United States attorney, or the clerk of a United States court, whenever there was no business transacted in the court. If the court was open, and the clerk was there, and the marshal and attorney, and a motion happened to be made to continue a case, and no business should be transacted or case tried, those officers would get no pay whatever. The Senate amended that.

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate amended it in a manner which defeats the object the House had in inserting the language.

Mr. BUCK. That depends on what was the object the House had.

Mr. RANDALL. It was to break up an abuse.

Mr. BUCK. If the object was to cut off any per diem to clerk, marshal, and attorney when a case was not tried, that object is defeated by the Senate amendment. But this amendment makes the law uniform everywhere. It neither increases nor diminishes the fees or compensation per diem.

Mr. RANDALL. We do not want that these men shall get pay for the sitting of a court when the court is not actually in session for any business.

Mr. BUCK. The Senate amendment would not allow that. It simply provides that when a court has been opened regularly the compensation will be made. The clerk must record that transaction of opening the court. The officer may be called upon to travel from his residence, and if so called upon the present statute entitles him to 5 cents a mile for travel to and from the court. This would oblige him to go from his residence and attend the session of the court and not have any bit of compensation except for travel.

Mr. RANDALL. This relates to the per diem.

Mr. BUCK. I understand that, and the provision of the bill cuts that off unless some cases are tried or business done in the court. It frequently happens that a judge opens a court and all the paraphernalia of the court are present; the marshal, the clerk, the crier, the attorney are all obliged to be there and attend to their business whether a suitor is there to go on with his case or whether counsel may be present or not.

Mr. LONG. That would be the transaction of business.

Mr. REED. You can not tell under the present Comptroller whether that would be transaction of business or not.

Mr. BUCK. I think it is better that the provision should be made as it is with the Senate amendment—

When the court is open for business or business is actually transacted in court.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Senate amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 199) for the retirement and recoinage of the trade-dollar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2451) for the relief of Mrs. Julia De Quindre, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. BLAIR, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. PALMER.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of the bill (S. 175) and that it be now considered.

Mr. DUNN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rules, and referred as follows:

By Mr. C. H. ALLEN: Petition of J. A. Garfield Post, No. 120, and of Abraham Lincoln Post, No. 11, Grand Army of the Republic, of Massachusetts, respecting the veto of the dependent pension bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MONDAY, February 21, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 18th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 785) granting a pension to George Ham; and

An act (S. 1384) granting a pension to Mathias Wondrak.

The message also announced that the following bills having been received by the President February 1, 1887, and not having been returned to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, they had become laws without his approval:

An act (S. 269) for the relief of W. H. Powell; and

An act (S. 1368) for the relief of Richard H. Porter, surviving partner and assignee of the late firm of R. H. & James Porter.

JOHN REED, SR.—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I herewith return without approval Senate bill No. 1626, entitled "An act granting a pension to John Reed, sr."

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions merely states that the mother of John Reed was granted a pension, commencing the 5th day of December, 1862; that she has since died, and that the proposed bill is to secure a pension to John Reed, sr., the aged and dependent father of the deceased soldier.

The records show that the beneficiary named in this bill filed an application for a pension in 1877, alleging that he was the father of John Reed, who died in the service, and that his wife, the mother of the deceased soldier, died May 10, 1872, and that he, the father, was mainly dependent upon his son for support. He filed evidence of the mother's death, and one witness alleged that he was present at her death, and attended her funeral.

In 1864 Martha Reed, the mother of the soldier, filed her application for pension, in which she at first claimed to be the widow of John Reed. She afterward, however, alleged that her husband, John Reed, abandoned his family in 1859, and had not thereafter contributed to their support, and that the soldier was her main support after such abandonment. She was allowed a pension as dependent mother, which commenced in 1862, the date of her son's death, and seems to have terminated July 22, 1884, when she died.

The claim of the father was rejected in 1883, for the reason that the mother, who had a prior right, was still living; and when his claim was again pressed, in 1886, he was informed that his abandonment of his family in 1859 precluded the idea that he was entitled to a pension as being dependent upon the soldier for support.

Of course these decisions were correct in law, in equity, and in morals.

This case demonstrates the means employed in attempts to cheat the Government in applications for pensions—too often successful.

The allegation in 1877 of the man who now poses as the aged and dependent father of a dead soldier that the mother died in 1872, when at that time her claim was pending for pension largely based upon his abandonment; the affidavit of the man who testified that he saw her die in 1872; the effrontery of this unworthy father renewing his claim after the detection of his fraud and the actual death of the mother, and the allegation of the mother that she was a widow when in fact she was an abandoned wife, show the processes which enter into these claims for pensions, and the boldness with which plans are sometimes concocted to rob the Government, by actually trafficking in death, and imposing upon the sacred sentiments of patriotism and national gratitude.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 19, 1887.

CHARLOTTE O'NEAL—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I herewith return without approval Senate bill 859, entitled "An act granting a pension to Charlotte O'Neal."

This bill proposes to grant a pension to the beneficiary therein named as the widow of Richard O'Neal, late colonel of the Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

In the report of the committee in the Senate, to whom this bill was referred, it is stated that the deceased soldier was the first colonel of the regiment named; that he resigned from the army, and was, by order of the governor of Indiana, put in charge of the United States camps at Indianapolis. A military order is made part of the report, announcing that the funeral of Lieut. Col. Richard O'Neal will take place January 6, 1863, and reciting the fact that the deceased had charge of the camps near Indianapolis for the preceding four months.

It is distinctly alleged in the report that the beneficiary did not apply to the Pension Bureau for relief, because the disease of which her husband died was incurred after his resignation.

The records of the War Department fail to show that there was a colonel of the Twenty-sixth Indiana Regiment named Richard O'Neal, but it does appear that Richard Neal was lieutenant-colonel of said regiment; that he was mustered in August 31, 1861, and resigned June 30, 1862.

If this is the officer whose widow is named in the bill, the proposition is to pension a widow of a soldier who, after ten months' service, resigned, and who seven months after his resignation died of disease which was in no manner related to his military service.

There is beside such a discrepancy between the name given in the bill and the name of the officer who served as lieutenant-colonel in the regiment mentioned, that if the merits were with the widow, the bill would need further Congressional consideration.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 19, 1887.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate——

Mr. BLAIR. Before the veto messages are disposed of I wish to make an inquiry. Have they been for the first time laid before the Senate this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the first time.

Mr. BLAIR. I observed their publication in the newspapers of the country last evening. I wish to inquire why it is that Presidential messages are given to the press before they are given to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such messages do not come as secret documents. The messages came to the Senate on Saturday, but not at an hour when it was convenient to present them to the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. So they were given to the press before they were laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They came to the Senate as public documents, and copies were obtained by the representatives of the press in the usual way.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose they should be referred to the Committee on Pensions. I am not familiar with the cases themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference has already been made.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 11, 1887, a report of Col. Henry B. Carrington in regard to the massacre near Fort Philip Kearney, Dak., December 21, 1866; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Maine; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

State of Maine.—Resolves in favor of the Miller bill.

Whereas the bill now pending before Congress providing for the extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, foot and mouth disease, and rinderpest among cattle, and for other purposes, affects a leading industry of our State: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Maine in Legislature assembled, That the enactment of the Miller bill, so called, would be in the interest not only of the cattle-growers of this State, but of every consumer of meat.

Resolved, That the losses inflicted upon the cattle industry during the last two years by means of embarrassing interstate and foreign quarantines amount to a national calamity, and that these quarantines constitute the greatest existing obstruction to interstate and foreign commerce.

Resolved, That experience has shown that the only successful way to deal with pleuro-pneumonia is by prompt resort to heroic treatment, and that the quickest way is the cheapest way.

Resolved, That as the very existence of the most considerable portion of the meat supply of the United States is seriously endangered by pleuro-pneumonia, that the suppression of the disease is not only demanded as a sanitary measure for the protection of the health of our people, but also as a measure of political economy.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, directed to forward an authenticated copy of the foregoing resolutions to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, with a request that the same be laid before their respective bodies.

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 17, 1887.

Read and passed finally.

CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD, Speaker.

IN SENATE, February 18, 1887.

Read and passed finally.

SEBASTIAN S. MARBLE, President.

FEBRUARY 18, 1887.

Approved.

JOSEPH R. BODWELL, Governor.

ORAMANDAL SMITH, Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from the secretary of state of Colorado, transmitting a memorial of the General Assembly of Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial No. 4, for the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from Colorado.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, respectfully represent that the Southern Ute Indians retained within the boundaries of this State, and upon a strip of land more than 100 miles long, and the entire length of the counties of La Plata and Archuleta, roam in their natural and savage state, subject to no laws of government, except the light control which a local Indian agent is able to exercise. Experience has shown that such a tribe of Indians under no more restraint than that imposed by an ordinary white man, acting in behalf of his own private interests, are likely to become turbulent and commit depredations upon the persons and property of their white neighbors at any time. And your memorialists further represent that the interposition of savages among an enlightened and law-abiding people is a system repugnant to the recognized ideas and practices of civilized government, and likely in the near future to bring on a conflict between the races which can be suppressed only at a great cost of life and property.

That, in fact, the southwestern part of Colorado and the northwestern portion of New Mexico are being so rapidly settled, and the white people are becoming so restless under their many unmitigated wrongs, that they threaten to rely upon themselves for that protection which the Government has failed to afford them. So that in the very nature of things some new and perhaps slight provocation will precipitate the inevitable conflict. And your memorialists respectfully submit, in view of the fact that Colorado is fast becoming a densely populated State, and especially as there are a number of Territories sparcely settled, under the sole control of the General Government, that the Southern tribe of Indians ought to be removed from within the State boundaries; that the speedy removal of said tribe from the long and narrow strip they now occupy and which crosses all the natural outlets of La Plata and Archuleta Counties, would be a measure of safety to them and of peace and safety to the white people who reside upon the borders of their reservation; it would at the same time open up a large acreage of agricultural land to settlement, and permit the people of Colorado and New Mexico to have that safe intercommunication to which they are entitled.

That copies of this memorial be forwarded to his Excellency the President of the United States, and to Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar, Secretary of the Interior, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

W. H. MELDRUM,
President of the Senate.
T. B. STUART,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

He also presented the memorial, officially signed, of the national legislative committee of the Travelers' Protective Association, urging the passage of the James commercial travelers' bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a resolution adopted by George Strong Post, No. 19, of Fairfield, Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, favoring the passage of a pension bill embodying provisions for the relief of ex-Union dependent soldiers as a substitute for the dependent pension bill recently vetoed by the President; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Crocker Post, No. 12, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, dated Des Moines, Iowa, favoring the passage of the dependent pension bill over the President's veto; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present a petition of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Iowa, praying for the passage of Senate bill 2362, to promote the political and commercial prosperity of American nations, now pending in Congress. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS presented resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation; which were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION—FOR SEACOAST DEFENSE.

The following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted at the regular monthly meeting of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation held February 9, 1887:

Whereas the necessity of arming our seacoast with the best guns procurable is imperative; and

Whereas the Military and Appropriation Committees of Congress have recommended certain experiments to be made with new and improved systems of guns, so as to be able to take prompt, intelligent, and decisive action, obtainable only after the result of such experiments are known, before expending large amounts of money for guns as offered by the Ordnance Department, which, it is alleged, have but little durability and not as much penetrating power as other guns ordered to be experimented with by the committee of Congress; and

Whereas a substitute for the fortification bill as amended by the Senate is now being considered by the conference committee opening the production of ordnance to public competition, ordering the trial of the multicharge gun and the conversion of the old cast-iron guns on hand into combined smooth-bore and rifle cannons and appropriating therefor $10,340,000; and

Whereas Congress is willing to appropriate large sums of money for guns for seacoast defense: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we urge upon Congress the advisability of adopting the above-mentioned substitute, now before the conference committee, the appropriation to be available only after experiments have been made to demonstrate which kind of guns are actually the best: and

Be it further resolved, That the Congress of the United States be asked to appropriate such sum of money as is recommended in said substitute fortification bill, to construct at once, for service trial, such guns as are deemed worthy of trial, and heretofore recommended by the Military and Appropriation Committees of the House, in order that the moneys contingently appropriated may only be expended for such guns as are proven to be the most effective and durable.

A report by the committee on seacoast defense, of which the following is an extract, was also adopted with the resolution attached:

Your committee use this opportunity to state that great care must be taken that the expenditure of the large sums of money required for seacoast defense, when appropriated, shall not fall into the hands of any inefficient corps of officials, but shall be dealt with by an independent commission to be appointed by the President, and that such commission shall afford a hearing for every plan of seacoast defense before a definite plan is finally determined upon. Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the New York Board of Trade and Transportation regard with satisfaction the passage by the Senate of measures for the defense of our seacoast, and trust that before the adjournment a well-matured plan will have been adopted by Congress, supported by adequate appropriations, to secure for the defenseless coast of the United States the best means of protection that modern engineering and military science can afford.

The other day I presented a memorial in regard to this matter, but different in its character. I ask that this be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial No. 4 for the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from Colorado.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

ALVA ADAMS, Governor.

Mr. TELLER presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, remonstrating against the repeal of the oleomargarine law; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[House joint memorial No. 4.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, respectfully represent that efforts are being made in your honorable body looking toward the repeal of what is known as the "oleomargarine law." Therefore, we, your memorialists, would respectfully ask that in view of such facts we be allowed to protest against any such action, as the repeal of said law, regardless of the defects it may possess, would work a hardship and incalculable damage upon dairy interests of this country.

And we would further represent that any bogus industry tending to compete with the legitimate products of agriculture and its different branches is a blow aimed directly at the future prosperity of our farming classes, upon whose prosperity, in the broadest sense of the word, depends the prosperity of the nation.

Therefore, we, your memorialists, would respectfully ask that said law be allowed to remain in full force.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

He also presented authenticated resolutions adopted by Lookout Post, No. 96, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic; a resolution adopted by Pea Ridge Post, No. 118, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, Chetopa, Kans.; a resolution adopted by Benton Post, Grand Army of the Republic, No. 61, Department of Kansas, Anthony, Kans.; a resolution adopted by Elk City Post, No. 128, Grand Army of the Republic, Elk City, Kans., and a resolution adopted by James Shields Post, No. 57, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, at Wellington, Kans., favoring the passage of the dependent relatives pension bill over the veto of the President; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB presented resolutions adopted by Mulligan Post, No. 91, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, at Longton, Kans.; a resolution adopted by Lookout Post, No. 96, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, Wellsville, Kans.; a resolution adopted by E. M. Stanton Post, No. 23, Grand Army of the Republic, Howard, Kans.; a resolution adopted by James Shields Post, No. 57, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, Wellington, Kans., and a resolution adopted by Benton Post, No. 61, Grand Army of the Republic, Anthony, Kans., praying that what is known as the dependent relatives and disabled soldiers pension bill shall be passed over the veto of the President; which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 899) for the relief of A. S. Bloom, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2981) to abrogate the powers of the executive officers of the United States in allowing indemnity locations or scrip for confirmed unsatisfied private land claims, under section 3 of the act of Congress approved June 2, 1858 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 11, pages 294 and 295, chapter 81), and to vest that power in the courts of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 10040) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Mississippi City, Miss.; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3294) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay certain creditors of the Pottawatomie Indians out of the funds of said Indians, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2503) for the relief of purchasers and other grantees of the United States of certain swamp and overflowed lands, and to reimburse and indemnify certain States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 391) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line, &c., reported it with an amendment.

SWITZLER'S REPORT ON INTERNAL COMMERCE.

Mr. GORMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, for printing 15,000 additional copies of the report on internal commerce, by William F. Switzler, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 15,000 additional copies be printed of the report on internal commerce, by William F. Switzler, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, being part 2 of the report on commerce and navigation, submitted by him on the 20th day of December, 1886; 10,000 for the use of the House and 5,000 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. I also submit with the report the cost of printing this document as well as the cost of all the printing previously ordered by Congress within the present fiscal year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be laid on the table.

LIST OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT CLERKS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the question of printing a list of clerks in the Treasury Department accompanying the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting a list of employés in his Department, to report it with a recommendation that it be not printed. We find that the cost of printing the usual number of this list would be nearly $1,000, and as all the names included in it are published in the Official Register, the committee recommend that the list be not printed but filed in the office of the Secretary.

The report was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 3329) to grant to the Fort Smith and El Paso Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 3330) for the erection of a national memorial bridge over the Potomac from Washington to Arlington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HALE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3331) to amend chapter 21 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia as to interest and usury; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITTHORNE introduced a bill (S. 3332) to authorize the construction of an arsenal for the manufacture of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States at Columbia, Tenn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships.

Mr. HOAR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 113) to provide for the recovery of internal-revenue taxes and penalties erroneously assessed and paid in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HARRISON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPRISONMENT OF CIVILO POUBLE.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations to make further investigation into the causes of the imprisonment in Cuba of Civilo

Pouble, who claims to be a citizen of the United States, by the order of the Government of Cuba, and to report the result of their investigation to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the resolution, with the accompanying paper, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

Mr. DOLPH submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate under what authority swamp and overflowed lands have heretofore been listed and patented to the several States; what rules and regulations have from time to time governed in the selection, listing, and patenting the same; what amounts of such lands have been approved, and what amounts have been patented to the several States; what amounts are still claimed by them; what amounts of lands have been approved to the several States as indemnity for swamp and overflowed lands sold by the United States, and what amounts in money have been paid to the several States as such indemnity; under what laws and regulations such payments have been made, and what States are still entitled under existing laws to such indemnity, and the amount thereof, and the reasons why the same have not been made; what claims for such indemnity have been made by the several States, in what manner, and in what States selections of swamp and overflowed lands are now being made; and to furnish the Senate with any other official information in his possession upon the subjects aforesaid which, in his judgment, should be laid before the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to say a few words before moving the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands.

The object of the resolution is to obtain necessary information, in a convenient form, to enable some general legislation to be had for the speedy adjustment of all questions of difference between the States and the United States in regard to swamp and overflowed lands. I have no doubt myself that great frauds have been committed, and are being attempted in the selection of swamp lands. The laws are unequal, some of the States being entitled, under existing laws, to indemnity, and others not being so entitled.

I desire, myself, to see some legislation which will not only adjust these questions, but protect, to the fullest extent, settlers upon lands which are claimed by the States as swamp and overflowed lands under the general land laws. It is impracticable that the Senate Committee on Public Lands should report such a measure at this time, but I hope by the convening of the next Congress we shall have the report in a convenient form for information upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

OREGON RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under what is known as the Harris rule is now in order.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. On Saturday I introduced a resolution having reference to the expenditure of appropriations for river and harbor improvements on the Columbia River, and I then gave notice that I should ask the Senate immediately after the morning business this morning to permit the resolution to be taken up for the purpose of enabling me to submit some observations. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. For what purpose?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. For the purpose of enabling me to submit some very interesting remarks.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator does not wait for an appropriation bill to submit them on.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Does the Senator object?

Mr. HARRIS. I can not object to a request such as that, but I would greatly prefer hearing the remarks upon some one of the general appropriation bills and not devastate the morning hour.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I prefer not to interfere with the river and harbor bill, and that is why I avail myself of this opportunity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on Saturday last. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution of December 7, 1886, report relative to river and harbor improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory, and now on the table, be referred to the Committee on Commerce with instructions, if, in the judgment of such committee, it is deemed expedient, to investigate and report to the Senate as to the cause of delay in resuming work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River in the fall of 1886, and as to the reasons for change of engineers in charge of such improvement in October, 1886, and if such investigation is deemed expedient by such committee authority is hereby given to send for persons and papers and administer oaths.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] has asked me to yield for a moment for the purpose of allowing him to ask for the consideration of a certain bill, and I am willing to do it provided it does not lead to discusssion.

Mr. HARRIS. I waived my objection because the Senator desired to submit some remarks. The Senator will not obtain my consent to his holding the floor for any other purpose than that for which the consent was given. The bill referred to by the Senator from Texas is the first bill in order under the rule governing the business of the morning hour, and but for the request of the Senator from Oregon to submit remarks the bill would be under consideration at this time under the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Then I will proceed with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President, I desire at this time to call the attention of the Senate and of the country, and especially of the people of the Pacific Northwest, who are vitally interested in the speedy opening up of the Columbia River to free and unobstructed navigation, and who are, by reason of their peculiar situation as to transportation facilities, in no humor to be trifled with by questionable or arbitrary action, or non-action upon the part of Executive officers, civil or military, some of the latter of whom have grown in a measure officially haughty, arbitrary, and to a degree intolerant, not to say insolent, by reason of having been for years protected in desirable assignments in Washington mainly as many are through the baneful instrumentalities of social influence rather than real merit, which, in this great capital too often makes and unmakes men, to the manner in which, during the fall of 1886, the will of Congress was set aside, and the execution of its act in appropriating $187,500 for the continuance of work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, suspended, unjustifiably, to the great detriment of the people's interest; and to fix, if we can from the record, the just responsibility for this high-handed, unjustifiable, and wholly illegal act upon the official or officials justly chargeable therewith.

Congress at its last session, in the river and harbor bill, which became a law August 5, 1886, appropriated $187,500 for the purpose of continuing the improvement on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River. This appropriation became immediately available, and with the exception of ordering the construction of a wharf at a cost of not exceeding $3,600, this money was retained under the control of the Engineer Department, and not a single dollar of it was authorized to be expended or a lick of work done until about October 8, 1886.

On the 6th day of December last, in response to an almost universal demand by the people of Oregon and Washington Territory interested in the proper and speedy expenditure of this appropriation, and of various representative bodies, all justly indignant over what then seemed, and which still seems to them an inexcusable delay in utilizing such appropriations, for an investigation upon the part of Congress, or the Senate, as to the cause of such delay, and also as to the reason for a change of local engineers whereby Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, was relieved and Capt. Charles F. Powell appointed, I presented to the Senate the following resolution:

Whereas the Congress adjourned its last session on the 5th day of August last; and by the provisions of the bill commonly known as the river and harbor bill, which became a law on that day, large appropriations were made, and were on that day immediately available, for the continuation of certain improvements of rivers and harbors in the State of Oregon and Washington Territory; including $187,500 for the further prosecution of the work of constructing a canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River; $187,500 for the continuation of improvements at the mouth of the Columbia River; $75,000 for the continuation of the improvement at the entrance to Yaquina Bay, Oregon; and $33,750 for the continuation of work on the improvement of Coos Bay, Oregon; and

Whereas it is alleged that no work whatever was done toward utilizing said appropriation for work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia until about the 10th day of October last, over two months after said appropriation was available, and thus losing, as it is alleged by those most interested in the early completion of said work, the great advantages of low water, good weather, and long days; and during which time, it is alleged, said work could have been carried on at much less expense and to much great advantage; and

Whereas it is further alleged the expenditure of the other appropriations above referrd to has been postponed by the War Department or its engineers until next spring; and

Whereas the boards of trade at Portland, Oreg., and The Dalles, Oreg., representing those sections and communities largely interested in the speedy completion of the works for which such appropriations were made, including also the Columbia Water-Way Convention recently in session at Vancouver, Wash., have all deprecated the delays in the prosecction of such works, and have some of them also adopted strong resolutions of regret that Maj. W. A. Jones, a major of United States engineers, and it is alleged for about two years last past in charge of the work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, should, as it is alleged he was, after he had submitted his project for the expenditure of said appropriation for the continuation of work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, be relieved by his superiors and displaced by the assignment to said work of Capt. Charles F. Powell, a captain of United States engineer, thus occasioning further delay necessarily incident to any change at such a time; and

Whereas the Senators and Representative from the State of Oregon have by such representative bodies, or some of them, been requested to inquire as to the cause of such delays in the utilization of said appropriations: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to advise the Senate at his earliest practicable convenience as to what change or changes, if any, have been made in the United States engineers in charge of the construction of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River since the 5th day of August last; and in charge of any of the river or harbor improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory since said date; and the date and character of any such change or changes; the names of the engineers relieved, changed, or transferred, and in what respect changed or transferred, and their rank respectively, and the reasons for such change or changes; also, in case any such change has been made, whether the engineer relieved had prior to such change or transfer submitted to the Chief of Engineers his project or plan for the expenditure of such appropriations; and whether or not the same had been approved or rejected by the Chief of Engineers or Acting Chief of Engineers or War Department prior to such change or transfer of engineers in charge; also what change, if any, has been made in the plan of work or the manner of proposed expenditure of such appropriation since the date of such change of engineers; also, if such change of engineers was made, what works were in charge of such engineers, respectively, for the two years prior to such change; and, further, what river or harbor works or improvements have such engineers been in charge of since the date of such change.

Also, that the Secretary of War be further directed to report to the Senate further, at its earliest practicable convenience, whether it is true, as alleged, or otherwise, that the work at the mouth of the Columbia, at the entrance to Yaquina Bay, and at Coos Bay, Oregon, has been postponed until next spring, and the reasons in detail for such postponement.

And, further, that he transmit to the Senate with such reports, and as a part thereof, full copies of all correspondence, whether by letter or telegram, occurring between the War Department or any of its officers, and any officer, board of trade, chamber of commerce, water-way convention, or person whomsoever, since August 5, 1886, relative to the expenditure of the appropriations above referred to, and each of them; or relative to any change of engineers in charge of the work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River, or relative to the change of engineers in charge of any of the works or improvement above specified.

After discussion in the Senate, the resolution was by me modified to meet the views of different Senators, and on December 7 adopted by the Senate in the following form:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to advise the Senate, at his earliest practicable convenience, as to what change or changes, if any, have been made in the United States engineers in charge of the construction of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River since the 5th day of August last, and in charge of any of the river or harbor improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory since said date, and the date and character of any such change or changes, the names of the engineers relieved, changed, or transferred, and in what respect changed or transferred, and their rank respectively, and the reasons for such change or changes; also, in case any such change has been made, whether the engineer relieved had prior to such change or transfer submitted to the Chief of Engineers his project or plan for the expenditure of such appropriations, and whether or not the same had been approved or rejected by the Chief of Engineers or acting Chief of Engineers, or War Department, prior to such change or transfer of engineers in charge; also what change, if any, has been made in the plan of work or the manner of proposed expenditure of such appropriation since the date of such change of engineers; also, if such change of engineers was made, what works were in charge of such engineers respectively for the two years prior to such change; and, further, what river or harbor works or improvements have such engineers been in charge of since the date of such change.

Also, that the Secretary of War be further directed to report to the Senate further, at his earliest practicable convenience, whether it is true or otherwise that the work at the mouth of the Columbia, at the entrance to Yaquina Bay, and at Coos Bay, Oregon, has been postponed until next spring, and the reasons in detail for such postponement; and, further, that he transmit to the Senate with such reports, and as a part thereof, full copies of all correspondence, whether by letter or telegram, occurring between the War Department or any of its officers and any officer, board of trade, chamber of commerce, water-way convention, or person whomsoever, since August 5, 1886, relative to the expenditure of the appropriations above referred to and each of them.

While many of the people, whom I in part represent, demanded that a joint committee, or otherwise, should in the first instance be raised and instructed to investigate as to the cause for the delay in the expenditure of this appropriation, and the change in engineers under the peculiar circumstances which it was made, and in what seemed to them a most unusual manner, and while I have been criticised by some for not in the first instance demanding such investigation, I believed that the War Department should first have an opportunity to be heard in response to these complaints of the people, not only as a matter of fairness and justice to the Department, but also for the reason that inasmuch as the response of that Department might present either a satifactory answer to all complaints, or otherwise might of itself amount to a plea of inexcusable guilt, disclosing at the same time the name of the offender, and in either of which cases no necessity for an investigation in order to arrive at the truth would exist. That I made no mistake in this course is clearly apparent from the answer of the Secretary of War to the Senate's resolution. This answer is dated December 21, 1886 (see Senate Executive Document No. 12, second session Forty-ninth Congress).

From this answer it will be seen that no investigation, however thorough, rigid, or searching, although made by the most able and experienced committee, joint or otherwise, could have more clearly, certainly, or conclusively convicted any officer of the War Department, civil or military, connected with the execution of the laws in that Department, of a more unjustifiable exercise, or arbitrary usurpation of executive power, than does this response of the honorable Secretary of War convict one of his subordinates in the Engineer Corps of the Army. I refer to John G. Parke, colonel of engineers, brevet major-general United States Army, and then for a few brief weeks in charge of the office of Chief of Engineers at Washington.

That the course pursued by Col. John G. Parke as acting Chief of Engineers in respect of this appropriation, while temporarily, through mere accident, in charge for a brief time of the office of Chief of Engineers, in withholding for weeks this appropriation, and in respect of the change of local engineers, was unreasonable arbitrary, and illegal, not to say tyrannical and defiant, and characterized by an utter disregard not only of official propriety but also of the public interests and individual rights, and in every sense wholly indefensible, will be made clearly apparent to all, except those who are determined not to see or know the truth, from his own report to the Secretary of War.

In other words, out of his own mouth he stands convicted of gross and inexcusable usurpation of executive power before an outraged and justly indignant people whose rights and interests have been in a material measure sacrificed by him to the end that he might, while exercising a little brief authority, either gratify an intolerant and reprehensible spirit of personal spleen toward a brother officer of his corps, or truckle to the selfish interests and sordid will of a transportation monopoly, whose iron heel is grinding the very life-blood out of the producers and shippers of the Pacific Northwest.

In view of the answer of Colonel Parke, as contained in the report of the Secretary of War, it is clear no investigation was necessary in order merely to fix the responsibility for the delay in the prosecution of the work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia during the good weather, long days, and low water of last fall, where it properly belongs. And to fix such responsibility is all that could be expected from an investigation, except it were to vindicate a worthy officer of the Corps of United States Engineers against what by most those familiar with all the circumstances is regarded as a gross libel on his profession, character, and reputation.

In fact, Colonel Parke, in taking upon himself as he does boldly and without hesitation or reservation, relieving the Secretary of War and all others, the entire responsibility for the inexcusable delay in ordering work to proceed on the canal and locks, when such order should have been issued, seems rather to glory in the manner in which he suspended the execution of a law of Congress, and refused, at his pleasure, to execute the expressed will of the legislative and executive branches of the National Government.

No military satrap or imperial dictator, subject to no law, or restraint, or regulating power save his own arbitrary will, was ever more unreasonable, defiant, or unjust than the record shows Colonel Parke to have been in reference to this very matter.

Let us see how far there is justification for these strictures on the conduct of Colonel Parke in reference to this business. For over two years prior to October 6, 1886, as appears by the response of the Secretary of War, river and harbor improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory were in charge of two local engineers of the United States Engineer Corps; the one, Maj. W. A. Jones, the other, Capt. Charles F. Powell, and the work was, according to the report of General J. C. Duane, present Chief of Engineers, to the Secretary of War, (and which is part of the response to the Senate resolution, pages 3 and 4), distributed as follows; I quote from the letter of Chief of Engineers:

The following works were in charge of Maj. W. A. Jones during the two years prior to October 6, 1886, viz:
"Improving Upper Willamette River, Oregon.
"Improving Columbia River, Oregon.
"Improving Lower Willamette and Columbia River (since February, 1886).
"Improving Columbia River at the Cascades.
"Improving Upper Columbia and Snake Rivers, Oregon and Washington Territory.
"Improving Cowlitz River, Oregon and Washington Territory.
"Improving Lower Clearwater River, Idaho."

While the works in charge of Capt. C. F. Powell for two years prior to the transfer, October 6, 1886, were:
"Improving Columbia and Willamette Rivers below Portland, Oreg. (to February 11, 1886).
"Improving mouth of Columbia River, Oregon and Washington Territory.
"Improving entrance to Coos Bay, Oregon.
"Improving entrance to Yaquina Bay, Oregon.
"Improving mouth of Coquille River, Oregon.
"Improving Skagit, Stielaquamish, Nootsack, Snohomish, and Snoqualmie Rivers, Oregon and Washington Territory.
"Improving Chehalis River, Washington Territory.
"Gauging waters of Columbia River and principal tributaries."

It will be seen at a glance that prior to October 6, 1886, on which date Major Jones was by order of Col. John G. Parke, then in charge of office of Chief of Engineers, relieved of the improvements at the canal at Cascades, while Major Jones was in charge of very important works aside from the canal and locks, the larger proportion both in number and importance of the improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory was and had been for over two years in charge of Captain Powell, an officer subordinate in rank to Major Jones. Yet, notwithstanding this fact, on October 6, 1886, the work on the canal and locks was, by order of Colonel Parke, taken out of the hands of Major Jones, an officer superior in rank, and in whose integrity, ability, and executive and administrative engineering capacity the people interested in the speedy and proper completion of this great improvement had unbounded confidence, and turned over to Captain Powell, his junior in rank—although an excellent gentleman—and a thoroughly able and efficient engineer; so that since October 6 the improvements are divided between these two officers, as follows:

Since the date of the transfer Major Jones has been in charge of the following works;
"Improving Upper Columbia River, including Snake River, Oregon, and Washington Territory.
"Improving Lower Willamette River and Columbia River below Portland, Oreg.
"Improving Upper Willamette River above Portland.
"Improving Cowlitz River, Washington Territory."

And Captain Powell has been charged with the following:
"Improving canal at the Cascadas, Oregon.
"Improving harbor at Yaquina Bay, Oregon.
"Improving harbor at entrance of Coos Bay, Oregon.
"Improving mouth of Columbia River.
"Improving Coquille River, Oregon.
"Improving Chehalis River, Washington Territory.
"Improving Skagit, Stielaquamish, Nootsack, Snohomish, and Snoqualmie Rivers, Washington Territory.
"Gauging waters of Columbia River," &c.

It would seem, Mr. President, that for an order so unusual and extraordinary in its nature, especially when considered in reference to the time and manner in which it was brought about, involving as it necessarily did, not only weeks of delay in the prosecution of a great public improvement, and the enhancement of its cost, but also a most serious and damaging reflection upon the officer superior in rank relieved, at least some plausible, if not indeed some reasonable excuse ought to be given, when the reason for the same had been peremptorily called for by the Senate of the United States. Has this been done? What is the reason offered by Colonel Parke for this extraordinary order? What excuse is presented for thus delaying a great public work of vital interest to the producers and shippers of a great empire, and for placing the ban of his official condemnation on a worthy and capable officer of his own corps, in whose ability, efficiency, and fidelity to public trust the people in whose interests he was laboring have entire confidence? It is found in that portion of the response of the Secretary of War, consisting of the report of Colonel Parke to General Duane, Chief of Engineers, of date December 11, 1886, page 5 of Senate Executive Document, before quoted, and is as follows, and that no injustice may be done Colonel Parke, I quote the whole of his report on this subject:

[Letter of Col. John G. Parke, Corps of Engineers, to the Chief of Engineers.]

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1886.

SIR: Referring to so much of the resolution of the Senate of the United States, of December 7, 1886, as relates to the change "made in the United States Engineers in charge of the construction of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River," * * * and especially to that portion of the resolution which calls for "the reason for such change," I beg to submit the following report, which seems to be called for from me, for the reason that, at the time the change referred to was made, I was in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers.

The river and harbor act was approved August 5, 1886.

Printed copies thereof were received at this office August 12. On the same day officers in charge of districts were called upon by letter for projects for the application of the amounts appropriated for the several improvements (copy of letter herewith).

In reply to this letter, Major Jones submitted, on August 21, his project for application of appropriation of $187,500 for "improving canal at Cascades, Oregon," and it was received August 28, 1886 (copy herewith).

On the 27th of August the Chief of Engineers was retired, and on the 30th I assumed charge of the office.

As a general rule the projects were considered and acted upon in the order of their receipt. On reaching that of Major Jones for the Cascades Canal it was laid aside, for the reason that I preferred to have it considered and acted upon by the Chief of Engineers as soon as possible after his appointment.

Owing to the great desire of those interested in the improvement for an early resumption of work, as expressed in various telegrams received at the War Department and at this office, I reported to the Secretary of War the status of the case, and added that, while I was Acting Chief of Engineers, in temporary charge of the office, I preferred not to make a decision on Major Jones' project, for I was not willing to assume the responsibility of recommending or authorizing the approval of a project for a work of this character of an officer whose administrative skill, capacity, and ability were not satisfactory to me; but in order that there should be no further delay in the work, I was perfectly ready to make a recommendation in the case, and that was for Captain Powell to relieve Major Jones of the charge of the improvement. This was authorized by the Secretary of War, and the transfer was thereupon effected. See telegrams to Major Jones and Captain Powell, copies of which accompany the papers.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN G. PARKE,
Colonel of Engineers, Bvt. Maj. Gen., U. S. A.

Brig. General J. C. DUANE,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A.

In a word, therefore, the reason why General Parke would not approve the project of Major Jones, and why he induced Secretary of War Endicott to authorize that Major Jones be relieved by Captain Powell, was, to use his own language, that "I," Colonel Parke, "was not willing to assume the responsibility of recommending or authorizing the approval of a project for a work of this character by an officer whose administrative skill, capacity, and ability were not satisfactorg to me."

Waiving, therefore, for the moment the question, and I shall come to that later, as to what, if any, good grounds existed upon which Colonel Park had any right to be dissatisfied with the "administrative skill, capacity, and ability" of Major Jones, or which justified him in proclaiming to the Engineer Corps of the Army, to the Secretary of War, the Congress, and the world, that Major Jones was lacking in administrative skill, capacity, and ability, or at least that he did not possess these qualities to an extent or degree as to be satisfactory to Colonel Parke, let us inquire as to the manner in which this thing was done.

Does the record show on its face that Colonel Parke was looking solely to the promotion of the public interests, and that this was his motive, as disclosed by his own record, by which he was governed, in his refusal from time to time, and from week to week, to give any attention whatever to the project of Major Jones, and when finally pressed to the wall by the protests of an indignant people whose interests and rights were being disregarded and trampled upon, to demand his removal from the work? or does it show a cunning, studied, and persistent effort for some real or fancied provocation to humiliate and degrade a brother officer, and this at the expense and sacrifice of great public interests, by an arbitrary, unjust, and inexcusable exercise of military power? Let the record speak on this subject.

For two years prior to August 12, 1886, Major Jones had been in charge of the work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, and on that date was called on by a letter of that date by the Chief of Engineers, General Newton, to submit his projects for the expenditure of the appropriation of $187,500 available August 5, 1886, and the prosecution of the work of improvement. August 21, nine days later, Major Jones mailed to the Chief of Engineers his letter submitting his projects. This letter was as follows:

[Project of Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, for application of appropriation of August 5, 1886, for improving canal at Cascades, Oregon.]

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Portland, Oreg., August 21, 1886.

SIR: In compliance with instructions in circular letter of the 12th instant, I have the honor to submit project for the expenditure of the appropriation of $187,500, act of August 5, 1886.

[Improving canal at Cascades, Oregon.]

It is proposed to apply the funds as follows:

	ESTIMATE.
1. Make the whole excavation for the low-water lock	$90,000
2. Build wing-walls	30,000
3. Secure supply of stone, broken stone, and gravel and sand, for lock masonry	5,000
4. Build a wharf for the handling of masonry and timber and wood supplies	3,000
5. Repair and extend tramways and purchase locomotive	4,500
6. Cut all stone on hand and pile it out of the way; stone-cutting and quarry work	15,000
7. Purchase of right to use quarry	1,000
8. Purchase of materials and new plant	2,000
9. Repairs of steam-launch, buildings and plant	4,000
10. Engineering superintendence	15,000

It is proposed, as has been done hitherto, to do all work by hired labor and to make all purchases of materials in open market, after public notice inviting sealed proposals, except in cases of single purchases exceeding $1,000, where there will be time to execute the necessary formalities of a contract. Also to make the purchase of petty articles for immediate use in sums not exceeding $10 in open market, without public notice.

The reasons for not carrying on this work by contract are, principally, that most of the work is of such a character that the United States can do it cheaper than private individuals. It owns the necessary plant. An effort was made to do this work by contract and failed. A reference to the cost per unit of work shown in my annual report proves these statements. It will therefore be the most economical and advantageous to carry on this work otherwise than by contract.

[Résumé.]

The plan for this improvement, adopted in 1877, and modified in 1880, is to give lockage around the main rapid, and open river navigation through the minor rapids below, from low water up to a stage of about 20 feet at the foot of the canal. The plan contemplates the construction of a guard-lock for use at the higher stages.

The canal will be about 3,000 feet long.

The low-water lock will have a lift of about 24 feet.

The lock capacity will be 90 feet by 462 feet, with a least draught of 8 feet.

The amount expended to June 30, 1886, is $951,450.25.

The amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project is $1,100,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. A. JONES, Major of Engineers.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, U. S. A.

This letter, it is admitted by Colonel Parke, in his communication of December 11, before referred to, was received at the office of the Chief of Engineers in Washington August 28. On the day preceding, August 27, the Chief of Engineers, General Newton, was retired, and two days subsequent to its receipt, that is, on August 30, Colonel Parke assumed charge of the Office of Chief of Engineers; and although Colonel Parke on September 9 approved Captain Powell's project for utilizing the appropriation as to Coos Bay, forwarded on the same date as that of Major Jones, that of Major Jones was permitted to slumber in the pigeon-hole or on the desk of Colonel Parke, neither approved nor rejected, criticised nor returned for correction, nor was Major Jones advised in any manner whatever that his project was in any respect whatever unsatisfactory to Colonel Parke or any other officer.

Day after day passed, and twenty days thus passed, and the 17th of September came, and still neither Major Jones nor his project received any attention whatever from Colonel Parke. Major Jones becoming somewhat impatient at the delay, and it was but natural he should, on September 17th sent the following polite telegraphic inquiry to his chief:

[Telegram from Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, to Chief of Engineers.]

PORTLAND, OREG., September 17, 1886.

Has my project for Cascades Canal been approved? Present time most valuable for operations.

JONES, Major Engineers.

CHIEF OF ENGINEERS.

This dispatch Colonel Parke permitted to lie on his desk unanswered for four days, when he sent the following curt and unsatisfactory telegram in answer:

[Telegram of General John G. Parke, in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, to Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 21, 1886.

Project for Cascades Canal not yet approved.

PARKE, In Charge of Office.

Major JONES, Engineers.

Not a word, not even a hint, it will be observed, is contained in this dispatch to the effect that the project was in any respect whatever either lacking in intelligent engineering or business expression, or in any wise unsatisfactory to the Department, or in any sense open to criticism. But not only so; and it may be said in passing that never yet has Colonel Parke in any manner, so far as disclosed by the record, indicated or pointed out any error, or mistake, or irregularity, or lack of engineering or business propriety whatever in the project of Major Jones; another nine days pass away, and a full month, lacking one day, elapses since Major Jones's project was on Colonel Parke's desk, and still receiving no word, except the unsatisfactory telegram of December 21, Major Jones ventures to send a second dispatch to Colonel Parke, as follows:

[Telegram from Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, to the Chief of Engineers.]

PORTLAND, OREG., September 26, 1886.

Request authority to employ overseer on Snake River, $150 per month. Request early action and telegraphic reply. I ought to be authorized to proceed immediately with work at Cascades Canal on some basis or other, say excavation and stone-cutting. This is very important.

JONES, Major Engineers.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS.

To that portion of this dispatch referring to the improvement of, or being authorized to proceed with, the work at the Cascades Canal, Colonel Parke does not deign to make any reply whatever, but on the contrary, replying to the other part of the dispatch, he treated this with supreme contempt. Colonel Parke's telegraphic answer, sent two days later, was as follows:

[Telegram of General John G. Parke, in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, to Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers.]

WASHINGTON, September 28, 1886.

Application to employ overseer on Snake River approved.

PARKE,
In Charge of Office.

Major JONES, Engineers.

No reference whatever is made, it will be observed, to that portion of Major Jones's dispatch which refers to the importance of being authorized to proceed with work at the Cascades Canal.

And his answer by letter of same date was as follows:

[Letter from General John G. Parke, in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, to Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers.]

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., September 28, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your telegram of the 26th instant, authority is hereby granted you for the employment of an overseer upon the improvement of Snake River, Oregon, at a salary not to exceed $150 per month, for such period only as his services may be indispensable.

Copy of telegram of this date to the above effect is herewith inclosed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN G. PARKE,
Colonel of Engineers, Bvt. Maj. Gen., U. S. A., in charge of Office.

Maj. W. A. JONES,
Corps of Engineers.

In this letter also the Cascades Canal business is wholly and absolutely ignored.

Major Jones, waiting four days for an answer to his dispatch of September 26, relative to work at the Cascades, and thirty-two days having elapsed since his project had reached the desk of Colonel Parke without receiving any attention whatever, and being unable to get any satisfactory response to his first telegraphic inquiry, and none whatever, satisfactory or otherwise, to that of September 26, again ventured on September 30 to send the following dispatch, being the third telegraphic inquiry as to what action was to be had on his project:

[Telegram from Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, to the Chief of Engineers.]

PORTLAND, OREG., September 30, 1886.

A large number of men are waiting, at much expense, for work at Cascades Canal. I ought to know concerning the time when operations may be resumed. They are entirely suspended.

JONES, Major of Engineers.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS.

And what character of response does Colonel Parke make to this third urgent appeal of a faithful officer made in the interest not only of the public service and of an important public improvement, but of that also of the scores of waiting laboring men? Simply this and nothing more—which might perhaps, with no great degree of impropriety, be termed little else than an insulting repetition of his dispatch of ten days previous, in these words:

[Telegram from General John G. Parke, in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, to Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 1, 1886.

Project Cascades Canal not yet approved.

PARKE, In Charge of Office.

Major JONES, Engineers.

Nor can it be said that the attention of Colonel Parke had not, aside from the dispatches of Major Jones, been called to the great importance of proceeding without delay with this work on the canal and locks. On the 25th of August last I addressed the following letter to the Chief of Engineers:

[Letter of John H. Mitchell, United States Senate, to the Chief of Engineers.]

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 25, 1886.

DEAR GENERAL: I am much concerned by a notice which has just reached me from one of the Oregon papers stating that nothing will be done this year by Captain Powell at Coquille, Coos Bay, Yaquina Bay, and on the Columbia Bar to carry out the appropriations made by the last river and harbor bill for these works, except to make preparation for active operations to commence about the first of next May. I sincerely hope that this is not true, and that even if such be the purpose of Captain Powell you will urge upon him to do all he consistently and properly can this autumn in the way of prosecuting the works now in progress at these various points, and other points for which appropriations have been made for river and harbor improvements in Oregon. The appropriations made for these various improvements have, according to Captain Powell's reports, yielded very valuable results. It is of the utmost importance also that the work on the canals and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia should be prosecuted without delay.

I cannot but believe that Captain Powell will have at least two months within which to prosecute work on the jetties at the mouth of the Columbia, the Yaquina, Coos Bay, and Coquille. If nothing be done this fall toward utilizing these appropriations before next winter, the effect upon our application to Congress for additional appropriations next winter will be comparatively disastrous. We shall, in such an event, be met with the argument that the money appropriated by the last bill is mainly unexpended and that there is no occasion for any considerable further appropriation.

In view of the fact that the appropriations made fall so much below what your Department has advised, and which in my judgment should have been made, it would be most unfortunate if the State should be prejudiced at the next session of Congress by a failure to expend the appropriations as far as the same can be judiciously expended before next winter. Of course, I would not wish to be understood as urging such action as would result in a waste of the money appropriated.

I am glad to be advised by you that Major Jones has been instructed by telegraph to proceed at once with the dredging of the river between Astoria and Portland.

I beg your earnest attention to this matter, which I regard as vitally important to the commercial interests and material prosperity of the State I have the honor in part to represent in the National Senate.

I am, very respectfully,

JOHN H. MITCHELL.

General JOHN NEWTON,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A.

This letter was presented by me in person to the Chief of Engineers August 26, and it was on that date referred to Captain Powell for report, and by him returned to Colonel Parke with his (Powell's) report September 21.

In the mean time the people, and boards of trade, and chambers of commerce, interested in the prosecution in good faith and without unnecessary delay of this great work, became impatient at the delay; long days, good weather, and low water, were all propitious; men were waiting orders to go to work by scores; the money, $187,500, had been appropriated, and was lying idle in the Treasury; the short days, high water, and bad weather, which would, as all know, enhance the cost of excavations for each and every yard more than 25 per cent., were rapidly approaching, and yet nothing was done. They began to speak on the subject; to inquire as to the cause of this unseemly and aggravating delay, and on September 30 The Dalles Board of Trade sent the following telegraphic inquiry direct to the President of the United States:

[Telegram from E. B. McFarland, president Dalles Board of Trade, to President of United States.]

THE DALLES, OREG., September 30, 1886.

We are officially informed that all appropriations for river improvements here are available except those made by the last Congress for building the canal at the Cascades of the Columbia River. This is withheld in Washington. Will your Excellency investigate this and advise us how soon the fund will be available?

E. B. MCFARLAND,
President Dalles Board of Trade.

His Excellency GROVER CLEVELAND,
President of the United States.

Of course the President knew nothing about it, and very properly, I presume, referred it to the Secretary of War, who in turn referred it to Colonel Parke, then in charge of the office of Chief of Engineers, being also chief of the division on rivers and harbors in that Bureau, who, on October 5th, made the following response to the dispatch:

[Telegram from General John G. Parke, in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, to E. B. McFarland, President of The Dalles Board of Trade.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 5, 1886.

Hope soon to perfect arrangements for resuming work at Cascades Canal.

JOHN G. PARKE,
In charge of office.

E. B. MCFARLAND,
Dalles, Oreg.

In the mean time I, on October 2, arrived at The Dalles, Oreg., on my return home from the East, and to my great surprise learned that work had not yet been resumed on the canal and locks; found the people in a high state of excitement over the matter, some of them even disposed to censure me and other of the Oregon delegation as being responsible for the delay. I immediately, on my own motion and in accordance with the wishes of leading citizens of The Dalles and of the board of trade of that city, sent two dispatches, one to the Secretary of War, as follows:

[Telegram from John H. Mitchell, United States Senate, to the Secretary of War.]

THE DALLES, OREG., October 2, 1886.

What occasions delay in proceeding with work on canal and locks at Cascades, Columbia River? Great and just indignation among people Eastern Oregon over report that last appropriation is not available. What is the trouble? Answer by telegraph.

JOHN H. MITCHELL.

The SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

The other to Colonel Parke, as follows:

[Telegram from John H. Mitchell, United States Senate, to General John G. Parke.]

THE DALLES, OREG., October 2, 1886.

Universal indignation in Oregon over report money cannot be expended on Cascade Locks. What is difficulty? Answer quick.

JOHN H. MITCHELL.

General PARKE,
Office Chief of Engineers.

And on October 5, three days after sending my dispatch requesting an answer as to the cause of delay, I received the following response from Colonel Parke:

[Telegram from General John G. Parke, in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, to John H. Mitchell, United States Senate.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 5, 1886.

Hope soon to perfect arrangements by which work at Cascades Canal may be resumed.

JOHN G. PARKE,
In Charge of Office.

Hon. J. H. MITCHELL, Dalles, Oreg.

This, it will be observed, was no response at all to my inquiries, but, on the contrary, was rather to the effect, when considered as a whole, and read between the lines, that it was no business of mine, or, in fact, that of any other person in Oregon as to what the cause of the delay was.

It was, however, in connection with the dispatch of same date to Mr. McFarland, president of the Dallass Board of Trade, the first word of assurance that Colonel Parke, then de facto Chief of Engineers, condescended to vouchsafe to any one that work would ever be resumed on this important improvement.

Colonel Parke finding that something must be done, that he must move on, that he could no longer with safety stand in the way of the execution of the law, or the resumption of this important work, and finding nothing in the project of Major Jones that would justify its rejection, set about to degrade that officer by reporting to the Secretary of War that the "administrative skill, capacity, and ability" of Major Jones were "not satisfactory" to him, and that for this reason he preferred not to make a decision on his (Major Jones') project, but was willing to recommend that he be degraded by having him relieved by an officer his junior in rank on suggestions of this character.

It is to be regretted that the Secretary of War permitted himself to be overreached by the cunning and plausible diplomacy of a Chesterfieldian officer such as we all know Colonel Parke to be, in a matter so important to the public interests and individual and professional rights. It does not appear from the report of the Secretary of War that any written charges were presented to him by Colonel Parke affecting the "administrative skill, capacity, and ability" of Major Jones as an engineer officer; on the contrary, it seems that Colonel Parke called on the Secretary of War in person for the purpose of securing through his representations his aid in plunging a poisoned dagger into the heart of Major Jones under pretense of performing a great public duty.

Upon full consideration—

Says the Secretary in his answer to the resolution of the Senate in speaking of this change of officers—of the reasons of the transfer, as submitted to me by Colonel Parke in a personal interview, I deemed it my duty to relieve Major Jones and to detail Captain Powell to do this work.

If it were true that Major Jones' administrative skill, capacity, and ability were deficient, and this fact was known to Colonel Parke, why did he not remove him without delay from charge of this important work? And, moreover, wherefore the necessity of appealing to the Secretary of War? It was perfectly competent for Colonel Parke, as officer in charge of the office of Chief of Engineers, to remove Major Jones from this work. Orders assigning engineer officers to stations issue from the Secretary of War, but orders assigning them to the charge of works invariably issue, as I am advised, from the office of Chief of Engineers.

It was, therefore, an unnecessary proceeding to call in the Secretary of War in this case. As officer in command of that important bureau he could and did assume the responsibility of obstructing the will of Congress, and defeating the just hopes and expectations of a suffering people by delaying a great public work. Yet he could not assume the responsibility of doing an important duty which his position required of him, assuming Major Jones was incompetent for the place, by removing him at once, placing a competent man in charge, and ordering the work to proceed. On any theory, therefore, of this case, there seems to be neither excuse nor palliation for the delay in resuming this work.

Colonel Parke, having secured the co-operation of the Secretary of War in superseding Major Jones by Captain Powell, on October 4 telegraphed Captain Powell as follows:

[Telegram from General John G. Parke, in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, to Capt. Charles F. Powell, Corps of Engineers.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 4, 1886.

Can you take charge of Cascades Canal in addition to your other duties?

PARKE, In Charge of Office.

Captain POWELL, Engineers.

And on October 5, receiving no answer, a second telegram was sent by Colonel Parke to Captain Powell.

[Telegram from General John G. Parke, in charge of the office of the Chief of Engineers, to Capt. Charles F. Powell, Corps of Engineers.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 5, 1886.

No answer to telegram of yesterday. It is desired here to make the change. Hope you can take charge at once.

PARKE, In Charge of Office.

Captain POWELL, Engineers.

To which Captain Powell, on the same date, responded as follows:

[Telegram from Capt. Charles F. Powell, Corps of Engineers, to the Chief of Engineers.]

PORTLAND, OREG., October 5, 1886.

I can take charge of Cascades Canal in addition to my other duties.

Captain POWELL.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, Army.

Thus it will be seen that after a delay of over two months from the date when this appropriation was available, and of forty-six days after the project for its application was on the desk of the Chief of Engineers, Major Jones was, without a note of warning, without a suggestion as to the cause, summarily relieved, so to speak, on the eve of battle, and his place filled by a junior in rank; and when he presumed to make the following modest inquiry as to the cause—

[Telegram from Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, to the Chief of Engineers.]

PORTLAND, OREG., October 8, 1886.

May I inquire why I am removed from charge of the Cascade locks?

JONES, Major Engineers.

CHIEF OF ENGINEERS.

Colonel Parke in charge of office does not condescend to make any reply whatever.

But the spirit in which the action of Colonel Parke was received by those most interested will be seen from the following official declaration of the Portland (Oreg.) Board of Trade, The Dalles City Board of Trade, and the Columbia River Water Way Convention.

October 8 the Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg., adopted the following resolutions, and telegraphed the same to the Secretary of War on the same date, and also sent a telegraphic copy to my colleague, Senator DOLPH, then in Washington:

[Telegram from the Board of Trade, Portland. Oreg., to Hon. J. N. DOLPH, United States Senate.]

PORTLAND, OREG., October 8, 1886.

Whereas the early completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River is demanded by the people of Oregon in the interest of cheap transportation and rapidly-increasing commerce of this city and the Pacific Northwest; and

Whereas we have viewed with regret the delay occurring since the adjournment of Congress in resumption of operations for the continuation of this important work, especially as the conditions of low water and good weather in Oregon this season are exceptionally favorable to the prosecution of work; and

Whereas we have learned with regret a rumor to effect that a change of engineers in charge is contemplated, which, if ordered, must necessarily result in further delay in resuming work, thus virtually postponing work until spring, resulting furthermore, doubtless, in defeating demands of Representatives in Congress for further appropriations next winter by reason of large unexpended balances; and

Whereas this board have implicit confidence in the capacity, energy, and integrity of Maj. W. A. Jones, engineer in charge for past two years: Therefore,

Resolved, That we respectfully, but earnestly, protest against further delay in the resumption of said work on canal and locks at the Cascades, and recommend that no change of engineers in charge be made at present, and that Major Jones may be instructed without delay, while the weather and stage of water are propitious, to proceed with said work.

Resolved, That the president of this board be instructed to forward certified [copies] of these resolutions by telegraph to the Secretary of War.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to use their influence to secure such action at Washington as is herein recommended, and that a copy be transmitted to Senator DOLPH, at Washington, by telegraph.

DON'LD MACLEAY,
President Board of Trade.
F. K. ARNOLD, Secretary.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senator.

While on October 12 The Dalles Board of Trade unanimously adopted a series of resolutions of which the following is a copy, and forwarded the same by telegraph to my colleague, then still in Washington:

[Telegram from The Dalles, Oregon, Board of Trade to Hon. J. N. DOLPH, United States Senate.]

THE DALLES, OREG., October 12, 188-.

Please present to Secretary War following resolutions, passed October 11, 1886:

Whereas it is of the greatest importance to the people of Oregon, especially of that portion residing of Cascade Mountains, that locks at Cascade of Columbia be completed soon as possible;

Whereas we have learned with indignation of delay in resuming operations upon this important work since last appropriation by Congress, especially as the season and present low stage of water render operations upon this work more practicable at this time than any other;

Whereas we have heard with great regret rumor that Major Jones, engineer in charge for last two years, is superseded and ordered to turn work over to Captain Powell, no reason being assigned for the change;

Whereas the Board have entire confidence in ability, energy, and integrity of Major Jones, and believe that any change in the management of work at locks at present time will not be conducive to speedy completion and economical expenditure of late appropriations therefor, but will cause further and unnecessary delay: Therefore

Resolved, We respectfully but earnestly protest against any further delay of resumption of operations upon locks, and earnestly recommend that no change be made in engineer in charge; that Major Jones be directed at once to proceed with work.

Resolved, That president of this board telegraph copy of these resolutions to Senator DOLPH, with request to present same to Secretary of War.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives be requested to use their influence to secure such action as is herein recommended.

E. B. McFARLAND, President.
B. S. HUNTINGDON, Secretary.

And on October 14, two days later, at the Columbia Waterway Convention, then in session at Vancouver, Wash., Col. Thomas S. Lang, of the The Dalles, presented the following resolution; which was, on his motion, as I find from the printed official copy of the proceedings of that convention, which I hold in my hand, unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we learn with regret of the removal of Maj. W. A. Jones, major of engineers, who has been in charge of The Cascades improvements. Major Jones' efforts in pursuance of this great work, the opening of the Columbia to free navigation in our behalf, has given hope to the people whose success lies in finding a market for their products of the inland empire, and they sincerely regret his displacement.

In the mean time appeals were being made to me from all quarters as to the cause of delay and change of engineers, and no little amount of denunciation from certain quarters was being poured out upon the Oregon delegation in Congress, holding them responsible in the premises, and being myself indignant at what I regarded as a species of worse than trifling with the public interests on the part of the Engineer Department at Washington, I, on October 16, sent from Portland, Oreg., to the Chief of Engineers the following dispatch:

[Telegram from John H. Mitchell, United States Senate, to the Chief of Engineers.]

PORTLAND, OREG., October 16, 1886.

There is universal indignation among people in Oregon and Washington Territory interested in speedy completion canal and locks Cascades, Columbia, over removal of Major Jones. Boards trade all cities interested passed unanimously strong resolutions of regret. The Water-Way Convention for Pacific Northwest, at Vancouver, Thursday, unanimously adopted following: "Resolved, That we learn with regret of the removal of Maj. W. A. Jones, major of engineers, who has been in charge of The Cascades improvements. Major Jones's efforts in pursuance of this great work, the opening of the Coumbia to free navigation in our behalf, has given hope to the people whose success lies in finding a market for their products of the inland empire, and they sincerely regret his displacement." The reinstatement of Major Jones is universally desired.

JOHN H. MITCHELL.

General J. C. DUANE,
Chief of Engineers.

And to which the Chief of Engineers, General J. C. Duane, courteously replied on October 19, stating, in substance, that the change of engineers had been made before he took charge.

On October 9, in pursuance of a telegraphic order of General Parke, Major Jones sent the following dispatch:

[Telegram from Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, to the Chief of Engineers.]

PORTLAND, OREG., October 9, 1886.

I have this day transferred charge of Cascades Canal to Captain Powell. Lieutenant Young was ordered last night to report to him.

JONES, Major Engineers.

CHIEF OF ENGINEERS.

And on October 17 Major Jones sent the following letter to the Chief of Engineers, which explains itself:

[Letter from Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, to the Chief of Engineers.]

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Portland, Oreg., October 17, 1886.

SIR: The circumstances connected with my removal from charge of the Cascades Locks are, from my point of view, extraordinary. I was removed summarily by telegraph, without previous warning whatever, and the work was placed in charge of my junior on duty at this station, who had been previously consulted in the matter.

This leaves the relative situation here as follows:

	Amount estimated to complete project.	Annual maintenance.
Command of Major Jones:
Lower Willamette and Columbia rivers	$467,000 00	*30,000
Upper Willamette River	35,000 00	*12,000

*About.

The inference from these circumstances is absolutely rigorous that this change resulted from grave fault on my part. Nothing else could justify placing me in such a humiliating position.

It is my right, in order that I may intelligently defend my rank and honor, to be informed fully as to the reasons for this change, so far as they involve me personally. And, reiterating the request in my dispatch of October 8, I hereby respectfully request to be so informed.

It is my great wrong to have been placed in such a position, on any grounds whatever, without previous opportunity for defense or explanation.

I appeal to you, sir, to protect and uphold my rank.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. A. JONES, Major of Engineers.

General JAS. C. DUANE,
Chief of Engineers.

And to which, so far as disclosed by the response of the Secretary of War to the Senate resolution, no reply was ever made, either by the Chief of Engineers or Colonel Parke, who as de facto Chief of Engineers had secured the removal of Major Jones.

And since the answer of the Secretary of War and the response of Colonel Parke have been laid before the people of the State of Oregon and Washington Territory, more than ever before are they convinced of the fact that the delay in resuming work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia in the fall of 1886, and the change of engineers in the manner, and at the time, and under the cirumstances it was done, at the instigation of Colonel Parke, was in every sense, not only inexcusable, but highly reprehensible, and the blame of all which rests upon and is properly chargeable to Colonel Parke. This feeling has manifested itself through various representative bodies in the Pacific Northwest, as may be seen from the following:

On January 14 ultimo, the board of trade of Walla Walla, Wash., adopted the following resolutions:

The following resolution in relation to Maj. W. A. Jones, United States engineers, was unanimously adopted at the regular meeting of the Walla Walla, Wash., board of trade, January 14, 1887:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this board the reasons given by Colonel Parke, acting Chief of Engineers, for the removal of Maj. W. A. Jones from charge of the works at the Cascades, are insufficient; and be it further

Resolved, That the reports of Major Jones on the improvements at the Cascades and The Dalles demonstrate to this board that he has worked faithfully for the best interests of this inland country, and we believe that his removal was caused for other reasons than those enumerated in Col. Parke's report, and in the interests of those opposed to the opening of the Columbia River to free navigation. That this board respectfully request the Secretary of War to reinstate Maj. Jones in charge of said works at the Cascades.

Attest: MARION D. EGBERT,
Secretary.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF OREGON SPEAKS.

And on the 5th of the present month the following House joint memorial No. 5, introduced in the house of representatives of the Legislature of the State of Oregon by Representative Biggs, passed that body, was sent to the Senate, and, as I am advised, is now under consideration by the committee on federal relations in that body.

This joint memorial is as follows:

Whereas the river and harbor matter placed under the Bureau of Engineers in Washington, has, for a great many years, been under the direction of one John G. Parke, a colonel of the Engineer Corps, United States Army; and,

Whereas the office thus occupied is one of great importance to the people of the Pacific Northwest, as the appropriations for the improvement of their great rivers and harbors are controlled and directed therein; and,

Whereas the officer in charge of said office should be one of wide experience in engineering construction; and,

Whereas the great railroad corporations who seek to paralyze the efforts of the people in the improvement of their water ways could not do so more effectually than by keeping in this office one whose lack of experience renders him incompetent for the management and direction of enginneering construction; and,

Whereas the records show that Col. John G. Parke has never had any practical experience in engineering construction; that at least thirty-five years of his service have been spent in Washington, D. C., bureau service; that he has recently allowed a personal spite toward a brother officer to cause a needless delay in the prosecution of the Cascade Canal, a great public work, upon the progress of which a suffering people are waiting with painful interest; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senators of the State of Oregon be instructed, and the Representatives of said State be requested, to use every effort to secure the removal of the said John G. Parke from the position he now occupies as chief engineer in charge of the river and harbor business of the Bureau of United States Engineers.

But what just reason, let us inquire, had Colonel Parke, from his high seat of official power, to cast this cloud across the official reputation and character of a brother officer? Where is the evidence of Major Jones' inefficiency? What proof is offered here or elsewhere as to his lack of administrative capacity or engineering ability? So far as this record discloses it is not forthcoming, except as it rests solely in unsupported declarations of Colonel Parke. While it is true the project for the expenditure of the last appropriation submitted by Captain Powell, and which was approved on sight by Colonel Parke, was somewhat different in form from that submitted by Major Jones, it can not be successfully denied that the plan for that improvement as formulated by Major Jones and the expenditure of this appropriation as suggested in the project of Major Jones to the Chief of Engineers, are the very plans in substance and effect if not indeed in detail that are to-day being carried out by Captain Powell in the prosecution of the work.

What, in brief, is the history of this work? Major Jones was ordered from San Francisco, where he had been in charge of important engineering works, to take charge of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia in the summer of 1884, General Parke, then as now, being in charge of the river and harbor division of the Engineer Bureau of the War Department, and the change was made by placing Major Jones in charge of this important work, presumably under the advice and direction of Colonel Parke, or at least with his approval. He had not then, it seems, arrived at the conclusion that the "administrative skill, capacity, and ability" of Major Jones were not satisfactory to him, although for many years he had been acting as one of his subordinates in the Engineer Corps in important engineering works in different sections of the country. When Major Jones took charge of this work in 1884 it was being conducted by his predecessor, Captain Powell, under a general plan formulated and furnished by a board of engineers in 1880.

This plan called for the immediate construction of one lift lock for the ordinary river stages, and contemplated a guard lock at the head of the canal for higher stages of the river, and for the present only the guard gate for this latter was to be constructed for use as the guard gate or high water dam for the canal. The plan of the Board of Engineers was in most general terms, and very much was left to be determined by the local engineer in charge. Under this discretion, Captain Powell, who was in 1884 superseded by Major Jones, had as I am advised, decided to move the guard lock down to the lift lock at the foot of the canal, and make a double lock of the two.

He also decided to lay all the foundations of this guard-lock, so that when it should come to be finished at some future time, after the opening of the canal by means of the improvement necessary for navigation in ordinary high water, it could be done with the least interference with navigation. Major Jones, after becoming fully conversant with the details of the work, became thoroughly impressed with the idea that the greatest of all considerations in view of the immense traffic along that great river, and throughout that great inland empire, and of the exorbitant nature of the freight charges to which it was subjected, was to place this canal in a condition so as to enable boats to pass through at ordinary stages of water at the earliest possible moment.

He found upon careful investigation that the wheat traffic alone amounted to nearly 600,000 tons per year, and that with other traffic it was safe to estimate a two-way traffic along that great river in a comparatively short space of time of over 1,000,000 tons per year. He found that this traffic was then paying a freight tax of at least 3 cents per ton per mile on the average. He believed, with all others who had thoroughly investigated the matter, that with the opening of the canal and locks at the Cascades, and the certainty that a portage arrangement at The Dalles by boat-railway or otherwise would be opened at the same time, it was quite certain that freight would be reduced to at least 1 cent per ton per mile, and in all probability to less than one-half of 1 cent per ton per mile.

He therefore intelligently realized that on an average haul of 200 miles this would, even at the higher rate of 1 cent per ton per mile, relieve the producers and shippers of the Columbia Valley or inland empire of a freight tax of $400,000 per year. Therefore it was that Major Jones comprehended that if one year's time could be saved in opening this canal to commerce, it would be worth at least that sum to the producers and shippers of that country, and hence he decided to make no present provision whatever for the guard-lock. This resulted in what is known as Major Jones' plan for this great improvement, and on and according to this plan he was permitted to proceed for about two years, and his estimate for completing the canal under this plan was $1,250,000, while the estimate for getting the canal open by his predecessor, Captain Powell, under his (Powell's) plan was $1,500,000, or $250,000 more than that of Major Jones, and which, in view of the manner in which appropriations are made by Congress annually as to amounts for the various works of the country, would have delayed the opening of the canal and locks at least two years longer than under the plan of Major Jones, and at a cost to the people in the shape of freight exactions, to say nothing of inconveniences and delays, of at least $800,000.

True, in justice to Captain Powell, whose ability, skill, and reputation as an engineer no one questions, his plan if regarded in a certain restricted sense and point of view, might seem best at first glance, and without a careful consideration of the whole subject in all its bearings upon the transportation interests of the country, as under it the whole final cost to cover the completing of the guard-lock at some distant day in the far-off future, long after the canal was opened, when the traffic of the country had trebled or quadrupled, would have perhaps been somewhat less; but the difference would fall far short of compensating for a delay of two years, or even one year, in opening the canal and locks to the passage of boats at all ordinary stages of water and at every stage except at extremely high water.

And doubtless Captain Powell had, in forwarding his recent telegraphic project, as requested by Colonel Parke, his own plan of three years ago still in view. When he came to apply it at the locks, however, he found, as I am advised, the whole staff of local engineers in actual charge of the work, who had given careful study to this great improvement, in ardent sympathy with the plan of Major Jones; and for what cause can only be surmised; but certain it is that for some cause the full and complete plan of Major Jones was, as I am advised, practically adopted in the work as now progressing under the direction of Captain Powell and Colonel Parke, chief of the division of rivers and harbors, and it is satisfactory, as it seems, to the very exacting and punctilious Colonel Parke.

Mr. President, were it either desirable or proper to search for motives on the part of Colonel Parke, other than those prompted by an earnest desire to promote the public interests, and advance the general welfare, and earnestly, honestly, and faithfully to execute the law, in his refusal for weeks to act upon, or take any notice whatever of, Major Jones's project for the utilization of the appropriations of the last session of Congress for this work, and thus delay the resumption of work on a great improvement, and, finally, when longer delay would not be tolerated by the people most interested in silance, to encompass his removal, and consequent official degradation, it might, among other things, with no impropriety, be made publicly known that Major Jones, in his annual report on river and harbor improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, under date of July 27, 1885, embodied as a part of the body of that report an interesting and carefully prepared plan, with accompanying maps, prepared with great care, suggesting the construction of a boat railway at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, and the widening of the channel at Ten and Three Mile Rapids, as a cheapand proper means of overcoming the obstructions to navigation at those points; and, further, that when such annual report was transmitted to the Secretary of War by the Chief of Engineers, and by him to the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, it was mutilated to the extent of having eliminated from it the whole of the matter relating to the proposed boat railway and the widening of the channel at the Dalles. At whose suggestion or under whose direction this was done I am not advised.

It would, however, not be a very violent presumption to suppose that the officer in charge of the division of rivers and harbors in the Engineer Bureau had something to do with it, but perhaps not. It is true, however, that Colonel Parke was then, as now, in charge of that division. I do know, however, and beg to attract the attention of the Senate and the people of Oregon and Washington and Idaho to the fact, that when the fact of this mutilation of the annual report of Major Jones, and of the suppression of the whole of that portion of it relating to a boat railway at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, came to my knowledge, I, on the 19th of January, 1886, introduced in the Senate of the United States the following resolution, which was on that date unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a full and complete copy of the annual report of Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on river improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, in form as originally submitted by him to the Chief of Engineers, under date of July 27, A. D. 1885, together with full copies of all statistics originally included in or attached to such report.

In response to this peremptory demand of the Senate, the Secretary of War, by letter of date February 1, 1886, transmitted to the Senate the whole of Major Jones' report, including that portion that had been suppressed in regard to the proposed boat railway at The Dalles, and it was by the Senate ordered printed, and is now Senate Executive Document 114, first session Forty-ninth Congress. It might, moreover, be a matter of interest to the people of Oregon and Washington Territory to know the reason why that portion of Major Jones' annual report relating to this proposed boat railway at The Dalles was suppressed. So far as I am advised, no reason has ever yet been tendered to the public or to any one.

In conclusion, Mr. President, the people of the Pacific Northwest, of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana, have made up their minds that the Columbia River shall be stripped of its obstructions at the earliest possible date and opened to free navigation. Neither they nor their Representatives propose to be otherwise than civil, and in all respects dignified in whatever they may do, in order to bring about that great consummation; but they do not intend that either selfish corporations, whose interests are adverse, or executive officers of the Government, some of whom have grown haughty in their cushioned chairs in Washington, shall stand in the way of their great purpose.

They have determined that all unreasonable and unnecessary red-tape, personal pique, individual selfish interest, jealousies, ambitions, personal grievances, and resentments, shall be swept aside and forever buried out of sight in their firm determination and settled purpose to accomplish a work in which are involved the interests of an empire—a work which more than all others combined advances the interests of commerce, of trade, of material development, of civilization itself, on the broad plains and in the fertile valleys, and among the gold, and silver, and lead, and iron, and cinnabar impregnated mountains of the Pacific Northwest.

The play with appropriations for the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia upon the part of certain interested parties and indifferent executive officers has held the boards for the last time, and quite long enough. It can draw no longer; in fact it will not be permitted any longer. The people interested are aroused; they are in earnest, they are determined, and will suffer no further nonsense or trifling with their great interests in this important matter.

With the present Chief of Engineers, General Duane, we have no controversy; in him we have confidence and to him we look for fair dealing and fair play. But to the attention of Colonel Parke, lately in charge of the office of Chief of Engineers, and at present and for years past in charge of the division of rivers and harbors in that bureau, I must be pardoned for bringing, as I have done, the various expressions of opinion of the different representative bodies and representative men in Oregon and Washington Territory, just quoted by me.

Personally I have no controversy, nor cause for controversy with General Parke. His personal treatment of and bearing toward me at all times when I have called at his office on business has been that of a most courteous, polite gentleman, and accommodating officer; but with him as an official, as one of the executive officers of the Government, in charge of and controling great public trusts, I, in my representative capacity, representing in part great and important interests, feel compelled, not only in justice to my constituents but myself as well, to take issue with him in reference to his official acts as disclosed by his own record in connection with a great public improvement which the people, whom I in part represent here, very properly regard as vital to the promotion of their best interests.

For the delays in the resumption of work on the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, I and others of the delegation in Congress have been by many of our constituents subjected to severe censure. In view of my public record upon the subject (and which is open to all) of opening the Columbia River to free navigation, commencing in the first session of the Forty-third Congress, now nearly fourteen years ago, and of my untiring efforts in connection with my colleagues in the Senate and House to carry forward this great work to as early a consummation as possible, I am, I confess, somewhat restless under adverse criticisms, and I propose now, henceforth and always, that all blame for delay in the utilizing of appropriations made by Congress for this important improvement, and for every other improvement in Oregon, shall rest where it rightfully attaches, and properly belongs.

The question, Mr. President, of improving the rivers and harbors of the United States is one of the gravest import to its people. It is absolutely the only effectual means whereby they can hope to secure for themselves the great benefits that accrue from cheap transportation. The greatest statesmen tell us that "cheap transportation is by all odds the greatest factor in modern civilization." To develop and secure it is one of the principal aims of the statesman.

Hence it is that Congress at each annual session makes one grand, patriotic effort to aid the various localities that need help in the matter of the improvement of their harbors and water ways. To attempt to gain relief by the regulation of railways is all very well and proper, but the task is beset with difficulties and met with most formidable obstruction on every step. A railroad is by its very nature a monopoly, and to direct and control a railroad company while it is in entire control of the sources of its own action is a most difficult undertaking. In the development of the water ways of the country there of necessity arises a conflict with vested railroad interests, since it is their control and regulation that actually underlies the whole question. Naturally looking to their own individual interest, they do not wish to be controlled, and will not be if it is in their power to prevent it.

It seems to them, and rightfully to, that the great reduction in the cost of transportation which results from competition means the direct loss of millions of money to their treasury.

This interest represents over 25 per cent. of the capital engaged in business in the United States. It is thoroughly and ably organized, and the vigilant, skillful, and ceaseless opposition of this tremendous power is to be met and overcome at every session of Congress by the people and their representatives; and after the long and protracted battle has been fought at each and every session of Congress, resulting in appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the whole amount is turned over to the Secretary of War to execute the will of Congress, and he in turn hands it over entirely to the Corps of Engineers of the Army.

This corps is governed by a bureau in Washington, at the head of which is the chief of the corps. He has several assistants, detailed from the officers of the corps, who have charge of certain subdivisions of his duties. One of these subdivisions is called the river and harbor division, and it is here the whole of the great and vastly important business created by the river and harbor acts of Congress is principally managed and controlled. All projects for improvements, involving the most abstruse and difficult questions in engineering science and all questions of personnel, are practically settled in this division.

Chiefs of Engineers come and go. They reach this position as a rule in the line of promotion, old, tired, and unskilled in bureau administration; and hence it is a matter of common notoriety that the officer in charge of the river and harbor division practically conducts and controls the most of the business. Obviously, then, such an officer should be much more than a mere polite and polished gentleman eminently fitted for the fashionable salons and gay and festive drawing-rooms of an aristocratic and fashionable capital. He should not only be a man of great engineering experience and ability, but a man who has knowledge of, and is in a great measure identified with, the great public interests of the people in the various sections of the country.

Obviously, also, if the great railroad organizations should wish to paralyze and cripple the business of improving the harbors and water ways, they would naturally endeavor to place an officer in this important position, or retain such a one, if already there, who had little or no practical engineering experience, and who had no identification, association, or sympathy with the great masses of the people or their material interests.

Now, the country in the far West may be surprised to learn, what everybody in Congress of course, and in the city of Washington have known for years, that for over twenty years this position has been occupied by an officer who has never had any practical experience of any moment whatever in engineering construction.

This may be stated to be his official record of service: Graduated at West Point in 1845; after a short service on the surveys of the northern boundary, he took station in Washington, where he remained on bureau duty until the breaking out of the war of the rebellion; serving through this war with credit, it is true, he returned to the Engineer Bureau in Washington, where he has remained ever since. Here is the record in brief of a man who has never been in contact with the people, who has sat in a bureau during the greater part of a long military career, and who obviously, and necessarily from his habits of life, can have but little knowledge of, or sympathy with the wants of the people, especially those of the great Pacific Northwest.

Recent events prove this to be the case; his own record, in response to the Senate resolution, attests the fact. And this is the officer who places Major Jones, an officer whose practical engineering experience in the matter of the improvement of rivers and harbors is vastly more extensive than that of his accuser, on the gibbet of official and personal condemnation by the official declaration that his "administrative skill, capacity, and ability" were not satisfactory to him. In recent years, Mr. President, the Secretary of War has, from time to time, announced a determination of weeding out of Washington the moss-back sycophants, who cluster like barnacles "around the throne."

Orders and circulars have been fulminated from time to time, and the crop of lieutenants and captains has been tolerably good; but to-day all Washington, and the entire Army with few exceptions, stand agog over the hidden power, the secret influence, the magic wand that can hold a military officer of the Engineer Corps in Washington on desirable bureau duty for a period of thirty-seven years. Secretaries may and do come and go, but Colonel Parke, genial, pleasant gentleman that he is, promises to stay forever. Secretaries may remark they are not justly responsible for keeping this officer in Washington, that it is a necessity, that the Chief of Engineers could not get along without him, that his services are essential in steering him through the intricacies and labyrinths of bureau administration, that the chief is always retired before obtaining a confident grasp of the helm.

But is it possible there exists but one man in the United States Engineer Corps who is competent, by reason of education and character, and worthy in all respects by virtue, of engineering skill, ability, and experience in the business of practical, civil, and military engineering operations in the field on river and harbor improvements, to fill with credit the position of chief of the division of rivers and harbors in the Engineer Bureau of the War Department?

Mr. President, if this be so, then the handwriting on the wall proclaims in burning characters the fact, that unless the United States Corps of Engineers can shake off the fossilisms that enshroud it, and which are paralyzing its efficiency in the upper story, and shall bring to its existence, and infuse into its arteries, new and vitalizing currents that will bring to it energy, aggressiveness, efficiency, and power, to enable it to keep step, in all respects, with the progressive spirit of the scientific age in which we live, and in which with all other sciences that of civil and military engineering is moving forward with tremendous strides, attracting by its triumphs and advancements the surprise and admiration of the world, then the day of its glory will not stand long on the order of its departure.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I move the adoption of the pending resolution, the effect of which will be to submit this whole business, with full power and authority to call for persons and papers and administer oaths, to the consideration and judgment of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, for such further action as may, by that committee be deemed expedient and proper under all the circumstances, in vindication of either public interests, or private, personal, and official rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate——

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair at this hour to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I ask for the adoption of my resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. It cannot be done without some reply.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Very well; then let the resolution lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. CONGER. I ask an opportunity now to make a very few remarks in answer to the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has a right to make his remarks on the river and harbor bill. The river and harbor bill is pending.

INDIAN TRADERS.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to offer a resolution that will take no time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to submit a resolution.

Mr. PLATT. Let it be printed and lie over.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee directed to investigate the subject of the appointment of Indian traders, the granting of licenses to them, and the refusal to extend such licenses to persons engaged as such traders, &c. (appointed under resolution of June 3, 1886), be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to continue the said investigation during the coming recess of Congress, with all the powers and authorities granted to said committee by the resolution of June 3, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1582) for the relief of Alpheus R. French disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ELDREDGE, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. STRUBLE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 929) for the relief of Albert H. Emery disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TRIGG, Mr. DOUGHERTY, and Mr. GALLINGER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10397) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TOWNSHEND, Mr. CABELL, and Mr. LONG managers at the conference on the part of the House.

OREGON RIVER AND HARBOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. CONGER. One object I had in asking the floor now was that my few remarks in answer to the Senator from Oregon might appear together with his in the RECORD.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session no Senator shall speak on any question more than once, and shall confine his remarks to five minutes' duration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CAMERON. I should like it to have immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

COMMITTEE ON ORDNANCE AND WAR SHIPS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on Ordnance and War Ships be continued under the former orders of the Senate, with the powers heretofore given them, with leave to sit at Washington in the vacation of the Senate, and to further examine and report upon any plans for war ships, engines, and armor that they may consider useful for the naval establishment of the United States, and that they may associate in their investigation any officers of the Navy, not exceeding three, on the active or retired list that the Secretary of the Navy may detail for the purpose.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

OREGON RIVER AND HARBOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I do not propose at this time to ask the Senate to listen to any speech or to any very lengthy remarks.

The character of this attack upon General Parke is so unusual, so different from the ordinary mode of warfare against an enemy, public or private, that I feel unwilling to let the occasion pass without saying a word or two in regard to General Parke, and a word or two in regard to the mode of attack adopted here in the Senate, where General Parke can not be present to answer, and must rely upon the feeble remarks of his friends.

The speech which has just been delivered here will unquestionably have accomplished its leading object. Perhaps no one on the floor of the Senate understands better than my friend from Oregon how to express the views and wishes of his constituents, whether they be a little board of thirteen men in the village of Dalles representing the board of trade, or a smaller number at Walla-Walla, or a gathering down on the fertile island and station of Vancouver, near the mouth of the Willamette.

I need say nothing to this assemblage, it seems to me I need say nothing to the old members of the Senate and the old members of the other House, in defense of the character, the reputation, the engineering ability, the long, arduous, faithful service from morning till night for the last twenty years of one of the most distinguished men who has ever held rank in the Engineer Corps, and a man who during all that time, through all administrations, through all Chiefs of Engineers, through all Secretaries of War, through the approval of all sessions of Congress, in the House and in the Senate, has had the main charge of the expenditure of nearly $150,000,000 appropriated by Congress to be used all over this country, upon known and unknown works when they were commenced, and to whom I venture to say up to this very last hour, except in some resolutions which have been offered here, no member of the Senate, however old in his place or however new in his place, no member of the other House in former years, has ever heard against his integrity, his honesty, his candor, his fairness, his wonderful ability in regard to the expenditures of appropriations and suggestions of our vast system of public improvements, one solitary word till to-day.

I would be willing to pause here, and if any old member of the other House in this body now, if any Senator on this floor would contradict my assertion and say that within his own knowledge, or within his own belief, or from suspicion, or from rumor, or from hearsay, there has ever come, except from these boards of trade and town meetings in Oregon and Washington Territory, a word of suspicion, a word of censure, a word of question in regard to the fidelity and honor and integrity of this chief of the department of rivers and harbors in the Engineer Department, I would be willing to sit down and think I may have been mistaken, and that other men have heard of this gallant officer and wonderful engineer rumors and stories that have never reached my ear.

Sir, eighteen years ago this coming spring it was my fortune to become a member of the Committee on Commerce in the other House, which then had charge of river and harbor improvements, since which time those duties of the Committee on Commerce have been divided and we have now a committee of the House on rivers and harbors. My first acquaintance with General Parke commenced at the spring session in 1869 with my duties on that committee, and they have continued intimate and close and thorough all through my service in the other House of twelve years and up to this time of six years in the Senate. Having had assigned to me in connection with two other members of the House for many years the duty of preparing the river and harbor bill, as one of the subcommittee of three it was my duty as well as my pleasure to have frequent intercourse and consultation and advice with General Parke, and has been, whether I was on the committee or not, until the close of my service in the House, and has been for the last six years as a member of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

I am not much of a man worshipper; I am not very much given to hero worship; I do not twine around a great man because he is in high place; I am not much inclined in that way; but I am willing to say that of all the public men with whom my business in the House and Senate has made me necessarily connected, I have never found a man who impressed me more strongly with the idea of his candor, his sincerity, his gentlemanly behavior and conduct, his wonderful familiarity with all the questions with which Congress has been interested connected with rivers and harbors, his good judgment, his fine appreciation of men, his ability to decide which man was best for the particular place and position than General Parke.

But, sir, as I said a few moments ago, to this audience, to the men who have known General Parke as I have known him, to these Senators who have gone to him to consult and advise and urge to hasten the great works in which they were interested, I venture to assert that there is no other man in the Senate, except my esteemed friend from Oregon, who will say now or at any time one word against the character for fidelity, candor, honesty, and fair play of General Parke; and there I leave that part of the matter.

Mr. President, for twenty years, through all changes of administration, under all the Presidents, under all the Secretaries of War, under all the Chiefs of Engineers—and the chiefs have been changed several times—even with an administration different in politics from those which had gone before, there has been no time when the remark of the Senator from Oregon as a reason for keeping General Parke in his place has not held good, that it could not be supplied by any other officer in the Engineer Corps. His long experience, his intimate knowledge, his wonderful memory, which he has acquired through these long years of service, belong to the country, belong to the service, and belong to those who desire that this vast system of internal improvements, which has done more to promote the advance, and the growth, and the progress of our country not only in the old States but in opening up and unfolding the vast West, could not be spared to the country or to the friends of its improvement, and no man has ever had the temerity, whatever his superior position, from President down to the Chief of Engineers, to assume that General Parke could be replaced by any other, however great, officer in the Army and in the Corps of Engineers, however great his engineering abilities may be.

Sir, any engineer can be Chief of Engineers. They are changed; they are called there from time to time, by selection, it is true, and not by rank, but the office goes on. In that system of improvement in that little dark back room, away from the enticements and allurements of society, with no vision from that darkened window where General Parke has spent the days for twenty years in hard labor, no vision of elegant society comes before him to distract his attention. No, sir; you may change Presidents, and with a whirling hand you may turn Secretary after Secretary of War from his place and select another; and in the course of events the time for retiring, or the accident of death will make the appointment of a new Chief of Engineers necessary and proper; but, sir, it will be a sorry day for all our interests—those of us who feel so much interest in this grand system of internal improvement—it will be a sorry day for us and for our constituents and for the country when any man will dare to remove General Parke from that desk of labor and of toil and of watchfulness, where we have always found him, in season and out of season, in all the past days. But I leave the question of the character, the fitness, and the ability of General Parke to the knowledge and conscience of my fellow Senators on this floor.

I know it is hard for an inferior officer in the army, who was sworn to obey orders, to go into Oregon if he wants to stay, if it is pleasanter where he is; but Major Jones took the place of Captain Powell after he had learned of the wants of the Pacific country. I do not know why, or how, or what influences got him into the place of Captain Powell. He held it two years. I know the two men only as I hear of them every year in the great family bible of reports. It came his turn to go. A soldier would have obeyed orders and gone; a soldier would not have growled and complained. I do not know what instigates these town meetings along the Columbia River and amidst the rocks of the cascades and in the back places of the little islands at the mouth of the Willamette.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I will tell the Senator——

Mr. CONGER. When the Senator spoke so long he ought to have been able to explain it. I thought he did.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I am satisfied with the explanation I made.

Mr. CONGER. Then the time came when by order of the same head of Department Captain Powell was restored to his position, which he had filled long and well, and Major Jones was ordered elsewhere; I know not where. I say it is the duty of an officer of the Army by the rules and regulations and by common consent to obey orders. He should not fall back on resolutions of town meetings finding fault with the Department. Town meetings ought not to control the President, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, or anybody acting in that capacity in giving his purely military orders. My friend from Oregon differs with me.

I appreciate the trouble and the anxiety of the people of Oregon and Washington Territory as to any delay in their work. I do not know, and I will not undertake to say whether after Congress had provided a board of engineers to go once, and I think twice, and examine the plans for the improvement of the Cascades, and when that board of engineers had determined upon a plan which was approved by the Chief of Engineers, approved by the Secretary of War, approved by both Houses of Congress in the bills already passed, and approved by the President in signing those bills, I do not know whether it might not be a subject of criticism if Major Jones sent to the War Department, not a plan for a canal as adopted by the engineers and adopted by Congress, but a plan of a ship-railway to overcome the rapids instead of a canal.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. That only shows that the Senator from Michigan does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. CONGER. I will not allow the Senator to tell how learned or how ignorant I am in my time. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I admit that——

Mr. CONGER. I will let the Senator speak when I get through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. CONGER. I said that if it was at the Cascades that a plan for a ship railway was projected——

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. It was not there.

Mr. CONGER. I just mentioned it to let the Senator see that I knew more than he thought I did. It was a trap to catch the gentleman, and I caught him. [Laughter.] It was a proposition at the Dalles, another point on the Columbia River. Our engineers do not make reports about railways to the Engineer Department. They do not ask their engineer officers to make plans for railways changing plans for canals. They do not ask them to overrule the board of engineers which had declared for a canal with one lift and a breakwater lock at the head of the canal, and to go on with one part of it against the recommendation of the board of engineers.

I do not know what there may be in the Department about Major Jones. I have always understood he was a good officer, and I should think so—still if some of his injudicious and unwise friends had not attempted to overrule the orders of the War Department and his chief by bringing the recommendations and the petitions of citizens of Oregon to the Secretary of War and the Engineer Department as to whom they ought to have there and whom they ought to restore—I do not think that was a very judicious proceeding.

I sympathize, as I said, with the desire that this great and important work shall go on. I have been along the Cascades. I have had the opportunity of a brief examination of this work at two or three points where it is going on. I have seen the Columbia River and know something of its people and its interests, and I know how desirable it is that the work should go on. But there were different plans. General Parke was, as the Senator says, accidentally at the head of the Engineer Department, and he was called upon to report upon new plans for the expenditure of millions of dollars when he was not the authorized legal head of the Engineer Department and when it was expected that the vacancy would be filled from day to day. Had he undertaken to decide that matter without waiting for the proper appointee of the President, who should be the real Chief Engineer of that department, he might have been presumptuous.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The Senator is wrong again. No plan was submitted to him, none whatever.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps not. The Senator's own argument shows that Captain Powell's plan was for a lift-lock and for a guard-lock.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The plan had been presented two years before.

Mr. CONGER. And in prosecuting this work with the appropriation that Congress made Major Jones left out entirely the guard-lock, and recommended that it be placed, not where the Board of Engineers said, at the head of the canal, but down near the lock itself.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The change had been made two years before by Major Jones. He remained in charge of the work after that for a period of two years.

Mr. CONGER. I am of the opinion—I say it with all respect—that the splendid oration of my friend in behalf of Major Jones and his attack on General Parke, his exhibition of the feelings of the people of Oregon and Washington Territory, as shown by the telegrams he has read here, the zeal which becomes him and which he ought to entertain in behalf of the carrying on of a great work in his part of the world, will have accomplished the purpose the Senator had in view. I think it satisfies the Senate that there is no sufficient ground for any charge on the face of the papers of any wrongdoing by General Parke. I think it satisfies the Senate that the Senator from Oregon is now, as he always has been, earnest, devoted, energetic in behalf of the interests of the people of Oregon and of Washington Territory; and it does not need my feeble approbation of his course here to say that I rank him among the most energetic and determined men in promoting the local and general interests of his region of country that I have ever met in the Senate. He has accomplished his object by publishing to the people, as he had a right to do, the troubles with which he has labored and been antagonized in getting this work along, a work which, it is true, will last ten, or fifteen, or twenty years' time with the appropriations we make; a work that can not be finished in a moment, or in a year, or in a half a dozen years, or perhaps a dozen.

But there has been too much of neglect here from some cause. The Senator says his constituents and friends charge it to him. I do not blame him for having made this grand, eloquent, wonderful oration; and I am happy to add my tribute of respect for the Senator and of appreciation of his diligence in behalf of his constituents. Let me follow his speech and say to the good people of Oregon and Washington Territory that they are led away too often by rumors; that they are mistaken in the man if they think the Senator from Oregon has ever for a moment slept when he might have been laborious in the discharge of his duties to them, or that from the very nature of the Senator himself he could be so.

That is all I desire to say at this time on this subject. I could not let the opportunity pass without at least offering my tribute of respect, of regard, and of admiration for an officer, as I have said before, that I have considered for eighteen years, with close and intimate relations to him, one of the most laborious, earnest, candid, faithful, honorable men connected with the public service; and I but voice, I believe, the opinion of every Senator who hears me to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the river and harbor bill being before the Senate, I will delay the Senate but a moment from its actual consideration.

I listened with, first surprise, and then astonishment, and then indignation, to the speech of an hour and a half, the elaborate, unrelenting, unmerciful attack upon General Parke before a tribunal where he has no possibility of appearing in defense.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He does not need any defense.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir; it is not necessary. On this floor General Parke can not be heard except through his personal friends, and the Senator from Oregon is the first man I ever heard of who knew Parke who was not his personal friend and admirer. He has been attacked here concerning a matter which belongs to military administration. If he made a serious mistake in judgment, or if he were guilty of something worse in the discharge of his duty as a soldier, the remedy is in the War Department, either by removal or rebuke, or if it be serious, by a demand for a court-martial. To all that General Parke will be glad to respond.

Powell was in charge of certain improvements for three years; Jones was in charge, I believe, about a year; I do not care how it was—whether Powell had ever been in charge or not. In the exercise of his discretion General Parke changed the officers, avowed the responsibility for it, but was not allowed to retain the responsibility for it, because the War Department telegraphed its action to the local board of trade, which assumed a right to review the action of one of the departments.

Your dispatch received from Senator DOLPH. Captain Powell is in charge of improvement at Cascades Canal.
The project of application of last appropriation has been approved. There will be no delay.
The change of officers was made after due consideration, and will not be changed. That is a matter of administration, and as the responsibility for this work is upon this Department, it must act upon its own judgment.
WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

In which the Secretary of War spoke precisely as he ought to have spoken, being responsible for that work, and having simply exercised a legal discretion according to his best judgment, first through Parke and then by himself, for a change of officers; and that is the end of it, and ought to have been the end of it, but for the attack upon this gentleman's honor. If I ever knew a man of whom I could say in the familiar phrase of the profession, "He is a gentleman and a soldier and incapable of dishonor," it is John G. Parke. If I shall be here to-morrow, which I doubt, I shall move either to lay this resolution on the table or to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, where it belongs.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, at the close of the morning call this morning the Chair announced that the Calendar was in order. I immediately rose for the purpose of moving the consideration of Order of Business 1642, being the bill (H. R. 4841) to change the eastern and northern judicial districts of Texas, and for other purposes. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] rose about the same time with a fresh matter. I shall be here but a very few days in the Senate. This is a bill of great moment to the people whom I represent, and especially to my neighborhood. I understood that there was a mutual agreement of parties in this Chamber that the morning hour at the close of the morning call should be consumed in the consideration of House bills under what is known as the Harris rule, but the whole time, every moment of the morning hour, was consumed by a long elaborate speech of the Senator from Oregon having nothing whatever to do with that rule or with any case pending under that rule on the Calendar. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee yielded because it is a universal rule of the Senate to extend courtesy when one desires to speak who has given notice to that effect, and to yield to him; but it is cruel to those of us who have bills which interest us on the Calendar to have the whole of the only portion of the day available for that purpose taken up with speeches in reference to anything, without regard to any pending bill on the Calendar.

Now I desire to say that the motion which I made was in strict accordance with the rule, not to take my case out of the rule, but the bill was passed over informally without losing its place, in my absence, with the intent that when I returned it should be called. My only object was to get my right. Now I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, and for every day from that to the close of the session, I shall object to using one solitary moment of the morning hour for any purpose other than the legitimate consideration of business on the Calendar.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10419) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. COCKRELL. What was done with the resolution of the Senator from Oregon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution went over and Senators have been discussing the river and harbor bill since 2 o'clock. The pending amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, after line 1029 of the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce, it is proposed to insert:

Continuing improvement and repair of works already constructed at Atchison, Fort Leavenworth reservation, and Arrow Rock, in Kansas, and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $100,000.

Mr. FRYE. That amendment ought not to be agreed to. There was in the bill $300,000 appropriated to the Missouri River between certain points, the mouth and Sioux City. Now, so far as I have any interest in the bill, I have no sort of objection to taking $100,000 of that $300,000 and applying it to the places named in this amendment; but this amendment increases that $300,000 to $400,000. Under a rule which the committee adopted (and from which it did not digress except in certain remarkable cases which required it in justice) only a quarter of the estimates was to be appropriated, and over a quarter was appropriated to this reach of the Missouri River, and this will make it almost one-half. There is no reason why the Missouri River, on which, as the Senator says here, there are only two steamboats below Saint Jo and a sporadic one above, should receive one-half the estimate, or nearly one-half, when all the rest of the rivers and harbors under the rule of the committee are not permitted to receive over one-quarter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. VAN WYCK. When I introduced the original amendment I agreed in sentiment with the Senator from Maine, that the amount for the points named should be taken from the $300,000. To that some gentlemen of the committee excepted, notably, I think, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Nebraska will remember that I made no opposition.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The chairman of the committee assented, but some members of the committee dissented, and probably all the Missourians dissented because this $300,000 was sought to be kept at two points, Saint Jo and Kansas City, in the State of Missouri. My colleague suggested that another $100,000 should be appropriated to these points. To that I assented. I should very much prefer the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, and with the consent of the Senate I will again move the amendment in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator indicate his modification?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I propose to add to the clause making the $300,000 appropriation:

Of which one-half shall be expended at points other than Saint Jo and Kansas City.

Mr. PLUMB. You had better put in the names of the points.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very well, I will name the points, saying "of which one-half shall be expended at" the points named in the amendment "under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. CONGER. Will not the Senator modify that by saying "or so much thereof as is necessary," leaving it to the Secretary's discretion?

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is under his direction.

Mr. CONGER. Why not say "of which one-half, or so much as shall be necessary, shall be expended?"

Mr. VAN WYCK. I accept that suggestion. Let it read:

Of which one-half, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be expended at

The places named in the printed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 1026, of section 1, after the word "dollars" it is proposed to insert:

Of which one-half, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War at Atchison, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, in Kansas; and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as thus modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now, another amendment will be necessary to connect this properly with the part of the paragraph which follows, which reads:

Of which sum $5,000 may be used between the southern limits of Saint Joseph and the head of Lake Contrary.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Insert the word "and" at the end of the former amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. No; because we do not desire that the sum of $5,000 shall come out of the money that is to be applied to the improvement of other points than Saint Joseph and Kansas City. The $5,000 should come out of the $150,000 provided for Saint Joseph and Kansas City.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas the propriety of striking out that item. This appropriation is under the control of the Secretary of War, and it is not best to designate $5,000 to be expended between Saint Jo and Lake Contrary. I think it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is not present. Is there any objection to letting the amendment lie over until he comes in?

Mr. MCMILLAN. This clause was in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I suggest to the chairman of the committee the propriety of that being left to remain under the direction of the Secretary of War instead of under the commission. Does this committee insist that the Missouri River Commission is an important auxiliary on that river?

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Missouri River Commission was established by an act of Congress, and is in charge of this river. We make no suggestion of a change in that regard.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It would seem that the Missouri River Commission has really had nothing to do up to this point of time, and there would appear to be no necessity for its continuance. I suggest to the chairman of the committee whether the committee feel it necessary to insist on the retention of the commission?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas offer any amendment to the bill?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would move to strike out this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was addressing the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], who rose a while ago suggesting an amendment. The Chair did not understand whether he had actually made a motion to amend or not.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggested that the amendment which had been adopted rendered another amendment necessary, inasmuch as the $5,000 that is appropriated for the improvement of the macadamized road between the southern limits of Saint Joseph and Lake Contrary should be taken from the $150,000 that is to be expended for the benefit of navigation at Saint Joseph and Kansas City, and not subtracted from the $150,000 that is to be appropriated for the improvement of navigation at the other points named. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] suggested that inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was not in his seat, the matter might as well lie over until he came in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment, the Chair will put the question on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. PLUMB. I move in line 1028 to strike out "commission" and insert "Secretary of War."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that as the amendment has been concurred in as a whole it can only be amended now by addition.

Mr. PLUMB. I will move then to add at the close of line 1029—

And all the expenditures in this paragraph shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the amendment can be offered.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not understand that it requires unanimous consent. I move to add.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. VEST. Is this amendment to take the place of the Missouri River Commission?

Mr. PLUMB. I want to have this work done under the judgment of the Secretary of War. The commission is still in existence auxiliary to the Secretary of War, but I want him to have the general supervising authority and direction of the question of the improvement of the Missouri River. The Senator will observe that in the following paragraph all the improvements are under the direction of the Secretary of War. There ought to be some responsible head here at Washington that we can bring to account if necessary for the expenditure of this money.

Mr. GIBSON. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas is to insert in line 1026 that appropriations under this item shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War. He has general supervision already.

Mr. PLUMB. If that is the construction of the committee, instead of putting in a direction to the Secretary of War in lines 1031 and 1032, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] suggests, it would do harm to put it in again.

Mr. GIBSON. I have no objection unless the intention is to abolish the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. PLUMB. I should be glad to do it, but I do not propose to do it here. The commission still lives and draws its salary; but that there should be a central authority which should be responsible for the expenditure in a general way, I think must be apparent. I see what the purpose of the committee was by the first paragraph; but inasmuch as they have made the improvement of the Missouri River between Sioux City and Fort Benton dependent on the discretion of the Secretary of War, I think it is as well to have the remainder of it in the same shape, and so specified that there shall not be any doubt about it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Kansas will permit me to make a statement in regard to that. The improvement of the Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton has never been under the actual charge of the Missouri River Commission. All the surveys which have been made of that portion of the river have been made by the War Department, and the improvements hitherto have all been conducted under the direction of the War Department. This is a mere continuance of the system that has existed there.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Before the Senator from Missouri proceeds I wish to give him some information which he may not have, as he was absent. Before he left the amendment pending was to add $100,000 to the Missouri River appropriation and make the expenditure applicable to certain places that were named. That has been withdrawn, and now it reads:

Continuing improvement, $300,000; of which sum one-half shall be expended, if necessary, at the points—

Named in the amendment pending when the Senator went out, and then "of which sum $5,000 should be used between Saint Jo and Lake Contrary," leaving $145,000 for Saint Jo and Kansas City. That is the condition of that clause now. It has been so reported to the Senate, and the question in the Senate will be on adopting the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN and others. It has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been agreed to in the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I was called out necessarily to attend a conference committee. I do not see that there is any necessity for the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas unless he proposes to abolish the Missouri River Commission. That is really the effect of it. The clause, "Improving Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton: Continuing improvement, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $50,000," was in the last river and harbor bill, and I opposed putting the upper part of the river under the Secretary of War, or in other words, taking it away from the commission, but the Senator from Minnesota insisted upon it and it was finally put into the bill, and this provision here now simply recognizes that fact as continuing that from Sioux City to Fort Benton the commission have nothing to do with that part of the river. I think myself the whole river ought to have been left under the charge of the commission, but I was overruled in committee and in the Senate.

Now, under existing law, as to the remainder of the river, from Sioux City to the mouth, the Secretary of War is to expend the money according to the plans and estimates of the Missouri River Commission. That is the law as it stands, and the Secretary of War is responsible for that expenditure, and there can possibly be no necessity for putting on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas unless he proposes to abolish the Missouri River Commission, and if he does, let us understand it distinctly and have the issue made, and let us take a vote upon that distinct proposition. If he simply means to say, as I understood him when I came into the Chamber, that he wants a responsible official for the expenditure of this money, and therefore he wants it expended by the Secretary of War, that is the law at present. I repeat that the Secretary of War now expends the money according to the plans and estimates furnished by the commission. If the Senator wants to abolish the commission, let that issue be made, and let us take a vote on it. The amendment is absolutely unnecessary unless he does mean to abolish the commission.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let me ask the Senator if the phraseology as to the omnipotent power of the Mississippi River Commission is extended to the Missouri River Commission. I think in the creation of the Missouri River Commission it is stated that what they do shall be with the approval of the Secretary of War. The Mississippi River Commission are not controlled by the approval of the Secretary of War; they are supreme; they are really above the Secretary of War; but the Missouri River Commission is different.

Mr. GIBSON. I beg pardon of the Senator from Nebraska. Every recommendation of the Mississippi River Commission is subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think that phraseology is not in the statute creating the Mississippi River Commission, but it is in the statute creating the Missouri River Commission. It is with the approval of the Secretary of War. Hence, when the Missouri River Commission sought to divert the $375,000 appropriated last year to Saint Joseph and Kansas City, some persons in Kansas and Nebraska interested in that matter called the attention of the Secretary of War not only to the injustice of the apportionment, but to the fact that it was in violation of the law making the appropriation, and the Secretary of War did not discharge, as I think at that time, his full duty. He permitted a silent acquiescence in what the Commission did.

The act creating the Missouri River Commission provided that its doings should have the approval of the Secretary of War. The ground taken in the Engineer Department here at Washington is—and that controls the Secretary of War—that the Mississippi River Commission is absolute, that the Secretary of War has no power to control their acts; and notwithstanding the difference in phraseology in the law creating the Missouri River Commission, the Engineer Department in this city held that it was the same as the Mississippi River Commission, that the Secretary of War had no option about it, had no control, but was simply to acquiesce.

Mr. VEST. It is simply impossible for anybody to have put that construction on the act creating the Missouri River Commission or the Mississippi River Commission. I do not remember the language, but any Senator can turn to the act in a second. The language is that the money shall be expended by the Secretary of War according to the plans and estimates furnished by the commission. Who is responsible for the expenditure of the money? The Secretary of War is responsible.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The act says that he shall expend this money. How? According to their plans and estimates. He has no power left with the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. VEST. There is no such language in the act. The language is according to the plans and estimates furnished by the Missouri River Commission. They simply furnish the plans and the estimates, and he expends the money. He is responsible for that expenditure. He does the work, but he does it according to the plans and estimates furnished by them; and how any lawyer or any official of this Government could ever say that the Secretary of War was controlled and absolutely bound to expend this money according to the Missouri River Commission's plans passes my comprehension.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand that the Mississippi River Commission under the law creating it makes the plans and estimates for the improvement of that river and submits them to the Secretary of War, and that the Secretary of War has no power of revision of those plans or estimates, but that he must make the expenditure of any sum of money appropriated by Congress in accordance with those plans and estimates, that he is a mere accounting officer to render an account to Congress of the disbursement of money in accordance with those plans and estimates; that he has no power to revise or change the plans submitted by the commission. Therefore, he is not at all responsible for the estimates or the plans, but is merely to account as a disbursing officer for the funds expended by the commission.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then the chairman of the committee confirms what I have said in regard to this matter, that the Secretary of War merely obeys the direction of the Mississippi River Commission, and has no power in the matter, except that through him they send their reports to Congress. Then I was correct on that point, as the Senator from Missouri will see. The Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, gives the same version of the law.

But in the Missouri River Commission act the phraseology is different, I submit to my friend, the chairman of the committee:

That the said commission shall, under the direction and with the approval of the Secretary of War, superintend, control, and expend.

The words "with the approval" are in the act creating the Missouri River Commission, but not, if I remember aright, in the act creating the Mississippi River Commission. The Mississippi River Commission is absolute, and so the Engineer Department of the Army in this city holds, and so also holds the chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

But Congress was unwilling to create another commission which should be supreme, and therefore, when the Missouri River Commission was created it said that no money should be expended under its direction without the approval of the Secretary of War, although the opinion of the Secretary of War and of the Engineer Department was that the Missouri River Commission was as absolute as the Mississippi River Commission, and that the Secretary of War was only a messenger substantially, an auditing officer first to audit accounts merely, and then a messenger to transmit their messages to Congress; and that the Secretary of War had no power, no control over the commission.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. It is very easy to make an assertion here as to what the law is, but I presume the law itself is the best authority. I read now from the act constituting the Missouri River Commission——

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator does not understand me. I have just been reading the phraseology in the act creating the Missouri River Commission, "that the said commission shall, under the direction and with the approval of the Secretary of War."

Mr. VEST. Exactly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If I remember aright, the words "with the approval of the Secretary of War" are not in the act creating the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. VEST. I am not discussing the Mississippi River Commission. I understood the Senator from Nebraska to assert that the chairman of the committee, whose authority he took to be conclusive on this matter, had stated that the Secretary of War had nothing to do with the expenditure of this money.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not this money.

Mr. VEST. With the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. McMILLAN. I made no reference whatever to the Missouri River Commission; I referred to the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. VEST. My view is substantiated by the language of the act itself. I say there is no necessity for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, because the Secretary of War is absolutely responsible for the expenditure of this money. Not one dollar of it can be expended without his approval and under his control. That is the language of the act, and unless the intention is to abolish the commission there is no necessity for the amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The only reason for the necessity of something of this kind in the bill is because, without probably weighing the difference in language between the acts creating the two commissions, the Secretary of War and the Engineer Department have held, as the chairman of the committee has stated, is the case with the Mississippi River Commission, that the Secretary of War has no power to control their action; that he is under them, and that the act of Congress made him so. The language of the act creating the Missouri River Commission, however, is different, but, as I stated, the Engineer Department and the Secretary of War held that he was as much subordinate to the Missouri River Commission as he was subordinate to the Mississippi River Commission; and when his attention and the attention of the Engineer Department was called to the apportionment of this money by the Missouri River Commission in defiance of law, it was held that the Secretary of War had no power over this matter; that he was under the control of the Missouri River Commission. Therefore it is that the Senator from Kansas is right—so that there may be no mistake about this matter hereafter we should provide that the Secretary of War shall be supreme and not the Missouri River Commission; and that is all of his amendment.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? He asserts now that the Secretary of War held that he was under the control of the Missouri River Commission. Will he bring proof here of that fact? Where is the proof of that?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have it substantially in the report which I read.

Mr. VEST. The Secretary of War called upon the Missouri River Commission, after we had passed a resolution of inquiry in regard to the expenditures at Kansas City and Saint Joseph, to know why they had so expended the money. They gave him their reasons, and he then transmitted those reasons to the Senate, stating that he approved the reasons and approved the expenditure. There is nothing in the correspondence which shows that he is amenable or subject to the opinion of the Missouri River Commission. He simply says that he considers their explanation satisfactory, and he approves what they have done, as he had the right to approve it under the language of the law itself. They can not expend one dollar without his approval, and he is responsible to Congress for every cent that goes out of the Treasury for the improvement of the river.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri intimates, with something of passion, it seems to me——

Mr. VEST. Oh, no.

Mr. INGALLS. That there is an indirect effort or design on the part of my colleague in the amendment he has offered to dispense with the Missouri River Commission. He declares that if that issue is to be tendered he desires to be advised of it in order that it may be promptly met. I do not know what the purpose of my colleague was in offering the amendment further than has been expressed by him, but I have no hesitation in saying that the Missouri River Commission, in my judgment, ought to be abolished. A more unnecessary, superfluous, and entirely ornamental excrescence never existed, in my judgment, than the Missouri River Commission, and if it were possible by any vote of mine to abolish it, either by indirection or by specific vote for that purpose, no act of my life would be more cheerfully done than a vote in that direction.

The Senator from Missouri says that the amendment of my colleague is not necessary, because the language of the act creating the Missouri River Commission gives the Secretary of War the supervisory power, and subjects their estimates and plans to his approval. That is true in terms, and yet as a matter of fact, the Secretary of War has absolutely abdicated all functions whatever in connection with the expenditure of the moneys and the approval of the plans submitted by the Missouri River Commission for the improvement of that river other than those employed in a simple perfunctory appending of his signature to the plans and estimates they have submitted. So far as any aggressive, affirmative act of volition on his part to examine into these plans and decide whether they are wise, to inquire into the allotment of moneys and ascertain whether they are prudent and in accordance with the acts of Congress, there is no evidence that the Secretary of War has ever committed a single act in that direction.

The correspondence between Mr. Duane, the brigadier-general who is Chief of Engineers, Major Suter, the president of the Missouri River Commission, and General Parke, the colonel of Engineers in charge of the office, shows conclusively that all the Secretary of War ever did or supposed he was able to do in connection with this subject was to approve the plans and estimates submitted by the Missouri River Commission. In the volume submitted in connection with this matter, containing the reports of the Missouri River Commission, appears a communication from Major Suter, dated Saint Louis, Mo., September 2, 1886, describing the results of a meeting of the Missouri River Commission, held August 26 and 27, on the subject of the expenditure of the item of $375,000 for improving the Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, which he declares at that time was carefully considered. Hear this major and president of the Missouri River Commission:

According to the wording of the act—

And what means he had of judging of the act except by its wording he declines to tell us—

According to the wording of the act, the money is to be expended in "continuing improvement, including necessary work, at Omaha, Atchison, Saint Joseph, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, Kansas City, Plattsmouth, Brownsville, and Nebraska City, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with plans and estimates to be furnished by the Missouri River Commission."

Major Suter declares that he understood what the intention of Congress was, and that the direction was specific that the $375,000 should be expended at the points named in the act which was approved August 5, 1886. What do they do? Disregarding the language of the act which they themselves quote, he goes on to state that in the judgment of the commission it would not be wise to comply with the declared will of Congress; he argues that it will result in failure and waste of money; that there has been a large amount expended already at those points, and that on the whole it would be better to disregard the act of Congress which he had quoted, and with whose terms he was entirely familiar, and divide the whole amount between Kansas City and Saint Joseph. He says:

To scatter the current appropriation in allotments to all the points enumerated in the bill would result in no good whatever, as the amounts would be everywhere inadequate to even begin the work needed. Under these circumstances the commission deem that a literal compliance with the requirements of the act is impossible, and they have therefore decided to recommend the continuance of work at Kansas City and Saint Joseph, two of the places enumerated, and on the general improvement of the river in the vicinity of Kansas City.

Mr. President, was there ever a more absolutely arbitrary, confessed, and admitted violation of plain and intelligent provisions of law than that? He quotes the statute, recites the names of the places that Congress had fixed in the act, and goes on to argue that he does not think it would be wise or appropriate or prudent on the whole to comply with the act of Congress; that it will be waste of money to apply the appropriation at these different points, and therefore he concludes that they had better take the $375,000 and disobey the act of Congress and spend the entire amount at Saint Joseph and Kansas City; and that decision is referred to the Secretary of War, and he approves it.

I say that the Secretary of War abdicated his functions. He coincided with the Missouri River Commission in their admitted violation of the law. They did not intend to comply with it. Their disregard of it was intentional. The Secretary of War on the 28th day of October, 1886, under the direction of Col. John G. Parke, Brevet Major-General, United States Army, in charge of the office, approved the allotment, as appears by the signature of John Tweedale, the chief clerk.

It appears that during the progress of this controversy, it having reached the ears of the Representatives from the States of Nebraska, Iowa, and Kansas that this violation of law was intended to be accomplished, they protested in vigorous terms against the proposed action of the Missouri River Commission and the Secretary of War. My colleague and myself, under date of September 9, and September 14, Hon. E. N. MORRILL, a colleague in the House of Representatives, on the 17th of September, 1886, and the honorable Senator from Nebraska, under date of December 18, 1886, all concurred in recommending to the Secretary of War to disregard the recommendations of the Missouri River Commission in allotting the appropriation for improving the Missouri River, from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa, made by act approved August 5, 1886, "it being alleged in some cases that the recommendations of the commission are in violation of the statute." This communication is signed by Maj. Charles R. Suter, and addressed to Col. J. G. Parke, in which the same arguments in his letter of October 6th are repeated in his communication declaring that although the language of the statute was explicit and peremptory, on the whole, in the judgment of the Missouri River Commission, it would be best to disregard it and expend the money at these two points, which in some mysterious manner appear to have engaged the attention and secured the consideration of the War Department and the Missouri River Commission.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, that the Missouri River Commission has shown itself to be an organization that defies the law, and does it in open and flagrant defiance of the expressed will of Congress. If the issue can be presented here, as the Senator from Missouri suggests, I should be very glad to vote for the immediate and unconditional abolition of the commission.

The Senator from Missouri intimated in his argument on Saturday that Saint Joseph was a place of such great commercial importance that that had undoubtedly actuated the minds of the commission in dividing the money between these two places. I should like to inquire whether Saint Joseph, with its 30,000 or 35,000 people, is a place of any greater commercial importance than Omaha, with its 75,000 or 80,000 people? If we are to regard population, exports, and imports in connection with the great railroad system of the country, what is there in Saint Joseph as compared with Omaha, double its population, equal in every other particular to say the least, that should have secured the attention of the Missouri River Commission to the division of the entire amount of the appropriation in this illegal and unjustifiable way between those two points in the State of Missouri?

I say that the amendment of my colleague is essential in view of what has been done hitherto; in view of what is disclosed in this correspondence, as the purpose and intention of the Missouri River Commission. If we desire that the expressed will of Congress shall be carried out hereafter, it is necessary to place the responsibility for this distribution on the Secretary of War and leave out entirely the Missouri River Commission, which ought to be abolished.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have listened very attentively to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], and if his arguments or remarks amount to anything at all, their result is that not only the Missouri River Commission but the Bureau of Engineers and the office of Secretary of War ought all to be abolished, because according to his own showing the alleged violation of law of which he complains was committed equally by the Missouri River Commission and the Bureau of Engineers and the Secretary of War. The correspondence which he himself reads shows that the Bureau of Engineers approved the acts of the commission, and the Secretary of War put the stamp of his approval upon the acts of both.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the Senator will allow me, I think he does some injustice to the Engineer Department, because in the letter of General Parke transmitting some letters which he received in regard to this matter, he says, the Senator will notice, near its conclusion:

On the other hand, the terms of the act are specific, and it is questionable whether upon the statements made by Senators any deviation from its plain requirement would be permissible. The subject is respectfully submitted for the decision of higher authority.

So the Engineer Department, I think, is not liable to the criticism of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. Still, the Engineer Department did not protest against the alleged violation of law which was denounced so eloquently by the Senator from Nebraska. There is no protest against it. It went up regularly through the routine channels to the Secretary of War, and was approved by him.

It appears that we have gone around in a circle in this debate and landed finally at the same place. The Secretary of War could have stopped the expenditure of this money at any time he pleased. The Secretary of War did not do it. Under the terms of the law the Secretary of War is responsible for the expenditure of every dollar upon the Missouri River. If you were to abolish the Missouri River Commission to-morrow you would not get rid of the alleged violations of law so eloquently complained of here to-day; and if the amendment of the Senator from Kansas remains in the bill it still leaves this responsibility where it is now, upon the Secretary of War, and upon the Secretary of War alone. He can veto and stop the expenditure of every dollar if he sees proper to do so.

I repeat that in order to get rid of this discretion, which it is said has been abused, you must repeal the act establishing the Missouri River Commission, and then abolish the Bureau of Engineers and the Secretaryship of War besides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. ALLISON. Before voting on that amendment I ask the Senator from Kansas to allow me to add "Sioux City, Iowa," to the names mentioned in the other amendments. There are some improvements necessary there.

Mr. VEST. Let us hear that amendment read.

Mr. ALLISON. I propose to add "Sioux City, Iowa," simply covering that point as well as the others named.

Mr. VEST. I wish to hear the clause read the way it is proposed to be amended.

Mr. MCMILLAN. That is an amendment to the amendment which has been adopted?

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment I offer now is to the amendment which was adopted. It comes in before the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to my colleague to insert it after the word "and," and before the word "Iowa," at the conclusion of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks leave to submit an amendment to the amendment which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole, the Chair understands?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the bill now in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now in the Senate. By unanimous consent the amendment will be received.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment is in order if the bill is in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be stated if there be no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment agreed to the words "and Sioux City, Iowa," so as to read:

Of which one-half, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, at Atchison, Fort Leavenworth reservation, Arrow Rock, in Kansas; and Omaha, Plattsmouth, Eastport, and Brownsville, in Nebraska and Iowa, and Sioux City, in Iowa.

Mr. VEST. Arrow Rock, Missouri.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to my colleague that he modify his amendment so as to insert the words "at Sioux City" between the words "and" and "Iowa" at the conclusion of the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will modify it in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must inform the Senate that the amendment can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I supposed so, and I understood that unanimous consent was given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment as modified is before the Senate, and the question is on its adoption.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have a formal amendment to offer to section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must inform the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that the bill is now in the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. And subject to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can only be amended by additions at the end of the bill, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLER. Why so?

Mr. McMILLAN. The bill, I understand, is subject to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is subject to amendment, but subject to amendment only by way of addition. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole has been concurred in as a whole in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. These are formal amendments.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to be informed by the Chair whether an amendment proposed by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole has any greater or different rights or any other position than an amendment proposed to the Senate by a standing or special committee. I understand the Committee of the Whole is no more than the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on the Judiciary or any other committee, and it proposes to the Senate a certain amendment.

Mr. PLATT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. It has been agreed to in committee.

Mr. FRYE. It has been agreed to in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the amendment was offered as in Committee of the Whole as one amendment, and that amendment was amended from time to time by the committee of the whole body. The amendment as amended in Committee of the Whole has been reported to the Senate and concurred in.

Mr. HOAR. In the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the Senate; so that now, as the present occupant of the chair understands, no amendment can be made to the amendment which has been reported to the Senate except as an addition at the end of the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. That is true. I understood the Chair to state the question on the adoption of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair is quite right.

Mr. McMILLAN. Section 3 of the bill as reported from the committee was stricken out, so that will render necessary a change of the numbering of the sections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The clerks do that.

Mr. McMILLAN. In addition to that, section 5 is referred to in other sections of the bill, and by the striking out of section 3 and the change of numbers it will be necessary to change that reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, asks that the amendments indicated by him may be made. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendments will be stated.

Mr. McMILLAN. In line 455 I move to strike out the word "five" and insert the word "four."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. In line 585 I move to strike out the word "five" and insert "four."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. If there are any other references of this kind in the bill I ask that the clerks be authorized to change the references.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done as a matter of course.

Mr. CONGER. By a mistake there was left out in the bill, among the places to be surveyed, Hunting Creek, Virginia, to come in after line 29 of section 2. I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that amendment will be received.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it?

Mr. CONGER. It is merely a survey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

Mr. CONGER. It places Hunting Creek, Virginia, among the surveys coming in after line 29 of section 2.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 29 of section 2 insert:

Hunting Creek, Virginia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am willing to have that inserted, considering the name of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to make an alteration in line 425 of the bill as reported, which is a mistake of the printer or of the clerks in copying.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In line 425 of the Senate amendment?

Mr. MILLER. Of the Senate amendment. As agreed to in the committee $15,000 was increased to $18,000, and in the same line the word "two" should be "three." The bill as passed by the House appropriated $15,000 for the improvement of the Narrows at Lake Champlain, and the Senate committee agreed to amend it by increasing the amount to $18,000, and saying, "of which $3,000 may be used to remove Ferris Rock, Lake Champlain."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that a committee amendment?

Mr. MILLER. That is a committee amendment, and was agreed to at the time. I desire to have the amendment made now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to have the amendment made proposed by him. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 425 strike out "fifteen" and insert "eighteen" before the word "thousand," and in the same line strike out the word "two" and insert "three" before "thousand;" so as to read:

Improving Narrows at Lake Champlain, New York, from Benson, Vt., to canal locks at Whitehall, N. Y., $18,000, of which $3,000 may be used to remove Ferris Rock, Lake Champlain.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. In line 87 of the bill as reported to the Senate I desire to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$15,000." I must apologize to the Senate and to the committee. This is a mistake of my own. The matter was called to my attention as a member of the committee, and I overlooked the papers. The appropriation for that point asked for this year was $76,000. The rule of the committee upon all important points was to give one-quarter of the amount estimated and asked for. One-quarter would be nearly $20,000, but I proposed to ask the committee at that point for $15,000.

I need not take up the time of the Senate in regard to the importance of the point. Rouse's Point is the entrance from Lake Champlain into the Saint John's River, and is in the direct line of communication with the Saint Lawrence River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to have the report of the engineer as to the estimate read, to see whether this is still 25 per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the discussion goes further the Chair will ask whether there is any objection to considering the amendment. It can only be received and considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will hear it explained first.

Mr. MILLER. In the report made by the committee on pages 35 and 36 (it is unnecessary perhaps to read it) the importance of this port is shown by the fact of the imports and exports this year. It will be remembered by all the Senate that Rouse's Point is on the border between the State of New York and Canada. It is a port of export and of import. The exports and imports of that port last year were nearly $4,000,000. The estimates of the engineer call for $76,000 for the present year. One-quarter of that amount would have been within the rule of the committee, but the papers which came into my hand were mislaid at the time and I overlooked the matter. I now ask for this correction. The amount asked for, $15,000, is not one-quarter of the estimate of the engineer, but I shall not ask for any more than that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I understand from the chairman of the committee, I feel bound to withhold my assent to this amendment. The chairman of the committee states that while the local engineer estimated that he could expend $76,000 with profit to somebody during the next fiscal year, the Chief of Engineers cut it down to $30,000, 25 per cent. of which would be the $7,500 that the committee has reported, putting it on the same scale with the others.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is the amount fixed in the bill as passed by the other House. We did not change it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am speaking of what the chairman of the committee has stated to me, and if wrong he will please correct me.

Now, at Burlington, Vt., where the annual receipts of customs amounts to nearly if not quite $1,000,000—I have forgotten the amount—on the same principle of 25 per cent., $12,500 were given in the bill as passed by the House, and the matter being explained to me by the committee, that they were only going to give 25 per cent., I made no objection and no request; and so it stands at $12,500. If the 25 per cent. rule is to be departed from in Lake Champlain, it ought to be departed from at Burlington if anywhere, for the lake is at its widest point there and the breakwater is an indispensable necessity to commerce. At Rouse's Point, the very foot of the lake, where the river runs out of it into the Saint Lawrence, the width of it within 5 miles southward is not 2 miles, and therefore the danger from winds is infinitely smaller.

I do not object at all to the Rouse's Point appropriation. It is all right as these things go; but I do not think my honorable friend from New York ought to take it out of the 25 per cent. rule. According to the statement of the chairman of the committee, it is left as the committee has reported it on the 25 per cent. rule, and I must therefore object to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the Senator will not object to this, for certainly——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that objection is made to the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator from New York will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Vermont objects to the consideration of the amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to hearing the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. Before the Senator objects I desire him to hear me. The committee, instead of taking the estimates of the Chief of Engineers and making it a rule that one-quarter of his estimates should govern and control, took the estimates as a rule of the local engineer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see.

Mr. FRYE. In Burlington, Vt., the estimate of the local engineer was only $39,000, and Burlington received considerably more than one-quarter of $39,000, because the Chief of Engineers increased the estimate to $50,000. Burlington, Vt., received a great deal more than a quarter of the local engineer's estimate, by which we were very largely governed.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the Senator from Vermont will withdraw his objection, and look a little further into this matter. I am very sure that he does not desire to curtail this work.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not.

Mr. MILLER. He knows the importance of it quite as well as I do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I desire to do the right thing and to have fair play, and if I am wrong in what has been stated, then I should withdraw my objection; but if my friend will look at the report of the committee on page 9, in respect to the harbor at Burlington, Vt., he will see it is stated:

> This is the most important harbor on the eastern coast of Lake Champlain. The city of Burlington, which is situated on this harbor, has, according to the census of 1880, a population of over 11,000.
> Commercial statistics for the year ending December 31, 1885.

Description.	Arrivals.		Departures.
	Number.	Tonnage.	Number.	Tonnage.
Steamers	989	419,149	989	419,149
Sailing vessels	36	4,013	36	4,013
Vessels in tow (barges)	182	24,045	156	21,434
Total	1,207	447,207	1,181	444,596

Then when we come over to what my friend from Maine has stated as the estimate of the local engineer, I find on page 10 this:

Total amount appropriated for this work to date	$501,922 20
Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project	203,000 00
Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1888	100,000 00

So on the 25 per cent. of the estimate of the local engineer there should have been put in by the committee, $25,000 instead of $12,500.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, the committee had prepared for their own use a table, and the Senator will see that the gentleman who prepared that table has made a mistake. The estimate is put at $39,748, when it should have been $100,000, and if the Senator from Vermont had asked the increase to 25 per cent. it would have been made by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but I did not look at the papers. I took the statement of the committee, as I do always, as they will bear we witness, with confidence and with respect and obedience; and when the committee told me that on the 25 per cent. theory all that could be given to this work at Burlington, Vt., was $12,500, I said, "That is enough; I do not ask anything out of the line of the rest of you."

Mr. FRYE. The Senator will see where we made the mistake. I certainly should not have the slightest objection to Burlington, Vt., being increased to 25 per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]?

Mr. MILLER. I ask the Senator from Vermont to withdraw his objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw it for the time being.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 87, before the word "dollars," strike out "seven thousand five hundred" and insert "fifteen thousand;" so as to read:

> Improving breakwater at Rouse's Point, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Now, I move to increase the appropriation for the harbor at Burlington, Vt., to $25,000, and I want to state my reasons.

I may as well say here in regard to the 25 per cent. rule, that it is not correct to state that the committee in all cases made the appropriations 25 per cent. of the estimates of the engineers, because in a number of important cases we increased it to at least 50 per cent. of the estimate of the engineers, depending on the importance of the work and upon its liability to damage by the elements if it was not completed; but we attempted in making the appropriations to the various States to keep within the 25 per cent. limit for each State. For instance, in the State of New York a large proportion of the items in the bill are not increased at all, and do not amount to more than 10 or 15 per cent. of the estimate of the engineers; but upon the important works in the State of New York in many cases we increased the appropriation to 50 or 60 per cent. of the estimate of the engineers, intending to make the appropriations, for instance, for the whole State of New York average about 25 per cent. of the total estimate, and we attempted to carry that through this bill, of course not making it absolute in each individual State, but relying on the importance of the work itself and upon its liability to damage. In the State of Vermont, of course, there are not many appropriations, and the appropriation for Burlington is by all odds the most important, and it should have been increased and given the full limit in the committee. Why it was not, I do not know. Therefore, I move that the appropriation for Burlington, Vt., be made $25,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be received.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 28, after the word "improvement," it is proposed to strike out "twelve thousand five hundred," and insert "twenty-five thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

> Improving harbor at Burlington, Vt.: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment can only be received by unanimous consent. There is no objection to receiving it, the Chair understands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALTHALL. I offer an amendment providing for a survey. I move to add to section 2:

> Survey of Bogue Phalia, in Mississippi, especially the part known as The Narrows.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be received.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to call attention for a moment to the amendment that was made about line 1025 or 1026. As the bill now stands as amended Arrow Rock is described as being in the State of Kansas. It is in Missouri, and I suggest that, inasmuch as the names of the towns are all well known, to avoid confusion, the names of the States be omitted by unanimous consent.

Mr. VAN WYCK. There is no objection to that.

Mr. McMILLAN. That would be better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that part of the bill will be so amended.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the indulgence of the Senate a moment to offer a provision putting in two surveys for New York, which have come to me from members of the other House. After line 50 of section 2, I move to insert as new items:

> Rockaway Inlet, New York.
> Fort Pond Bay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment will be received.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment to this bill, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. RANSOM were appointed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10397) making aprropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. GORMAN.

NICARAGUA MARITIME CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2636) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Vermont to allow this bill to be informally laid aside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can not do it. I deem it to be a public duty to have the Senate pass on this question. I can not yield to anybody.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendments of the Committee on Foreign Relations will be stated.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to move an amendment that was presented in regard to the Tehuantepec ship-railway bill. I wish to get the section as to the subscriptions to the stock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been read at length.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read again. It is some time since it was read.

The bill was read.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 19, after the word "made," to insert "or to be made to them, or those to whom they may succeed;" so as to read:

That Frederick Billings, Charles P. Daly, H. L. Hotchkiss, Francis A. Stout, W. B. Franklin, Daniel Ammen, William L. Merry, Horace Davis, Edward F. Beale, James H. McMullen, Sheppard Homans, and all those persons who are or may be associated with them, and their successors, are hereby created a body corporate under the name and style of the "Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua," by which name said company may sue or be sued, may defend and be defended, in all courts of law and equity within the United States, may have a common seal, and generally may have and possess the rights and privileges usually possessed by similar companies, and may receive, purchase, hold, and convey such real estate and personal estate as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act, and may do all lawful things to secure the full enjoyment of the powers, privileges, rights, benefits, and grants contained in any canal concession made or to be made to them, or to those to whom they may succeed by the Republic of Nicaragua.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator who reports this bill whether there is not now existing an American company, chartered by either Congress or one of the States, that is engaged in this work or has a contract for its completion, and if so, what effect upon any rights or interests of that company this charter may have?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no company chartered by Congress having this matter in charge. How many different speculators have taken out State charters under general State law organizations I do not know; but I am informed and believe that the Republic of Nicaragua recognizes no existing right on the part of anybody to build this canal there, whatever her concessions may have been hitherto, except as they exist in a treaty which I believe has been made public, and is still open between the two countries upon the subject.

Mr. HOAR. I was spoken to about five minutes ago by an eminent member of the House of Representatives, who informed me that there was a company, composed of neighbors and friends of his, who had a contract and had taken steps to proceed in the execution of this work, who were entitled to the protection of the Government of the United States in their rights, who had a contract with the Republic of Nicaragua. I am not myself informed upon the subject-matter, and I should like to inquire whether the committee have so informed themselves as to be able to tell us whether that company has rights which the American Government is bound to protect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state that the members of the committee received from, I think, two different sets of people who called themselves State corporations——

Mr. HOAR. What States?

Mr. EDMUNDS. One the State of New York and perhaps both.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman who spoke to me was from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would not imply that he had a Pennsylvania charter, necessarily. I think I remember that both the sets of people who sent papers to us were people who said that they, under the general laws of New York, were incorporated and that they had contracts, not with the Republic of Nicaragua, but with certain iron-workers in Pennsylvania—that is probably what my friend refers to—to supply in a certain contingency a certain amount of material for a canal that they expected to build.

But the committee is well informed, as we were when we had the other matter about the United States doing for the Republic of Nicaragua, and the State Department was then well informed that the old supposed concessions of the Republic of Nicaragua had entirely and fairly expired, and that that Republic was then and now under no obligation whatever to anybody, except to the Government of the United States under existing negotiations.

Mr. VEST. I know nothing about any corporation created under State authority in regard to the Nicaragua Canal; but I have before me now a charter granted by Nicaragua to the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company, which corporation was created under the authority of the State of Nicaragua with perpetual succession, and with the absolute and exclusive right to construct a canal across that isthmus. The cession provides in so many words that this right shall be exclusive. Article 32 of this concession reads:

The State also binds itself to protect and defend the company—

in the full enjoyment of the rights and privileges granted in this contract, and also binds itself not to contract with or cede to any government, individual, or companies whatsoever the right of constructing a ship-canal, railroad, or any other communcation across its territory, between the two oceans, or the right of navigating, by means of steam vessels, any of its rivers or lakes which may be occupied by the company while this contract continues in force.

I suppose that every Senator has received a pamphlet from Admiral Ammen, who claims that the State of Nicaragua has rescinded this concession, and who has published in this pamphlet a letter from Señor Cardenas, at that time, I believe, president of Nicaragua, in which he says that this company has ceased to exist. Personally, as a matter of course, I know nothing about the facts; but I know that a gentleman named Blackman, who brought to me letters from some of the most responsible men in New York, and who claims to be the president of this American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-canal Company, states that he is the president of this company; that the company has expended $10,000,000 in surveys and work in Nicaragua, and that their concession is still in full force. I have here and will ask the Secretary to read the opinion of Messrs. Lowrey & Porter, one of the most eminent legal firms in the city of New York, I believe, who state that in their judgment this concession is still in full force and valid, and that the rights granted originally to this company by the State of Nicaragua still exist. I have not had time to go through all the documents because they are very voluminous, but I will ask the Secretary to read that opinion, and I will ask the Senator from New York to state what is the legal standing of this firm of Lowrey & Porter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OPINION OF MESSRS. LOWREY & PORTER.

We have examined the question submitted by John E. Body, esq., president of the Central American Transit Company, and are of the opinion that the right conferred upon the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-canal Company by the Republic of Nicaragua in the contract between that republic and the company to build a ship-canal across the territory of the republic survives unimpaired in favor of that company.

Before entering upon a very brief statement of the grounds for this opinion, it is proper to say that the character of the contracting parties, and the importance to the commerce of the world of the concessions and stipulations made between them unite to take these questions out of the sphere of technical law and bring them within the influence of those broad rules of morality which are supposed to underlie international law, and to govern in all cases where, a nation being a party, conscience can alone be appealed to by the other party for redress in case of wrong or misunderstanding.

The American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company was a partnership composed of American citizens. In 1849 it entered into a contract in the State of Nicaragua, by which the State granted to it the exclusive right and privilege of constructing a ship-canal across its territory, together with the right to make use of its rivers, waters, and lands, public and private, for the purpose of a canal.

This important contract was first signed on the part of Nicaragua by authorized commissioners and the secretary of foreign relations, and afterwards ratified and adopted by a formal act of the national legislature.

The term of the grant was eighty-five years (article 4), and the conditions essential to be considered were that preliminary surveys were to be begun within twelve months, and the work to be completed in twelve years, allowance being made for interruption by events beyond the control of the company, such as epidemics, wars, &c.

By the same contract the State bound itself to protect and defend the company in the full enjoyment of its rights and privileges, and not to make any similar contract or other cession to any other company, person, or government during the continuance of this contract.

Without remarking upon intermediate transactions and events, we find that in 1857 an amendatory or supplementary contract was entered into. Various grounds for the amendments made are stated by the Government of Nicaragua in the decree promulgating the contract, amongst which it is stated that it has been ascertained and determined by competent and thorough examination, made by competent engineers, that a canal of the dimensions required in the aforesaid articles (article 1 of the contract of 1849) can not be constructed because of a want of sufficient depth of water in the Lake of Nicaragua.

To this declaration, whether true or false, the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company was not privy, so far as we have any evidence.

The terms of the supplementary contract on the subject were as follows:

"The obligation to construct the canal on the part of the company is dispensed with." (Article 1.)

A new method of effecting transit was provided, but in all respects except as changed, modified, and dispensed with the former contract remained to govern the relation of the parties.

It is therefore clear that the right to build the canal granted by the contract of 1849 was not abrogated by the contract of 1857. The Government of Nicaragua having the right like any contracting party to waive performance of a condition in its favor, dispenses with the obligation, thus leaving the company still free to claim its right or accept the dispensation.

By a later contract of 1861 the Central American Transit Company is authorized by the Government of Nicaragua to be organized by persons composing the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company, and certain rights and privileges, which have come to be known as "transit" rights as distinguishable from "canal" rights, are conferred upon the associates in their new capacity and, as it would appear, abandoned in their old. No reference is made to the outstanding canal rights, except that a saving clause is put in to guard the grant against a collision of the canal rights of the old company or other parties with the transit right then being given to the new company.

The clause referred to appears in two contracts subsequent to 1857, and substantially as follows in each:

"If the government of the republic should be a party to any contract or convention which now exists for the construction of a maritime canal across its territory, and the duration of the rights and privileges stipulated for in the present contract shall be incompatible with the terms and conditions of said contract or convention, in such case the rights and privileges stipulated for in the present contract shall only last until the complete execution of the work of the maritime canal, according to the terms and conditions of said contract or convention."

This language shows very clearly that it was understood by the lawyers advising the Nicaraguan Government that the canal rights of the company had survived the mutations which had overtaken their contract in other respects.

The letter of the Nicaragua minister, Mr. Irisarri, referred to by Mr. Body, gives similar evidence.

In answer to Mr. Body's question, we are further of opinion—

First. That there is no mode under the canal contract of 1849, and of the amendments thereto, of settling differences except by arbitration, as there provided, and the decisions and annulments made or attempted to be made by the republic are void.

Secondly. That the thirty-seventh article of the primary contract is a covenant in favor of the Government of Nicaragua, which it had the right to waive, and did afterwards waive by allowing the persons composing the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company to organize themselves under their new name, and treating with it under that new name.

JOHN K. PORTER.
GROSVENOR P. LOWREY.

NEW YORK, September 1, 1871.

Mr. VEST. That is the opinion of a firm of lawyers in the city of New York, very well known to be exceedingly able. Their deliberate opinion is that this concession from Nicaragua is still in existence. I know very well that Mr. Frelinghuysen, the late Secretary of State, claimed that this concession had been terminated by a subsequent contract between Nicaragua and this company, but the company, as will be seen from an examination of that opinion, claim that the contract made after 1850, which was the date of this concession, referred only to the rights of a company known as the Transit Company, and that it did not rescind the original concession, which was made to the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company.

As a matter of course, Admiral Ammen has declared that the contract in question was at an end, and that this company was composed of a lot of adventurers without capital and without responsibility. I know nothing about them except that Mr. Blackman, whose name is signed as president of the company, was introduced to me by a member of the House of Representatives, and that he brought me letters from entirely responsible gentlemen stating that he was a man of character and of credibility. Mr. Blackman asserts that the pamphlet of Admiral Ammen is got up in the interest of a rival project for the purpose of putting an end, if possible, to the concession which was granted in 1850 by Nicaragua.

Every member of this company, the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company, is a citizen of the United States, and Mr. Blackman is here now appealing to Congress not to pass any act which prejudges the rights of the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company, and which, in the face of the opinion of these eminent lawyers and in the face, as they claim, of the record, says to these gentlemen: "The Congress of the United States deliberately declares that you have no concession from Nicaragua, and will now proceed to incorporate another company."

I will not detain the Senate by having all these papers read. Here is the act of incorporation of this American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company from the State of Nicaragua. Here is their contract for the construction of the work. Here is a mortgage executed by this company to John J. Cisco for $100,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. When was the concession made?

Mr. VEST. In 1850.

Mr. TELLER. What have they done since?

Mr. VEST. They claim that they have expended $10,000,000; they claim that they have made the most elaborate surveys; that they have contracts now in existence, and one of them with a Pennsylvania company, an entirely responsible company, the Phœnix Iron Company, and the Senator from Pennsylvania can say whether that is a myth or not——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator the New York charter?

Mr. VEST. No, I have not seen any New York charter. I have a charter here from the State of Nicaragua. For these statements I am not at all responsible. This gentleman came to me as he had a right to do as a citizen of the United States, and he claimed that he was president of an entirely reputable company, with an office in the city of New York, and that they are now the possessors of this valid concession from Nicaragua.

I propose further in the argument to use this information and these papers to point one single contention on my part, which is that the Congress of the United States should not grant an act of incorporation when these conflicting claims are brought to their notice; that as between American citizens, this company being composed entirely of citizens of the United States, and another company composed also of citizens of the United States, it is manifestly improper, unjust, and inequitable for us, without due and full examination and hearing of both parties, to prejudge and determine their respective rights.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator believe that this company has spent $10,000,000, or 10 per cent of it?

Mr. VEST. I have no belief about it; I simply give the statement for what it is worth. I am assured by a member of the other House that he has visited their office in the city of New York and seen there the plans and profiles, and that he was satisfied that it was a bona fide company, and that they had expended a large amount of money. As a matter of course I have no knowledge on the subject.

Mr. TELLER. Have they any work done? Has this company ever done any work?

Mr. VEST. I understand from the company that they have. I understand from the president of the company that they have made an exhaustive survey and an expensive one. I understand that they have made contracts for a large amount of material, and for two thousand men to be put to work upon the canal, and that they would have been put to work some time ago but for the interference of this Menocal Company, as I hold it to be, in which Admiral Ammen is interested, and which comes here now for an act of incorporation from the Government of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the Senate, but I feel it to be a duty to say one or two things.

In the first place, I deny that the United States are to be in any way affected by whatever may be the rights and interests of any New York or any other State corporation or Nicaraguan corporation in respect of this matter. All that this company, if it is chartered by Congress, can do must be done conformably to the laws of the state of Nicaragua. If there are conflicting rights by a later grant by Nicaragua than the one that my friend from Missouri speaks of, it is for Nicaragua to settle, the United States seeing, as she would with all other nations, as we would with Mexico in respect of the Eads business, that all the citizens of the United States had fair play, according to the laws and the judgments of the tribunals of that country.

I deny that any State can cut off the right of this nation to incorporate a company to do something that a State has already incorporated a company to do.

Second, I wish to state that when the Nicaragua treaty for the United States building this canal was under negotiation, these same pretensions of these people who had failed for thirty-five years to do whatever their concession authorized them to do were brought forward when the Republic of Nicaragua was ready and did negotiate a treaty with the United States to accomplish this object through the direct action of the two Governments. These pretensions were then brought forward; they were thoroughly examined by the President of the United States and the Secretary of State, and were found in their opinion to have no foundation whatever either in morals or in law; and accordingly the treaty was negotiated, both Governments holding that these pretensions of this thirty-five years' old alleged concession had no longer any existence either in law or in morals, whatever might have been the case in the first place. The papers that are now presented are papers which were prepared and were considered on that very subject a year and a half or two years ago, in the beginning of 1885.

If I did not know the patriotism and sincerity of my friend from Missouri, I should suppose that he had been overreached and misled by the same body of people who undertook to levy contributions from the United States as the price of the negotiation of that treaty and set up these old pretensions again in order to defeat any action by Congress in respect of what I consider to be the most important business national affair with which we have been engaged since we had that treaty under consideration before.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to state that Mr. Blackman and his associates were trying to levy blackmail on the United States in regard to a treaty with Nicaragua?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Missouri understood me to say exactly what I did say. I said nothing about blackmail, but I said I was then informed and I believed that the people who were setting up this same thing—whether they were the same names I do not know, they may have changed hands twenty times since; I do not remember their names—undertook to tell the Secretary of State that if he would withhold the $750,000, or whatever it was that they were to have, then they would consent that that treaty might be negotiated. But it stood upon that State charter, and I presume it is this very one.

Mr. VEST. I think that the Senator from Vermont is utterly mistaken about these people, whom I do not know, being those who wanted part of the $750,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be.

Mr. VEST. These people do not claim any charter from a State. Mr. Blackman is president of this company, and I have always understood—I may be mistaken—that they made no claim for any amount of money; but that came from an entirely different source.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be; but the Senator will perceive that this very paper that he is reading from is dated "New York, 24th of September, 1885." The action of the President and of Secretary Frelinghuysen is referred to in it, and I do not know but that it was originally addressed to them. I can not tell, but the whole of this subject of whatever the State of Nicaragua had hitherto done was brought to the attention of the President and his Cabinet and was repudiated on all hands. Whether these particular gentlemen were the people who wanted to have their charter rights, as they claimed them, provided for, I do not know. I am not talking about blackmail. That is the Senator's phrase. I am not drawing any implications as to what it might amount to, because that is a question of definition. But people came forward representing that Nicaragua had theretofore granted them concessions which would be overridden by the treaty between the two governments which was then under negotiation and which I believe I may state publicly, for I think the injunction was taken off—certainly the President has referred to it in his message—provided for the two governments doing it. The whole matter was then exhaustively examined—I have forgotten the details of it—but the whole subject of the rights of everybody was gone through with and the negotiation went on upon the ground that the two governments thought there was no pretension either of morals or of law which allowed anybody to interfere with the action of the two governments in regard to it.

Mr. VEST. It is very certain, Mr. President, that at the time when the treaty with Nicaragua was pending in the Senate these persons, or persons who claimed this concession from Nicaragua and an act of incorporation from Nicaragua, appeared and protested against what is known as the Frelinghuysen treaty, which was afterward defeated by the Senate; and it is within my personal knowledge and that of every Senator who has paid any attention to this question at all that there has never been a day or an hour in which these people have not set up this claim and in which they have not appeared here before the committees of Congress and before individual members of Congress and protested against the Frelinghuysen treaty and protested against the act of incorporation proposed since.

As to the offer of $750,000, it is not my impression that that came from these people. They certainly never have pretended, so far as I know, that they held an act of incorporation from any State of the Union, but only this act of incorporation from the state of Nicaragua. I do recollect distinctly a claim of $4,000,000, which was made on the United States as a portion of the Frelinghuysen treaty. I recollect that conditions were placed upon that treaty, but the treaty was defeated, or withdrawn by the President of the United States.

So far as these people are concerned, the only point is whether they have at any time waived this concession. As a matter of law, I have read the opinion of this eminent firm in New York to the effect that they have not waived the concession and have not given it up, and I ask the Secretary now to read a communication from the president of this company. He requests to have it read as a citizen of the United States in order to show the contention of the company that he represents in regard to their rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE AMERICAN ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC SHIP-CANAL COMPANY (NICARAGUA CANAL).

WASHINGTON BUILDING, No. 1 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, June 30, 1886.

SIR: The attention of this company has been called to the matter of the introduction "by request" in the Congress of the United States of a bill to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, and the reference of said bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Against the consideration and passage by Congress of said above bill to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company respectfully urge its earnest and most emphatic protest. The grounds for this action are as follows, to wit:

I. The American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company most respectfully beg to state to your honorable committee that the said The American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company is a legally organized corporation, having a charter of perpetual succession, granted, enacted, and decreed by the Government of the Republic of Nicaragua. The principal office of the company is in New York.

II. The State of Nicaragua granted under contract, decree, and charter, to said American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company the exclusive right and privilege to construct, own, and manage a ship-canal across the territory of said State from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

III. Eminent counsel have given opinion "that the right conferred upon the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company by the Republic of Nicaragua in the contract between that republic and the company to build a ship-canal across the territory of the republic survives unimpaired in favor of that company."

IV. The location of the line of the canal as adopted and fixed by this company is as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point at or near the port of Greytown, on the Atlantic Ocean, in the Republic of Nicaragua, and running thence in a general westerly direction to the River San Juan; thence up and with the course of said river, passing into the Lake Nicaragua, through the said lake, and thence by a canal cut into the Rio Grande, thence by the valley of the said Rio Grande to a point at or near the Port of Brito, on the Pacific Ocean, in said State of Nicaragua.

V. This company has heretofore expended large sums of money upon this work, in the improvement of the San Juan River, the construction of houses, the building of highways from the lake to the Pacific Ocean at San Juan del Sur, &c.; and this company is now daily expending sums of money in the necessary preparations for the immediate commencement and early completion of its ship-canal across the territory of Nicaragua.

VI. This company have recently made contracts with entirely responsible contractors for the construction of all of the locks, gates, valves, and machinery for operating the same, for all the warehouses, stations, piers, docks, wharves, bridges, iron-work, and railway to be constructed in connection with the canal; and has also made a contract for the construction of the western division of its ship-canal extending from the lake to the Pacific Ocean. Contracts for over one-half of the work of constructing the canal have been let to entirely responsible contractors.

VII. Active work on the canal will be begun by the engineers of this company in Nicaragua as soon as the chief engineers can organize for their different departments of the work.

VIII. In order to provide sufficient funds for the construction of its ship-canal the company has found it necessary to borrow money upon the first mortgage bonds of this company, and for that purpose the company has authorized and issued $100,000,000 of first mortgage bonds of this company; these bonds have in part been delivered to the subscribers and owners thereof; and to fully provide for the repayment of said bonds at maturity, this company has legally executed and delivered to the trustee, who has received the same and undertaken to execute the trust thereby reposed in him, a deed of mortgage for $100,000,000, which is made a first lien and mortgage upon the ship-canal, franchise, rights, and all the property of this company situated and being in said State of Nicaragua.

IX. This company beg further to state that the proposed so-called Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua and the parties named as corporators are simply interlopers, who are trying to deprive the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company of its right of way and its exclusive right to construct and manage its ship-canal across the territory of Nicaragua and its vested rights of property, which has cost this company large sums of money laboriously and honestly expended in this work and for these purposes.

X. The so-called proposed Maritime Canal Company are seeking an act of incorporation from the United States Congress to give said parties a quasi standing before the public, which, in the face of the priority and exclusive right of the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company, they otherwise would not have.

XI. As simple act of justice the bill to incorporate the proposed so-called Maritime Canal Company should be withdrawn or defeated. These parties should not be allowed to interfere with a legitimate company who are making progress in this great work, and who have exclusive and inalienable rights to said property of said ship-canal across the territory of Nicaragua.

XII. The American Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Canal Company have an abiding faith in the integrity of the Congress of the United States, and this company does not believe that Congress will ever pass an act which has for its objects and purposes robbery and spoliation of American citizens, and which would disregard the treaty obligations of the United States with a great and friendly nation.

XIII. This company finally begs to state that the United States and Great Britain are joint treaty guarantors to the protection of this company during the time it is engaged in the construction of its ship-canal, as and in the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty made between those two Governments on the 19th day of April, 1850.

The company have the honor to be your most obedient servant.

THE AMERICAN ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC SHIP-CANAL COMPANY, [SEAL.] By A. L. BLACKMAN, President.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, the discussion between the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Missouri starts a memory and suggests a question. Nearly three years ago we had under discussion a proposition to appropriate $250,000 to be paid to some body in Nicaragua for the purpose of some canal. May I ask which one of these projects that $250,000 was intended for? Does the Senator from Vermont recollect that circumstance?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not either of them as far as I recollect.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That $250,000 was not intended for either of these schemes. Every time we discuss the project of a canal to connect the two oceans, or a ship-railway to connect the two oceans, it is said we must do it at once because the opportunity is slipping away. I remember when this $250,000 proposition was to be paid out of the Treasury for the benefit of some canal in Nicaragua—I do not know whether it would be in order now to say what took place in executive session three years after it passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it would be.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Not in order. I supposed the Senator would say that, and I presume the Chair concurs in the opinion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORGAN. You may speak of what occurred in legislative session.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If it is not proper three years afterward to refer to what occurred in executive session, then I will refer to the current history of those times as it appeared in the newspapers. I suppose that is in order.

That is the memory which is started by this discussion. I remember we were told then there was a concession, so the papers stated, for some purpose in Nicaragua just slipping our grasp. I think it ran out in the following October, we were told.

There was a great Nicaragua concession. It was hugely important. Patriotism bubbled all over; generosity and humanity were invoked for the benefit of mankind, as usual on such occasions; and we must secure it at once. Here was this great concession, and the Treasury must be put under subjection again to pay out the amount of $250,000. For what? The public tried to find out. For what? For this concession, and we were immediately plunged into the dark and hidden recesses of a secret session on this subject, which was not to be discussed before the American people; and yet it was a proposition which affected the people in their business relations, a canal through Nicaragua, and only wanted $250,000 to be taken out of the Treasury. The people should know, but no, that would not do.

Mr. President, it may be well to look back. That was only three years ago. That concession was slipping away. The Senate voted it in its liberality on that occasion the $250,000, but I think it was defeated in the other House, if my recollection serves me. Now I am anxious to know to what that applied. There was a sensation. We were called upon to pay $250,000. Now we have two projects here. The Senator from Vermont says that the $250,000 applied to neither of these, neither to his bill nor to the incorporation which the Senator from Missouri refers to. Is there another? Will some member of the Committee on Foreign Relations tell us whether there was another Nicaragua scheme at that time, three years ago? Does the recollection of the Senator from Vermont serve him as to that point, whether there was another Nicaragua scheme at that time that we were called upon to pay $250,000 for? The Senator from Massachusetts, I believe, does not remember any other Nicaraguan scheme.

Mr. HOAR. My memory is so bad that I do not remember anything about it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator is so very familiar with getting across mountains and valleys and rivers between the Atlantic and the Pacific that I supposed he would probably remember how many schemes there were to dig through the mountains and get landed on the sweet Pacific.

Well, I will read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is instructive, I know. Let us see whether we can get any information there. Who are the projectors, friends, and advocates of these various schemes? It seems the one my friend from Missouri talks about is only half a century old, and he remembers all about that; but the scheme of three years ago, the Foreign Relations Committee, and the friends of all these great projects do not remember. My friend from Missouri, in view of the national greatness of the United States involved in his favorite scheme for a ship-railway at Tehuantepec, was willing to let it go without protection to the stockholders or the bondholders. Now, it may refresh gentlemen's recollection probably if we go back three years, because when we were called upon to make a contribution of a quarter of a million dollars to help somebody or help something it was so important that it must be done at once. And yet it has drifted away from the memory of everybody in the Senate who had any interest in it.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 615 the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted the following clause:

"To meet the necessary expenses attendant upon foreign intercourse, to be expended under the direction of the President, pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

It was pretty well hidden here under circumlocution and as to the law under which it was to be applied.

Mr. VEST. An examination of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bills in the previous history of the Government will develop the fact that antecedent to this time the largest appropriation ever made to meet the expenses to be incurred under the direction of the President in the execution of the neutrality act has been $20,000. This appropriation reaches the amount of $250,000. It is an extraordinary appropriation. It is due to the country and to the Senate that the Committee on Appropriations should state before the American public why this enormous amount, in proportion, or relatively, is now asked at the hands of the representatives of the people.

I undertake to say in my place in the Senate that for the execution of the neutrality act this amount is not to be appropriated as it has been in former appropriation acts. I undertake to say that upon the contrary it is for an extraordinary purpose, and it is due to the Senate that the chairman of the committee should state what that purpose really and honestly is. I call upon the chairman of the committee to make that statement. What is the real purpose of this appropriation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to propose the following amendment, to come in at the end of the committee amendment:

"But no portion of said $250,000 shall be paid directly or through the Nicaraguan Government to the owners of a concession granted to the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua."

What is the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua? That was the amendment. Now, I may be excused for referring to these concessions. Who would have believed that any legislative body on earth, when a proposition of that kind was made, would attempt to hedge by getting into a secret session?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I move to lay that amendment on the table.

My amendment—

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

Several SENATORS. It is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What was the motion?

Mr. ALLISON. I moved to lay that amendment on the table.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Nebraska had taken his seat.

Mr. INGALLS. I saw him take his seat.

[Laughter.]

It is amusing because the American Senate have forgotten three years, and see the sort of performance to get matters which should be openly discussed and known to the nation, hidden away in a hole in the wall in secret session.

Mr VAN WYCK. I desire to know——

Mr. INGALLS and others. Order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take care of the question. The Senator from Iowa was recognized, and the Senator from Iowa moved to lay the amendment on the table. With what object does the Senator from Nebraska rise?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I had the floor and offered the amendment. I offered the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. VAN WYCK. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska had yielded the floor.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion for a few moments.

Of course that would not be done; and then a vote was taken; and I see I voted "ay" with the gentlemen. Then this followed:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his motion?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa declines to withdraw the motion to lay on the table. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the motion?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I voted "ay" on this motion, and I desire now to make a motion for a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Mr. ALLISON rose.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not yield the floor just at this moment, I say to my friend from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair entertains the Senator's motion.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My motion is to reconsider the vote just taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. MORRILL. It is subject to the same rule, however.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have the floor, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a privileged question, a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will state his question of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this question under Rule XXXV.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I second the motion.

And thereupon the doors were closed under Rule XXXV, and the matter was considered in secret session.

How now? It seems my amendment was to prevent this $250,000 from being appropriated to the Nicaraguan Government and to the owners of a concession granted to the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua. That was where we stood three years ago. Which is the project that applied to? If that name is not in some of these bills it is remarkable. We were then told that the only thing to save that concession was to vote $250,000 out of the Treasury. Fortunately the House prevented its being voted, and therefore we saved the $250,000, and it seems the concession has not gone yet. Is that the name of either of the two companies who appear here to-day? That establishes that point.

Then another very remarkable fact. The Senate went into secret session on that amendment, and when we came out into open session the question then was, "shall this bill pass?" It had got to its final passage almost, except the vote, in this executive or secret session. When the doors were opened, the Chair stated:

The question now before the Senate is, the bill having been read three times, shall it pass?

I remember then making some suggestions in regard to that matter. We had acted on that amendment, not before the people, and came into open session on the passage of the bill. It is not proper for me to state what occurred in executive session, but I can state what appears from the public papers.

It is time to emphasize the fact that it was necessary to go into an executive session to hide the purpose of this appropriation of $250,000. That was done without telling it to the public and to the world. But evidently the object of the appropriation that was proposed was to pay this money out to the parties having this concession under the pretense that it might lapse in October; and yet the money was not paid and evidently the concession is not gone, because, I suppose, if you run over the list of corporations here you will find this Maritime Canal Company. I do not know what is the title of the bill now under consideration. I have not looked at it. A friend hands it to me. Here it is:

"To incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua." It seems to be the same thing. It is the "Monsieur Tonson come again." It did not disappear in October, 1884, as we were told it would if we failed to appropriate the quarter of a million.

Thus it seems that there is no danger of losing the chance of connecting the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific, or making a canal between the two.

Now, that that point seems to be settled, before I sit down, I desire to offer the amendment which I offered to the Tehuantepec bill when that was under consideration.

I merely make these suggestions to call for some information because I want to ascertain exactly what these projects are, and whether those that were living three years ago and fifty years ago are in existence to-day. I send up the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is not now in order, as there are amendments of the Committee on Foreign Relations pending. His amendment will be presented when they are disposed of. The question is on the amendment which has been read. It will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 1, line 19, after the word "made," insert "or to be made to them, or those to whom they may succeed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in line 20 of section 1, after the words "by the," to strike out "Republic" and insert "Republics."

Mr. HOAR. It is a very small matter, but it is very clear that the word "Republic" ought to stay to make it grammatical, so as to read:

Republic of Nicaragua, or Costa Rica, or both.

If you say "Republics," the words "or both" would be out of place. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that the word "Republic" should remain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right. That is a clerical error. "Republic" should stand before the words "of Nicaragua" instead of the plural.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was after the word "Nicaragua," in line 20, of section 1, to insert "or Costa Rica, or both," so as to read:

The Republic of Nicaragua, or Costa Rica, or both.

The next amendment was in section 4, line 4, after the words "granted in," to strike out "said" and insert "such;" in line 5, after the word "concession," to insert "or concessions;" in line 7, after the word "stipulations," to insert "of the United States;" and in line 8, after the word "Nicaragua," to strike out "for the protection of a ship-canal within the territory of Nicaragua;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That for the management and disposition of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the said company the board of directors may make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as may conform to the authority granted in such canal concession or concessions, and not to be inconsistent with this act or the laws of the United States, or the then existing treaty stipulations of the United States with the Government of Nicaragua, and may fix the time for election of directors, and in case of vacancy in said board, caused by death, resignation, or otherwise among elected directors, may fill the same. No person except the directors appointed by the respective Governments of Nicaragua and the United States shall be a director who is not a stockholder, and any one ceasing to be a stockholder shall cease to be a director.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 5, line 28, after the words "report to," to insert "the Governments of the United States and Nicaragua and;" so as to read:

Said directors shall make an annual report to the Governments of the United States and Nicaragua and to the stockholders of their proceedings, receipts, and expenditures, verified by the affidavits of the president and of at least six of the directors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 6. That no part of the capital stock paid in shall be at any time withdrawn or returned to the stockholders or in any manner diverted from the proper uses of the corporation. Every person violating or aiding in the violation of the foregoing provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend that amendment by striking out the first word, "that," and by inserting instead thereof what I will read:

That no certifiates for stock shall be issued till at least 10 per cent. of the same shall be fully paid for in money, at the par value of said stock, and the money deposited in the treasury of said company; and said stock shall not be assignable until the whole of the same shall have been so paid in; and no payment on account of the capital of said company shall be made except in money; and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid. No bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received shall be authorized or issued until such paid capital shall amount to the sum of $5,000,000.

I will send it to the Secretary to read in a moment; but before he reads it, as I have read it myself, I wish to say that that is precisely what was put, by I believe a unanimous vote of the Senate after discussion, in the bill passed the other day, except that I have inserted in it a provision which I am sure will have no objection from any quarter, that no payment on account of the capital of said company shall be made except in money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is in the first part of the print.

Mr. HOAR. "No certificate shall be issued until at least 10 per cent. of the same shall be fully paid for in money, and the stock shall not be assignable until the whole has been paid in," and the payment in money in the clause the Senator refers to only applies to the 10 per cent. It is very clear that no bogus or pretended payment ought to be permitted of any part of the capital.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why did not the Senator think of that when we passed the Tehuantepec bill?

Mr. HOAR. I did not think of it. I should have thought of it. I think of something in the Tehuantepec bill in another place which covers it, but I will see about that presently. The amendment to the Tehuantepec bill was moved by the Senator from Nebraska, and it was amended on my suggestion; and this particular clause——

Mr. VEST. Here is a copy of the Tehuantepec amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I have one here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have it.

Mr. HOAR. I think it is somewhere in substance in the Tehuantepec bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a very good provision, and I am sorry the friends of the Tehuantepec bill did not think of it when that bill went through. But it is a very good thing, and I have no objection to the language of the amendment as it was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to say in reply to the Senator from Vermont that it was in substance and legal effect in the Tehuantepec bill in this, that it provided that none of the certificates of stock should be assignable until the whole of the value thereof had been so paid in. It did not contain an express and distinct prohibition of paying in anything but money, but in the Tehuantepec bill the stock remained absolutely unnegotiable and only valuable to the original owners unless it had been actually paid for in money; so that this is merely a little fuller expression of what is in vigor and substance there. But still the Senator is quite right in his criticism. I did not think of it at that time. I certainly would have put it in if I had thought of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will add simply that the second section of this bill provides in legal effect precisely the same thing. They are to pay, and then having paid it provides that no money shall be taken out. So I will say that I have not the least objection at all to this provision.

Mr. HOAR. But the second section of the bill does not provide that they shall pay in money; it only provides what it shall consist in. There is not in either the Tehuantepec bill or in this as it now stands any express prohibition of bogus payments, payments in road building or in articles of inflated value, but there is a provision in the Tehuantepec bill, and it is now proposed here, that no stock shall be assignable unless it has been paid for in money, which is pretty much the same thing; but I have introduced what was not thought of then, a direct and express provision; that is all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was thought of in the Committee on Foreign Relations in reporting the bill now under consideration, and if my friend will read section 2, at the bottom of page 5, the clause that I now read, he will see it:

When the president of the company shall have certified that not less than $5,000,000 have been subscribed to said stock by responsible persons, and when 10 per cent. thereof shall have been paid in in cash, a meeting of stockholders may be called.

Mr. HOAR. Where is that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is at the top of page 6.

Mr. HOAR. That is only 10 per cent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly.

Mr. HOAR. Where is the rest of it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we come to the provision that no certificates of stock shall be issued until 10 per cent. shall be paid in money.

Mr. HOAR. Where is the other 90 per cent. provided for?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it is provided that no part of the capital stock shall be withdrawn; then it is provided that the other payments shall be called for in dollars, and shall be paid in as they are called for, and the money shall be deposited in the Treasury, &c.; and then that if the amount of $10,000,000 shall not have been subscribed and 10 per centum paid in the whole thing shall be forfeited. But, as I say, the amendment proposed is a mere repetition of what is in the bill, except as to the issue of bonds, and I have not the least objection to it.

Mr. HOAR. I am sure when my honorable friend reflects a little more he will see that he is in error. The bill as it is reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations does provide that 10 per cent. of the capital shall be paid in money, and shall not be returned. So far so good; but there is 90 per cent. more which may get in by bogus contracts for road-building and material, by a check which is returned; and the Committee on Foreign Relations have not provided for the payment of that sum in money at all.

The Senator has not read anything which my amendment covers. He goes on to state that it shall be paid, it shall not be taken out, and so on. That being the case, I propose two things: first, the provision that no stock shall be assignable unless the whole of it has been paid in full in money, which is not in now, and was in the Tehuantepec bill; and then I propose to add to that, which was not in the Tehuantepec bill and is not in this, an express provision that the whole capital paid shall be paid in money, and nothing else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for one moment? I simply want to have a resolution referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; but I do not yield my right to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the resolution introduced by me on the 17th of December be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it about?

Mr. BUTLER. It is about the appointment of a committee to go to Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks that a resolution be taken from the table for reference. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. BUTLER December 17, 1886, as follows:

Whereas the close proximity of Mexico to this country, the increasing commerce between the two countries, and the common interests of the two republics in many respects make it most desirable that there should exist between them the closest ties of friendship: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to visit such places along the frontier as they may deem proper, and also the City of Mexico, with the approval of the Mexican Government, in order to inquire into and report upon any disturbances that may have occurred between citizens of the two countries; and if any disturbances have occurred to inquire and report the cause thereof. That said committee may send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer, and such other persons as may be necessary for the proper accomplishment of the object and purposes of said inquiry. That said committee may sit during the recess of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution at this time for immediate consideration, and I assure the Senate that I will not indulge in one single remark about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the resolution proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Wednesday, the 23d instant, at the usual hour, in honor of the memory of the Father of his Country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am paired generally with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]; but as I believe his patriotism would not permit him to vote against the resolution, I shall vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 42; as follows:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2890) donating certain lots to the city of Saint Augustine, Fla., for public schools, parks, and a public library, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 432) donating certain lots to the city of Saint Augustine, Fla., for public schools, parks, and a public library, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 6974) to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States; which was ordered to be printed.

NICARAGUA MARITIME CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2636) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations will be stated.

The next amendment was, in section [6] 7, line 3, after the word "channel" to insert "shall be reasonable and;" and in line 10, after the word "thereof," to insert "reasonable rates;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That the aggregate of all charges, dues, and towage collected by said company for the transit of any vessel through the channel shall be reasonable and shall not exceed the rate of $2.50, gold coin, per ton weight, or per 40 cubic feet measurement (according to the usage from time to time observed by steamship companies engaged in a carrying trade in the Pacific Ocean), of the total of all cargo, fuel and supplies included, on board any vessel in transit; but said company may, at its option, charge in lieu thereof reasonable rates not exceeding $1.25 per ton actual displacement of any steam-vessel and $1.75 per ton of the actual displacement of any sailing vessel passing through the canal. But nothing herein contained shall bind the said company to do any towing except such as may be essential to the proper and safe working of the locks and to the general safety and preservation of the canal; and for towing other than this the company may collect reasonable charges over and above the aggregate charges above mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a misprint there. In line 3 it reads "channel;" it should be "canal." I move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ventures to suggest that the word "channel" is broader and will include the lake.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I will withdraw the amendment then. The lake is a part of the canal, but I will withdraw it.

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in section [7] 8, line 3, after the word "Nicaragua," to insert:

And not inconsistent with any treaty obligations of the United States that may exist with any power.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That the United States shall exercise such control over the canal as is now or may at any time be provided for by treaty with Nicaragua, and not inconsistent with any treaty obligations of the United States that may exist with any power, and shall, upon payment of one-half of the customary rates, enjoy its unobstructed use for the transportation of troops, munitions of war, and mails, and otherwise, as far as the same shall be in accordance with stipulations in existing or future treaties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 9. That if stock to the amount of $10,000,000 shall not be subscribed, and 10 per cent. thereof actually paid in, before the expiration of two years next after the passage of this act, or if the work of constructing said canal shall not be actually commenced before and be in progress at the expiration of four years next after the passage of this act, the said corporation shall be deemed to have expired by limitation, and all its franchises and privileges shall be deemed to have absolutely ceased and become determined.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 10. That nothing in this act contained shall be held or construed to in any manner involve the United States in any pecuniary obligations whatever other than in respect of the payment of tolls as provided in section 8 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [8] 11, line 2, after the word "alter," to strike out "or;" in the same line, after the word "amend," to insert "or repeal;" and in line 3, after the word "require," to strike out "but not in violation of the rights of the company considered in equity;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That Congress shall at all times have the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act when in its judgment the public good may require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This completes the amendments reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] has submitted an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 2, add the following:

That no certificates for stock shall be issued till the same shall be fully paid for in money, at the par value of said stock, and the money deposited in the treasury of said company; and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or repaying any part of the money so paid. No bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received shall be authorized or issued until such paid capital shall amount to the sum of $10,000,000; and no bonds shall be issued or disposed of at less than par value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All that has been covered by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Inasmuch as it embraces the same provision embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to offer one other amendment. In section 7, line 4, before the word "coin," I move to strike out the word "gold;" so as to read:

Shall not exceed the rate of $2.50, coin.

Not gold coin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right; no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "gold" will be stricken out as indicated, there being no objection.

Mr. VEST. At the end of section 2, after line 34, I move to add:

But no amendment to or change in the by-laws shall be made except by a majority vote of the stockholders, either personally or by proxy, and at a meeting called for the purpose. At least twenty days notice of any such meeting shall be published in a newspaper of general circulation in the city where the principal office of the company is located.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. In section 5, after the word "proxy," in line 14, I move to strike out the following words:

The annual meetings of the stockholders of said corporation shall be held for the transaction of business, the time and place and notice of such meetings to be prescribed in the by-laws, such time and place to be changed by vote of the stockholders.

And to insert:

All meetings of the stockholders shall be held at the office of the company in the city of New York, and at least one such meeting shall be held in each year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that in the Tehuantepec bill?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I move to add, as a final section to the bill:

SEC. 12. That this act shall have no force or effect until the incorporators herein named shall have secured from the Government of Nicaragua a concession authorizing them to construct and operate the canal, and until said concession shall have been submitted to and approved by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I do not agree to by any means.

Mr. VEST. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, as distinctly and as sharply as I can, that we are now giving an incorporation to this company with a provision in that act which binds us to the terms of any concession that may hereafter be granted by Nicaragua to this company.

As a matter of course the Senate will remember that for three weeks I struggled here day after day against the objections made persistently and consistently by the advocates of this bill to the concession which was granted by Mexico to Captain Eads. There was not a sentence in that concession which was not subjected to hypercritical comment. It was said that that bill ought not to be passed because it committed the Government of the United States to a concession the terms of which were not only imperfect but absolutely inimical to the interests of this country.

Now we are asked deliberately to pass an act which commits us to such a concession as may hereafter be made, without anything but mere imagination and supposition as to the terms of that concession. We know what has been the history of the past in regard to these Nicaraguan negotiations. We know that from time to time with every negotiation had with that Government has come a demand for money, for a protectorate, for committing the Government of the United States with all its naval and land forces to the protection of the territorial integrity of Nicaragua.

I want the Senate before this vote is taken to understand distinctly that after for three weeks the friends of the Tehuantepec ship-railway were subjected day after day to all sorts of opposition on account of the concession which was spread before the Senate, made by Mexico to Captain Eads, we are now asked to pass this bill without any concession at all and without knowing what Nicaragua may demand of the United States in the future.

The newspapers of the country have stated, and the communication which was laid upon our tables from Mr. Bayard, the Secretary of State, in response to the resolution of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] also states, that the treaty which was rejected by the United States, known as the Frelinghuysen treaty, under the last administration demanded on the part of Nicaragua the loan of $4,000,000, the guarantee of a territorial unity or integrity, as they expressed it, and we to build every foot of this canal, which, according to Mr. McFarland, the Army engineer who made the survey of it, is to cost $140,000,000 to start with.

In the communication which Mr. Bayard lays before us it appears that there is a new factor in these negotiations hitherto unknown. Costa Rica appears now and claims that it owns the right bank of the San Juan River, and it claims one-ninth of the net proceeds of the canal before it can be built across the territory. Here in this paper is found the agreement between Nicaragua and Costa Rica to leave that territorial question to the arbitrament of the President of the United States. In his communication the Secretary of State says:

Protracted negotiations ensued, and within the past few days the gratifying intelligence has been received that a convention has been signed between Nicaragua and Costa Rica for the arbitration of their boundary dispute by the President of the United States. This convention only awaits ratification and exchange to be a full and final disposition of the question of jurisdiction. Inasmuch as a knowledge of this transaction appears to be essential to the examination of any project for a ship-canal by way of Lake Nicaragua, the undersigned deems it proper to lay before the President copies of a certain correspondence on the subject, with a view of the transmission of the same to the Senate, as responsive to the resolution of December 21, 1886, as being in the line of the requested information.

Respectfully submitted.

T. F. BAYARD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 25, 1887.

If my strength or the patience of the Senate permitted I could go on and read from this communication the demand of Costa Rica, made not only upon Nicaragua, but upon the Government of the United States, that we should proceed no further in this matter until Costa Rica is guaranteed one-ninth of the net proceeds of the tolls upon this canal. Nicaragua admits that there is a territorial claim unsettled between those States. There is no concession in existence at all with this company, and yet we are asked now blindly to pass this act of incorporation and commit ourselves by the terms of this bill to whatever Nicaragua may demand of us in the future.

Mr. President, what is the object of passing this bill at this time? It was never thought of until the Tehuantepec bill was introduced into Congress. So soon as Captain Eads gave up any demand upon his part for a single dollar, either of guarantee or of grant upon the part of the people of the United States, the Committee on Foreign Relations waked up suddenly to the importance, concession or no concession, of bringing in a bill for incorporating a company that has no concession at all, and binding the Government of the United States to construct this canal, with a disputed boundary between Costa Rica and Nicaragua, to commit ourselves to all the military necessities which we know must arise from its construction, to the building a navy, to the having an army ready to march by land in order to defend Lake Nicaragua.

The members of that same committee are the identical Senators who for three weeks impeded at every step the Tehuantepec ship-railway bill, because they said the concession from Mexico was not sufficiently favorable to the Tehuantepec Ship-Railway Company. I say there is no concession to this company. I know what the Senator from Alabama in front of me claims that the treaty of 1867 between Nicaragua and the United States gave sufficient rights to the citizens of this country, whether incorporated or acting as individuals. Let us read it and see if that be so.

Mr. MORGAN. What treaty does the Senator read from?

Mr. VEST. I read from page 632 of Treaties and Conventions, the fourteenth section of the treaty between Nicaragua and the United States made the 21st of June, 1867:

ARTICLE XIV.

The Republic of Nicaragua hereby grants to the United States, and to their citizens and property, the right of transit between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, through the territory of that republic, on any route of communication, natural or artificial, whether by land or by water, which may now or hereafter exist or be constructed under the authority—

Mark the language—

under the authority of Nicaragua, to be used and enjoyed in the same manner and upon equal terms by both republics and their respective citizens; the Republic of Nicaragua, however, reserving its rights of sovereignity over the same.

When the concession from Mexico to Captain Eads was under discussion and when a clause was brought to the attention of the Senate which provided that the Tehuantepec Company should be a Mexican corporation and under the sovereignty of Mexico, the alarm and indignation of my friends on the other side of this question was instantly aroused. Yet they stand here now upon nothing else but the treaty of 1867 between Nicaragua and the United States, which provides that any isthmian transit over the territory of Nicaragua shall be under the rights of sovereignty of that State.

What does this treaty give? It simply gives to the citizens of the United States the same rights that the citizens of Nicaragua have over any transit hereafter constructed, nothing more and nothing less. As to the terms upon which that transit shall be constructed, there is not one word in the treaty. Suppose hereafter Nicaragua comes in and says, "We will give no concession to this corporation except on condition that we shall have absolute control in every respect over this canal."

Mr. MORGAN. They will have to get rid of the fifteenth article of the treaty before they can do that. If you will read on you will see.

Mr. VEST. I will read that article of the treaty.

ARTICLE XV.

The United States hereby agree to extend their protection to all such routes of communication as aforesaid, and to guarantee the neutrality and innocent use of the same.

That is, the United States.

They also agree to employ their influence with other nations to induce them to guarantee such neutrality and protection.

And the Republic of Nicaragua, on its part, undertakes to establish one free port at each extremity of one of the aforesaid routes of communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. At these ports no tonnage or other duties shall be imposed or levied by the Government of Nicaragua on the vessels of the United States, or on any effects or merchandise belonging to citizens or subjects of the United States, or upon the vessels or effects of any other country intended, bona fide, for transit across the said routes of communication, and not for consumption within the Republic of Nicaragua.

The United States shall also be at liberty, on giving notice to the government or authorities of Nicaragua, to carry troops and munitions of war in their own vessels, or otherwise, to either of said free ports, and shall be entitled to their conveyance between them without obstruction by said Government or authorities, and without any charges or tolls whatever for their transportation on either of said routes; provided said troops and munitions of war are not intended to be employed against Central American nations friendly to Nicaragua. And no higher or other charges or tolls shall be imposed on the conveyance or transit of persons and property of citizens or subjects of the United States, or of any other country, across the said routes of communication, than are or may be imposed on the persons and property of citizens of Nicaragua.

And the Republic of Nicaragua concedes the right of the Postmaster-General of the United States to enter into contracts for carrying the mail, &c.

Is the Senate called upon now to grant this act of incorporation on these terms and none other? Suppose that Nicaragua hereafter demands a loan of $10,000,000, and that the United States shall pledge itself to maintain the territorial integrity of Nicaragua, are we to be asked now to commit ourselves in advance to any such stipulation? We are taking this leap in the dark. We have no more idea except by analogy to the past what Nicaragua will demand than we have of any other transaction that may occur in coming years. We know by the past what Nicaragua will demand. We know they will demand money. There never was one of those Latin governments that was ever willing to do anything without a payment of money.

Mr. MORGAN. Mexico is no Latin government.

Mr. VEST. Mexico is partaking now to a large extent of the spirit and civilization of the United States, and I am glad to know it. Look now at the condition of the two governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua. They are quarreling and scrambling over the plunder that is to come from the Government of the United States—this great, rich, powerful northern Republic. Costa Rica says it owns the right bank of the San Juan River, and that the enormous embankment of Menocal's, a mile and a quarter long and 51 feet high, shall not be constructed without the consent of Costa Rica; but, mark it, they demand in addition a guarantee of one-ninth of the net profits of this canal, built with the money of the people of the United States, before they will give up the right bank of the river for the construction even of that embankment.

We have heard in the past that Nicaragua wanted $4,000,000, besides our building the canal and pledging ourselves to maintain her territorial unity and integrity. What are they to demand in the future? If I had come here with my feeble efforts to defend such a bill as I did the Tehuantepec ship-railway bill, I can hear the Senator from Vermont now with indignant denunciation, exclaim, "Is it possible, before gods or men, that we are asked to do this thing?"

Mr. President, I propose to state as briefly as I can the objections to the bill.

This company has no concession from the State, or States, rather, through which the canal is to pass. What the conditions of any concession that may be obtained will be we can not even guess at this time. They may be such as to make the passage of this bill granting a charter of great injury to the United States.

Permit me to inquire why is there such hot haste in giving this act of incorporation to the gentlemen named in the bill? Why are we to incorporate them and pledge ourselves to a concession, the terms of which we do not know? What is to become of the concession after it is put into the hands of this company? Are we, as was proposed by Mr. Frelinghuysen, to step in then with national aid and buy the concession from the company? Why is it that we are not permitted to know upon what terms this canal is to be built, but we are to pledge ourselves in the dim and unknown future to whatever terms may be prescribed by a foreign government?

As is well known, and as it has been brought out in the debate on the ship-railway, we run solidly against England in granting a charter to a company to build a canal at Nicaragua. She has strongly asserted her right to a share in this inter-oceanic transit, and she will do so again; for the reason that it is her commerce that will use the canal more than that of any other nation of the earth, and her necessity for holding her rights there is consequently greater than that of any other nation. I know it is claimed here that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been terminated, but if terminated it has been by indirection and by construction, and we know the English people and Government too well to imagine for a single instant that they will ever give up their right of protectorate over this transit if they find once that there is a possibility of its being about to be constructed.

The Senator from Massachusetts has, with great care, brought together the facts to show the strategic disadvantages to us of a canal at Nicaragua, and with consummate skill he has brought them to our attention.

The enormous expense attending the construction of a canal at Nicaragua has not been fully appreciated, for the reason that the estimates that have been made for it have been entirely inadequate. To charter a company with a capital of $100,000,000 in securities, when the work will cost double that sum, would be an unwise thing for Congress to do.

The impracticability of using the canal and its harbors if constructed according to the plans presented to us.

The first three propositions, or objections rather, I will not discuss at this time, but the last two I propose now to take up and to show by documentary evidence that they are so serious that they preclude Congress from granting a charter for any enterprise that is based on such inadequate examinations, plans, and estimates.

Preliminary to this discussion, and as a matter of information, and to bring before the Senate an examination of the route and a careful study of the subject by an experienced engineer of the Army, who was not part owner in a concession and had no fortune to make by floating a canal scheme, I will ask the Clerk to read the report of Col. Walter McFarland, United States Engineer, which is said to have been suppressed by the promoters of the canal scheme, who were some of them high officials under this Government.

This report will show how inadequate the plans and estimates are, particularly in reference to the improvements of the harbors, and careful attention to the reading of the report will impress the Senate with the carefulness bestowed upon the subject and bring out by contrast the lack of these important features in the later reports on the canal. Previous to the reading of this report I will call attention to one important discrepancy only, and that is in the estimate for the improvement of Greytown Harbor on the Carribbean Sea, which, by the estimate of Mr. Menocal, the naval engineer, will cost $1,766,625, but by the estimate of Major McFarland, $9,500,000. I read first, however, some extracts, which I have marked, from a report on Greytown Harbor by a committee of the National Academy of Sciences in 1866, and also some extracts from a report on the same subject by Prof. Henry Mitchell in 1874, being appendix 12 of the Coast Survey report of 1874; and I will then read the report of Major McFarland.

2. GREYTOWN HARBOR—ITS DECLINE AND MEANS OF IMPROVEMENT.

Greytown Harbor is situated just within a projection of the shore of Nicaragua, at the southern extremity of a slight bend or concavity in the general coast line. This harbor is protected from the sea by a strip of sand which stretches westward from the aforesaid projection and bears the name of Isla Castilla, or Punta Arenas. This harbor receives the waters of two off-sets of the San Juan River.

The earliest source of information that we feel warranted in using is the sketch to be found in Mr. Molina's work upon Costa Rica, which is based upon a survey by George Peacock, in 1832, and has additions showing the progress of the sands of Isla Castilla down to 1848.

In 1832 five fathoms of water could be carried from sea to a point within the present basin of Greytown Harbor through an opening which measured 1¼ miles from Isla Castilla to the west shore. At that time the avenue to the sea was without a bar, and the regular decline of the bottom along the seaward channelway gave no indications of the action of scouring forces. There was no depression at the harbor's mouth and no accumulations beyond that seemed in any way to be a dependency upon the existence of the basin or its outlet. The shallow ground lying along the coast outside of Isla Castilla and projecting beyond to the westward would seem, upon Mr. Molina's sketch, to be a concomitant or parallel to this island as well as an outwork in the advance. Subsequent surveys, however, dissolve this apparent connection and relation.

The embouchure of the lower San Juan River is found in this first survey at the head of the anchorage basin, and the deposits of that stream appear to be nearly 2 miles within the harbor's mouth.

Between 1832 and 1834 a movement of the sands to the westward occurred which extended the point of Isla Castilla about 456 feet per annum. This extension took the form of a hook. From 1834 to 1835 the point advanced 608 feet. Four years later, in 1839, it was found to have advanced 1,065 feet, or at the rate of 266 feet per annum. Between 1839 and 1840 it had advanced about 400 feet. Between 1840 and 1848, a space of nearly eight years, it advanced 221 feet per year, and in the next succeeding ten months 913 feet were added, or the beach grew at the rate of nearly 1,100 feet per annum. The harbor as a protection to shipping had been improving up to the last date upon Mr. Molina's sketch, but its opening from the sea had become reduced to about 0.8 of a mile—a loss of over 50 per cent.

Our next authority is a chart issued by the hydrographic office of Great Britain, from surveys of 1853-'56 and 1859.

In 1853 we find the mouth of the harbor, measured on the same line as before, reduced to 0.52 of a mile—a reduction of 35 per cent. since 1848. In this period of four and a quarter years the sand-spit made an average annual advance of 401 feet. The physical character of the harbor had thus far undergone no change; the same good depth of water could be carried in; the same gradual decline of the bottom to seaward was preserved and no bar or shoal lay in front. The point of Isla Castilla, called on this more recent map Punta Arenas, had been made across the floor of the sea by sands thrown in from above, not scoured from the bottom; it was built out like a mole, the material taking nearly its natural slope, and not suffering waste under the action of any currents from within. In this chart of 1853, an opening through the beach is found about at the extremity of the Castilla—of 1832. As a physical feature it does not yet seem important.

The survey of 1856 found the dry portion of Point Arenas advanced nearly due south from its position in 1853, and a gradual shoaling off to the westward, reducing the harbor's mouth to 0.3 of a mile. At this time the point was broad and hooked. The same depth of water could be carried in as formerly, and no bar was found outside.

Between October, 1856, and January, 1859, two and a quarter years, Point Arenas advanced to the southwest 1,156, or at the rate of 514 feet per annum. Even as late as 1859, when the harbor's mouth was reduced to 0.13 of a mile, the only trace of any action within was the retreat of the 18-foot line on the west shore.

According to a note upon the British chart the entrance was reduced to 300 feet in 1861; while in January, 1865, Captain Jones, of Her Majesty's ship Shannon, reports "that the entrance has a bar across it after a norther, though after a continuance of fine weather the scour of the river increases the depth to 8 or 10 feet. The passage on the opposite side has also reduced to 50 or 60 yards."

Our final authority is the survey made under the direction of Capt. P. C. F. West, who brought to the field the skill and accuracy of long experience in the Coast Survey, to which corps he belongs.

In this survey, made in February, 1865, the change in the physical character of the harbor, shadowed forth in the note that we quoted from the British chart, is confirmed. The anchorage basin has become a lagoon, with an uncertain inlet. Between Point Arenas and the opposite shore a depression of 20 feet is found, to reach which 17½ feet must be passed in the approach from the harbor, and 8 feet in the approach from the sea. Here we have the depression at the opening, and the bar outside, which are the characteristics of a true inlet, for which we have looked in vain upon the earlier charts.

The unsteady progress of Point Arenas since 1832 does not necessarily imply an irregularity in the action of the causes, nor a fluctuation in the supply of material. In an unpublished report by Henry L. Whiting, assistant in the Coast Survey, relative to the extension of Sandy Hook and the closing of Shrewsbury Inlet, it is said that the movement of the sands along the coast is often in horizontal curves or projections which advance like dunes, by the drifting of sands from rear to front, so that to an observer any single point chosen upon the beach the shore-line will for a few months seem to creep out, then remain stationary for a while, then retrograde. In this case the movement from rear to front is in the horizontal, whereas in dunes it is in the vertical plane.

After the completion of the general survey Captain West's party found in May that the opening at Greytown Harbor had closed, and that a break had been made further to the westward.

Captain West says of this break that "a channel opened when sufficient water had accumulated in the harbor, through the sand at the place marked on the sheet, which has remained open ever since, the water on the bar varying in depth as the river water varies in volume (affected also by the action of the sea), about 5 feet being the average." A letter from J. E. Hollenbeck, dated San Juan del Norte, 1st March, 1866, says of this break: "The inhabitants of this place were compelled to dig a channel through the sand-bank to prevent the town from inundation (the effect of the sea banking the sand up higher than the level of the town). The channel cut by the inhabitants here was at first 4 feet wide and from 4 to 8 feet deep, but in five days there was such a head of water accumulated after opening this small channel in one night it cut an outlet to the sea 80 yards wide and 9 feet deep, and from this time to January, 1866, the channel varied just in proportion to the water in the river."

From Mr. Hollenbeck's statement it would appear that the sand beach went on increasing by the action of the sea after the harbor had closed.

It is not till we reach Captain West's survey that we detect any essential alteration in the depths of the central portion of the anchorage basin. The depths, 1832 to 1859, were 4 fathoms; in 1865, 22 feet. The material of the bottom is now soft black mud, no doubt vegetable mold and clay from the river, which, being suspensible, have been carried out beyond the delta and dropped in the still basin, to which is added fine sand blown in from Point Arenas.

The area of the anchorage basin bounded by the 18-foot curve in 1853 was 385, in 1856, 295, and in 1865, 132 acres. In a period of twelve years it shrank to one-third of its former area.

APPENDIX NO. 12.—REPORT ON AN INSPECTION OF THE TERMINAL POINTS OF THE PROPOSED CANALS THROUGH NICARAGUA AND THE ISTHMUS OF DARIEN, BY PROFESSOR H. MITCHELL, UNITED STATES COAST SURVEY.

GREYTOWN (SAN JUAN DEL NORTE).

The examination of the coast in the immediate neighborhood of Greytown and the outlets of the Lower San Juan River has satisfied me that a reconstruction of the harbor is practicable. This conclusion is based upon a particular conception of the causes which led to the destruction of the old port, and a conviction that these causes, still active, may be successfully resisted by artificial works. I quote the following from the report of the Committee of the National Academy, made in 1866:

"History of Greytown Harbor.—The earliest source of information that we feel warranted in using is the sketch to be found in Mr. Molina's work upon Costa Rica, which is based upon a survey by George Peacock in 1832, and has additions showing the progress of the sands of Isla Castilla down to 1848.

"After the completion of the general survey, Captain West's party found, in May, that the opening at Greytown Harbor had closed, and that a breach had been made farther to the westward."

Causes of the decline and final destruction of the harbor.—The quotations which I have made from the report of the academy indicate somewhat the view entertained by the committee regarding the causes which formed and ultimately destroyed the harbor; but I may be permitted to restate the matter briefly from a review of other portions of the same report.

The harbor of Greytown was originally a re-entrant angle or cove, lying between the delta of the San Juan River and the adjacent coast to the northwestward. Near the head of this cove there entered an offset of the San Juan River (bearing the name of the parent stream originally, but recently, for distinction, called the Lower San Juan), which formed a subsidiary delta of its own within the cove.

This cove, opening to the northward, was in the course of time converted into a lagoon by a mole of sand driven across the mouth by the waves from the northeastward, which swept past the outer shore of the main delta. It became a harbor easy of entrance and perfect in shelter at the intermediate stage, when the mole had reached within a couple of miles of the main shore to the westward, at which time the channel way from the basin to the sea was in nowise dependent upon the outflow of the Lower San Juan, nor upon the tides, but was simply an avenue, not yet encroached upon, whose bed was the original floor of the ocean. It was not until the mole had nearly crossed to the opposite shore that the river outflow and the tides began to act upon the bed and banks of the outlet, resisting the absolute closure of the basin.

Opposed to the view of the case stated above is another, quite different in character, which has been urged by nearly all the engineers who have visited Nicaragua, and is not to be ignored, because, if it is the correct view, it materially alters the question of the practicability of a restoration, or, at all events, modifies the plan of improvement. In stating this opposite theory of the case, I shall, as nearly as I can remember, repeat the words of Don Maximillian Sonnenstern, the accomplished engineer of Nicaragua:

"The sand-bar (Punta Arenas) which now separates the Greytown basin from the sea is a part of the delta of the Lower San Juan River, and is formed from material swept down this river in floods. In former times the Lower San Juan received a much larger proportion of the waters of the parent stream, and was able to maintain a grand opening to the sea; but recently the main river has chosen to send its waters to the sea by the Colorado, and in this way the Lower San Juan has been deprived of the power of pushing its débris into the sea and thus maintaining a ship-channel through Punta Arenas."

I think I have stated the two theories fairly, and it only remains to add a few considerations which have confirmed me in the view held by the committee of the academy.

First. Standing upon the outer beach of Punta Arenas, I have been witness to the movement of the sand to the westward. The waves drive on diagonally (at an angle of 45°), carrying up the strand gravel, shells, &c., which, upon the recoil, are, for the most part, carried down again to the sea, but in a direction normal to the shore-line. In this way, by a zigzag movement, the sands, &c., travel slowly along the coast, and pile themselves up against the main shore to leeward. It is precisely the same movement that has formed Long Point at Provincetown and Sandy Hook at New York. The only difference is that at Provincetown or New York we have the mole in that earlier stage of its formation at which it acts as a breakwater and not a barrier.

In the interval between Captain West's survey of 1865 and that of Commander Lull's of 1872–'73 there accumulated upon the western shore, to leeward of the inlets through which the river waters had been discharged, over 25 acres of dry sands in addition to that found by Captain West. A single line of levels over these sands, made by Mr. Menocal and myself, gave 6½ feet summit elevation over the site of the ship-channel of fifteen years ago.

Second. The sands, &c., composing Punta Arenas are like many other beaches, as far as regards the size of the grains, &c., both on the ocean and basin sides.* In other words the mole is built of selected material, sifted out by the long-continued action of the sea—the work, not of a few years, but of centuries perhaps. These selections have been made from a vast deposit of mud, of which they form an exceedingly small proportion.†

Third. The once grand entrance of Greytown could not have been maintained by the San Juan, even if it had been the only avenue of discharge from the main artery. One has only to divide the discharge (measured by any of the engineers) into the cross-sections of the ship-channel given upon the old charts, to discover how powerless the seaward flow must have been. From the best computation that I can make with the data at hand, I find that in 1832 the section of the entrance to Greytown was seventy times the area that we have now in the Lower San Juan at the head of the passes; eighteen times the section of the main river above the Colorado in dry seasons, and seven times the sections of the main river in "top-gallant floods." Even as late as 1853 the section at the entrance to Greytown Harbor was five times as great as that of the main river.

Our purpose in stating the accumulations in this triangular space separately is to give some measure of the rapidity with which the material is likely to advance toward the end of any jetty or groin which may be extended from the beach, with a view of arresting the progress of the sands which might tend to incumber an artificial opening through the beach. We shall refer to this matter again presently from another point of view, but must pause here to consider the relations of the river to the beach.

The material of Punta Arenas, like other beaches, is sand sifted by the sea. It is probably derived indirectly from the San Juan River, precisely as the sands which are encroaching upon the western pier of Port Said are derived from the Nile; but we have no data for computing how long ago the river delivered to the ocean the enormous mass of mud from which these grains of sand have been so carefully selected. River muds are usually over 90 per cent. sand, but mostly very fine sand as compared with that on outside beaches. In illustration, I will recall an incident connected with our physical survey of Mobile River and Bay made a dozen or more years ago. Along the shore of this bay, in Garrow's Bend, there is a little belt of white sand which I could not believe was the product of the dash of the waves against the bluff, because the latter was composed of a very fine yellow clay.

General Totten, however, to whom I gave specimens of both materials, succeeded, by treating the clay with acids, and by laborious washing, in detecting a few grains of the very same sand which lay at the foot of the bluff; but the
